THE QUIVER.

"THE QUIVER" GOOD CONDUCT PRIZES.

ALBERT E. S. WATTS.

POSSIBLY we are beginning to learn in these days the lesson that, as a stimulating power, kicks are not so potent as halfpence, that in the long run encouragement will do infinitely more than all the driving in the world. It is strange that it has taken so many centuries to learn so simple a lesson, if, indeed, we have yet learned it; for how many masters and employers of labour we still find who seem to think that no work can be carried forward without a continuous stream of fault-finding and grumbling!

Still, we are beginning to find that the Irishman's idea of suspending a carrot before his donkey's nose is far more efficacious than any amount of belabouring in the rear. Hence we see that in our educational establishments the ferule and the birch are fallen from their high estate, and scholarships, prizes, awards, allurements of one sort or another, are held temptingly before the gaze of the rising generation. And with good effect too; for, with a wisdom equal to that of the Irishman's steed, the young idea breaks into a brisk trot along the path of knowledge, and—happy consummation!—in the exercise develops a love of knowledge for its own sake, of excellence for excellence' sake, and so can dispense with the carrot.

There are some few who object strongly to prizes of any sort whatever. "Virtue for virtue's sake," say they, "knowledge for the love of knowledge." This may be all very well for these high teachers themselves, but will scarcely do for ordinary flesh-and-blood youngsters. It is scarcely wise to expect the boy but just breeched, to whom toffee is a real factor in life, to spring at one bound to the topmost round of the ladder of virtue. Moreover, as rewards and punishments are divinely woven into the very nature of things, into the soul and body of man, surely such objectors fly a little too high and one is inclined to attribute their reasonings more to the liver than to the brain.

It must be generally known among our readers that for the last three or four years QUIVER Prizes for good conduct have been awarded at different benevolent institutions, such as the Princess Louise Home of the National Society for the Protection of Young Girls, the National Refuges, the Gordon Boys' Home, and others. The annual award of the QUIVER prizes is quite an event among the young people of these Homes. Few prizes have these little ones, for in many cases it requires the most strenuous efforts on the part of those who have given their lives to the carrying on of these charities to get funds to provide absolute necessaries—to fill the hundreds of little mouths, and find clothing.

ELEANOR R. GARNHAM.

In such institutions doubtless the QUIVER Prize is a real boon, and is highly valued by the winner. One guinea is sent annually to seven of the chief Homes for destitute and orphaned children, to be awarded to the best conducted boy or girl. In some places where there are both boys and girls the money is divided into two prizes: sometimes it is given entirely in money, but more often half in money and half in books or other useful articles.

We give this month portrait-sketches, taken from life, of most of this year's prize-winners. The histories of these young people are tinged with sadness, and it would be hardly wise or kind to draw the veil that hides the past. Orphaned, and some of them worse than orphaned, we can only hope for them that the shadowy part of their lives lies behind them, and that these prizes are but the first-fruits of many yet to be won in the battle of life.

CHARLES LEET.

ELLEN BROWN.

At the Orphan Working School, Haverstock Hill, the prize is divided into two, and the prize-winners this year are Albert Ernest S. Watts and Eleanor R. Garnham, both of whom have excellent reports. The artist has hardly done justice to the latter in the accompanying portrait. The sweet and pleasing expression that shone in her face when we first shook hands with her, vanished under the trying ordeal of sitting to be sketched.

At the Princess Louise Home of the Society for the Protection of Young Girls, Ellen Brown has received the prize. She, with many other of the elder girls, is employed in the laundry attached to this place. Here it has been found to work well to allow the young people to vote their own prize-winner, the superintendent and matron reserving to themselves the right to veto the selection if necessary. It has never been found necessary to exercise this right, however, as so far the vote has always fallen on one of the two or three that the matron had mentally selected herself. This rather interesting election takes place at a public meeting held by the girls in their own school-room.

At Field Lane Institution, Charles Leet and Mary Ann Green are the winners.

Charles is a quiet-looking boy, engaged in the tailoring department of the Boys' Industrial Home at Highgate, and is shortly to be put apprentice to that trade. He is a beautiful singer, the master informs us, and plays the piccolo in the band.

We next turned our steps towards

JOHN JOHNSON.

Shaftesbury House, the head-quarters of The National Refuges for Destitute Children—an immense institution with its Ragged and Industrial Schools, its Country Homes, and Arethusa and Chichester training-ships. We were introduced to John Johnson, a sharp little fellow who has carried off the Good Conduct Prize here. We set him up to have his portrait sketched, and such is the moral effect of a semi-military uniform, that he stood without flinching for the space of an hour with all the grim determination of a soldier facing the enemy.

Little Julia Johnson, or Judy, as she has christened herself, represents the National Orphan Home, Ham Common, Surrey. Her father was a soldier, and her mother, whom she has not seen for six years, was left on her husband's death with four little children unprovided for.

The Asylum for Fatherless Children at Reedham, among the Surrey hills is, like the Orphan Working School, a charity for the children of parents belonging to the middle class—a class less picturesque in its poverty, but as full of heart-rending records as the utterly destitute. From the 300 orphans here sheltered Joseph Lacy Goldsack and Edith Lampard have been awarded the QUIVER Prize. We give a portrait of the former, but Edith Lampard, we are sorry to learn, is on the sick-list; so we have to content ourselves with mentioning her name and the fact that will astonish many of our juvenile readers—that in all the five years that she has been at Reedham she has never lost a single mark.

JULIA JOHNSON.

J. L. GOLDSACK.

We were to have added a sketch of Corporal William Balmer, the prize boy at the Gordon Boys' Home, but as he is away on leave of absence, and time presses, we must close our portrait gallery without the gallant corporal.

Going from one Home to another we have met several of the QUIVER prize-winners of former years; some are still beneath the sheltering roof of their foster-homes, others have gone out into the world as sailors, domestic servants, page-boys, and some into trades and commercial offices; the report of all, in so far as we have heard, is that they are doing very well. So not without reason we end this short account as we began it, by saying—"A little encouragement is better than a great deal of driving."

WORTHY TO BE LOVED.

BY E. NEAL, AUTHOR OF "MY BROTHER BASIL," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER I.

THE SHADOW OF MONT BLANC.

"Oh, thou proud mountain! whom I now survey,
Not in the phrenzy of a dreamer's eye,
Not in the fabled landscape of a lay,
But soaring snow-clad through thy native sky,
In the wild pomp of mountain majesty."

IT was a lovely summer day in the year 1861, and every hotel in Switzerland was full of tourists and pleasure-seekers, whose polyglot chatter came pleasantly through the open windows of the gay saloons. But though the principal hotel in Chamouni was even fuller than its rivals, it was curiously quiet. Only yesterday a party, consisting of two guides and two young men, had set out to ascend the great mountain that rears its snow-clad head so far above the little village, and of the four only three had returned alive. The fourth—a young English baronet—had slipped on the edge of a precipice; and though the party were roped together, the rope had had a rotten strand, as too many Alpine ropes have, and had given way at the critical moment. His companions had been unable to rescue the unfortunate young man, and had been obliged to return without him. It was no wonder that a thrill of horror fell on the visitors, or that their hearts were stirred with pity for the young man cut off in the flower of his strength, and with sympathy for the two gracious and high-bred women who were staying at the hotel with him, and one of whom was known to be his wife.

The other was his wife's mother, Mrs. Kenyon, a handsome and distinguished-looking woman, whom many people admired more than the gentle and rather insipid Lady Vereker.

Nothing had been seen of either of these ladies since the climbing party returned with the news of the sad event which had plunged them in such sudden and overwhelming grief. It was whispered that Lady Vereker had been utterly prostrated by the shock; and that an English doctor had been in attendance upon her all day.

When at last he was seen coming down the stairs, he was watched by many curious and sympathetic eyes, and a lady, who was evidently English, stepped forward and accosted him.

"How is Lady Vereker?" she asked, in a voice that was singularly clear and sweet.

The pure, clear intonation had something of the same effect as the rather severe chiselling of the beautiful face. Both might have been cold, but for the sweetness of the one and the look of anxious sympathy in the other. The doctor paused for a moment before he answered, and in the pause he thought that he had never seen so beautiful a woman.

"Thank you, Mrs. Dalrymple," he said—he knew just her name, and that she was the wife of the gentleman who had accompanied Sir Raymond Vereker in that ill-fated ascent—"Lady Vereker is doing pretty well. It is the child I am the most afraid of."

"The child?" exclaimed Mrs. Dalrymple. "Do you mean——"

"Did you not know? Oh yes, a boy—but such a puny little thing! It is more than doubtful if it will live, I'm afraid."

Other ladies had gathered round Mrs. Dalrymple and the doctor, and there was a general murmur of sympathy and commiseration.

"Is there anything that I—that any of us—can do?" Mrs. Dalrymple asked; but Dr. Fletcher shook his head.

"I think not. I am going now to see if I can find a nurse, and I'm sure I hope I shall succeed. Lady Vereker is quite unable to nurse the child herself, and, humanly speaking, its life depends on that."

"Poor little thing! But if Lady Vereker gets on all right——"

"Lady Vereker will not get on unless the child does—I've seen quite enough to be sure of that. I believe its coming has saved her reason or her life—and I fear her life hangs on the child's."

The kind-hearted doctor went off to make inquiries of the landlady, and the little group of sympathising women dispersed in various directions. Only Mrs. Dalrymple remained, looking after the doctor's receding figure, and apparently debating some point with herself. Whatever it was, it was quickly decided; and indeed, one had only to look at the firm mouth and the lines of the beautiful chin to know that this was a woman whose decisions would be as prompt as her actions would probably be vigorous. She was a bride of a few weeks' standing, and her husband, Captain Dalrymple, was a man who had distinguished himself in the Crimean war, and had since been in active service in the East. Returning home, he had fallen in love with and married the daughter of a celebrated London banker, and the happy pair were on their honeymoon when the captain and Sir Raymond Vereker agreed to share guides and ascend Mont Blanc together. No faintest shadow of blame attached to Captain Dalrymple, who had done all in his power to save his companion's life; but the fact that they had been companions in that fatal expedition seemed to the happy bride a link between herself and the stricken widow that no one else in the great hotel possessed. She went up-stairs, and knocked with soft, firm fingers at Lady Vereker's door.

It was opened, not by a servant, but by Lady Vereker's mother, Mrs. Kenyon, and Mrs. Dalrymple felt a further impulse of pity to see the change in the elder woman's face, but she did not venture to remark upon it.

"How is Lady Vereker?" she asked. "I came to inquire for her, and to ask if I could be of use in any way. I am quite used to illness, and if I could do anything I should be so glad."

Mrs. Kenyon looked at her in a dazed, uncertain way.

"Thank you; you are very good," she said, "but my daughter is sleeping now, I am thankful to say."

A feeble cry from the room made her turn quickly.

"It is the child!" she exclaimed. "I must go to it, so I must ask you to excuse me."

She looked as if about to close the door, but Mrs. Dalrymple made one more effort.

"Cannot I help you?" she entreated. "I have so many little nephews and nieces, I am quite clever with children."

The elder woman gave way at last, vanquished by a will stronger even than her own. She took Mrs. Dalrymple into the room, where the child, dressed in some odd-looking foreign baby-clothes the landlady had lent, was keeping up a feeble little wail in the inexperienced arms of Lady Vereker's maid.

Mrs. Dalrymple took the tiny bundle from her and walked up and down, crooning gently, as she had often done to her brother's little ones, and the rhythmic movement and softly sung lullaby seemed to act as a charm. The wailing stopped, and the small eyes closed. Mrs. Kenyon ceased to look anxiously at her grandson, and sat down beside the widowed daughter, to whom, in the extremity of her trouble, had been vouchsafed the double blessings of motherhood and sleep. She had said, truly enough, that she could not sleep herself. There was too much to do and to think of; and now that poor Raymond had been taken from them, there was no one to think or to act for her daughter but herself. Something would have to be decided about the funeral, and she had already telegraphed for the family lawyer and for their own doctor. She understood that Dr. Fletcher would be leaving Chamouni shortly, and in any case she would feel easier if Dr. Overton were there. Dr. Fletcher was a young man, and, grateful as she was to him, she would feel more confidence in Dr. Overton.

ful. The gravity of his bearing, the anxiety in his face, had haunted her ever since. She wondered how far she could trust to words that had to be set against looks like those.

"Did you see Dr. Fletcher?" she asked Mrs.

"Watched the two boys playing on the lawn."– p. 10.

This was the burden of Mrs. Kenyon's thoughts as she sat by her daughter's bed, and watched Mrs. Dalrymple walking up and down with the baby in her arms. If only Dr. Overton were there, she would feel easier, she thought. She could not feel easy now, for indeed she was anxious both about the mother and the child. Dr. Fletcher had spoken hopefully, it was true, but he had not looked hope-

Dalrymple, who was still pacing the room with her tiny burden.

"I stopped him to ask after Lady Vereker. It was then he told me about this."

"And what did he say about Evelyn?"

"About Lady Vereker? He said she was doing well. Oh, yes! I am sure of that. He said she would be all right if——"

"If!" exclaimed Mrs. Kenyon. "If what? Tell me—tell me exactly what he said!" The anxiety in her face quite frightened Mrs. Dalrymple. It seemed cruel—nay, as she glanced at the frail little creature in her arms, it seemed impossible to tell Mrs. Kenyon that the doctor had declared that the mother's life hung upon the child's.

She was spared a reply by the entrance of Dr. Fletcher himself, followed by a round-faced, comely peasant girl, clad in the picturesque costume of the district. She carried an infant in her arms, and looked a perfect embodiment of health and good-humour. Mrs. Dalrymple divined at once that it was the foster-mother of whom Dr. Fletcher had gone in search, and very proud he seemed of his success.

"It was the most wonderful piece of luck!" he averred. "Her husband is a strolling singer, and she had been left at her mother's while he went off on a tour. They are all poor enough, and Madame Balmano will be glad to turn an honest penny. She has a fine healthy babe, and is the very woman for us. She has brought her child with her: the best credentials she could bring."

He spoke a few rapid words in French, and the stolid face expanded into a smile as the nurse put back the wraps from her own child's face, and evidently offered him for the ladies' inspection.

Their looks were less admiring than the doctor's. Healthy the child might be, but pretty it certainly was not. Its skin was too swarthy, its hair too dark for beauty at an age when, to English eyes at least, extreme fairness is the only type of loveliness.

"He is not like his mother," Mrs. Dalrymple said; but Mrs. Kenyon was not thinking of his looks from an artist's point of view.

"He looks healthy," she said, in a tone of satisfaction, as she felt the firm, mottled arms. "As long as he is that, nothing else matters."

"He is not a bad-looking little fellow," said Dr. Fletcher; "but his father is an Italian, which accounts for his being so dark. The mother speaks French and Italian, but very little English."

"All the better; she will gossip less," Mrs. Kenyon said approvingly.

And then she began to arrange details, and Mrs. Dalrymple took her leave, almost as pleased as Dr. Fletcher himself that so promising a nurse had been found.

"For indeed, Hugh," she said to her husband, as she joined him on the balcony that opened out of the salon and overhung the steep little street, "Dr. Fletcher says it is the baby's only chance, and it would be too sad if Lady Vereker were to lose the child. It would break her heart—I am sure it would. Poor thing, poor thing! who could have thought, when we all came out here to look at the moon, only two nights ago, that such trouble was in store? It is wonderful—wonderful, how women bear such things and live! Hugh, if anything happened to you——"

She could not finish for the sob in her throat, but he felt the convulsive clasp of her hands upon his arm, and knew that tears were shining in her eyes. He drew her closer to him, and looked down on the quivering face with a sort of tender banter.

"Why, Madge!" he cried, "what sort of talk is this for a soldier's wife? Your nerves are all unstrung, and the sooner we get away from Chamouni the better. Would you like me to run away from the enemy's fire for fear of your feelings, my dear——"

She interrupted him with a quick, proud gesture.

"You know I wouldn't, Hugh. It seems to me that I never realised before what it must be to lose the man you love; but death would be nothing—nothing to dishonour!"

CHAPTER II.

THE LITTLE BARONET.

"Death borders upon our birth, and our cradle stands in the grave."—BISHOP HALL.

A MONTH later, the memory of the catastrophe on Mont Blanc had almost passed away. Chamouni was in the full tide of the summer season, and guides—with ostentatiously brand-new ropes—were as ready as ever to accompany adventurous tourists up the side of the great, white, beautiful mountain where Sir Raymond Vereker had met his untimely fate. Only in his wife's heart her grief was still fresh and new, and Mrs. Kenyon was pale with watching, and her eyes grew more and more anxious from day to day.

Louise Balmano proved, in a passive, indifferent way, an excellent foster-mother, but the little heir of the Verekers had not thriven under her care, and Lady Vereker had proved the truth of Dr. Fletcher's predictions, and seemed to fade with the fading of her infant's life. Mrs. Dalrymple would have felt her heart torn by sympathy for the mother and the child; but the Dalrymples had left Chamouni long ago, and of those who had been in the hotel when Sir Raymond Vereker lost his life, only Dr. Fletcher still remained.

Dr. Overton, the family doctor for whom Mrs. Kenyon had telegraphed, was away from home, holiday-making in Norway, and Dr. Fletcher, who had already sacrificed the greater part of his own holiday to the patients in whom he had come to feel so lively an interest, stayed on from day to day, reluctant to leave them till Dr. Overton arrived.

He would be with them in a few days now, but it seemed to Dr. Fletcher that the question was of hours rather than days.

"If we could but get her moved to a quieter place!" he said, as he stood by Lady Vereker's bedside, and listened to the low, delirious mutterings of the fevered lips.

The people at the hotel were considerate and kind, but neither consideration nor kindness could make a crowded hotel, where tourists were coming and going, a suitable place for an invalid in Lady Vereker's critical condition.

To remove her seemed impossible, but Dr. Fletcher was energetic, and his patients were rich. Between English energy and English gold difficulties were overcome. and the night before her own doctor was expected, Dr. Fletcher had the satisfaction of establishing Lady Vereker in a châlet a little way from the hotel, where at least she would be free from the injurious effects of bustle and noise, from the clatter of feet shod with tourists' shoes, and the ceaseless buzz of French and English, of German and American tongues.

"At least she may die in peace," he thought, as he lifted her from the litter in which she had been moved, and carried her into the châlet. And then he wondered, for the hundredth time, if he had been right to risk the experiment of removal, and if, after all, it had not been made too late.

She knew no one now: neither mother nor doctor. It was only when they laid the child beside her that a glimmer of recognition came into the languid eyes, and the dry, burning lips parted with the dawning of a smile. It was touching to see how maternal love triumphed over the weakness that made her oblivious to all the world beside, and tears of infinite pity and the expression of a nameless dread she would not put into words filled Mrs. Kenyon's eyes.

"It is the one thing she notices," she said, looking at Dr. Fletcher with eyes dark with that awful, nameless fear.

"Yes," said the doctor compassionately: "the one thing she notices—her one tie to life. It is best to face the truth, Mrs. Kenyon—the mother's life hangs upon the child's."

"And the child's?" she whispered, with a sinking heart.

"The child's is in God's hands," said the doctor reverently.

"That means you have no hope!"

"While there is life there is hope. If the baby rallies—but I am bound to tell you I do not think it will——"

"Dr. Overton will be here to-morrow," she said eagerly, and then she gave a faint, bitter cry. "I see what you think—you think that will be too late!"

If Dr. Fletcher had said what he thought, he would have admitted that she was right; but few doctors have the courage of their convictions when a woman's eyes implore them to forswear themselves for dear pity's sake.

"We will hope it may not be," he said evasively; and Mrs. Kenyon was too anxious to accept the shadowy hope to press him further.

She told herself she hoped, but when the doctor had gone, she sat down with something nearer the inertness of despair. Her eyes were on her grandson, on the frail, puny child on whose life she had just been told that his mother's life hung, but her hands lay listlessly in her lap. What was there that she, that anyone, could do? No one could look on the frail little creature and believe that it would live. Already it seemed to the anxious woman, watching it with that fixed, hopeless gaze, that its eyes were glazing. that each breath was more feebly drawn. The nurse came and took the child from the pillow where his mother had fallen into an uneasy doze, and shook her head over him significantly; and Mrs. Kenyon felt as if a fresh stab had been dealt at her lacerated breast.

It was evening now, the exquisite evening of an Alpine sunset, when it seems as if heaven itself was opened, and all the myriad hills break forth into singing at the sight. Each separate peak seemed an altar, glowing with celestial fire, till the tints slowly faded through opaline glories to the mysterious greys and whites and faint translucent greens of an Alpine night. And still Mrs. Kenyon, keeping her sad vigil far into the moonlit night, felt as if a chill from those snow-clad hills had crept into her heart, and turned her veins to ice. If this child, on whose life so much depended, might but live! There seemed a cruel irony in the thought that this descendant of an illustrious house should be so frail and puny a thing, a creature doomed to death before he had well tasted of life, while the peasant-boy in the cot beyond was healthy as a babe could be. There could be no anxiety for the hearts that loved Giuseppe Balmano—if there were any such—Mrs. Kenyon thought bitterly. She doubted it sometimes, so stolid and undemonstrative were his mother's ways. She seemed to have no preference for her own son, to know no difference in her affection for the children—if the tepid regard she gave to both could indeed be called affection!

No one would have missed the little Balmano, Mrs. Kenyon thought now, as she kept her vigil that moonlit summer night. No mother's life hung on its baby breath, no ancient line depended for its continuance on its feeble existence.

It was not strictly true, indeed, that this was the case as regarded the Verekers. There was a distant cousin—so distant that Lady Vereker's mother had never known more of him than his name—who would be Vereker of Verecroft if he survived the present frail possessor of the title. To Lady Vereker's mother he hardly seemed a Vereker at all; he was an impalpable abstraction, a mere name the lawyers brought into their documents; but for all practical purposes he was as much a stranger as if he had not borne the name of Vereker. She forced herself to think of him now, however. John—or George—which was his name? She could not remember, nor where he lived, nor what his profession was; but the lawyers would know, no doubt, when the time came.

And thus the brief summer night wore to the rosy dawning of another day, and once more Dr. Fletcher came, with his soft professional tread and grave anxious face. Graver and more anxious than ever he looked as he bent over the little cot where the small Sir Raymond lay. For once he did not go to the mother's side, but stood with his finger on the little wrist, where even his accustomed touch could hardly detect the failing pulse. It was Mrs. Kenyon who caught a whisper from Lady Vereker's bed, and bending down to catch the feeble sound, came back with a white, scared face.

"She is asking for the child," she said, holding out her arms.

XUM

But Dr. Fletcher did not lay her grandson in them.

"He is past moving," he said decidedly; and it seemed to Mrs. Kenyon that the death-warrant of her daughter was in those few brief words.

"What shall I do?" she cried, in tones of anguish; and for once the ready doctor had no suggestion to make. What could he say or do that would avail in a strait like this? But an answer to the hopeless question was unexpectedly supplied. Louise Balmano stood up stolid and unconcerned in the tragic little group.

"Miladi asks for ze bébé?" she said in her imperfect English, "and he must not remove? Ah, bah! is not one bébé all as good as anuzzer? Miladi know not'ing—Miladi will not know!"

And before either grandmother or doctor guessed her intention, she had taken her own son from his cot and laid him by Lady Vereker's side.

"How dare you?" the indignant grandmother began; but Dr. Fletcher interposed.

"Let her be!" he cried. "It is the best thing she could have done. See, it is true enough that Lady Vereker does not know. It is her best—I believe it is her only—chance of life."

The argument prevailed, and when Dr. Fletcher went away, Louise Balmano's son was still sleeping by Lady Vereker's side, and the little baronet was lying in the cot from which no one would venture to move him while yet the faintest signs of life remained. That they would cease before the sun was well above the snow-capped peaks, already blushing in his morning rays, Dr. Fletcher felt sure, but he could not wait to see the end. He had stayed to the furthest moment possible, and Dr. Overton would be there before noon. And after all, there was nothing he could do.

He wondered often on his homeward journey how the patients he had left in Chamouni were getting on, and he wondered from time to time even when he got back to his work, but he never heard. The child was dead, of course, he thought; but though he looked for its name in the Times obituary, he never saw it; and by degrees Chamouni and Lady Vereker and the poor little baronet almost faded from his mind, till he happened to meet Dr. Overton in consultation a few months afterwards.

Then, when the business in hand was over, he asked after the patients who had interested him so much on his summer holiday. Both the ladies were well, Dr. Overton reported, and the boy was getting on famously.

"But the boy died!" cried Dr. Fletcher.

"Died? Not a bit of it! As fine a little fellow now as you'd wish to see," the other protested stoutly.

"I can't understand it," Dr. Fletcher said, with a very puzzled face. "Why, the child was in extremis when I left him. He was dying, if ever I saw death. It seems impossible!"

"Ah!" said the elder man, "there are two things we always learn in our profession before our hair is as grey as mine: one is to distrust a positive prognosis, and the other is to believe that nothing is impossible."

CHAPTER III.

VERECROFT.

"Under the shady roof
Of branching elm, star-proof."—MILTON.

VERECROFT is one of the comfortable country houses common in England, and common nowhere else, and the well-wooded park that surrounds it is, if possible, more English still. The setting of the Verekers' lives is the sweet woodland scenery in which Shakespeare's life was set. The Avon that runs by Stratford runs by Verecroft too; the great Warwickshire elms stretch their umbrageous arms, and cast their deep, cool shadows about both; there is the same wealth of swelling upland, rich with corn, and of fertile pastures, where the cattle stand knee-deep in the long, lush grass. The few cottages near have the same whitewashed walls, with the cross-beams painted black, with moss-grown roofs of ancient thatch, and little latticed windows, where the roses and the jessamine climb and flourish as they never flourish on more pretentious walls.

They have budded, and bloomed, and faded six times since Lady Vereker came back to the house that was her husband's, and is now her little son's. She has put off her weeds at last, and looks almost a girl again, except that in her face is a satisfied fulness of content that only happy mothers know. And Lady Vereker is not only a happy, she is an ideal mother. Her life is bound up in her child's as entirely, if not as fatally, as in the days when Dr. Fletcher declared that the one hung upon the other. She thinks, and thinks truly, that he is a son of whom any mother might be proud: and proud and adoring she is, to the verge of spoiling. Whether, if she were left to herself, she would cross that impalpable line and ruin the child she loves so well, it is impossible to say. Lady Vereker is not left to herself. Mrs. Kenyon still lives with her widowed daughter, and is the ruling spirit at Verecroft; and Mrs. Kenyon takes care that her grandson shall not be spoilt.

She is even too strict with him, Lady Vereker considers—is a trifle stern in her manner, a little cold. The six-years-old baronet, who tyrannises over everyone else in the house, stands in awe of his stately grandmother, and is indeed a little afraid of her. He is a fine sturdy boy of his age, dark as a gipsy, and with long velvety black eyes that are his mother's especial pride. It is one of Lady Vereker's grievances that Mrs. Kenyon cannot be brought to admire Ray's eyes; but Mrs. Kenyon says, with undeniable truth, that his mother admires them enough for both.

It would be hard to say, indeed, what there is about her boy that Lady Vereker does not admire. She admires everything, from the crown of his dark-haired head to the sole of the foot, that is so much less finely arched or well shaped than her own. The Verekers have generally been a fair-haired race, but the young Sir Raymond has curls of a crisp dark brown that is already almost black. He promises to become a handsome man, but of a type sufficiently unlike his immediate ancestors.

He is unlike, too, the only relative he possesses on his father's side of the house. This is Lancelot Vereker, a boy some three years older than himself, and son of the distant cousin who would have succeeded to the title had the little Raymond died when Dr. Fletcher expected him to do so.

They had known little or nothing of this distant cousin then—not even so much as his Christian name; but on their return to England Mrs. Kenyon had displayed an extraordinary interest in him, and had induced her daughter to seek him out.

"For we cannot forget that he is the heir if anything happens to Raymond," she began; but the look of anguish in the eyes of Raymond's mother made the words die on her lips. She never referred to that aspect of the subject again, but she never rested till the object of her solicitude had been discovered.

His name had proved to be neither John nor George, but Raymond; but this seemed his only link to the prosperous Verekers of Verecroft.

He was a country clergyman, with the poorest of livings, and in such failing health that it was possible for Lady Vereker to offer assistance without offence, and for him to accept it without humiliation. He had never known Sir Raymond, and was a good deal surprised at the kindness shown him by his cousin's widow, but it served to assuage his sufferings, and to relieve him of the anxiety as to his son's future which had been the bitterest drop in the father's cup. His wife had been dead some years, and there was no one to care for the little Lancelot; but Lady Vereker promised to adopt him, and was rewarded as much by the satisfaction in her mother's face as by the dying man's unspeakable gratitude.

Lancelot had been at Verecroft two years now, and a greater contrast to his cousin could scarcely be imagined. He was tall and slight, with none of Sir Raymond's sturdy robustness, with much less vivacity, and, it must be owned, with a much more equable disposition. His eyes were a tawny hazel, his skin of an ivory fairness, and his hair stood up from his forehead in thick chestnut waves, and fell in natural curls upon his shoulders. In his suit of black velvet he looked like a painting by Velasquez or Vandyke, while Sir Raymond's dark round face and flashing eyes recalled as strongly the canvases of Murillo. But if the cousins were unlike—perhaps because they were unlike—they were devoted to each other. Lancelot had all the protective affection of his three years' seniority for his little cousin, and Raymond looked up to Lancelot with the imitative admiration of a small boy for a big one, and regarded him as the model of all manly excellences.

In one thing both were indeed alike, and that was their affection for Lady Vereker. Though Raymond tyrannised over her, he adored her with all the passionate ardour of his stormy little heart, while Lancelot regarded her with a mingled love and gratitude that made him absolutely devoted to her service. It was not in him to be demonstrative, but Lady Vereker was often startled at the depth of feeling in the boy's calm eyes and quiet tones. His mother had died too early for remembrance, and the father's reserved, undemonstrative nature had been, perhaps, too much like his own for perfect sympathy or passionate love. His father's dying charge had been the inculcation of gratitude to his benefactress, and the boy had never forgotten this, while his half-starved heart had opened to Lady Vereker's gentle caresses as flowers open to the sun.

It was a peaceful, pleasant life, this life in the grey old Warwickshire house, that was set amongst the silver windings of the placid Avon, and sheltered by the giant elms of Verecroft Park: a life of calm repose, that was broken only by the small storms of the little Raymond's impetuous wrath. These were, indeed, of tropical force and frequency, but when they were over, his repentance was so touching, his contrition so sincere, his attempts to conciliate or atone so generous and ardent, that Lady Vereker often thought she would hardly have had her boy less impetuous and hot-tempered than he was.

She and Lancelot were always ready to extenuate, excuse, and forgive. It was Mrs. Kenyon who seemed to set justice above mercy where her grandson was concerned: who extenuated no childish fault, excused no passionate outburst: and if she forgave, forgave so coldly that the high-spirited child resented forgiveness more than punishment.

Mrs. Kenyon had altered more than Lady Vereker since that fatal visit to Chamouni. The younger woman, though the catastrophe had affected her so much more nearly, had regained her health, and even her spirits, but Mrs. Kenyon seemed never to have recovered from the shock. She looked quite an old woman already, and the manner that had once been only dignified had become cold and forbidding. She shrank from society far more than Lady Vereker, and suffered from a sort of nervous depression which sometimes kept her in her own rooms for days together. At such times she shunned even her daughter's company, and the little Sir Raymond took especial care to keep out of her way. The only person who could approach her with impunity was Lancelot Vereker, for whom she showed a curiously capricious affection, sometimes treating him as coldly as her grandson, and sometimes overwhelming him with caresses, and lavishing upon him money and presents with a sort of reckless profusion, which Lady Vereker deprecated as unwholesome for a boy in Lancelot's position.

Lancelot was not ungrateful, but the spasmodic and capricious spoiling, with its intervals of entire neglect, failed to inspire him with the same regard as Lady Vereker's equable and unfailing kindness. The one was true affection, which he returned with all the devotion of his heart; the other—what was it? He could not tell. He called it affection now; but there came a day when he understood, and then he called it by another name.

Whatever it was, it prevented his dependent position from galling, and even from making itself felt. If Sir Raymond had a pony, Mrs. Kenyon insisted on Lancelot's having one too. When Lady Vereker gave Raymond a watch, Raymond's grandmother presented Lancelot with its duplicate. The clothes in which Lancelot looked the beau-ideal of aristocratic grace were the fac simile of those in which his cousin only looked a model of gipsy freedom and picturesque ease.

"He might be a gipsy!" a gentleman in clerical attire was saying now, as he stood beside Lady Vereker's chair, and watched the two boys playing on the lawn. It was Mr. Selwyn, the vicar of the straggling country parish on the edge of which Verecroft lay. He had ridden over to see Lady Vereker on parish business, and was enjoying the shade of the Verecroft elms, while he sipped the blandest of tea out of dainty Sèvres cups. "He might be a gipsy," Mr. Selwyn said. "Are you sure he isn't a changeling, Lady Vereker?"

Lady Vereker smiled at the harmless little joke, as she was meant to do; but Mrs. Kenyon stood up with a face that scared both her daughter and the vicar.

"What do you mean? Are you mad?" she asked, with white quivering lips, and eyes that looked as if they could have slain the vicar on the spot.

And then she forced herself to calmness, and broke into a shrill little laugh.

"I beg your pardon, Mr. Selwyn; I am a Scotchwoman, you know, and never see a joke."

Mr. Selwyn bowed uncomfortably. It might be true that Mrs. Kenyon could not see a joke, but was that any reason she should transfix him with that annihilating glance? He sat down with a nervous, deprecating smile, and cast about for some safer topic of conversation.

"Have you seen the paper to-day?" he asked Lady Vereker, who was looking almost as uncomfortable and astonished as himself.

"No; I was busy this morning. Is there anything particular in it?"

"Only the rumour of disturbances in Ashantee and the account of the Dalrymple case."

"The Dalrymple case? What is that? There were some people of that name at Chamouni—he was with poor Raymond that dreadful day.—Don't you remember, mamma?"

"Certainly," said Mrs. Kenyon; "and his wife was so kind afterwards." The colour had returned to her cheeks, and self-possession to her manner.—"What is the Dalrymple case, Mr. Selwyn? I don't remember seeing anything about it."

"There was a paragraph a month or two ago, but the trial was in the papers to-day. It could not be your friend, I should think," ended the vicar nervously. "No one you knew would be likely to—to——"

"To put themselves within the grasp of the law?" Mrs. Kenyon finished the unfinished sentence with a curious mocking bitterness, and what the unhappy vicar mentally designated as "another basilisk glance."

"It was a Captain Dalrymple whom we knew at Chamouni," Lady Vereker said, "and I believe his name was Hugh."

"I am afraid it must be the same," said Mr. Selwyn, "for this man is in the army, and his name is Hugh."

"And what has he done?"

"He is accused of forgery."

"Forgery! Impossible!" with a horrified gasp.

"I fear it is too true. The evidence was very clear against him. It was altogether a painful case, for the chief witness was his wife's own brother. There was an inquiry about a month ago, and he was committed for trial; and now they have found him guilty, and the papers are full of it."

"And what will they do to him? He will be dismissed the service, of course?" Mrs. Kenyon asked. Lady Vereker looked too horrified to speak.

"Certainly; and has five years' penal servitude as well."

The good, nervous vicar glanced almost apprehensively at Mrs. Kenyon as he announced her friend's disgrace, but there was no offence in her face, only a good deal of womanly sympathy and pity.

"His poor wife!" was all she said. "Heaven help her! she was the proudest woman I ever knew."

CHAPTER IV.

LOVE'S YOUNG DREAM.

"Who ever loved that loved not at first sight?"—MARLOWE.

FIFTEEN years have passed away, and the Verecroft boys are boys no longer. The years have rolled on so uneventfully: one day, one week, one month, has been so like another, that both Mrs. Kenyon and Lady Vereker would be ready to aver that no change has visited their lives. It is only when they look at Lancelot's chestnut head towering so far above their own, and remember that Raymond only wants a month of his majority, that they realise that time has not stood still, that their boys have grown to man's estate, and that a change they can no longer ignore has come upon them all.

Only Lancelot is at home this summer, for Sir Raymond is still at Oxford, and will probably be there for another year yet. Lancelot was called to the Bar a year ago, but has not yet begun to practise his profession.

There would be time enough for that, Lady Vereker said, when Raymond came home; and meanwhile, what could Lancelot ask better than to devote himself with all his strength to his benefactress's service? The Verecroft steward was getting old and feeble, and the management of everything was practically in Lancelot's hands. Lady Vereker laughed fondly at his energetic administration, and Mrs. Kenyon hoped cynically that Raymond would make half as good a squire as his penniless cousin; but there was no doubt that Lady Vereker was spared much anxiety and worry, and that the estate would come to Sir Raymond next month in all the better order for its passage through his cousin's vigorous hands.

How Sir Raymond's majority should be celebrated was the engrossing topic at Verecroft now. Mrs. Kenyon would fain have passed it over without any public rejoicings, but Lady Vereker insisted that her boy should come of age with all due honour, and Lancelot supported her entirely. Verecroft should be en fête that day, they both agreed. Raymond would come home, of course, and there should be an ox roasted whole for the villagers, and a marquee in the grounds, with a cold collation for their own friends. There should be cricket and archery and tennis in the afternoon, and fireworks and coloured lamps at night. It would not be the fault of either of these amiable conspirators if the celebration of Sir Raymond's majority fell short of his father's, or of any other Vereker whose coming of age the county could remember.

Half the county was bidden to Verecroft for the 20th of June, and Lady Vereker and Lancelot passed the intervening time in a fever of excitement and preparation, while Mrs. Kenyon looked on with faint sarcastic smiles, and sad, wistful eyes. She was a feeble, white-haired woman now, looking much older than her seventy years, and going about leaning on a silver-headed cane. She seldom left her own apartments when Sir Raymond was at home, for the coldness she had always shown to her grandson seemed to have grown into actual dislike. To Lancelot she was as kind as ever, though it was still a curious intermittent kindness, and there were times, the young man fancied, when she shrank from the sight of him, nay, even from the sound of his voice. He could not understand it, but he did not trouble much about it. Mrs. Kenyon could not be quite right in her head, he thought, and so accounted for what was otherwise unaccountable.

Unaccountable indeed it seemed to Lancelot Vereker that anyone should undervalue his cousin Raymond—a crime in Lancelot's loyal eyes only second to failing in duty or affection to Raymond's mother. Who was so handsome or popular as Sir Raymond? Who was so clever and amusing? who could talk so well? above all, who had a voice like his?

Lancelot felt all an elder brother's pride in his handsome young cousin intensified by the almost romantic gratitude he bore to Lady Vereker. Where and what would he have been but for her? There was nothing, he told himself, that he would not do for her or for her son.

He was proportionately indignant at Mrs. Kenyon's want of interest in the birthday festivities. Why should she be so indifferent when all Verecroft was anxious to do Sir Raymond honour? And why, oh! why should she have chosen this time of all others to traduce him to his mother?

For Mrs. Kenyon had been over to Leamington one day, and had come back full of a report she had heard there of Raymond's attentions to a young lady whom she chose to describe as a music-mistress.

"A nice connection for the heir of the Verekers!" she cried, looking severely at her daughter. "What have you been doing, Evelyn, that you could not bring him up better than that? Well, well—it is no fault of yours, I know. Didn't the vicar tell us last Sunday that every sin brings its own punishment? He was right, Heaven knows!—but the punishment has an odd knack of falling on innocent heads."

"What do you mean? What have you heard? A music-mistress? I don't believe it!" cried poor Lady Vereker, aghast.

"You can believe it or not, as you please. I heard it from Mrs. Lacey, and again from Mrs. Phipson, and they are neither of them given to making unfounded statements. You know yourself he was always in Leamington at Easter."

"Because Lance was away, and of course it was dull for him here."

"He contrived to amuse himself there, it seems, and not in the wisest of ways," said Mrs. Kenyon. "It is all over Leamington that he is going to marry the girl. Mrs. Lacey was astonished to find that we knew nothing about it. I told her I could say nothing as to Lance, but that certainly neither you nor I had ever heard a word."

"Lance would have told me," Lady Vereker said, with a look of affectionate confidence that made Lancelot colour with gratification; but Mrs. Kenyon interpreted the sudden flush in another way.

"Lance knows all about it, I've no doubt, but a Vereker pur sang does not tell tales or betray confidences," she said. And then she went away, leaning on her stick and frowning to herself, and looking, Lancelot thought, more like a malefic fairy godmother than ever.

"Did you know about it, Lance?" Lady Vereker asked, turning to him with imploring eyes and outstretched hands. "You know I don't want you to betray Ray's confidence——"

"There is no confidence in the matter," said Lancelot, clasping the delicate hands in his and raising them to his lips. "I knew that Ray had met a Miss Meredith at Easter, and that he admired her very much; but I did not regard it very seriously. As for any engagement between them, it is mere gossip, and utterly false, I am sure."

"He might have told me," sighed the mother.

"He was afraid you would be vexed, I suppose. I did not say anything myself, because it never occurred to me that it was a serious thing. I believed it would all wear off as soon as he got away. You know what Ray's fancies are."

"This is the first he has not told me of," she said, with a wan little smile. Did it mean, she wondered, with a shiver of foreboding, that this was a more abiding feeling? For indeed, Raymond had been in love a dozen times since he left off jackets, and his mother had always been his confidante—till now.

"Who is she, really?" she whispered, trembling. "A music-mistress? It cannot be true."

"A half-truth," said Lancelot. "She is a friend of Lady Rosalie Finch's. Ray met her there at Easter, and when I came home he raved about her—but I doubt if he even remembers her now."

"But is she a music-mistress?"

"Her mother is a widow, and not very well off, and I believe Lady Rosalie was trying to get her some pupils just amongst her own friends. She is certainly a friend of Lady Rosalie's, so you see it is not as bad as it sounds," said Lancelot, ready as ever to excuse his cousin and put his actions in the best possible light.

"And—and what is she like?"

"I have not seen her. Ray says she is—perfection!" said Lancelot, with a little smile at the extravagant word. It was so easy to smile at Ray's ephemeral raptures, and so difficult to believe in their reality. "He will have forgotten all about it when he comes home," he said again, and Lady Vereker allowed herself to be consoled.

Nevertheless, she admitted that she could not rest till she had heard more about Miss Meredith, and intimated her intention of driving into Leamington to see Lady Rosalie Finch that very afternoon.

Leamington was about nine miles from Verecroft, and while Lady Vereker found the distance a convenient excuse for only seeing as much or as little of Lady Rosalie as she pleased, the young men found it a pleasant ride or drive, and had come to be much more intimate at the Rosery—as Lady Rosalie called her pretty little house on the Kenilworth road—than Lady Vereker herself had ever been. The two ladies had known each other as girls, and had always kept up a certain acquaintance, but Lady Rosalie thought Lady Vereker prim and old-fashioned, and Lady Vereker was astonished and dismayed at her friend's utter defiance of conventionality, and especially at the way in which she took up fresh acquaintances and drifted into intimacies with people of whom she really knew little or nothing.

To hear that Miss Meredith was the friend of an earl's daughter was not as reassuring as if the earl's daughter had been anyone but Lady Rosalie Finch; and Lady Vereker was conscious of feeling both nervous and anxious as the carriage pulled up at the Rosery gate.

A play on her own name was one of Lady Rosalie's fancies. Her house was the Rosery; her rooms were hung with rose-coloured curtains, looped up with gilt finches; her notes were written on rose-tinted paper, with a rose and a finch embossed upon it instead of initial or crest; her ornaments were chiefly in the form of tiny birds that a lively imagination could regard as finches; conserve of roses was handed round at her afternoon teas; and if she did not array herself in rose-coloured garments, it was only because Hilda Jackson, her friend and companion, told her bluntly that they would make her look a fright.

"With your sallow complexion you can't be too careful in your dress," this candid friend was fond of saying; and then she would borrow Lady Rosalie's maid for her own toilet, and scold her "dear Rosalie" for coming down mal coiffée just as her guests were ringing at the bell.

Lady Rosalie was the daughter of the late, and the sister of the present, Earl of Wimbledon. She had run away, when quite a girl, with a penniless lieutenant, and though, on his death, her family had made overtures of reconciliation, she had sternly refused the olive-branch. If they had not cared to remember her existence while her dear Charlie was alive, she would have none of them now, and she wrote a defiant little letter to her brother, in which she reproached him for a coolness that was rather her father's fault than his, and signed herself "Rosalie Finch" in enormous letters that had a note of resentment and defiance in every stroke.

"Poor Rosie! She always was a fool, and I suppose she always will be!" was Lord Wimbledon's comment as he put his sister's letter in the fire, and determined to dismiss Charlie Finch's widow from his mind.

Since that, Lady Rosalie had gone her own way. She had a small income of her own, and had chosen Leamington to live in because house-rent was cheap and society not difficult to find. She was a tall and rather stout woman, with bright dark eyes, a broadly beaming smile, and a perennial interest in her friends' affairs that some people called sympathy, and some impertinence; but as she also possessed an inexhaustible fund of amusing chatter, and a genuine good-heartedness that showed itself in a hundred little kindnesses to high and low, Lady Rosalie Finch was a decidedly popular person, and the Rosery one of the most popular of houses.

She had soon tired of living alone, and had invited a distant relative of her husband's to share her home—an arrangement that suited Lady Rosalie's dread of solitude and aversion to household management as well as it suited Miss Jackson's limited income.

Hilda Jackson was a pretty little brunette, who still possessed an elegant figure, and the remains of considerable beauty of feature, and whose endless flirtations were a constant amusement to her friend. Both the ladies were in the pretty rose-tinted drawing-room when Lady Vereker was announced, and Lady Rosalie ran forward and greeted her with a little scream of delight.

"You dear thing!" she cried, with an effusive abandon that was perhaps more appropriate to a girl of eighteen than a portly widow of eight-and-thirty. "You dear thing! I haven't seen you for ages—positively ages! If it wasn't for those dear boys of yours, I should know absolutely nothing about you.—Hilda, find Lady Vereker the comfortable chair, and ring for tea, dear, do! She comes so seldom, we must pet and make much of her now we've got her.—Well, and what's the news, Evelyn? You might be all dead and buried at Verecroft for anything we hear of you now. Lancelot never comes near us when Raymond's away, and I'm sure we make no difference—do we, Hilda?—We're just as glad to see him as if he were the heir of Verecroft, with more pounds a year than he has pennies, poor dear boy! You can tell him so, Evelyn, and I hope he'll remember it when he's Lord Chancellor, as he's sure to be some fine day."

"He is coming for me presently, so you can tell him yourself," laughed Lady Vereker.

"As if he would believe such fudge!" interjected Hilda, who prided herself on a bluntness of speech not to be distinguished from sincerity. "Poor relations see easily enough through flummery like that, as I know, Lady Vereker."

Lady Vereker thought the remark ungrateful, with kind Lady Rosalie standing by.

"We do not think of our dear Lance as a poor relation," she said coldly; and then she turned to Lady Rosalie, and spoke in lowered tones.—"I came for a little talk with you," she said nervously. "It is not exactly on business—but——"

"But I am in the way, all the same?" cried Hilda gaily. "Why didn't you tell me so before? I'll take myself off at once."

And though Lady Vereker looked extremely disconcerted and uttered a few feeble protests, Miss Jackson laughed her politeness to scorn, and disappeared through the French window into the bright little garden.

"Of course she has heard what a fool that boy of hers made of himself at Easter, and has come to hear all she can about it," she reflected, as she went across the smooth-shaven lawn. "I wonder what Rosalie will tell her? I shall get it all out of her afterwards, so her ladyship need not have troubled to send me away."

And meanwhile the two friends were closeted together, and Lady Rosalie, who divined as easily as Hilda Jackson the object of Lady Vereker's visit, plunged into the subject at once.

"You needn't tell me what you've come for," she cried. "Somebody's been telling tales out of school, I can see, and you've come to scold poor me! Sir Raymond did lose his head, I'm afraid; but really, when you see Avice you'll forgive him."

"Is that Miss Meredith?"

"Yes; the eldest, and the dearest girl——"

"But who are they, Rosalie?"

"Great friends of mine, dear; and you'll like them immensely, I'm sure."

"I've never seen them, have I?"

"I don't fancy you have. The girls have been at school abroad, and Mrs. Meredith never goes out. It's a great pity, for she must have been as handsome as Avice, and quite in the same style."

"But who are they?" persisted Lady Vereker.

"Ah, I don't know their pedigree, if that's what you mean. Their father—well," continued Lady

Rosalie, "I don't think I ever heard what their father was, but you've only to look at Mrs. Meredith to see she's a lady. They're dear people, all of them, and the girls are charming—Avice especially, as Sir Raymond seemed to think."

"I'm afraid he's been very silly."

"He had every excuse, as you'll say when you see her. And, by the way, I'm expecting her every minute. She promised to come in and sing for me this afternoon—and there she is, I declare!—Come in, Avice, come in this way. Here's someone here I want to introduce you to."

Lady Rosalie opened the French window through which Miss Jackson had gone out, and as Avice Meredith entered, Lady Vereker rose with quite indescribable feelings.

Framed in the window, with a background of green leaves and sunny sky, was a gracious, youthful figure, a girl with great grey eyes that looked dark against the fairness of her hair, and a face the like of which Lady Vereker confessed at once she had never seen before. Nothing could be finer than the contour of brow and chin; nothing more delicately haughty than the fine straight nose and the short upper lip; nothing more splendid than the great dark eyes, or more regal than the carriage of head and neck. It might have been a young princess standing amongst the clematis and roses that clustered round the window, and looking at her with soft, serious glance; but Lady Vereker did not ask if she were princess or music-mistress—she only felt, with a sudden yearning thrill, that it was the girl her Raymond loved.

She did not say anything, for she had sense enough left to know that the time was not ripe for saying. If Raymond had not spoken yet, it was not for her to speak.

"Lady Vereker, let me introduce my young friend Avice Meredith," said Lady Rosalie, and the conventional words seemed to strike a sudden discord on her friend's excited nerves. It was like being awakened from a dream.

"I am very glad to make Miss Meredith's acquaintance," she said, with the smile Lancelot always thought so inimitably sweet, as she held out a hand small and delicate as Avice's own. And then Lady Rosalie made talk that fell a little flat, for the mother's heart was full of one thought only, and could respond to nothing else. What did she care for Leamington gossip, or the last tit-bit from society papers, when the girl sitting beside her was the girl whom Raymond loved, who might some day be Raymond's bride?

"You know my son, I think?" she said, turning to Miss Meredith, when at last there was a pause. She felt as if it was scarcely a fair question, but Avice Meredith looked far more composed than herself.

"Sir Raymond Vereker? Oh, yes; I know him quite well. He has a beautiful voice."

"And Avice measures all her friends by their voices," said Lady Rosalie, in a bantering tone.

"No," said Avice gravely, "but Sir Raymond's is unique. You do not often meet with a true tenore leggiero in an Englishman. It is a pity he is a baronet."

"A pity!" exclaimed Lady Vereker, looking with artless surprise at this composed young lady who could speak of her lover without blush or tremor, and apparently without the least consciousness.

"A voice like his ought not to be wasted on drawing-rooms—it should be for the world!" said Miss Meredith.

"Sir Raymond will have something better to do in the world than to sing to it," said Lady Vereker, with all an English patrician's scorn of artists and of art.

"Come, Avice, sing to us yourself. That will be better than talking about singing," said Lady Rosalie. She meant it well, detecting the slight chill in Lady Vereker's tone, and hoping to restore the entente cordiale between her two dissimilar guests, but the little ruse was scarcely successful.

Avice laid aside her hat and went to the piano; Lady Rosalie sat down to play her accompaniment, and Lady Vereker leant back in her chair, and looked critically at Miss Meredith, as she had hardly been able to do before.

She was beautiful, beautiful exceedingly, Lady Vereker confessed, and her beauty was of a type both unusual and refined. The dark eyes, the rippling waves of fair hair, were a combination striking from its rarity. The hair was not golden, but fair, simply and purely fair, and the eyes grey, without any tinge of blue. It was the dark line round the irids, and the long black lashes, that made them seem so dark. It was a face, Lady Vereker thought, that might enchant any man. No wonder it had bewitched her too susceptible son!

And then there came forth a voice that seemed the natural expression of the beauty of the sweet, fair face. At the first notes one felt that just that voice and no other could possibly belong to those mysterious star-like eyes. But as the pure, clear soprano filled, and more than filled, the little room, Lady Vereker shrank more and more into herself.

It was beautiful singing, no doubt, but it was not the ballad style to which she was accustomed in Warwickshire drawing-rooms. There was something unusual, something almost professional about it, Lady Vereker thought, and Avice—the girl whom Raymond loved—seemed to be only Miss Meredith, the music-mistress, once more. Lady Rosalie felt that her friend's thanks lacked the warmth she had expected, and tried to atone by the fervour of her own.

"I never heard anything so lovely," she protested; "but, Avice, may we have a ballad for a change? Sing that little thing of Barry Cornwall's you were singing the other day."

"Do you mean 'Ask me not how much I love thee?' You always like such sentimental songs," protested Avice, with a smile.

She did not care for modern ballads herself, but her singing seemed to lift the simple words and trivial music into a lofty and passionate devotion they scarcely possessed alone.

Lady Vereker listened to the perfect articulation and exquisite phrasing of the song, and every note seemed to set her further from the singer. It was Lancelot who, coming in while the last verse was being sung, stood entranced within the doorway, listening in rapt amaze.

"I am thine, while the stars shall shine,
To the last—to the last!"

He had never heard singing before, the young man thought; nor, as he looked at the singer, had known what beauty meant.

He did not ask who she was, nor did he care to know. He only knew that he had met his fate—that whether this peerless girl were Raymond's love or not, she was for him, now and for ever, the one and only woman in the world.

"BE OF GOOD CHEER!"

BY THE REV. NEWMAN HALL, LL.B.

HE who uttered these words to His afflicted disciples utters them still. He knew what tribulation means. He chose to come into a world full of it. The "Man of sorrows and acquainted with grief" was familiar with every form of tribulation—bodily privation and pain, social suffering, hatred of foes, deeper wounds from friends, fierce conflicts with Satan, mental depression, spiritual anguish, and the agonies of death long foreseen. Knowing from experience how greatly His disciples would need comfort, He addressed to them a farewell discourse, replete with consolation—a treasury of comfort to all afflicted disciples in all ages (St. John xiv., xv., xvi.). "These things have I spoken unto you, that in Me ye might have peace." He forewarned them, lest they should be taken unawares: "In the world ye shall have tribulation." But He poured forth such rivers of consolation that, if they believed, they could not but have peace in Him. Though visibly leaving them, He would still be spiritually present. He would send them "another Comforter" to abide with them always. They might still hold intimate fellowship with Him; He would listen to every request; they should be blended with His very life, inseparable as branches in the vine. He was going to prepare mansions for them in heaven, and would soon return to take them to dwell with Him for ever. Should not such assurances give them peace? "Peace I leave with you, My peace I give unto you."

Believers exist in two conditions — "in the world," and "in Christ." They are as certainly in Christ their Peace, as they are in the world their Tribulation. "A Christian lives in two kingdoms: an outer and inner; and in proportion as he lives in the one or the other he feels the tribulation or enjoys the peace." By Christ's atonement we are in harmony with God, pardoned, reconciled, saved: "Being justified by faith, we have peace with God, through our Lord Jesus Christ." We have filial peace, trusting in a loving Father, who makes all things work together for our good. We have peace in abiding fellowship with Christ. The tribulations are on the surface. The wildest waves of ocean do not disturb the abiding calm of the waters not far below. In confiding intercourse with a dear friend or in loving service for him, in some inner chamber, warm and well lighted, we do not feel, we often do not notice the roaring wind and rattling rain against the window-panes. When the promise is fulfilled—"I will come in to him and sup with him, and he with Me"—though in the world of tribulation, we have peace in Christ.

Having this peace, we are enabled to overcome all difficulties and bear all trials. Nay, more: we can triumph, we can rejoice. Jesus said, "In the world ye shall have tribulation; but be of good cheer: I have overcome the world." The world might be regarded by the disciples as an enemy, seeking their injury and destruction. They might well be dismayed by having to encounter not only ordinary trials, but the malice of persecutors and the fierce assaults of Satan. They might tremble as they saw their Champion enter the deep darkness of Gethsemane and the Cross. They might think—for a little while they did think—that the world had conquered. But He sought to dispel such fears beforehand. He uttered a cry of victory in advance. He had no doubt of the issue. He went forth to encounter all the powers of a wicked world and all the hosts of darkness with the shout of a conqueror—"I have overcome the world." Two inquiries arise. How did Christ overcome the world? and why should His victory make us of good cheer?

Christ overcame the sin of the world by atoning for it. He was the Sacrifice whereby pardon and reconciliation were secured for the guilty. "Behold the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world," and with its sin all its power to injure. And we overcome when by faith we share the benefits of this atonement.

Christ overcame the world's sorrows by suffering them. He did not ostentatiously seek them nor timorously avoid them. He did not submit because He could not escape, but He voluntarily accepted the sorrow. There was no impatience, no murmuring. Had there been, the world's sorrow would have overcome Him. "The cup which My Father hath given Me, shall I not drink it?" He overcame the world's hatred by love. The world would have overcome Him had He rendered evil for evil. He loved His enemies, wept over the city that demanded His blood, and prayed for His murderers. He overcame persecution by perseverance. Threats and frowns never deterred Him from duty. There was no deflection from the straight path. "He endured the cross, despising the shame." Had there been any yielding, persecution would have overcome Him. He overcame the allurements of the world by scorning them. Smiles, flatteries, honours, were to Him as nothing. He overcame the temptations of the world by resisting them. By the sword of the Spirit, "It is written," He parried every blow. Obedience was to Him more than bread. Confidence in God never induced presumption. No advantages, even to His Kingdom, could be gained by the least compromise with evil. So He overcame. He overcame "the prince of this world" by casting him down from his usurped throne. He "came to destroy the works of the devil." He overcame death by dying for the world. He, "through death, destroyed him that hath the power of death, and delivered them who, through fear of death, were all their lifetime subject to bondage." Living in God, He lived above the world, and so overcame it.

But why should His victory make us of good cheer? He showed us how to conquer. Let us imitate His example. Let us overcome tribulation by patient suffering, carrying the cross, kissing the rod. Let us conquer hatred by love, not retaliating except by kindness, not being overcome of others' evil, but overcoming their evil with our good. Let us conquer difficulties, not by avoiding, but by mastering them; and persecution by perseverance; and worldly allurements by the inner life of godliness, that scorns whatever cannot reflect the Master's smile; and Satan's temptations by the Word of God and prayer. So let us overcome, even as Christ overcame.

But the example of Christ in overcoming cannot alone make us of "good cheer." A giant's victory will not give confidence to a child when assailed by the same formidable foe. If it needed all the power of Christ to overcome the world, how can this encourage me in my weakness? Yet He says, "You are in a world of tribulation; but be not troubled; the world shall not overcome you. I have triumphed, so shall you: be of good cheer!"

He conquered as our representative, not for Himself alone, but for us: in our name, on our behalf, as our Champion, to secure our salvation. As by the first Adam defeat and death befell humanity, so by the second Adam victory and life are won for all, and are actually possessed by those who accept Christ. May we not therefore be of good cheer, since He has overcome? Christ's victory encourages us because we have now to fight a defeated, wounded, weakened foe. The enemy is in retreat. Before our David the Philistine host flies, and we may now win an easier victory. Christ's triumph obtains for us the help of the Holy Spirit, so that we fight not in our own weakness, but in the strength of God. "He hath ascended up on high, He has led captivity captive, and hath received gifts for men, that the Lord God might dwell among them." His victory proves that He survives the conflict, a living not a dead Champion. He went into the Red Sea, but came forth out of it unhurt, "mighty to save." He is seated on the throne of the universe. After His resurrection He said, "All power is given unto Me in heaven and in earth." He is stronger than the world. He can "put down all rule and authority and power." "He is able to save to the uttermost."

Surely such a victory should make us of good cheer. This was its effect on the disciples. How these feeble few blew the trumpet of victory on the day of Pentecost! When scourged, they "rejoiced that they were counted worthy to suffer for the name of the Lord Jesus." Paul and Silas in the inner prison sang songs of triumph. Not the prisoner, but Felix, trembled. The apostle spoke of himself and his companions as the "offscouring of all things;" yet he said, "Thanks be to God, who always maketh us triumph in Christ." "In all these things we are more than conquerors through Him who loveth us." In daily expectation of martyrdom, he was of good cheer, saying, "I have fought a good fight; henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness." The disciple who recorded these words of the Master said, "This is the victory that overcometh the world, even your faith." The disciples overcame, even as Christ, but it was by trust in Him. "Ye have overcome because greater is He who is in you than he who is in the world." And he records also the subsequent assurance of his Lord: "To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with Me in My throne, even as I also overcame, and am set down with my Father in His throne."

Let afflicted believers be comforted: nay, let them rejoice and be of good cheer. In Christ they have inward peace, and may well endure the world's outward trouble. An old writer says: "The world afflicts believers because they are too good; God afflicts because they are not good enough (to make them better); the world to drive them out of earth, God to help them into heaven." Do not regard tribulation as an evil. Tribulation! It is a whetstone to sharpen the sword by which we are to win the battle! It is the harsh blast of the trumpet calling to the fight that shall secure the victory! It is the fire, not only of the purifying furnace, but of the flaming chariot to carry us to glory. Tribulation is the path to triumph—along which our Saviour marched to the Throne; it reminds us of Him who fought for us, conquered for us, won eternal life for us, and who is saying to us this very day, as He said to His disciples of old—"In the world ye shall have tribulation, but be of good cheer: I have overcome the world."

JOTTINGS FROM A MINISTER'S NOTE-BOOK.

"The parks seemed to grow more precious."

THOSE who prize every glimpse into the "short and simple annals of the poor" may perhaps scan with interest these notes of some years' residence in one of the busiest corners of the London world. My first experiences there were the more impressive as I had come to my new district from one of the most pleasant suburbs of the metropolis. There life wore a smile for all comers. My neighbours spent their leisure hours in their pretty gardens, and found time for many a recreation which gave zest and enjoyment to life's daily task. In the new sphere all was changed. The struggle for life seemed to have entered the acute stage. The faces you looked on in the streets supplied illustrations of every phase in the story of care. Workshops lay hidden behind the houses, covering what were once bright gardens. But utility had taken the place of comfort. The better-to-do were now far away in the suburbs; those who filled their places had to sacrifice everything to their toil for daily bread. The parks seemed to grow more precious. One scarcely cared to think what would have come of our busy toilers but for those happy pleasure-grounds, where youth and old age were alike at home during the scant week-day intervals of recreation. For them a glimpse of real country was a rare treat, but the parks were always there, and always wore a welcome for their poorest neighbours.

Visiting was not easy at first. A characteristic incident may perhaps amuse others, as it amused me. One afternoon I set out in quest of a parishioner whom I had not yet seen. The noisy, narrow street was reached, and the number found. There was another difficulty, however. Every room seemed to have its own family. Two or three rough little urchins were playing on the step. When I had knocked at the door, there was time for a pleasant word or two with them. Soon a boy appeared, to whom I told my errand. Almost as I spoke, one of the little fellows, who could scarcely reach the knocker, lifted it up and banged it heavily down four times. The shock jarred on my nerves. I heartily wished that the boy had not been so lively. I soon found, however, that he had caught the name of the person whom I wished to see, and, like a little gentleman as he was, had come to the rescue with a promptness and decision which surprised me.

The column of bells at the side of the doors showed how crowded those houses were. It was not unusual to find them four or five deep. Where there were no bells, the door-knocker enjoyed a somewhat extended sphere of usefulness, appreciated and understood only by the initiated.

A visit to the more respectable members of my little flock proved at first somewhat impressive. I used to stand in the passage whilst my friends who had just let me in ran down-stairs for the key of their best sitting-room. It was scrupulously locked. Privacy was almost unknown when three or four families lived in a house. It was not always wise to leave hat or umbrella in these lobbies. A visitor soon learned, in fact, to keep such belongings in his hand wherever he went. Shortly after we reached the neighbourhood we enjoyed a hearty laugh over an incredulous cobbler. My wife asked him to send home some boots that he was to repair. "What part of the house, ma'am?" he asked. "Number 25," was the reply of the bewildered customer, who had not yet learned the ways of the district. "We have the whole house," she added, seeing his look of wonder. The man stared in amazement. We enjoyed the story, but the boots did not arrive. Our servant found that the man had been so utterly staggered by my wife's incredible statement, that he had not known where to send them.

Immediately on our arrival we were inundated by applicants for charity. I had wondered why the notice-board at our church had not the minister's name upon it. Strangers in the district, or people who wished for someone to visit the sick, seemed thus left without a clue. But when I knew the district I ceased to wonder. As the stream of applicants poured in, it was clear that I could have spent half a year's income in a fortnight, on what, to judge by the stories told, were the most deserving and heartrending cases of distress. Women could be reclaimed from a course of profligacy by a shilling; a few coppers would find a homeless man a night's lodging, boots or clothes would help him to get work, or make a new start in life. It became evident that to listen to such stories was worse than useless; to relieve these people in this fashion was to encourage vice, and to rob one's poor old members of some little comfort for their last days.

At our services we generally had a fringe of such hearers. They were ready to go into the inquiry-room or attend the Bible-class; they would even come to the meeting for prayer on a week-night if only they could ingratiate themselves and gain a little charity. We had to give a wide berth to such people. That was far from easy. They knew how to plant themselves at any coign of vantage, ready to swoop down on you. Time was worth nothing to them; their patience appeared inexhaustible. After our mission services we learned to expect some after-crop of doubtful cases. Our hopes would be awakened on behalf of some man or woman who seemed bent on living a new life. But we had many a bitter disappointment. No pains were spared to counsel and help them. Ministers and people vied with each other in the effort to hold these people fast. But by-and-bye the old spirit often regained its hold. We saw the hopes of weeks die away, and felt that we had lost the day. Sometimes we were grieved to discover that all this show of earnestness had been simulated in order to secure financial help; in one case at least the pretended convert proved to be a thief in disguise. Those who made a regular trade of attendance at churches did not forget us. They contrived, as the Rev. Harry Jones found in the East End, to distribute their attentions so as to put in a claim for the gifts of two or three denominations. It was not always easy to detect their purposes.

Such were some of the trials. It was hard indeed to make any impression on the neighbourhood. House after house was occupied by people who never attended the House of God. Not far away was a district in which a man and his son were known to have made a sovereign of clear profit by the sale of Sunday papers in a single morning. As soon as we awoke the newsboy's cry was heard. A couple of girls with arms filled with papers would pass along throwing Sunday journals through the rails into the area before the houses. These were for regular customers. There was no public feeling that could be brought to bear. Had such people lived in the suburbs or in some provincial town, their conduct would have given rise to remark among their neighbours, and have elicited signs of disapproval, but here there was no such influence to move our ungodly neighbours to consider their ways.

A devoted Christian who came to reside among us was appalled by this carelessness. He supplied himself with bright magazines for Sunday reading, enlisted helpers, and visited from door to door. He was received kindly, but his hope of inducing some of our neighbours to attend God's House soon sank very low. Our Mission Band, indeed, always received a hearty welcome. When we went to sing in the courts and mews around, the beautiful Gospel hymns proved great favourites. We were urged to come again. If we were long in appearing, or if the winter compelled us to suspend operations, we were told when we re-appeared that they had been eagerly expecting us, and had not forgotten our visits months before. Windows were thrown open, and men and women sat in the rooms drinking in every word. An earnest invitation to Christ was given, with an entreaty to go with us to the house of prayer, but we generally had to content ourselves with the evident welcome and appreciation shown for our out-door work.

The Sunday-school and Band of Hope were an unspeakable blessing in that busy neighbourhood. Our teachers were a fine staff. They had not much leisure for preparation. Most of them were busy from morning till night. Only two or three had enjoyed any special advantages of education; but zeal and devotion abundantly compensated for such drawbacks. It was a pleasant sight as I wandered round the school on Sunday afternoons to watch the attention of the children. The groups of scholars were pressing eagerly round their teachers to catch every word. There was a religious earnestness about the school which never failed to cheer us. A large number of young children attended the Sunday evening service. In that district you did not see the clusters of little children sitting in a circle on the pavement between ten and eleven o'clock on a Sunday night, as I used to see them under the shadow of Westminster Abbey, but there was many a home where it was a relief to have the restless little people out of the way for a time on Sunday evenings. The result was, some of them came to us, and, though we were a trifle disturbed at times, the little ones were always welcome. Special devotional meetings for children had great success.

Our library, which had a capital selection of interesting books, was a never-failing attraction to the boys and girls. Something to read is one of the first essentials for such mission centres. Free libraries were not available, and the homes from which we drew our scholars had few coppers to spare for books. There was a healthy craving for literature. Nothing came amiss. Tracts, religious newspapers, magazines, or books were all eagerly asked for. We took some pains to meet the demand, but we could have done much more if funds had been forthcoming. Such work had no taint of pauperism. It carried the truth into homes never visited by any church-workers; it filled up many a leisure hour that might have borne evil fruit if the great employer of idle hands had found them waiting for him. There is a fine field for Christian energy in this direction. Well-selected books and magazines will inculcate many a wholesome lesson, and awake many an impulse towards a more worthy life.*

minister's duty, but I never seemed to have so much of that work as during the earlier part of my residence in this district. The first winter, when one summons to a death-bed followed another in rapid succession, we all seemed under a cloud. Our servant, who was not without previous experience of such matters, grew quite gloomy. Some of the cases were unutterably affecting. A young fellow who had been a baker's assistant—a steady, respectable man, just about to be married—was seized with consumption. I visited him often during his long fight with death. One night, when I returned home late after a service, a message awaited me that he was at the point of death and would like to see me. I went round at once. When I stepped into the room he sent all his friends out, and said, with gasping breath, "I want to make my peace with God." Then he hesitated. "I don't like," he added, "to ask Him to forgive me at the last moment." Under such circumstances, when it was almost agony for him to hear more than a sentence, I had to point him to the Saviour. I think it was next morning—for he lived through the night—that he told me, with a tone which I never forget, "You would not believe, sir, how long this night has seemed to me." He found rest to his soul, and died in Christ.

The disappointment of such work was illustrated by this young fellow's mother, who had nursed him with unflagging care. She had been an earnest Christian, but self-indulgence had led her astray. She was fast becoming a drunkard. We spared no pains to help her. After her son's death there was a happier prospect. The dying man had reproved her faithfully.

* See "Fifteen Millions," page 80.—Ed.

"Oh, mother," he said, "I wonder that you, who know the Bible so well, have not lived nearer to God." That remonstrance stirred her conscience, and we hoped for better things. One day, however, she disappeared from the neighbourhood. She had sold her little business and gone off by stealth, leaving her debts unpaid. We never heard of her afterwards.

By the side of that disappointment a notable success may be chronicled. I was asked to visit a man dying of cancer in a neighbouring street. His pain was terrible, but worse than all physical distress was the trouble of a burdened conscience. As I talked to him of the mercy of God and the atonement of Christ, light broke into his mind. Soon a blessed change was wrought by God's Spirit. Once, when he was suffering great pain, I asked whether he felt troubled. He calmly answered, "How can I be troubled when He hath said, 'Let not your heart be troubled, neither let it be afraid'?" Years have passed since then, but I still remember the thrill of joy with which I passed from that dark room, feeling that the sufferer had found sure anchorage at last. His gratitude was unbounded. He urged his family on his death-bed to come to our little church, and before I left the district they were among the best workers in every branch of service—teachers in the Sunday-school, members of the choir, workers in the Mission Band and Band of Hope—ready for every good work. We had several missions conducted by men well adapted for such labour, and attended with real blessing to us all; but none of our missions could show such substantial and abiding results as those produced by visits to the dying. In times when more imposing methods are so much in vogue, it is well to bear witness to the blessing which rests on quiet ministries to our neighbours in life's darkest hours. There is a blessed harvest to be reaped in the house of sorrow, and the fields are "white already."

The members of my own church were simple-minded, devout Christians, whose heart-felt experience often cheered us. Some of their portraits will never lose their place in my memory. One died in the fever hospital. He had come up from the country to a large workshop, and found Christ in our Bible-class. In the midst of ungodly workmen he set a noble example. He had a hard life, but learned to stand firm amid sneers and temptations. When he died we felt that we had lost a true Christian. He was familiar with difficulty, and there was something sad about his dying hours, spent alone in the fever hospital. His friends in London visited him, but his relatives were far away, and he breathed his last among strangers. The last time his teacher was at the hospital, Thomas said, "I am very happy. I have nothing to fear." In that spirit he calmly awaited the inevitable hour.

The patriarchs of the church were a remarkable group. Strangers in our prayer-meeting were often struck by the earnestness and power of one of these worthies. He had been a canal-boy—the son of a bargeman, who brought pig-iron and bricks from the potteries of London. He was bred amid oaths and curses, and never spent a day at school, not even at a Sunday-school. He could not read a line. No religious influence seemed to touch his life until he married a Christian woman. Some years afterwards, as he was going through a square in the neighbourhood, he found the peace of God. The Holy Spirit had wrought conviction in his heart. For six weeks he had gone about his daily employment in an agony. Now he had found the blessing. It was a hard task to learn to read, but he struggled on till he managed to pick his way through the easiest chapters of his Bible. Everyone respected him. The railways robbed him of his first employment on the canal; then he worked for a coal-merchant, until at last he opened a coffee-stall. His constant readiness to oblige, and his pleasant conversation, made him very successful, and helped him to speak many a word in season. His last illness was very painful, but prayer and praise were always on his lips. When the struggle was over, all who gathered round his grave felt that one of the best Christians they had known was gone to be for ever with the Lord.

My old crossing-sweeper was still more interesting than the ex-bargeman and coffee-stall keeper. He lived in one room, which cost him four shillings and sixpence a week. But for a small parish allowance, he would have found it impossible to live. I saw him and his old wife grow gradually weaker. They were above eighty years old, and kept their sixtieth, or diamond, wedding-day whilst I visited them. The husband was worn down with bronchitis and rheumatism, so that he could at last scarcely get to his crossing. He had to rise soon after five to light the fire and make the breakfast, as his wife was nearly blind. As he went to the crossing he would sit down on a doorstep for a few moments, and then go hobbling forward. He had been brought up as a shepherd-boy in a little Hertford village, which he left more than sixty years before to become a drayman in London. In town he soon made himself a great favourite with his master, a working-man who had become the owner of several carts and horses. This man was fond of hearing his young carter sing, and used to treat him at the public-house on Saturday nights in order to secure this pleasure. This led my old friend into drinking habits, and ruined the peace of his home. One Sunday he watched a neighbour returning from his little chapel. The sight awoke him to better things. He felt his misery and degradation, and resolved to lead a new life. He attended the same place of worship, and broke off his visits to the public-house. One day as he was driving a team of three horses over Blackfriars Bridge he found the peace of God. Such was his joy that he almost forgot where he was going. He never lost the blessing. Half a century had rolled by when I first visited him. His life had been a sharp struggle. Twenty-five years before a terrible attack of rheumatism compelled him to give up hard work and take a crossing. But amid all troubles my old friend's faith didn't fail. He was full of trust, thankful for God's care, and looking on with joy to the rest of heaven.

It was pleasant to see how the old man loved his Church. He knew its great preachers, and carefully read one of the religious newspapers, that he might follow the progress of its work at home and abroad. "Doctor so-and-so," he once told me, "was the best doctor he ever had." He had gone to hear this popular preacher whilst suffering from a smart attack of neuralgia. Once or twice he was on the point of turning back, but he persevered. He soon forgot all his pain in his delight at listening again to the much-loved minister, whom he astonished at the close of the service with his greeting: "Well, Doctor, you are the best doctor I ever had in my life!" The old crossing-sweeper had learned the lesson of contentment. His happy spirit was so full of gratitude for God's mercies that troubles and poverty were almost forgotten. It did one good to spend a few minutes with one whose religion was so evidently full of Divine comfort, amid all the rough ways of poverty.

Life was sadly monotonous for some of my parishioners. One woman had lived thirty years in a little front kitchen, the ceiling of which was not much higher than the street. Her husband, a pianoforte finisher in excellent work, had been seized with a nervous complaint, which ended in melancholia. He was taken to Colney Hatch, where he lingered out a living death for twenty-eight years. At first he recognised his wife; but as time passed by, even this scrap of comfort was denied her. She earned a humble livelihood as a dressmaker, till she injured her hand with a needle. Eager to support herself, she began to work again too soon, and the hand had to be amputated. When I knew her, she earned a pittance by carrying out dresses and doing occasional errands. Nevertheless, her cellar wore a bright look. Some pleasant pictures on the walls—relics of her happier married life—were still there, to tell the story of a darkened lot, lighted up at last with God's endless peace.

The experience gained in such scenes was in itself no small reward for the tension upon mind and heart which they brought. It was wonderful to see how human nature could adapt itself to its environment, and live on amid surroundings which might have been thought fatal to every effort. That was one lesson. Far more blessed was the reflection that grew with added experience. The peace of God could fill human life in its most uncongenial surroundings with light from Heaven, and make it a benediction to all who had eyes to read its lesson.

THE CHILDREN'S HYMN.

JESUS, in what tender ways,
What drawings from above,
Our hearts are called, with joy and praise,
To offer Thee our love!

Thy sweet compassions are the same,
And all may happy be
As those who for Thy blessing came,
And gathered round Thy knee.

Thy little ones may understand
The whispers of Thy grace,
And still in faith may hold Thy hand
And look into Thy face.

Lord, in the brightness of our youth,
Thy summons may we hear,
With simple hearts that love the truth
And feel Thee always near!

HOW ST. EILLONS LIGHT WENT OUT.

CHAPTER I.—IN SHINE.

"THERE'S the boat in already, and me not half done; it's surely soon the day."

Christian Grant laid the damp coil of baited line into a basket beside her, scattered a handful of cut grass over it, and began upon another interminable coil. It was half-mechanical work; the silvery morsels of bait seemed to slip over the hooks almost of their own accord as the quick brown fingers flitted over them, her eyes intently watching the passengers filing up from the panting steamer that had just drawn up at the end of the little jetty that stretched out from one side of the bay.

Once a day it arrived, that is, during the summer months, and formed the little fishing village's chief means of communication with the outside world. When the October gales began to blow it vanished from the horizon, and was seen no more till early June. It was September now; every boat might be reasonably expected to bring one or two staying visitors, not those mere birds of passage, the day tourists, who strolled up the one street, sniffed at the fish-curing sheds, called in at the "Traveller's Rest" for their refreshments, and returned on board, satisfied that they had exhausted every charm of the quiet, quaint, out-of-the-world place—St. Eillons.

There were three hopeful-looking arrivals to-day: an invalid lady with luggage, an artist with an easel and a battered portfolio, and a fair-haired young man in a light suit, who carried a leather bag and a hat-box.

Christian watched the artist's progress rather blankly. Three—but she doubted there would be little extra fish required for the whole of them. A family would have been far better.

"What do you use for bait? It looks slippery work."

Christian looked round; the young man had set his bag on the low wall, and was inspecting her and her work with frank curiosity.

"Why, sand-eels, of course," she answered, a little uncomfortably, conscious all at once of her tumbled hair and shabby petticoat. Another hour, and she would have been as fresh as a daisy.

"Are you obliged to do that sort of thing?" was the next question, settling himself easily against his hat-box.

"Folks must live."

"Yes, but you should let the plainer folk do the dirty work. Your pretty hands were made for something better."

Christian flushed hotly; she was not used to compliments; the line raced faster through her fingers.

"Who is it for?"

"My father," without looking up.

"Ah, well! I am going to stop a few days; perhaps I'll look round and see the fishing to-morrow. Good afternoon."

He lifted his hat—just as if she had been a lady, she said to herself afterwards—picked up his bag, and sauntered leisurely away. Christian, glancing round the tarred fence presently, observed that he made his way to the one inn half-way round the bay—"family hotel" it had begun to style itself this last year or two, since the steamer had brought the first stray visitors.

"Why, Christian, you're late the night; you've surely been to sleep over it."

It was a different voice this time—rough and uncultivated, though not unpleasant—but somehow just then it jarred upon Christian. Colin and she were half friends, half lovers, after the curiously shy, self-contained Scottish fashion. The character of the young man's attentions would have puzzled an English lassie sorely, but Christian had been trained up with the system, and took more meaning out of the silences than many would have found in speech.

"Did you see the boat come in?" she asked shortly, vouchsafing no comment upon his remark.

"Aye; we'll no mak' our fortunes out of all the visitors she brought."

Christian went on with her work in silence; Colin leaned over the wall, whistling softly to himself. Christian generally led what conversation there was, but she made no attempt to carry it on now.

"Air ye ailing anything?" he inquired presently.

"Of course not. Oh dear, how fishy you do smell!"

"Fishy!" he echoed. "Why wouldn't I, carrying in all those nets; and you're no much better yoursel', I'm thinking."

"Well, I'm finished and going home, now. You needna come up the night; I'm busy."

Colin nodded. "All right; I'll go and see after the Light—the wind's rising."

The Light—St. Eillons Light—was a primitive oil lantern chained to the end of a dangerous ridge of rocks at the north of the bay as a danger-signal to the boats on rough nights, and the lighting of it had drifted into Colin's care of late; it was a risky climb over the rocks, and, sooth to say, the St. Eillons folk were not clamorous for the honour of it.

Christian crossed the strip of short wiry grass to a tiny cottage that crowned a sandy hillside at the back of the jetty. The village proper ended with that jetty: it did duty for pier, promenade, landing-stage, fishing station, and custom-house, if ever any doubtful arrivals had needed looking into. There was also an extensive coastguard kept up, presumably on the chance of the same contingency.

At the door she found her step-mother rinsing out a pile of blue fishing-jerseys in a tub of cold water; a bare-footed baby crawling about, ready for any mischief that might offer. Christian picked him up, swung him over her shoulder on to the window-ledge, with an injunction to stay there on peril of his life, and began to wring out the jerseys too.

"I'd have been through the now, Christian," said the mother. "I got hindered sending off that fish."

Christian never grudged a helping hand in any direction, but this evening there was something not quite as cheery about her movements. Mrs. Grant looked at her once or twice doubtfully.

"Air ye no weel?" she asked as she put on the big black kettle.

"That 's twice in less than an hour," said Christian impatiently. "I 'm weel enough, Lisbeth. Those lines took such a time to-day, and I meant to be cleaned up before the boat came in."

Mrs. Grant looked rather mystified. What had the boat to do with it? But she was a wise woman, and went on preparing the tea without any comment. She boiled an egg for herself, one for her tall step-daughter, two for her husband, and as she was taking them out of the pan, he came in—a big, handsome man still, though sunburnt and grizzled. It was easy to guess where Christian got her winsome face from; there was a curious likeness between them, even to expression.

"The boat brought us good luck the day, wife," he said, cutting off a huge "whang" of cheese for himself.

"I didna see many folk coming off," said his wife, sitting down beside him, the baby on her knee.

"There 's a young fellow put up at the 'Fife Arms.' His folk are coming on in a week or so, and I 'm to take them all out rowing and fishing whenever they want to go."

Christian looked up sharply.

"Did he say that?"

"Of course he did, lass; d'ye think I 'm dreaming it? A decent young fellow he is; he 's been sitting by the flagstaff for an hour past. There 's his mother and sister and a cousin coming, and if they like the place they 'll be here for a month or mair—Saxton their name is."

"That 's the sort of visitors we want," said Mrs. Grant approvingly; "it 's strange we didna see him coming up, Christian."

Christian did not answer; she was stooping over the kettle, and—it might have been the effect of the unaccustomed compliment—some curious shyness kept her from owning that she had both seen and spoken with the new-comer.

Perhaps it was the same reason that led her to put on her clean pink short gown when she went down to bait her lines the next afternoon, and that also made her carry her stool and baskets to the back of the tarred fence that shut in the fishing-sheds. It was a benefit in the point of outlook. In place of the sandy road, there was the strip of yellow sand, narrowing every minute as the creeping waves rippled over it; the wide blue sea, with here and there a brown sail or grey line of smoke from a passing steamer, lay still as a painted picture in the soft September sunshine. Christian, except for her quick fingers, was almost as still. The boat was faintly visible on the horizon. It would be an hour or more before it came panting in, and long before that hour passed, down the road behind came Mr. Saxton, who quietly skirted the sheds to her retreat. He had seen her take up her position from his sitting-room window. Far-seeing Christian, not to have remembered those inn windows, taking in the whole sweep of the bay!

"What a lovely place for doing one's work in!" he began, perching himself on the fence close by. "If those things must be done, you couldn't have chosen a better place."

No answer.

"I saw your father last night," he went on lightly. "He seems to be an authority on fish, and he is going to let me have the use of his boat while I am here."

"Yes, he was telling us."

"Does he go out by himself at night?"

"No; there is Sam—my brother—and Colin."

"Colin a brother too?"

"No."

"Shall I interfere with your work if I wait till the boat comes in?"

"No," was the response. "I 'm nearly finished."

And yet, long after the last hook was supplied and laid away under the damp grass, Christian sat there listening to the gay talk she only half understood, and though she half despised it, as coming from a stranger and a Southerner, the easy tones, the pleasant grace of it, had a certain charm for the roughly nurtured fisher-girl, accustomed only to the honest, plain matter-of-factness of her "ain folk."

She looked after him wistfully as he sauntered away when the steamer drew up at the end of the jetty. She had scarcely spoken beyond an occasional yes or no, and yet how that hour had slipped by! Colin was true and dependable enough, but it was a change to listen to someone who spoke as if he thought her opinion of value, and listened with an air of polite deference that was a very novel feature in her experience, and so—she hardly knew why—she did not mention this second meeting either, to Colin when he came back from his fishing.

CHAPTER II.—IN SHADE.

THAT was the whole of it—those one-sided chats over the lines of bait—it never reached any further stage. Mr. Saxton was no gay Lothario, bent on conquest, only a kindly, easy-going young fellow, with a good many idle hours on his hands. A man could not golf eternally, and there was literally no other occupation in St. Eillons except the fishing, which was prosecuted, like everything else in that sleepy hollow, after a very leisurely fashion. "Once in a great storm and hurricane, three hundred years before," saith the local chronicle, "nearly the whole of the fishing fleet was exterminated in one night, and the industry has never thoroughly rallied from the shock."

Mr. Saxton laughed aloud when Christian gravely mentioned this fact to him, but he apologised the next minute, and acknowledged that it did take a very long time to recover from some shocks, and on the whole he thought the inhabitants had the best of it, especially as it had saved them a good deal of hard work in the three centuries that had gone by since.

He never tried in those lazy talks to make the girl dissatisfied with her lot; in truth, he gave little thought to it of any kind, but the effect was there all the same. The glimpses into a world so different from her own; nay, even the white, shapely hands and well-fitting garments made Colin's rugged outlines seem more rugged, and his manners blunter. Christian overlooked the item that those manners were more in accordance with her own than those of this fair-weather acquaintance could be by any possibility. All her interest in the day's work began and ended, just now, with that hour or two in the afternoon while Colin and most of the fishermen were sleeping, ready for the night's work.

"My mother is coming to-morrow," Mr. Saxton remarked casually one day towards the end of the second week: weeks that had slipped by so swiftly, and yet seemed to have begun in some remote past, "and then I'll have to be on duty again; she likes little attentions. I must do something at the golfing too."

"Why have ye no done it before?" queried Christian.

"Laziness, I think," he laughed. "Is your father greatly attached to Colin?"

"Greatly attached," echoed Christian, a little puzzled by the sudden change of subject; "why, he's knowed him since he was a wee laddie."

"And that constitutes a sufficient reason, of course; and you share his views, I suppose?"

"I dinna ken," said Christian, rather stiffly. "Colin is—Colin."

"So I believe, but he's not the most cheerful companion I ever had on a fishing trip. I'm not bad-tempered as a rule, which was a great pity, I thought two or three times last night."

"What's come ower you and Christian?" her father was asking Colin that same day, as the two pegged their nets down on the sunny sand-hills to dry.

"What should come over us?" was the response.

"Nay, gudeness kens; ye no seem very thick the now."

Nobody was more conscious of that than Colin, but he was not given to talking over his grievances either with his prospective father-in-law or any other person, and Grant asked no more questions, reflecting that young folk were aye young folk, and not once connecting the advent of the pleasant-spoken stranger with the matter. Colin finished his share of the nets, and marched grimly away to his own quarters; he had to pass the Grant cottage on his way, and there Christian was standing knitting a coarse blue stocking beside the low boundary wall of shingles that fenced off the sand-hills. He walked straight up to her, and leaned across the shingles.

"What was that fellow talking to you about all the afternoon down here?" he began abruptly.

Christian looked at him coldly. "That's my business," she curtly answered.

"And mine too. I'd no have believed you were the sort of girl to be whistled out by any ne'er-do-weel that liked to hold up his finger."

"That's enough, Colin; you may just go on believing it. I'm tired of the whole business. Gang and look for any lass that'll suit ye better."

"Tired?" cried Colin. "Are ye forgetting how I've waited for ye since ye were a wee bit lassie that high? When did I ever look at any other lass when ye were by, or when ye were na by either? Tell me that, Christian."

Christian's head bent over her needle. "I canna help it," she said stubbornly, "but I'm just tired hearing of nothing but the fishing and the boats, and that bait, all day long."

"And what wad ye be wanting to hear about? You've been brought up to it."

"That's just the reason I want to get away from it."

"Get away from it!" Colin took one step forward, facing her full. "Look here, Christian;" but Christian was counting off the heel-stitches, and to all appearance utterly absorbed in them; the next instant, sock and needles were snatched from her hands and flung away out on the sand-hills. "You shall hear me!" he said in a low, hoarse voice, "and answer me: Are ye wanting to get away from me too?"

The hot, angry colour surged up into Christian's face, then ebbed away, leaving it white and cold. "I'd be hard up indeed for a man if I wanted to keep you," she said presently, speaking slowly and with cutting scorn.

And so face to face for one minute they stood—this lover and his lass who had held by each other in their own peculiar fashion for so long. The sky had clouded over, a sudden drift of raindrops pattered unfelt, unheeded, on their faces, on her bright uncovered hair—hair that Colin believed was the bonniest crown even a queen could wear—and then, without another word, he turned on his heel and went away along the sand-hills, and Christian, free and fetterless, perhaps by way of celebrating that same freedom, walked soberly down to the sheds and worked at her haddies for kippering for the space of three mortal hours.

Mrs. Grant looked up anxiously from the griddle where she was baking scones when she finally went home. "Christian, what's keeping your father? Sam's away with the creels this half-hour. Ye might slip down to the boats and see; it's no' often he's behindhand."

Slip down to the boats, with the certainty of there encountering Colin, and possibly Mr. Saxton likewise!—the one place where she did not want to go. The wind was rising, and now and again came a gusty shower of heavy drops. Christian caught up her plaid and hurried down to the jetty. The dusk was creeping up, but she made out that most of the boats were already away, their own among them. She called up to one of the old coastguards, standing like a sentinel by the flagstaff—

"Do ye ken what made my father gang so sudden-like?"

"He's no' gaun, lassie; he's ben the boat-house."

Christian looked inside the wide door. There, on a coil of tarred rope, sat John Grant, his foot stretched out before him.

"There ye are, my lass! I've slipped my foot on the step, and I'm doubting I'll no' get the use of it the morn's morn, either. Gi'e me your shoulder in."

"But the boat?" asked Christian.

"The lads have ta'en it. They'll just have to do the best they can, and it's but a dirty night they'll have of it, I'm thinking. Colin swung up the light last thing; if it was needed ony time it'll be the night."

Christian saw it flickering, away at the end of the rocky ridge, as they went slowly back. Grant was able to limp into his big chair by the hearth, but it was evident to both his wife and daughter that it would be a good many "morns' morns" before he would be down amongst the boats again.

Free, quite free! But Christian fluttered restlessly about the kitchen, seeing after various items of work with an odd empty feeling at her heart, now and then holding her breath to listen to the sough of the wind or the dash of the white breakers

"'There ye are, my lass!'" on the rocks. Even the bay was sheeted over with foam. Her father went to sleep at last in his box bed in the corner, the baby followed his example, and then Mrs. Grant came softly out into the porch, shutting the door behind her, to where Christian stood straining her eyes seaward.

"It's a bad night for the lads," she said anxiously; "and so dark."

They stood together listening, sheltered by the cottage wall from the full force of the wind. It was late, but neither once thought of going to bed, though it would be hours before the boats came in, unless they were obliged to make for the shore in sheer distress. Suddenly Christian sprang away up the steep slope behind the house. A minute or two, and she was back at her stepmother's side.

"I was sure of it," she said breathlessly. "The light 's out!"

"Oh, Christian, and the puir lads!"

A change had swept over Christian's face; she turned back to the door. "I'm gaun down to light it," she said half to herself.

"Lassie, ye canna; it's wark for a man in daylight, and in this wind—and the dark——"

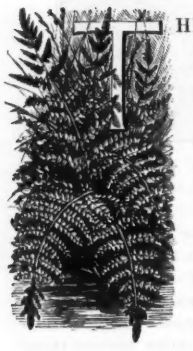
"Dinna hinder me, Lisbeth; I maun try it. I've been before with the lads."

Yes—with the lads to help and drag her over the awkward places, and in the full sunshine. It was a different story crawling on hands and knees in the teeth of that howling wind, the lantern tied about her waist. Christian did get there, she hardly knew how, and she never cared to talk of that journey after. She lighted the lantern and sent the warm glow streaming out again over the tossing waves below, and then, too utterly exhausted even to try to struggle back, she crept behind a big boulder to rest.

The night wore on; she was used to solitude and stormy weather—that did not trouble her, but something else did. The discontent of these last weeks was rolling away like morning mist. What was this outside stranger—what were his white hands, or pleasant manners, or the big city he came from—to her, in comparison with Colin?—Colin, who had grown up beside her—grown into her whole life—Colin, who had fought her battles against all the other fisher-lads when she was a wee girlie in pinafores: Colin, who had never spoken a rough angry word to her or hers till that day, when his very anger had been a revelation of how much he loved her?

And it was out there on the rocks in the grey dawn that Colin found her. The boats came riding safely in past St. Eillons Light, guessing nothing of its brief lapse from duty. Mrs. Grant told them of it first when they reached the cottage, and that Christian was still away. "I didna tell her father; he could do nothing," she said; "and I'm thinking she 's just waiting there for the daylight; it 's a gey hard road over those rocks."

There were no explanations; the place where he found her explained it all better than words. Colin took her, wet and battered as she was, into his arms. "My lass, my lass!"



And Christian forgot the fishy smell, the rough jersey, and rougher hands. "Oh, Colin! my heart was just sair for you."

She saw Mr. Saxton that same afternoon escorting three ladies up from the jetty, his mother and two fashionably attired damsels, who looked as though no rough wind had ever blown across the even tenor of their days. Mr. Saxton was so busy talking, that he never remembered to look round as he passed the fishing sheds. Christian watched them very gravely as they skirted the bay to the "Family Hotel." Only yesterday! It seemed like months since she had listened to his gay talk over her lines.

"I 'm glad he came, though," she said to herself half aloud, "very glad; maybe I'd never have found out what Colin was if I hadna been so near losing him."

NEVER YOUNG AND NEVER OLD.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "HOW TO BE HAPPY THOUGH MARRIED," ETC. ETC.

THERE are some people who seem to have always been grown-up. They do not understand, and have no sympathy with, the thoughts, feelings, and doings of unconventional youth, and it is impossible to imagine that they themselves ever played like young animals. This is not always their fault. The cares and responsibilities of life may have come upon them too soon, making them old men and old women before their time. Nothing is more painful than to see premature age on the faces of children of the very poor, many of whom cannot enjoy a romp or an unconscious laugh, and are as knowing and suspicious as an old soldier or an old rat.

But there are others who never were young because when they ought to have been it was the desire of foolish friends, or their own ambition, that they should be "old-fashioned." In these days of competitive examination, children are driven from one kind of drill to another, and have no time to be young. The following epitaph, written by Waller on a young nobleman, describes the not unusual result:—

"Like buds appearing ere the frosts are past,
To become man he made such fatal haste,
And to perfection laboured so to climb,
Preventing slow experience and time,
That 't is no wonder death our hopes beguiled:
He 's seldom old that will not be a child."

The reason that in so many cases middle life is a struggle and old age a regret is because youth has been a blunder—something that ought not to be described by that pure, bright, happy word. Youth is the time for settling habits, and nothing but misery can result when this, the most precious time in life, has been wasted or misused. There are boys and girls who exhaust the enjoyments of life so early that nothing remains to them in middle life and old age but ennui and regrets. What can be more odious than the precocity of "little wee bit mannikins" who think that they can make themselves men merely by imitating men's vices? Not to have had, either through our own fault or through the fault of circumstances, a pure and happy youth, is the greatest loss we could have.

"We were sad
In the sweet air made gladsome by the sun;
Now in this miry darkness are we sad."

Here is a warning to those who are not giving to the morn of life its natural blessedness, who are sad in the sunshine of youth because they forget their Creator, and will not rule themselves after His Word. Unconsciously, perhaps, to themselves, some young people seem to say, "Now is not the appointed time for us to turn to God; now is not the day of salvation; wait till I get older. Don't trouble me about religion for about fifty years, and then, when I am going to die, I shall give the matter my serious attention." And yet

"Why should we think youth's draught of joy
If pure would sparkle less?
Why should the cup the sooner cloy
Which God hath deigned to bless?"

If young people knew what religion is, instead of trying how long they could do without it, they would feel that every year and month and week and day they live away from its "sweet reasonableness" is so much of their precious youth wasted—lived on a lower level than it might have been. Mr. Pomfret, who became an eminent Christian minister, was converted at the age of nineteen; yet the remembrance of so large a portion of life spent in impenitence ever after affected his heart, and he used often to repeat the words of Austin, "O Lord, too late I loved Thee." Those only rejoice in a way that does not bring subsequent misery, who in the precious but dangerous time of youth remember their Creator. The youth of those who forget Him might be described as non-existent were it not that it makes its existence felt by very sad results in after-life.

But if it is a mistake never to have been young, it is no less a mistake to grow old. Leigh Hunt quotes the following, which he calls "a delicious memorandum," from Mrs. Inchbald's diary: "One Sunday I dined, drank tea, and supped with Mrs. Whitfield. At dark, she and I, and her son William, walked out, and I rapped at the doors in New Street, and ran away." This was in 1788, when Miss Inchbald was thirty-five. What would the tenants have thought if they had been told that the runaway knocks had been given by one of the most respectable women of the day—the authoress of the "Simple Story"? "But," says Leigh Hunt, "such people never grow old."

Householders cannot altogether approve of elderly people giving vent to the exuberance of their lingering youth in this way, but we all must admire those who grow old in the graceful possession of such feelings. "As I approve," says Cicero, "of a youth that has something of the old man in him, so I am no less pleased with an old man that has something of the youth. He that follows this rule may be old in body, but can never be so in mind." We do not think that the first part of what is here said is opposed to the sentiments expressed in the beginning of this paper, for though we ought not to expect to find an old head on young shoulders, still the thoughtlessness and carelessness which produce so much of the world's misery have no right to excuse themselves on the plea of youth.

We shall all agree, however, to praise old people who retain something of their youth when there is no self-consciousness or pretence. When there is, the result is very far from pleasing. It is indeed a sad sight to see an old lady, wrinkled and withered, dressing, talking, and acting like a very young one, and forgetting all the time, as she clings to the feeble remnant of the past, that there is no sham more transparent than hers, and that people, instead of feeling with her, are laughing at her. Old boys disguise their foibles a little better; but they are equally ridiculous.

Very different are the juvenile old people whom we commend as worthy of imitation. In one sense they have put away childish things; in another they have not. They have put away the weakness, imperfection, and immaturity of childhood; they retain its open mind and heart—"In wit a man, simplicity a child." Having been long in this "naughty world," they know good and evil, but they are as innocent as new arrivals from a better world.

What an object of pity a man is whose extreme dignity will not allow him to have any fun in this world! The elderly people of whom I am thinking are without this extreme dignity. They enjoy a romp with children; and one celebrated man at least used to amuse himself when safe from the interruption of fools by jumping over chairs. It was a boyish leap over a fence that caused the death of Matthew Arnold in his sixty-fifth year. The way to preserve the grace of youth in that old age to which, if we do not soon die, we must all come, is the way of self-control, the way of sympathy, and the way of unselfishness. The grand essentials of happiness in every stage of life, but particularly in the last, are—having something to do, something to love, and something to hope for. In explanation of the fact that he could still play the rôle of a young man, old Adam says in As You Like It:—

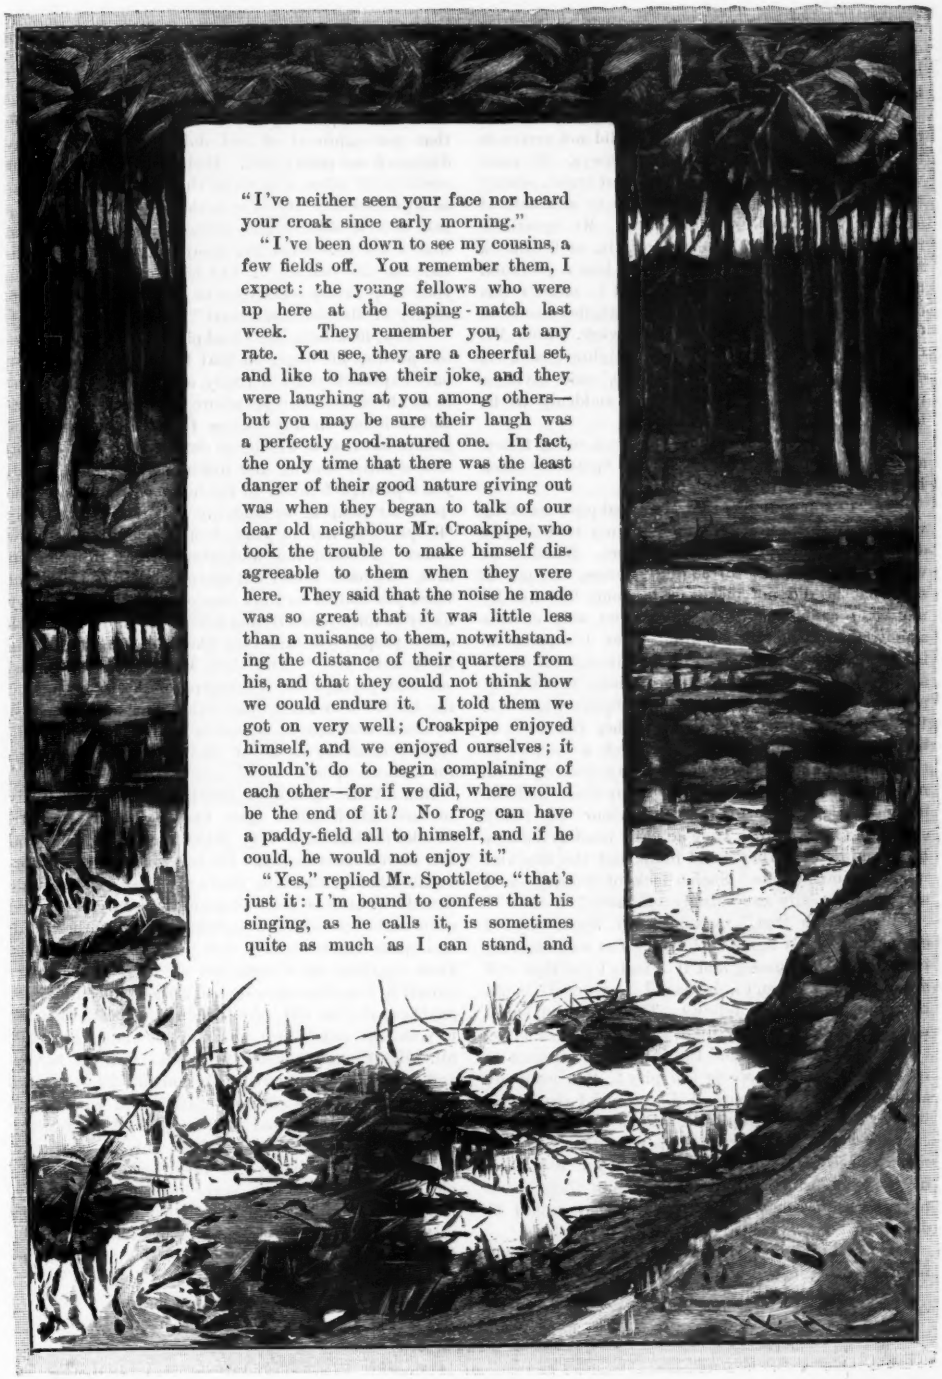
"For in my youth I never did apply
Hot and rebellious liquors in my blood,

> Nor did I with unbashful forehead woo
> The means of weakness and debility;
> Therefore my age is as a lusty winter,
> Frosty, but kindly."

"If you wish," says Sydney Smith, "for anything like happiness in the fifth act of life, eat and drink about one-half of what you could eat and drink." Then the old should live with the young, sympathising with them and helping them. When over eighty years of age, Jeremy Bentham wrote to a friend: "I am living surrounded with young men, and merrier than most of them." We have all seen instances of unhappy rich old men who have retired from business and have no habitual recreations. They used to enjoy the excitement of uncertainty in their business; now everything is safe and dull; then mere rest after fatigue was happiness; now there is no fatigue, but there is restlessness in monotony. It is well, therefore, that all should prepare for the decline of power in recreations, as in much graver things, and there are many that do not lose their charm or their utility as they grow older. "Without a hobby-horse," exclaimed James Watt, "what is life?" and he himself is a proof that riding one keeps people young and vigorous. He went on inventing and perfecting his inventions to the end of his life, presenting to his friends the first copies of the busts made by his copying machine as "the productions of a young artist just entering his eighty-third year." When Cato was drawing near the close of his life, he declared to his friends that the greatest comfort of his old age, and that which gave him the highest satisfaction, was the pleasing remembrance of the many benefits and friendly offices he had done to others. To see them easy and happy by his means made him truly so. Someone said to a good man: "You are on the shady side of seventy, I expect?"—"No," was the reply; "I am on the sunny side; for I am on the side nearest to glory." Very beautiful is an old age which, looking to "the light that never was on sea or land," is joyful through the hope of entering into the new heaven and the new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness. The ideal life begins with a happy youth, and ends with a free and beautiful old age, but it is only realised by those who remember their Creator all the days of their life.

THE FROGS IN THE PADDY-FIELD.

A NEW FABLE.



BY ALFRED J. BAMFORD, B.A., AUTHOR OF "TURBANS AND TAILS; OR, SKETCHES IN THE UNROMANTIC EAST," ETC.

WITH a hop and a skip and a jump, flop came Master Brighteye, close to where old Mr. Spottletoe was sitting, on the raised bank that ran between the paddy-fields. Master Brighteye was a lively young frog, not much more than half-grown, and Mr. Spottletoe was a frog of experience, who had seen these same paddy-fields irrigated for rice, and then drained off for other crops, a good many times. The bank had not been made for him, but it suited him almost as well as though it had been. It had been made to prevent the water, in which the rice loved to grow, from running off and leaving the rice-roots dry, and he found it a cheerful and airy place to sit on in the cool of the evening, and was as regularly to be found there at sundown as though he owned it. He was something of an invalid, and troubled with what he called "nerves." Although the story was one on which as a rule he avoided saying much, having an idea that it did not present him in a dignified light, it was well enough known that he had once been caught by a man who had fixed his foot in a thing called a microscope, to study the movement of the blood through the veins. Thanks to great courage and agility, favoured by some happy accident, Mr. Spottletoe had managed to make his escape; but he had had a stiff joint ever since. And far worse than the stiff joint had been the effect on his nervous system, which had received such a shock, that from that time till his death the least thing would startle him dreadfully. That is how it was that he gave a jump when young Brighteye came suddenly to the end of a flying leap right in front of him.

"I'm sure I'm very sorry to have startled you so," said Brighteye, who was as kind-hearted a frog as you could wish to see. "I did not mean to."

"'Mean to,' my tadpole! of course you didn't; of course you didn't. I know that well enough," said Mr. Spottletoe, as soon as he had recovered his breath. He had a great liking for young Brighteye, and, indeed, for most of the young frogs of the place. Some folks, when they get old, do not seem to care to have anything to do with young people, except to scold them or complain of them. But old Mr. Spottletoe was not one of that sort at all; he was a general favourite, always friendly and bright; as young in spirits, if not in limbs, as any frog in the neighbourhood; and so, when the youngsters were tired with their gymnastics and games, in which, of course, poor lame old Mr. Spottletoe could not join, they liked nothing better than to come and have a chat with him, to tell him the news of the paddy-fields, or to listen to some of his wise saws, or to the stories he could tell of things he saw and heard about when he was as young as they.

"Where have you been all day?" asked Mr. Spottletoe.

"I've neither seen your face nor heard your croak since early morning."

"I've been down to see my cousins, a few fields off. You remember them, I expect: the young fellows who were up here at the leaping-match last week. They remember you, at any rate. You see, they are a cheerful set, and like to have their joke, and they were laughing at you among others—but you may be sure their laugh was a perfectly good-natured one. In fact, the only time that there was the least danger of their good nature giving out was when they began to talk of our dear old neighbour Mr. Croakpipe, who took the trouble to make himself disagreeable to them when they were here. They said that the noise he made was so great that it was little less than a nuisance to them, notwithstanding the distance of their quarters from his, and that they could not think how we could endure it. I told them we got on very well; Croakpipe enjoyed himself, and we enjoyed ourselves; it wouldn't do to begin complaining of each other—for if we did, where would be the end of it? No frog can have a paddy-field all to himself, and if he could, he would not enjoy it."

"Yes," replied Mr. Spottletoe, "that's just it: I'm bound to confess that his singing, as he calls it, is sometimes quite as much as I can stand, and always more than I like. But he would think I ought not to have such weak nerves. At any rate, he enjoys it, and I must make the best of it, and bear it as well as I can."

At this moment up came the very person of whom they were speaking. Mr. Croakpipe did not arrive in the boisterous manner of Master Brighteye. He came with what he intended to be a dignified crawl, simply taking a genteel hop when he came to any tuft of grass or weed too big to crawl over. Mr. Spottletoe received Mr. Croakpipe very cordially, as became a neighbour. Young Brighteye made him a profound bow, which Mr. Croakpipe understood to mean reverence, though he was not perfectly satisfied about it. Close upon his bow followed a quiet wink, which Mr. Croakpipe did not see; and then Brighteye said, "I expect I must go, or I shall be late," and, giving a prodigious leap, he disappeared as suddenly as he had come.

"That 's a nice young fellow—as nice a young fellow as we have in the field." So said Mr. Spottletoe when Brighteye was quite out of hearing.

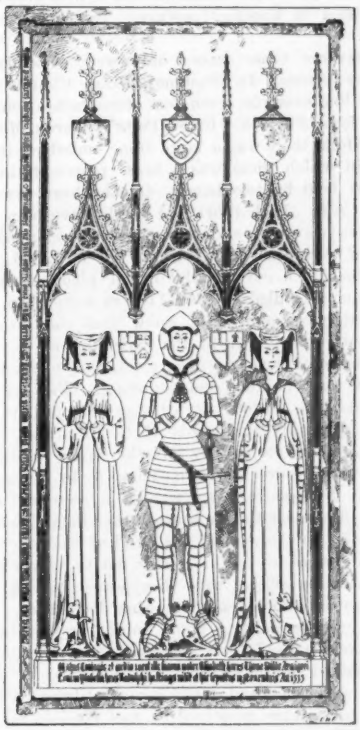
"Yes, I suppose he is," said Mr. Croakpipe, speaking with a certain hesitancy, which plainly told that he did not suppose anything of the sort. Whether he was moved by a desire to be quite honest, and not to say what he did not mean, or by some less worthy motive, I cannot say; but he did not stop at this assenting to the other's praise. "Yes, I suppose he is," he replied, but added, "I do not like his manners; and as for his friends and companions, I must say plainly that I regard them as a painfully vulgar set. Why, do you know—I forget whether you were at home that day or not—but last week a number of them were up here playing leap-frog in this very field, not far from my front door—yes, leap-frog—and the boisterous heartiness of their behaviour was really exceedingly offensive. They actually tried to see how high and how far they could jump, and the laughter was most immoderate. Such a lack of dignity—as I say, it was really exceedingly offensive."

"Why, as to that," responded Mr. Spottletoe, "I cannot say I fully agree with you. You see, leap-frog is a good healthy game, and if I hadn't got this stiff ankle, and if I weren't quite so old, I expect I should be joining the young fellows. Though it condemns myself, I 'm bound to say I don't think much of a frog that cannot jump, and find fun in it too. I cannot do it myself, I know, more is the pity! But were my ankles as sound as yours, I 'd try; and I should not wonder now, Mr. Croakpipe, if a little more muscular exercise would do you good, help your digestion, and make you feel ten times happier than you do. Why do not you ask them to let you join their sports next time they come? I am sure they would be delighted."

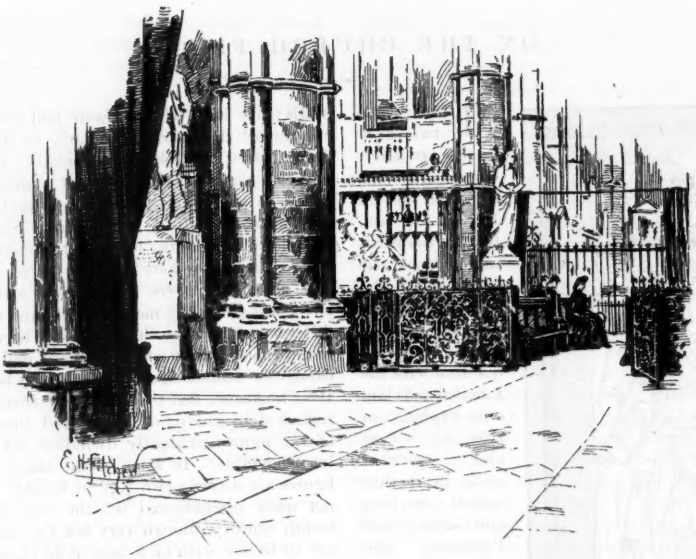
Mr. Croakpipe opened his eyes in sheer astonishment. "Can you think that I could join in any such exhibition of vulgarity? Mr. Spottletoe, your question surprises me beyond answering almost. I beg you to understand I do not play leap-frog at all, and if I were to do so, I should not play with such frogs as these we are speaking of. I never dreamed of finding that you approved of such doings as have recently disgraced our paddy-field. Feeling, as I do, that the credit of all of us is at stake, that we shall lose caste as a community unless something be done to put a stop to these objectionable proceedings, I must confess that I am astounded and disappointed at your attitude in the matter. I had counted confidently on your help in my endeavour to maintain the respectability of the neighbourhood."

"Now, look here, Mr. Croakpipe," said Mr. Spottletoe, putting his finger on that frog's shoulder; "you have expressed yourself freely, and you will allow me to do the same. Let me assure you that our respectability is not in any danger from the young folks' games, but that it will be in danger from any exhibition of bitter feeling and unkindness. And I 'll tell you a proverb I heard in the house of that man who spoilt my jumping by studying my foot. It ran thus: 'People who live in glass houses should not throw stones.' I could not understand what it meant at first, but have found out since; and it is this: that when you intend to hurt someone else, you are very likely to hurt yourself, and when you find fault with other people, you are very likely to set them finding fault with you." And then Mr. Spottletoe pointed out that perhaps Mr. Croakpipe ought to be among the last to find fault, since other frogs had at least as much occasion to complain of his noisy and incessant croaking as he of their occasional meetings for athletic sports.

But all Mr. Spottletoe could say was little likely to have much effect upon his neighbour, for Mr. Croakpipe had been very delicate as a tadpole, and had been a trifle spoiled. He had got into the unfortunate habit of thinking that everybody else must do exactly what was most pleasant to him. It seemed quite right for him to complain of what others did, and quite right, further, for them to cease at once from anything he complained of. But it never occurred to him that anybody had a right to complain of anything that he did. And when Mr. Spottletoe tried to point this out to him, he could not understand it at all. His thoughts and expectations were as before, and his conduct unaltered. He continued to interfere with other people's affairs, telling them what to do and what not to do, and for the sake of peace many did as he told them. So he often got his own way, but he was never happy—at least, never so happy as old Mr. Spottletoe, who never interfered with anybody if he could help it, but tried to make things pleasant for everybody, and who was so great a favourite, that everybody tried to make things pleasant for him.



ON THE CHURCH FLOOR.



STONE OF ONE OF THE TRUMPINGTON FAMILY, TRUMPINGTON CHURCH.

MORE than two hundred years ago it came into the heart of George Herbert to ask, in the beautiful sacred poem he called "The Temple," "Mark you the floor?" He answered the question with the fanciful and elaborate explanation that the square and speckled stone in it that looked so firm and strong was Patience; the alternate squares of black and grey were Humility; the step or gentle rising leading to "the quire above" was Confidence; and the cement that bound all together in one sure band and tied the whole frame was Love and Charity. We also are about to call attention to church floors, though from a more material point of view; for besides the black and grey and speckled tiles, or squares of marble, so exquisitely compared to moral excellencies, there are many objects, either in the paving or associated with it, that are of considerable interest.

For instance: in many of our churches, especially in many of our village churches, there are yet to be seen, embedded in the floors, superb memorial brasses, or flat brass effigies of knights and squires, with or without their dames, and of merchants with and without their wives, and of clergy, all long since departed to the mercy of God. For three centuries at least it was the custom to incise upon thin metal plates representations of those whose memory it was desired to perpetuate, and to cut out these brass presentments, and insert them in large flat stones, properly prepared with matrices, or indentations, to receive them, so as to present an even surface when fixed. The large flat stones thus converted into frameworks for the brass figures were then laid down on the floor among the paving-stones or tiles. Some brasses were also placed on altar-tombs, and some on walls; but most of them were laid down level with the rest of the floor, particularly in the churches in Kent, Essex, Suffolk, and Norfolk. Curiously, the earliest examples of this sort of monumental art are found to be the best, as though perfection in the matter was attained at the first. Size, simplicity, and elegance were the leading characteristics to begin with; the figures were large, or life-sized, and single; few ornaments were introduced, and the general effect was gained by means of bold and graceful lines. After a century or so this excellence began to decline; more ornamentation was introduced, more escutcheons, canopies; female figures were placed by the sides of their husbands, and the number of their children was indicated in groups of them: and then the life-size of the figures gradually dwindled till they became inconsiderable. In some of the latest examples the figures are scarcely two feet in height. This art was not quite discontinued till the close of the seventeenth century, though very few fine specimens of it are to be met with of a later date than the reign of Elizabeth. The feet of the earliest effigies generally rested on representations of animals treated heraldically. In later examples the figures were often delineated in kneeling postures. Inscriptions were usual.

Sometimes brass crosses only were embedded in the gravestones. In Blackmore Priory Church there was a fine example, seven feet three inches long by three feet in width. In St. Peter's Church, Merton, in Norfolk, there was a large stone embedded in the floor in which there was a brass representation of a heart held by two hands. On the heart was the word Credo. Both heart and hands have been long lost, but two scrolls and an inscription have remained till our own time. We learn, by the last-mentioned, that the stone covered the burial-place of Alicia Fincham, who died in May, 1477, or more than four hundred years ago. We know that the heart is frequently mentioned in the Scriptures as the seat and source of love, courage, grief, and pleasure, as well as of wit and understanding. May we not conclude this curious device was intended to set forth pictorially the words of the Psalmist, "My heart shall rejoice in Thy salvation"; or, "With my whole heart have I sought Thee"? In Brampton Church, Derbyshire, there was to be seen part of a female figure, holding a heart in her hand likewise.

Exposed to the wear of the tread of the congregations of successive centuries, it is not to be wondered at that many effigies have disappeared, leaving the matrices only to mark where they have been. But we may yet see many a noble knight, arrayed in his "warlike harness" from head to foot, delineated as he remained in the sorrowing remembrance of those who loved him; and many a noble dame with as much portraiture preserved as was possible for the artist. There are, indeed, but few counties that are not thus enriched, from Cornwall up to Northumberland. In Cobham Church, Kent, there are some fine brasses, well known to enthusiastic collectors, who have made many a pilgrimage to the Pickwickian village, with paper and heel-ball, to carry away rough rubbings of them. In Trumpington Church there is a good example, representing a Trumpington. In Morley Church, Derbyshire, there is a squire kneeling on his helmet with his lady in the attitude of prayer, with an inscription stating they gave three bells to the church, and ordained three shillings and fourpence to be laid out for bread for the poor of the parish, and that the "Squyer" died in 1454, and his "wyfe" A.D. 1444. Sometimes two wives are delineated, as in Bromham Church, Bedfordshire. In Thornton Church, Bucks, there are three wives of one husband thus depicted. A brass in Etwall Church delineates a knight and his wife and their seventeen children. In a Cornish church the metal used for the plates is copper. In a Berkshire church there is an instance of lead being used for the purpose. At Burwash, Sussex, plates of cast-iron were laid in the pavements instead of gravestones.

There were a few years ago, and probably still are, two interesting figures on the floor of the north side of the chancel of North Ockendon Church, which are no more than two feet nine inches high. The inscription belonging to them relates that they represent William Pointz and his wife, who was the sister of the Lord Mayor of London. The squire is delineated in armour and spurs, with his head uncovered resting on a pillow. The dame's robes fall in graceful folds and cover her feet. Her hands are slanted, as if in prayer. Two groups of children, with six figures in each, evidently indicate that their issue were twelve in number. In Hutton Church there was recently, and probably still is, a stone on the floor of the chancel, on which two figures represent a warrior and his lady, and two groups depict their sixteen children. The inscription and armorial bearings that should have told us who they were have been lost, but the evidence of their dress points to the reign of Richard III. as the period in which they lived. The knight in this example is but one foot four inches and a half high, and his dame is depicted only one foot four inches high; and the groups of children are only six or seven inches high. Unfortunately, as these metal memorials were easily melted down, many of them have disappeared—even recently. In Croydon Church, for instance, two handsome female figures, with high-crowned hats, peaked bodices, and ruffs of Queen Elizabeth's time, were surreptitiously removed, with four others, in the course of repairs after the fire there in 1859.

Besides brasses, we have many interesting memorial gravestones embedded in church floors of different materials, according to the locality. In Cornwall these slabs are frequently made of Purbeck marble and of slate, as in Wales; in Derbyshire they are sometimes alabaster; in the northern counties sandstone is most generally used. Some of them keep the secret rather than disclose the identity of those who are buried below them. A still larger number, of later date, have curious inscriptions. On a flat stone in the flagging of the north aisle of Alnwick Church, now covered up by pews or removed, was the following:—"Wonder not Reader who soe obscured lies. A loyall subject of most unvalued Price. Soe have we known such iewels Hid in mould. And sweetest Flowers the shadiest Leaves Enfold. Know Reader in thos sacred ashes there Lies under coverd A loyallest of Men, viz.: Richard Chaleton who departed the 23 of March Anno Dom 1664." In North Hinksey Church, in Berkshire, an inscription commences thus:—"Reader, look to thy feet; honest and loyal men are sleeping under them. Here lies," etc. Still quainter wordings than those of the seventeenth century are to be seen in the examples of the preceding one. On a plain floor-stone in the chancel of Mountnessing Church was cut:—

"17 Decembris 1583.

Layde heere aloone all dedde in tooeme John Peers of Arnollde Hall, Awaitheth for the daye of dooeme till Christe hym up shall call,
Whose tyme nowe paste on earth well spente hath gotten him good name.
His honest lyfe and governmente deserved well the same
God grawnte that his good dealyne may to us example be Of Mowntneysinge that rightelie saye an honest man was he."

As our glances fall upon church floors, then, and these memorials remind us of those who have gone before us, whose hearts were filled with the same aspirations as our own, and who, in their day, perhaps did more than we have been able to do—kept in their minds the love of God more constantly, and loved and served their fellow-men better than we have done—it is no wonder there come to us the words, "The place whereon thou standest is holy ground."

Mosaic pavements are the most costly of all floors. Though comparatively common in Italy and Sicily, they are extremely rare with us. We have one ancient example in Westminster Abbey of the famous Opus Alexandrinum, as this sort of mosaic-work used to be called. It is spread out, as it was laid down in Abbot Ware's time before the Chapel of Edward the Confessor, in a line with the east aisles of the transepts. A golden floor, however, is mentioned as having been laid down in the richest and most sacred part of Solomon's Temple. We are told King Solomon built the walls of the House of the Lord within with boards of cedar, both the floor of the house and the walls or the ceiling, and he covered them on the inside with wood, and covered the floor of the house with planks of fir, and that he overlaid with pure gold the sanctuary wherein was deposited the ark of the covenant. We may read:—"And he carved all the walls of the house round about with carved figures of cherubims, and palm-trees, and open flowers, within and without. And the floor of the house he overlaid with gold within and without."

Glazed or encaustic tiles, with and without ornamental designs upon them, are of frequent occurrence with us. The continual disturbance of the pavements in churches, owing to the burial of clergy and laity under them, as well as the passing to and fro of congregations, has led to the destruction of many that must once have been beautiful. Sometimes there were inscriptions on them, which ran round the edge of each tile like a border. Fantastic animals, grotesque birds, conventional foliage, warriors on horseback, personages seated on thrones, and ornamental configurations, were among the chief objects depicted upon them. In Canterbury Cathedral there is a zodiac graven upon tiles of thirteenth-century workmanship. The subdued colouring of ancient tiles is supposed to have been ordered so as to form a suitable and harmonious surface for the foot to fall on, which very startling tones would not have afforded. Seldom is an excavation made in any old ecclesiastical building without the spade turning up portions of ancient tiles.

On the floor of Westminster Abbey, also, may still be observed, here and there, lines of square stones marking the centre of the diagonal paving. By the aid of old engravings we may see that the nave and aisles, and the aisles of Henry VII.'s chapel, were once all furnished with this "middle tread," as it is called in the Clerk of the Works' register. It is supposed it was intended to conduce to the maintenance of regularity in processions. As the numerous interments and tombs had effaced most of this middle tread, and the need of it no longer existed, the meaning of it had escaped notice when the nave was repaved with diagonal squares, about fifty years ago. In a more recent repair of the paving of the north aisle of the choir and the western aisle of the transept, it was noted and carefully perpetuated. In York

Minster there was another curious provision in the paving, for the proper conduct of ceremonials. This consisted of three rows of circular stones placed at regular intervals, which, we may conclude, were considered suitable and symmetrical standing-points for the leading dignitaries on grand occasions. These stones, too, have been removed.

North-country antiquaries have observed mention of lair-stones and layr-stones in connection with the floors of churches in the account-books of churchwardens in old times. In the book for the year 1732 kept by the churchwardens of the grand old abbey-church at Hexham there is an interesting entry which informs us that a charge was made of a sum of one shilling, "commonly called lair-stone money," for every person buried within the church; and that this money was appropriated for the repairing of the flags in the nave and aisles, or, as they wrote it, "the fflags in the great isle and in the north and south isles." It appears they had appointed their "beedle" to collect these charges, on the understanding that he would keep the flagging in repair, but he had failed in his undertaking, and at the date mentioned it was ordered that the churchwardens should receive the said lair-stone money, and pay the same into the chest of the said parish, and lay it out as occasion might require for the repairs to the pavement. The memorandum in question goes on to say that no bargain shall be made by the churchwardens in the future for any person to receive the lair-stone money and make the necessary repairs, unless such person will give security, not only that he will keep the flags in good repair, but that he will sweep and clean all the passages to and from the church, and keep the same clean and decent at all times.

The accounts of the churchwardens for the two churches so curiously close together at Bywell, in the same county, also mention lair-stone money, some as received and some as "wanting." They set forth that in 1695 two "sesses" of sixpence per plough were to be laid on the parish for paving the floor of the church and making it plain and even, and that money that had been due for layr-stones for three years should be gathered in and paid in towards the charge of paving and making even the floor of the church. We may learn, too, from other entries that they received one shilling and eightpence for the layr-stone money of an adult, and tenpence for that of children, in this Border town. The inhabitants of Bywell, we learn from an Elizabethan survey, were hardy men, who occupied themselves chiefly with the manufacture of bits, stirrups, and buckles for the horsemen and borderers of the country, and they were very subject to incursions of the thieves of Tynedale, which caused them to drive all their cattle and sheep into their one street every night, winter and summer, and keep watch at both ends of it, that on the approach of the enemy they might raise Hue and Cry for rescue of them. Under these circumstances it is scarcely to be wondered at, perhaps, that their payments for layr-stones were not very prompt.

Church floors were once frequently strewed with rushes. Some authorities state they were universally strewn with rushes when halls and parlours were also strewed. Occasionally, in remote rural districts, where the congregation is gathered together from distant farms, we may yet see clean straw neatly placed in the pews in wintry weather; but formerly rushes were strewn at stated intervals in most churches. The strewing usually took place on the day of the dedication of the church, except in the Peak Forest, where it took place on Midsummer's Eve. Many persons left land and money for the supply of the requisite rushes. The right to cut rushes and grass for the purpose is still maintained by the churchwardens of various parishes, ceremoniously, that it may not lapse, as at Clee, in Lincolnshire, and at old Weston, in Huntingdonshire, and at Pavenham, in Bedfordshire. Perhaps the custom of strewing in its integrity lingered longest in Derbyshire and Cheshire, though some observance of the ceremony is still gone through both in the northern and southern counties. Glossop, in Derbyshire, continued the strewing down to this century. The carts that brought the rushes to the church were decorated with garlands, and the inhabitants made a festival of the occasion. In Cheshire there were processions of young men and women, gaily dressed, carrying garlands, which were afterwards hung up in the churches. The custom was called rush-bearing. The ancient records of the parish of St. Michael, Cornhill, mention payments to "a raker" for taking away the dust and rushes that he swept out of the church. George Herbert, too, says of the country parson that he takes care that the church be swept and kept clean, without dust or cobwebs. Another clergyman of the days of the Stuarts alludes to rush-strewing in his "Hesperides," where, after enumerating the succession —rosemary, bay, mistletoe, holly, box, yew, and birch —for the respective seasons of Christmas, Easter, and Whitsuntide, for the adornment of homes, mentions "green rushes then, and sweetest bents."

As we think of the piety, the prayers, the vows, the endeavours, the self-effacement of thousands who have passed away, we must own George Herbert was right, and that church floors should remind us of Patience, Humility, Love, and Charity, and more besides.

LOWELL'S RELIGIOUS POETRY.

LOWELL occupies a peculiar position in literature. He has written elegant verses, scholarly essays, and some serious poems of sustained merit, but the humorous poems which were first made popularly known here by John Bright are those the public chiefly associates with his name; and thus some of the beauties of his graver verses are overshadowed by these "Biglow Papers" which are rich in humour, and keen in satire. Perhaps next to Longfellow Lowell is the American poet most known, though not most fully known. He has written nothing so well known as the verse in which Hosea Biglow figures; his religious poems have not the repose that many of Whittier's have, nor is any one of them so clear in its poetic ring as that of Bryant's "The Cloud on the Way," but there are in Lowell's works poems that might not unfitly be brought into our collections of sacred poetry, and there are dispersed through his writings couplets that will well bear extract.

It is probable that the early training and association of James Russell Lowell have had much to do with the determination of his mind. He was born at Cambridge, Massachusetts, in 1819, and was the son of the Rev. Charles Lowell, D.D., a Congregational minister there. Graduating at Harvard College, he was in 1840 admitted to the Bar in Boston, and his first published verses were issued the year previously. It is forty-one years since the first of the "Biglow Papers" appeared, and from the time when the authorship became known, fame has crowned the brows of the writer with the wreath, and until diplomacy ousted for a time literature, poem and essay succeeded one another, and appealed to widening circles of readers.

It is with the religious poems of Lowell that we here have to do. They are not very numerous, and there is not one which is so directly a hymn as those of some of his competitors—as that of Bryant's "Mors Janua Vitæ," or Whittier's "My Psalm." Lowell's moral rises out of the common things of life; he sees an oak towering in his gnarled shade and growing in unkind soil, and it teaches the lesson—

> "Lord! all Thy works are lessons—each contains > Some emblem of man's all-containing soul;
> Shall he make fruitless all Thy glorious pains,
> Delving within Thy grace an eyeless mole?"

And then arises the desire that through the man the Lord may speak, that he may have some message to bear. The daily doings in life become to the poet the media of lessons; and though the frequency of the sight of the object makes that lesson one that is often given, yet it has the advantage of more frequent application. Possibly in "The Search" there is a fair illustration of that lesson. In it the search for Christ is told; it is begun, and nature seemed so fair that the woods were believed to be the place where He would be found. But winter came and shook the crown and purple from the wood, and so "back to the world I turned." Believing that Christ is King, the seeker spurned the "cramped alley and the hut," as far beneath where He should sojourn. He sought 'mid power and wealth, but "found no trace of Him," and the costly offerings grew dim with rust and mould. Then the seeker shook from his feet the dust of the proud world; and led by love he turned to the city, following the footprints of the Lord, and found the King he sought in a hovel rude. A naked hungry child clung round His knee,

> "And a poor hunted slave looked up and smiled,
> To bless the smile that set him free."

He saw new miracles done by the gracious Presence, the morsel swollen out to a goodly store, and then he knelt and acknowledged that the throne of Christ is with the outcast and the weak! It is a lesson that needs to be taught, and that is sometimes forgotten by both the poet and the preacher.

Another poem, "A Parable," has a somewhat similar moral, but Christ is the Seeker, and His quest is to see how men believe in Him. The chief priests and rulers spread carpets of gold for the Son of Man to tread on; great organs swell jubilant with praise, but still the "Lord in sorrow bent down His head," and asks if the altars are founded on bodies and souls of living men. He tells them that with golden bars and silver gates they have fenced the sheep from the Father's fold, and he seeks an artisan stunted and haggard, and a motherless girl, and sets these in the midst of the rulers and kings, and says—"See here the images ye have made of Me!" For Christ Church, in his native town, Lowell writes a poem to aid in procuring a chime of bells, and from it some lines illustrative of his teaching may be quoted:—

> "O chime of sweet Saint Charity,
> Peal soon that Easter morn
> When Christ for all shall risen be,
> And in all hearts new-born!
> That Pentecost when utterance clear
> To all men shall be given,
> When all shall say, 'My Brother' here,
> And hear 'My Son' in heaven."

One of the suggestive poems is "What Rabbi Jehosha said," but it does not so well invite extract. The story of the Holy Grail has had its attractions for Mr. Lowell, and in treating it he has altered the time and the persons. His "Vision of Sir Launfal" is that of a knight who wishes to go in search of the Holy Grail "in his unscarred mail." As he went his way, he saw a leper, who moaned as he begged, and a loathing came over Sir Launfal, "the sunshine went out of his soul," but he tossed the leper a piece of gold scornfully. The latter rejects it; gold is worthless to him, and he would rather have a slender mite when given with love. Time passes; Sir Launfal returns from his long search "an old, bent man, worn out and frail." He has lost his earldom; he again sees the leper begging, and he now beholds in him "an image of Him who died on the tree;" he parted his own crust with him, and gave him drink, though it was only "water out of a wooden bowl." Then the leper stood up glorified, "shining, and tall, and fair, and straight," and the Holy Grail is the cup which "thou didst fill at the streamlet for me but now."

> "The Holy Supper is kept, indeed,
> In whatso we share with another's need,
> Not what we give, but what we share,
> For the gift without the giver is bare.
> Who gives himself with his alms feeds three—> Himself, his hungering neighbour, and Me."

The conclusion of the poem has a fine fancy, though one that has been often used. There is an open gate at Sir Launfal's castle; the wanderer is welcome there, and there now summer smiles "the whole year round." Sir Launfal has hung up that "richest mail" which he wore—the idle armour may become "the spider's banquet-hall," for

> "He must be fenced with stronger mail
> Who would seek and find the Holy Grail."

And then the closing lines of this version—widely different from that of our Poet-Laureate—are

> "The meanest serf on Sir Launfal's land
> Has hall and bower at his command;
> And there 's no poor man in the North Countree
> But is lord of the earldom as much as he."

The whole poem has its attraction, but the reader will at once notice the changes in personages and in time from that of the heroes of the Round Table, whose deeds have been sung by Lord Tennyson.

It would be difficult to classify the "Biglow Papers" under the heading of the poems we are commenting on, but there are dispersed over both the first and second series of these remarkable verses, couplets that might fittingly illustrate the position we have taken up. There is the splendid apostrophe to the "Strange new world, that never yet was young," in the "Yankee Idyll;" there is in the same poem the quaint axiom, "That only manhood makes a man;" and there is the caustic utterance of Parson Wilbur on the political preacher, who endeavoured to uproot the good old ideas of what's right, and what is not. The "first epistle" of Hosea Biglow, even with its characteristic Yankee familiarity, did much to put slavery into the right light, and one verse has certainly an enduring moral :—

"Labourin' man and labourin' woman,
Hev one glory an' one shame;
Ev'rythin' thet 's done unhuman
Injers all on 'em the same."

But the form of these "Papers," and their caustic irony, renders them less the vehicle for the carriage of thoughts of love than of stern reproof; and it is in the volume called "Under the Willows" that we find better illustration and truer embodiment of that charity that thinketh no evil. The spirit of the poet, in one poem, walks in thought through long aisles; he sees the altar's gleam shine from Calvary, where "the Church's East" is; and from Calvary down centuries, he finds lives that "end at the Cross," and he learns that many sects and warring creeds find their paths have one goal. So—

"Moravian hymn and Roman chant
In one devotion blend,
To speak the soul's eternal want
Of Him, the inmost Friend.
One prayer soars cleansed with martyr fire,
One choked with sinner's tears:
In heaven both meet in one desire,
And God one music hears."

It will be seen in many cases that the thoughts thus expressed have been carried too far; but Lowell does not aim at doctrinal teaching—his desire is rather to exemplify what he thinks are truths that are not sufficiently heeded, and his verse is usually more marked by vigour than by the nice distinctions that one or two poets have made. We have not so much to look critically to the wording, but for the spirit of the verses; and so read, in poems such as we have named, and such as that of "A Parable," we find a healthy moral, and that usually embodied in vigorous verse. It is probable that some will discover the influences of the land and the people in which and amongst whom they were written, but there is little of "provincialism."

THE HON. J. RUSSELL LOWELL.

Finally, as illustrative of another moral taught, we may quote the poem, "All Saints." It no more compares with Tennyson's than an American apple with a hot-house peach :—

"One feast, of holy days the crest,
I, though no Churchman, love to keep—
All Saints; the unknown good that rest
In God's still memory folded deep;
The bravely dumb that did their deed
And scorned to blot it with a name—
Men of the plain, heroic breed,
That loved Heaven's silence more than fame."

There are other poems that would bear quotation; there are in "The Cathedral" touches that are very tender, and others holding fancies, such as when the stern faces looked down

"And seemed to say,
Ye come and go incessant; we remain
Safe in the hallowed quiet of the past;
Be reverent, ye who flit and are forgot,
Of faith so nobly realised as this."

And thus through many verses the lesson is taught. It is one to which an old sin of America—that of slave-holding—gave a part of the meaning; it is the moral of trust; of the brotherhood of man; of the enduring love of God, and of the pity of His Son. It is not entirely of the highest type of poetry, as we have hinted; but it has tenderness of thought, facility of versification, and an easy presentation of its moral. Lowell will not take the place of Longfellow, but the extracts we have given show that at least some niche in the gallery of American sacred poets is his. Hitherto, we have had too limited ideas of the number of the singers in that gallery; and Lowell's satirical verses have prevented some from hitherto thinking of him in connection with it.

PROVIDENCE.

A SERMON PREACHED AT A TIME OF NATIONAL ANXIETY.

BY THE REV. J. R. MACDUFF, D.D.

"Now it came to pass in the thirtieth year, in the fourth month, in the fifth day of the month, as I was among the captives by the river of Chebar, that the heavens were opened, and I saw visions of God," etc., etc.—EZEKIEL i. 1.

THIS sublime chapter, with its series of figurations, represents to us, in what I might call dramatic form, the great and ever comforting and sustaining theme of Divine Providence; the agency of God in the natural and moral government of His own world.

These visions were revealed to the prophet Ezekiel at one of the most memorable as well as the saddest eras of Jewish history. Jerusalem had now been for five years besieged by the armies of Chaldea. After an heroic resistance, she had reached her last throes — her expiring agonies. The Hebrew seer was far away, separated by mountain ranges and rivers, leagues of dreary wilderness, from the home of his fathers. He was the head apparently of a colony of Jews, who had previously been carried captive to Assyria, and now, in their exile, had stationed or settled themselves on the banks of the Chebar. The words we have read transport us to the distant home of the prophet, with his sorrowing band; each bosom heaving with the torture of anxiety as to the fate of city, country, friends —all so dear.

What is Ezekiel's refuge?—or rather, what does the God he trusted and loved vouchsafe to him and his fellow-colonists, to comfort and cheer them? It is the succession of magnificent picturings we are now to consider, commencing with the whirlwind cloud, and ending with the calm, reassuring sight of the august Being seated on the Heavenly Throne.

I. First in order, let us contemplate the symbol of the Four Cherubims. There were outward significant figurations which ushered these in. The prophet (shall we suppose in the visions of the night, when deep sleep falleth upon men?), while gazing up, it may be, on the calm, clear stillness of a Mesopotamian sky, beholds, in the far north, a whirlwind approaching; a cloud encircles it, lighted up at the same time with an infolding fire.

Might he not think at the time, might he not utter in trembling awe, the very words of his country's Psalmist, "Our God shall come, and shall not keep silence; a fire shall devour before Him, and it shall be very tempestuous round about Him"? Such, however, was evidently not the design or interpretation of the vision. It was comfort—comfort to himself; comfort to his sorrowing companions. In that whirlwind he recognised the well-known emblem of Divine power. In the cloud he saw the reflection of his own depressed and desponding spirit—the clouds and darkness that are so often round about God's throne—the deep, unfathomable mystery of His ways. The cloud, impelled by the whirlwind, and coming, too, out of the north, might it not have been to him suggestive of the cloud of woe from northern Babylon, the gloomy Chaldean storm rushing with whirlwind speed on the devoted land and city of his fathers? Even if he regarded the whirlwind as an emblem of God, all the more terrible was the thought that that cloud, laden with woe, was driven by the Almighty; that the Chaldean monarch, the Cedar of Lebanon, who had made the nations tremble, was like the Assyrian before him, the rod of Jehovah's anger, the staff of His hand, to whom He had given a charge as the waster to destroy. In the case of these two invaders, too truthfully were words familiar to him realised: "God hath spoken once—yea, twice have I heard this—that power belongeth unto God."

But after the hurricane and the earthquake comes the still small voice. He looked, and while terrible to him would have been this impetuous whirlwind and portentous cloud, lo! "a fire infolds itself" (verse 4), "and a brightness was about it, and out of the midst thereof as the colour of amber." There was light in the darkness; the black cloud was relieved by a shining fire, a glorious radiance as the colour of amber illumined the skirts of the storm. It is a picture of all God's judgments, whether national or individual. The whirlwind and the cloudy darkness are followed sooner or later by the fire and the amber. We are hasty often in our surmises and verdicts on the Divine dealings. Well would it be were we to wait patiently till the hurricane and the cloud pass by, and until He set up in our dark night, as He did of old to Israel, His pillar of fire. "At evening time it shall be light." While gazing at the cloudy whirlwind we are apt to exclaim, "He is terrible in His doings toward the children of men." But when these doings come to be illuminated with the infolding fire, the harsh, precipitate verdict gives way to a more truthful one: "I know that Thy judgments are right, and that in faithfulness Thou hast afflicted me."

The prophet still farther gazes, and lo! out of these conflicting elements and symbols there emerge Four living creatures. It is impossible to read the description of the appearance of them as given in verse 10—with the fourfold face of a man, a lion, an ox, and an eagle—without having forcibly suggested to us those slabs of Assyrian marbles close by in our British Museum; moreover, that he who was now the spectator of this vision had himself probably wandered amid these gigantic halls and Nineveh palaces nigh his Chebar abode, and was familiarised with these strange colossal shapes—the rude but impressive Assyrian types of majesty and intelligence, strength and courage.*

We cannot now dwell minutely on this second part of the vision. Suffice it to say, that the manifestation seems evidently to bring before Ezekiel's mind the agency and instrumentality of angels in the Divine government of the world. He had just gazed on the material symbols (the material elements which God has under His control in effecting His purposes)—whirlwind, and cloud, and fire. But He has mightier agents and ministries. The prophet, from the mute, dumb, insensate figures, ascends a step higher in the ladder, and in these four representatives of the cherubic host, he is reminded of Him who maketh His angels spirits, His ministers a flame of fire.†

These angels are God's intermediate administrators in working out His behests, and who employ the elements of nature for this purpose. But, observe, they are viceroys, but not plenipotentiaries. There is a Supreme Voice and Hand represented as directing and controlling their every movement (verse 25):—"There was a voice from the firmament that was over their heads, when they stood and had let down their wings." Whenever God gave the word, whenever the great Being who marshals their ranks utters His voice, the swift wings collapse. And again (verse 20): "Whithersoever the spirit was to go, they went, thither was their spirit to go." It was at the bidding of the Spirit of God they set forth on every enterprise. They followed the Divine impulse alone, and never deviated from the track of their great Leader (verse 12): "They turned not when they went." Whatever be the view we take of this Scriptural doctrine of angelic agency, its main comfort is that these are not irresponsible agents. I could not trust the highest or the brightest of them. For, after all, they are but creatures "kept by the power of God." But as the subordinate ministers in His hand, I rejoice in their mission and ministry. The Psalmist does not say, "They have themselves taken charge;" but, "He shall give His angels charge over thee, to keep thee in all thy ways." "Are they not all ministering spirits, sent forth to minister to them who are heirs of salvation?"

II. We pass on to the second vision of the chapter. It is a new delineation and symbol of God's Providential dealings: the Vision of the four wheels. Let us glance at a few of their characteristics.

1. They are high, lofty, mysterious (verse 18): "As for their rings" (the tires of the wheels—the circumference), "they were so high, that they were dreadful." "O God! Thy ways are past finding out! Thy justice is as the great mountains, Thy judgments are a great deep!" "Who can, by searching, find out God?" We look upwards to this vast wheel of Providential dispensations. Its height is often lost in the clouds. We cannot attain to it. Daniel's name for Jehovah is "the great and dreadful."

2. God's dealings are intricate (verse 16): "Their appearance and their work was as it were a wheel in the middle of a wheel." To the unscientific, the uninitiated, the most perfect and elaborate piece of mechanism is a mass of complication. Take an unskilled, unlettered man into one of our engineers' works or factories. Show him piece after piece of a machine; each piece lying by itself—axle, and rings, and cogs; what a mass of apparent confusion! He can scarce believe, when he sees it at last put together and working like a thing instinct with life, that it is the combination of these unshapely fragments of steel and iron and brass which he first beheld in disjointed confusion. Aye, even when working, it is all a mystery to him—these cross movements, wheel propelling wheel, cog fitting into cog, the revolution of the smaller wheel depending on the larger; and all subject to the intelligent mind and intelligent hand which fabricated and now controls it. Such are God's ways. Such are the dealings of the great Artificer. We are but children, gazing with awe and wonder on the complex wheel within wheel, ever and anon ready, as we gaze, with our "why and wherefore": very much that is mysterious, incomprehensible. Yet

3. God's dealings are all in harmony (verse 16): "They four" (wheels) "had one likeness." Every rotation of the wheel was in accord with the motions of the living creatures. "When the living creatures went, the wheels went by them." Intricate, perplexed, and perplexing as often the plan of the Divine government seems, the intricacy is only to us, and from man's point of view. The most elaborate of machines is the most harmonious. As in the structure of the outer universe, the wheel within wheel obeys the silent law of gravitation, from the circling of the planet to the

† The description here given may help us to understand alike the nature and the mission of angelic beings:—

(1) They are exceedingly glorious (verse 7): "They sparkled like the colour of burnished brass."

(2) They are pure and holy (verse 13): "Their appearance was like burning coals of fire, and like the appearance of lamps."

(3) They are exceedingly powerful. This is indicated (verse 10) by the fourfold image of strength and dignity—the lion, the ox, the eagle, and the human countenance.

(4) They are swift to fulfil God's bidding. They rush to and fro with lightning speed (verses 13, 14): "Out of the fire went forth lightning, and the living creatures ran and returned as the appearance of a flash of lightning."

(5) They are persistent in duty. There is not with them, as alas! often with us, faltering, caprice, hesitation (verse 9): "They turned not when they went; they went every one straight forward."

(6) There is a blessed harmony in their ranks—no jarring, no contention (verse 9): "Their wings were joined one to another."

formation of the dewdrop. All is perfect; not a wheel, or part of a wheel, in disorder, otherwise the universe would rush to disorganisation and ruin. So, in the still more intricate and complex moral world, if we understood it aright, there is no clashing, or confusion, or disharmony. Mystery may often be written on it to us: "But as for God, His way is perfect." Nay, farther—

4. Not only is there harmony in God's moral government, but beauty (verse 16): "The appearance of the wheels and their work was like unto the colour of a beryl." A delicate azure green—one of the most precious of gems. These high wheels, reaching to heaven, the great motive power and propellers of the smaller wheels, these colossal tires sentinelled and turned by angels, were as distinguished for beauty as for height. God's darkest dealings will yet come forth radiant with faithfulness and mercy and love. "He will beautify the meek with salvation." "O thou afflicted, tossed with tempest, and not comforted; behold, I will lay thy stones with fair colours, and lay thy foundations with sapphires; and I will make thy windows of agates, and thy gates of carbuncles, and all thy borders of pleasant stones." And once more—

5. Not only will God's dealings come forth beautiful, but they will be, they are, harmonious and beautiful, because every one of them is His own. The machine is guided by supreme Intelligence. It is not self-acting, automatic, the wheels turning capriciously, having no supervision—the world, as some secularists nowadays would have it, left to the control of general laws, its God the unknown and unknowable (verse 18): "Their rings were full of eyes round about them four." The eye of God, the eyes of perfect wisdom, are not only gazing on every revolution of the wheel, but they are represented as in the wheel itself—eyes above, beneath, on every side. "Whither can we go from Thy presence, or whither can we flee from Thy Spirit?" "Behold, the eye of the Lord is upon them that fear Him." "The eyes of the Lord run to and fro throughout the whole earth."

III. But we must hasten on to speak (it must, however, be but in a few sentences) of the third vision of the chapter, although it is the grandest and most comforting of all, and might well demand more special consideration. It is Ezekiel's Vision of the glory of God.

We have hitherto spoken of the earthly and semi-earthly imagery and symbolism, the complex machinery under the ministration of angels. We ascend now to the heights of the firmament above their heads, as described in verse 26. Far above cloud, and whirlwind, and infolding fire, there is "the likeness of a throne." The beryl, beauteous as it is, is outdone in brightness by the flashing sapphire. The whole throne had "as the appearance of a sapphire stone." It was one blaze of luminous glory. On this august and royal seat (verse 26) there was "the likeness as the appearance of a Man above upon it." This glorious Being was surrounded with a glow of brightness like the colour of amber mingled with fire. And then (as the prophet still farther gazed), this coronal of amber and fire seemed to suggest, or to resolve itself into, the well-known covenant emblem, the type and symbol of the Divine faithfulness alike in Providence and grace (verse 28): "As the appearance of the bow that is in the cloud in the day of rain, so was the appearance of the brightness round about." Can any doubt as to the interpretation of this magnificent closing part of the vision, this its culminating glory? the sapphire throne of Deity, the likeness of a man, the encircling rainbow? It was the God-man Mediator, Jesus, in His glorious twofold nature of Deity and humanity, surrounded with the blessed symbol of covenant love!*

Come then, dear brethren, in conclusion, and ere the sublime vision of which we have caught a brief glimpse, and no more, passes by, let us gather up its lesson of comfort. It is a pictured parable of Divine Providence, conveying the assurance that there happens nothing, domestic or national, which is the result of blind chance or fate. There are no random revolutions in the wheels of Providence. Nay, more—that some wise and gracious purpose and disclosure will yet emerge from what is perplexing and mysterious, if we could only trust Him who dwells in the thick darkness, and yet whose name is Light! We may see the whirlwind coming. It may be as in the case of Ezekiel—descending hosts, the march of whirlwind armies. It may be the whirlwind of famine, or pestilence, that is to make homes and hearths and granaries desolate. It may be the whirlwind of individual sorrow, sweeping fond props and cherished treasures down, and turning the heart's garden into a lonely wilderness. In one or all of these we are often able to see no controlling, superintending hand, no living agency, no Divine instrumentality. We see the whirlwind careering along in its apparently capricious course. There is nothing but what Ezekiel saw at first in the vision—clouds round about it, and "men see no bright light in these clouds." But there is light, there is an infolding fire; there are ministering angels seated in that whirlwind chariot, guiding the horses of fire, aye impelled by a higher power and agency, and turning only whithersoever their great Master listeth. Better still. Do you entertain one unbelieving doubt as to the wisdom of some mysterious dealing? Look upwards. High above whirlwind and cloud, smoke and fire, in that calm, serene heaven, see the reins of universal empire in the hands of the Man who has the rainbow diadem around His head! See these chariots, twenty thousand, even thousands of angels; they are all doing His bidding, they are His ministers that do His pleasure, hearkening unto the voice of His word. What could you wish more than this? All events, the wheel within wheel of your complicated life, in the hands and under the superintendence of the Christ of Calvary. The clouds may gather, the complex wheels may roll dreadfully and terribly along life's highway: we shall keep our eye on the sapphire throne and the amber rainbow, and exclaim, "He that spared not His own Son, but delivered Him up for us all, how shall He not with Him also freely give us all things?" Aye, and the wheels in the vision are going "straight forward;" there is no divergence. All that is taking place in the world—science, politics, philosophy, the miracles of steam, the wonders of electricity, the very curse and demon of war—all, all are helping the onward career of the advancing chariot and the assured triumphs of the Prince of peace, the rainbow-crowned King!

* Who is not reminded, in this vision at Chebar, of more than one future one at Patmos?—"And I saw another mighty angel come down from heaven clothed with a cloud; and a rainbow was upon his head, and his face was as it were the sun, and his feet as pillars of fire." Or the antecedent vision, in the same book, of the Lion of the tribe of Judah, who was pronounced alone worthy to open the sealed roll, and who is immediately worshipped as the slain Lamb. The lion symbolising the might of Godhead, the lamb the reality and tenderness of His manhood: what was this but the New Testament rendering of "the amber throne" and "the likeness as the appearance of a man?" while the song of praise, the song of the ransomed, "to Him who had redeemed them with His blood," corresponds with the rainbow of Ezekiel—the silent memorial and symbol of redeeming grace and love.

This theme of to-day cannot fail to be one of individual comfort to many of us. The chapter cannot fail to touch some page in our manifold and chequered histories. The homeliest part of the vision—that of the revolving wheel—must, in some sense, be true of all. It is a child-picture and illustration, but its meaning is patent to the oldest. The wheel of life is ever revolving. We hear in common yet truthful phrase of the "ups and downs" in life. It is the revolution of this gigantic wheel. With some of you it may be now the top of the wheel, with others it may be the bottom. Some may have reached that point in the revolution where they are raised above the ruts and mud, the anxieties and cares, the trials and adversities of life; others may be underneath, crushed and broken. Some may have never known a trial, never had their eyes dim with the tear of sorrow; others may have had the shadow almost always brooding over their path. Be comforted! "The rings of the wheels are full of eyes." Better than angel or cherub or living creature are at the turning of these wheels. "He setteth up one, and putteth down another;" our life is a plan of His devising and developing. He is above all and over all, "of Him, and through Him, and to Him are all things." You may take up Ezekiel's scroll and inkhorn, and write over whatever befalls you, "Righteous art Thou, O Lord." Regard your troubles only as the dust on the high road, raised by the ponderous wheels which are revolving for your good. Yes, look up! If within be troubles, and without fear, if cloud and whirlwind encircle heart or home, or Church or nation, keep your gaze on the eternal calm above, where no tempest sweeps, and no cloud gathers. Let your eye fall on the similitude of the old Hebrew seer, and think of it not as a similitude but as a glorious reality. There is a Man on that sapphire throne. That Head now crowned with God's own triumphal arch, was once wreathed with a crown of thorns. Trust the Brother-Man who died for you, Who now lives for you. He has storms and tempests, clouds and whirlwinds, under His control. With your eye on the rainbow round about His throne, you can triumphantly sing, "A MAN shall be as an hiding-place from the wind, and a covert from the tempest."

A BLIND MAN'S SONG.

[To the honour of a little girl, a complete stranger, who persisted, one very cold winter's day, in guiding the author, who is blind, to his destination, and when leaving him, insisted upon his accepting a penny, which he declined to take for a time, but as she still pressed him to do so, saying that her mother had often told her to be kind to the old and blind, he at last consented to accept it for the sake of the poetry of the action.]

LITTLE Angel—great in kindness—
Heaven-sent guardian once to me,
Let an old man smit with blindness
Sing his grateful thanks to thee.

For the coin thy goodness gave me,
Which might be thy only store,
My soul's memory fain would have thee
In its casket evermore.

I am feeble, old, and hoary,
So I must not tarry long,
Yet 't would give my muse a glory,
To enshrine thee in a song.

I have nothing else to give thee
But my song, and earnest prayer:
Oh, may arms of love receive thee
When thou leav'st this world of care!

And may I be there to meet thee,
When thou ent'rest into bliss,
That I may rejoicing greet thee,
With a holier song than this!

WINGS OF THE MORNING.

BY C. DESPARD, AUTHOR OF "INTO A LARGER ROOM," "BY THE WATERS OF BABYLON," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER I.—THE HURRICANE-DECK OF THE "AMAZON."

OST of us know what it is to be haunted: not, of course, by the conventional ghost who, years ago, came rapping at the doors of chilly mortals at the dead of night, and who, in these latter days, if we are to believe the mystery-mongers, has undergone a strange resurrection, but by things far more subtle and various. Words and looks and tones, pictures, faces, even dreams will sometimes, for days and weeks, take possession of us, floating through our brain like an often-heard melody.

Little Thekla Ellerslie is haunted to-day—haunted by a phrase. It was spoken by one of her father's friends some days before they started on this wonderful journey, that, for many weeks, has been her one thought.

"Why don't you go with us?" Sir Richard said.

And his friend answered, with a wistful smile, "If I could take the wings of the morning, I would; but unfortunately I can't."

The words took Thekla's fancy, and over and over again she repeated them to herself. "Wings of the morning"—wings that would carry them east, to the beautiful land of the sun-rising, where palms wave softly their feathery crowns in the balmy air; where dusky people, dressed in gorgeous robes, move slowly through the land; where flowers are as thickly strewn over the sunlit earth as the stars in the midnight sky; where birds and insects are like brilliant gems; and where marble tombs, cave-temples, ruined palaces, and dead cities are every-day sights.

All of this will make us suspect that Thekla was not only very young, but also exceedingly inexperienced. She was: but youth and inexperience have a charm of their own; and when, as in this young girl's case, they are transfused with imagination, there can be nothing in the world more interesting.

She is sitting on the hurricane-deck of a large East Indian steamship that has just slackened speed to put out the Channel pilot.

A very young girl—merely a child, we should say, at a first glance—but when we look again, we shall probably change our opinion. It is the youthful style of her dress and the peculiar sweetness and purity of her face which give this impression. The eyes are wonderful—grey in one light, almost black in another, and so large and lustrous—so pathetic in their transparent innocency, that they touch you to an admiration which is of kin with pain. Some day those eyes will be the glory of the face. Now they are almost too much for it.

Thekla is travelling with her father, Sir Richard Ellerslie, her half-sister Marion, and a maid. It is for health's sake that the journey has been undertaken. Ever since Sir Richard lost his second wife he has been ailing, and his doctor has advised him to winter out of England for the next few years. Marion, too, has been delicate lately, and a change, he is persuaded, will do her good; while Thekla, who is robust, as her mother was before she married Sir Richard, and so perversely disappointed him by dying, will be better away from home for a time. Certain of her relations have of late shown a desire to be kind to her, and Sir Richard has reasons of his own for wishing that no one, for the present, should be kind to her but himself. This is how it comes that we find little Thekla Ellerslie on the hurricane-deck of the good ship Amazon, eastward bound.

The light has faded from the western horizon, the pale green shores have receded, and the waters, which had been bright for a few moments with the soft warm colours of an autumn sunset, lie dead and silent under a leaden sky. A light breeze is skimming the surface of the sea, and the great sails are spread to catch it. Thekla looks up, and her lips part in a smile. "The wings of the morning," she says to herself.

But someone is speaking to her, so she brings down her eyes hastily from the masthead. Before they have reached the deck they meet another pair of eyes, which are bent down towards her with smiling malice. She answers the smile readily, for she likes the owner of the eyes. He is much older than she is, and he belongs to an order of beings that have been hitherto outside the sphere of her experience. She has seen them flutter about Marion, and she has occasionally had the opportunity of hearing their conversation and watching their ways, and she has not been favourably impressed by them. I am afraid she would have classified them as satirical, and therefore alarming, or silly, and of course uninteresting. But Mr. Hinton, although he is a young man, does not fall under either of these categories. He is tall and delightfully strong-looking, and he carries himself with a trifle of self-assertion which is not at all unbecoming, and he has the pleasantest way of talking and laughing. Then his eyes are brown and merry, and his face has a boyish expression, and although he is so perfectly grown-up—ages older than Thekla—he is not in the least satirical. He is the sort of person, in fact, that she would have liked for a brother.

Her eyes answer the smile in his, and then the colour springs to her face. "Oh! Mr. Hinton, did you speak?" she says.

"I spoke twice," he says.

"I am so sorry I didn't hear you. I was dreaming. Won't you tell me what you said?"

"I asked if you wouldn't like a turn before dinner."

"Indeed I should," says Thekla, springing up, and thinking it "so kind" of him to ask her.

They fall into the stream of promenaders. Thekla, who is ignorant of how young men like to be talked to—Marion does all that kind of thing at home—is at first rather silent and reserved; but the frank geniality of his manner thaws her, and after a few moments she feels as much at ease with him as if he were really the big brother of whom she sometimes dreams. Ronald is pleased too. The large grey eyes fixed earnestly upon his face as he tells, with a little pardonable exaggeration, of his Indian experiences; her eager comments—does he really live in a tent? how delightful that must be; and to see all the poor dark people flocking to him for judgment: it is wonderful! Then to think that he understands their language as well as he does his own—that is wonderful too! And don't they love him? They must!—This, with the mantling of colour in the sweet, childish face, though what our friend Ronald would probably call "quite delightfully amusing," was also very agreeable. He liked to be appreciated; besides, if we must confess the truth, he had a particular desire that this little girl should like him. So most amicably their talk ran on.

Suddenly, when, in Ronald's opinion, it was at its most interesting point—he was telling her how he had prevented a disturbance of the peace by some infatuated Hindus in his station, who wished to stop a Mahommedan procession—Thekla's attention was diverted. A solitary promenader had passed them by slowly. "Oh!" she cried in an eager whisper. "Forgive me for interrupting you; but who is that?"

"The person who has just passed us?" said Ronald. There was a little irritation in his manner which did not escape Thekla. Not being used to the ways of young men, she did not know how much even the nicest of them object to be interrupted when they are telling anecdotes about themselves, and the change of manner puzzled her.

"I asked you because I saw him at dinner, and I wanted to know who he was," she said, looking up at Ronald with a charming infantile smile of apology. "He has such a beautiful face—just like a picture—don't you think so?"

"Do you mean the man with the fur collar to his coat?" asked Ronald.

"Yes; he is going down to the main-deck now—the man with rather a dark complexion, and a tall, graceful figure. Surely you think him good-looking?"

"Well, if you put it to me—no," said Ronald. "We see rather too much of that kind of thing out in India."

"That kind of thing!" echoed Thekla blankly. "I don't understand."

"The fellow is almost a native."

"A what? I beg your pardon," said Thekla very humbly. "I am afraid I am asking you silly questions. But——"

"No, no: I beg yours," answered Hinton. "I forgot that you didn't understand our jargon, which is really rather absurd. He is—how shall I put it?—well, half an Asiatic."

"And is that wrong?" asked Thekla seriously.

This was too much for Hinton, who broke into a peal of laughter. But he repressed it almost immediately, for Thekla, who was sensitive to the fingertips, flushed up to the roots of her hair, while the big grey eyes that had been fixed on his face with such keen and inspiriting interest looked perplexed and angry. "I beg your pardon a hundred thousand times," he said; "it was really too bad of me to laugh, but I assure you it was too funny to resist. You can't, of course, see how funny it was. Let us change the subject. I was just telling you——" And now he entered upon a full account of that one of his executive triumphs upon which he looks back with the greatest complacency. But it was of no use. The pleasant flavour of the conversation had gone. His story was not so well told as it would have been before the interruption, and his little friend listened to it with an effort. Her mind kept wandering away to girlish speculations about the mysterious person who was half an Asiatic.

CHAPTER II.—ABOUT THE MAN WHO WAS HALF AN ASIATIC.

ALTHOUGH Ronald Hinton was interested in Thekla—patronisingly interested: as a young man may be in a child—it was not altogether for her own sake that he had sought her out. He was in love, for the first time in his life. After holding out for years; after laughing with good-humoured scorn at others; after declaring repeatedly, in the presence of the stricken, that, for his own part, he never intended either to make a fool of himself, or to permit anyone else to make a fool of him—the magnificent Ronald, as his cronies called him, had at last fallen a prey to the inevitable. He was as far gone—as deeply, as hopelessly entangled—as any of the moonstruck youths whom he had carelessly bantered in the days when his own heart had never known a wound. Since a certain fateful evening in the month of June, when he spent a day and night at a friend's house in the country, and met her, with other fair English maidens, at afternoon tea under a willow, on the softest green lawn that was ever spread for dainty feet, the round world had contained but one "she" for him; and she—but here we must leave Ronald behind us, for if we were to attempt to describe what he saw that day, we should become hopelessly embarrassed.

As a fact, she was pretty exceedingly, and pretty in a bewitching sort of way that older men than Ronald were apt to find irresistible. Soft, delicate, and fair, caressing in manner and gentle of speech, with large brown eyes, whose long silken lashes gave them a curiously pathetic expression, a mouth like a Cupid's bow for its lovely curves, and a slender willowy figure, she won, wherever she went, the hearts both of men and of women.

Ronald, triply armed, as he considered himself, against enchantment, fell in love with her at once. But they moved in different worlds, and had they never met again, he might have forgotten his brief midsummer madness. Fate, however, had decreed that they should meet, for when Ronald, who was returning to his post in India after his six months' holiday, went on board the Amazon and looked over the passenger list, the first name he saw was hers.

At first he could not believe it. She on board! It was impossible. Before that day was out he found that it was not only possible, but true. Pretty Marion Ellerslie was actually amongst them. For four long, happy weeks he could see her, talk to her, prevent her every wish, and surround her with such observance as should wait upon queens. But Ronald, naturally, was not the only one on board who found Marion enchanting. Already the little world of the Amazon had bowed down before the royalty of beauty, and Ronald, who was burning to serve his queen, found occasions for service few. This is one reason, no doubt, why he was glad to fall back upon Thekla.

That young lady, when she went below, found her sister in the music-saloon, surrounded by a little crowd, comprising all the officers who were off duty and several of the passengers, and making the officers tell her "everything about everybody."

Thekla whispered a word in her ear.

"Oh yes!" she said, addressing the doctor—a tall, grim-looking man—"you will know about him, Doctor, for he sits near you at table—the man with a distinguished foreign-looking face, and rather a dark complexion."

"Dark? Black!" laughed one of the bystanders.

"Don't interrupt," said Marion. "Is it a secret, Doctor?"

"Not at all, Miss Ellerslie. My friend's name is Grierson."

"Is he English?"

"He is the son of an English father and a Persian mother. Thirty years ago his father was a well-known man in India: a great friend, I believe, of Sir Henry Lawrence's. He was supposed to have been rich, but he died poor; and his son, my friend Michael, is travelling for an East Indian firm."

There were little chuckles round the circle as the doctor concluded. "I told you so!" from one. "Half a native, and a prig!" from another. "All he's good for! I know the type!" from a third. The doctor drew himself up, and, while he pretended not to hear the comments, answered them defiantly—"Mr. Grierson," he said, "is one of the best men I know: a gentleman and a scholar. If," addressing himself pointedly to the sisters, "you want to know anything worth knowing about the East, I advise you to cultivate him."

"Oh! thank you," said Marion, with one of her most charming smiles. "You must be kind enough to introduce us to Mr. Grierson. My father loves to talk to people who understand things really, don't you know? So do I. But there is the dinner-bell, Thekla, and I must go and dress."

This scrap of information about the curious person whom Ronald Hinton had spoken of as "almost an Asiatic" interested Thekla deeply. An hour or two later she heard of him again. She was walking with Lady Lucy Leveridge, after dinner, up and down the main-deck, under the pale light of a wintry moon. Lady Lucy had taken one of her enthusiastic fancies to the little Ellerslie girl, and Thekla returned her admiration with interest. She was talking rapidly, telling her new friend about her home in the country, and dear old Anna, her nurse, when a light pressure from Lady Lucy's hand, which rested on her arm, checked her for a moment.

In that moment she saw a picture which for years upon years would haunt her. It was the man with the face that, a few hours before, she had called beautiful. He stood alone in one of the gangways, his arms folded across his breast, and his eyes looking out seawards. Involuntarily she trembled. They were such strange, sad eyes, and what did they see that he should stand there so silently? Was he lost to what went on around him? Did he know, or did he not know, the unkind, the mysterious, things that were said about him? These were some of the questions which rushed through Thekla's mind as, in that moment's pause, she looked at the tall, slender figure in the gangway; and suddenly, for no reason that she could have given to anyone, her eyes filled with tears.

They moved on, and Lady Lucy said lightly that her friend Michael was dreaming, and she would not disturb him. "I meant to make him talk to us," she said; "but perhaps it's better not. He may be meditating a poem—trying to coin rhymes. Have you ever tried to coin rhymes, Thekla? It's the most absorbing work—maddening, when you get hold of a difficult word. But you must hear him talk some day. He is wonderful!"

"Is he—is he—a poet?" faltered Thekla.

"My dear child, he is everything: poet, philosopher, politician—saint, I was going to say, but that is a word most grievously taken in vain nowadays. What I mean is that he is as good and unselfish as he is talented. A few such men—with money, of course, which means influence—would regenerate the East." It was very curious. Thekla had only seen him twice, and had not so much as spoken to him; but as Lady Lucy, who was nothing if not thorough, poured out these unmeasured praises, her heart began to bound, and the glad girlish colour sprang to her cheeks. She had known it, she said to herself: she was certain of it. All these foolish people, how could they judge? Because they were petty themselves, they could not recognise genius and goodness. Bound down by prejudice, they were blind to what was really excellent. But Lady Lucy was neither petty of mind nor prejudiced. She had seen the world. Her judgment was to be depended upon. And she knew—she knew. So that little bird which, if we could only listen to it, would continually be telling us secrets, sang over and over again in her heart.

Lady Lucy went on talking. It was all about Michael. She had heard some of the foolish remarks of the gossips on board, and they had made her angry, so that it was a relief to her to pour herself out, and of course she could not know what a deep impression her little rhapsody was making on the mind of her young companion.

When, an hour later, Thekla turned into her berth, with the throbbing of the mighty engines in her ears, and the deep, deep starlit sky peeping in at her through her porthole, she repeated it all to herself. And then the picture she had seen returned to her. The still, inscrutable face, the dark eyes, the folded arms: she saw it up there amongst the stars, remote, lonely, unapproachable. Was this the hero: the great man of whom she had dreamed since she first began to con poetry and to read history and romance? She had been certain that she would meet him somewhere in the world. But so soon? Ah, how strange it was! And then, in the midst of her wonder, she fell asleep, and all through her dreams the heroic face haunted her.

That was the last of the quiet nights. Up to this the sea had been perfectly smooth, but early the next morning, when they were running into the Bay of Biscay, a heavy swell came rushing in from the Atlantic, and the Amazon took to dipping and rolling after a fashion that was highly disagreeable to most of the passengers. A grand morning it was, though few were on deck to enjoy it. The sun shone gloriously from a broken sky, the blue above the heaped-up clouds was marvellously deep and pure, and a fresh south-west wind came rattling through the rigging, and breaking the white foam on the crests of the waves into sheets of sun-illumined mist. Lady Lucy Leveridge, who was an old Anglo-Indian, and had made the voyage "scores of times," according to her own account, was almost the only lady out. She lay on a long chair that had been lashed to the rail round the cuddy. Ronald Hinton, and Michael Grierson, and young Wilkinson, fresh from Sandhurst, and on his way to join an Indian regiment, were amongst the men who were trying laboriously to keep their feet, standing being so much more dignified than sitting.

"Why don't you give it up?" said Lady Lucy to Grierson, who had stopped to speak to her. "Here's a chair; sit down and talk."

"Do you think we can hear our own voices?" said Michael, smiling.

"I think I can hear yours. Come, you are a poet, you know; interpret! I want to know what it's all about."

"This racket, you mean?"

"Yes. It looks like much ado about nothing. But I believe there's a sense in it, if we could only find it out."

"That's what the poets have been trying to do from the beginning," said Michael, "from Homer to Tennyson and Browning."

"It is not surprising," said Lady Lucy. "The sea bewitches one. Old traveller as I am, I feel its power—and more, I think, every voyage. How grand it is to-day! The wind so strong and sweet! and those waves! Ah, what a monster! Hold on, Michael, or you'll be bowled over. Who is that in the companion?"

"Little Miss Ellerslie, I think. Shall I bring her here?"

"Yes, do. No; Mr. Hinton is before you. So much the better," said Lady Lucy, with a meaning smile. "She is not the rose, but she lives near enough to that queen of all flowers to share its sweetness."

It was Janet, the Ellerslies' maid—she had been the daughter and often the fellow-traveller of an old sea-captain, and she knew how to meet the initial difficulties of a sea-voyage—who had persuaded her young mistress to dress and go up out of her hot cabin, and the first giddiness having passed, Thekla was beginning to revive in the fresh strong air.

Meanwhile she was amusing Ronald almost as much as she had done the day before.

"Is there any danger, really?" she said. "It's not that I'm frightened; but I want to know."

"So that you may make up your mind to the worst?" said Ronald. "Well, I really believe there's no need yet for any such desperate proceeding. The old Amazon rather likes this kind of thing. See, what a splendid wave! And how grandly she shakes it off! We shall let you know soon enough if there's danger. What do you say, Mr. Larkin?"

This was to the first officer, a short, bluff-looking man, with face like a full moon for breadth, and merry blue eyes, who had stopped to ask after Thekla's health.

"I say," he answered with mock seriousness, "that in cases of emergency, the first thing we do is to warn the ladies; then when they're ordered to the boats they have their trinkets on, don't you see, and everything ship-shape for a hurried move. But take things easily. We'll not want the boats yet awhile. The old ship has faced much uglier seas than this. She's a tough old customer, I can tell you."

"Like her chief," said Ronald, with a laugh.

They went on to Lady Lucy, with whom he left his little friend, his own business to-day being to wait about the companion, in the chance of seeing Thekla's sister. He was a good fellow, and he had taken a brotherly liking to the quaint little girl with the large grey eyes, and before he went he called a quartermaster to lash her chair into its place, and wrapped her up warmly in the fur cloak and woollen shawl which Janet had brought out. Then Lady Lucy advised her to shut her eyes and keep quite still for a few minutes, till she became accustomed to the wind and the movement of the ship. Thekla, who had seen that her hero of the night before was sitting beside Lady Lucy, and who thought that if she kept quiet she might hear him speaking, obeyed gladly. At first the roaring of the winds and waves and the novelty of her position prevented her from hearing anything clearly. But after a few moments there was a brief lull, and then Michael's voice, thrilled with passionate fervour, came towards her. He and Lady Lucy were talking on their favourite topic—the East—and much of what they said was as enigmatical to Thekla as it would have been to almost any other English girl. Our present curriculum of things necessary to a liberal education does not include the history and literature of England's greatest dependency. But she heard and understood something, and whenever Michael spoke, she felt in his words the true heroic flavour.

This day is typical of several that followed. The sea continued to run high, and squalls of wind and rain came rushing up every now and then, flattening down the water for a few minutes, but making the decks impassable. The passengers of the Amazon were exceedingly wretched. Some few tried to keep about, but even they looked woe-begone; and many a sad and dreary story was exchanged by the little groups who sat huddled together in the companions and music saloon.

It was owing, no doubt, to the depressed state of the ship's company that the exaggerated rumours which worked so much mischief later got about. Someone had seen a wild-looking person on the lower deck. Someone else had heard a curious story about him. Another person—he was a perfect boon to the circle which he joined on one of those stormy forenoons—had been in the second-class saloon, happening to have a friend there, who, from eccentricity merely, had chosen to travel second-class. He reported, to the open-eyed terror and amazement of the little flock in the companion, that the peculiar-looking young man was much more than peculiar. He was certainly out of his mind. His story was so extraordinary that it would scarcely be believed, and of course everyone was sorry for him. Still, a ship was a small place, and if he should do anything dreadful—— ! Whereupon terrible visions—of murder, suicide, and, worse still, fire at sea—rose before the minds of that troubled ship's company. But when it came to Lady Lucy's ears she smiled in her superior way.

"Of course they must have their little bit of sensation," she said to Thekla; "but I wish it had taken another form. If this poor young fellow happened to be in a depressed state of mind, and if he heard what was said, there is no saying what effect it might have upon him."

"Couldn't they be stopped?" said Thekla indignantly.

"Stopped talking! I am afraid not, my little Thekla. The tongue is just the one living thing in the world that no one has been able to tame."

One day, when Thekla was helping a fair little maiden of tender years, whose nurse and mother were too ill to take care of her, to make her way to that interesting part of the ship where the beautiful horse, which was on its way to the stable of an Indian Maharajah, and the cow and the sheep, and the cocks and hens and dogs were kept, she saw the passenger of whom everyone was talking. He was a tall, slender man, who had a face like a girl's for delicacy, dark violet eyes, with a curiously haggard expression in them, and a beautifully formed mouth, so sensitive that it was almost painful to watch it. He was stroking the glossy neck of the poor imprisoned horse when Thekla and her little companion came up, and it was pleasant to see how, at his gentle touch and low, caressing words, the creature's wild terror died down, so that presently it stood quite still, and answered his caresses with a grateful whinny.

"Lift me up! lift me up!" cried the child. "I want to stroke him too."

"Will you?" said Thekla timidly to the young man. She had an instinctive feeling that he would like to hold the pretty child in his arms and to talk to them.

His delicate face flushed like a girl's. "Will I? of course I will," he said. "Now then, little girlie! I don't know your name, you know."

"I'm Mabel," said the child, half shyly.

"You'll trust yourself to me, won't you?"

"Yes, please, if I may kiss Prince. Oh! isn't he lovely!" said Mab, pressing her soft little cheek against the pretty creature's glossy neck.

"Prince seems to like being taken notice of," said Thekla.

"Yes, poor old boy!" said the young man. "He is as sensitive as a lady, and he doesn't like this sensational sort of existence. His box got loose in the hurricane last night, and his terror was pitiable. His groom—do you see him? that Indian there, with the dark face and sparkling eyes—well, he could do nothing with him. But I heard the commotion, and, guessing what it was about, I came out to speak to him, and dear old Prince was as quiet as a sheep in a few moments."

"Then he knows you?"

"Yes; we are the greatest chums. He is my only friend just now—aren't you, Prince, old boy?"

"Oh! but I think you have made another friend," said Thekla. "Mab won't forget your kindness to her; nor will I."

These last words were spoken timidly, but she was glad she had been courageous enough to say them when she saw his face brighten.

"Thank you," he said gently. "If I may think that I have three friends on board, I shall feel very rich indeed."

After that they chatted together for a few moments, and watched the waves breaking over the poop; and when the wind and sea rose, making it impossible for them to stand where they were, he carried little Queen Mab down to the children's saloon, and found a sheltered corner on the upper deck for Thekla.

That was the first, but not the last, of Thekla's talks with Murchison.

One day she told Lady Lucy, blushingly, that she had made his acquaintance. "I am sure he is not so bad as they say," she protested. "He talks quite naturally and pleasantly to Mab and me. And Prince is so fond of him. You should see them together!"

"Yes, Mr. Grierson has told me," said Lady Lucy, with a sigh. "Poor fellow! His is not an uncommon case. I am glad you have made friends with him, dear. He will not do either you or Mab any harm."

This was during the rough weather in the Bay of Biscay, when all the little world of the Amazon were miserable. On the evening of the third day the wind fell suddenly: and then, what a changed world it was! The ladies put on pretty evening dresses, and came flocking out into the saloons, and the girls who could sing and play came shyly forward, and merry childish games, post, proverbs, hunt-the-slipper: no matter what, so that they made people laugh—were organised.

The fun was at its height, when Thekla, who wished to see what the outside world was like, ran up to the hurricane-deck alone.

It was a fascinating scene. The moon had not risen, and the sky was covered thinly with ink-black clouds, through whose ragged skirts peeped a few stars faintly. Eastwards there was a pale shining, and this was reflected from the sea in a ghostly glimmer of silver light. Then, gradually, the clouds thinned away westwards, and in the east the horizon-line became so mixed—the whiteness of the sky meeting the whiteness of the sea—that the ship seemed to be driving straight upon some unknown mysterious land of shadows.

While Thekla was gazing out, all manner of strange fancies coming and going through her mind, she heard a voice behind her. "Are you not cold?" it said. "Lady Lucy thought you would be, and she has sent me up with your shawl."

The girl turned round hastily, and, dark as it was, recognised Michael Grierson. "Oh, thank you; how very, very kind of Lady Lucy and of you!" she said. "It is a little cold; but I had not thought of it. I suppose I may stay up a little longer?"

"Lady Lucy did not tell me to bring you down," said Michael smilingly. "But you should be careful. We are not in the tropics yet."

"The tropics!" she said, with a deep-drawn sigh. "It seems like a dream that we are going there. Are we going quickly now?"

"A solitary promenader had passed them by slowly."—p. 44.

"Yes; we are going at a pretty good rate. We passed Cape Finisterre about an hour ago."

"Do you know when we shall be at Gibraltar?"

"The day after to-morrow, very early in the morning."

"And then we shall be in the Mediterranean, and there will be no more storms?"

"I should be sorry to answer for the Mediterranean," said Michael, with a smile. "It is a very treacherous sea, for all its good report. But do you dislike rough weather so much? You have been getting about very well these last few days."

"I? Oh yes; I am becoming a good sailor. But Marion and poor father hate it. And father says that if we get out safely, he will never tempt the seas again."

"You want to go back to England?" said Michael, looking down at her with friendly interest.

"Oh yes, yes," her voice trembling. "My home is there, and I left my dear old nurse behind me. She was my mother's nurse as well as mine, and she had never been away from me for a day in all my life. Poor old Anna! She cried so when I came away. She said she was my only true friend—which was absurd, of course, when I have my father and Marion; and then, the very last night we were together she gave me a sealed-up parcel—— Oh! but I promised not to tell anyone about that."—Thekla interrupted herself, experiencing, as she did so, a shock of surprise. She was talking to this man—who was a wise man, moreover, and a hero—as if she had known him all her life. Hero as he was, however, he seemed to like her talk, for he asked her all sorts of questions—not inquisitive questions, such as some of the people on board ship had put to her, but quick with a living interest that drew out her words.

She told Michael about her home, which was the sweetest place in all the world: an old hall that had once been part of an abbey, and that was surrounded with as delicious a garden as ever was seen—a garden where beautiful oak and elm-trees threw their sheltering arms round soft wide lawns, and where dear old-fashioned flowers—cloves, and sweet-williams, and pinks, and carnations, and mignonette, and honeysuckle, and glorious cream-coloured roses—grew in profusion. "And I will tell you a secret," said the child. "It was my mother's own, own place. She had it when she was quite a little girl, and she lived there like a queen, Anna says; and then father came like the prince in the 'Sleeping Beauty.' It was such a pretty story; but Anna says that father doesn't care to hear it talked about. He had a fall from his horse just at the Hall gates, and he was brought in, and mother's old aunt and Anna nursed him. You know, father is handsome now, and Anna says that then he was just like a picture. So mother saw him, and she was beautiful too, and they fell in love with one another, and were married."

So Thekla poured out her confidences. They delighted the grave Michael, and feeling his interest real, she told him more. He heard about the cottages that were grouped round the abbey, and where Thekla was always a welcome guest, and about Anna's old cronies who had known and loved "my own mother when she was a little girl"; about the little men and maidens of the school, dressed out in smocks and pinafores which Anna and Thekla had made for them; about large sunny strawberry-beds under peach and cherry walls, and solitary wanderings in enchanted woods; and as he listened, putting in a remark now and then, which to Thekla had the true heroic flavour, he felt as if he were standing on the threshold of a morning world, full of freshness and beauty, whose portals had never opened to him before.

Long before he was tired of listening or Thekla was tired of talking, Janet came in search of her; and when left alone to resume his walk under the stars, he said to himself, "That is one of the most charming little girls I have ever met."

CHAPTER III.—LANDING AT GIBRALTAR.

TO one other person on board ship we must give a few words. He was a young man, large-nosed, pale-complexioned, and endowed with a quantity of sandy hair and a pair of shrewd grey eyes, who, though he looked a mere boy, bore himself with the self-confidence and assurance of a man of forty at least. This manner of his puzzled and repelled his fellow-passengers until it came to be known who he was. Then the mystery was solved. He was the son and heir of Isaacson—known a short time since as "the great Isaacson"—who, when he had achieved fame and vast fortune by the mysterious processes attendant upon financing companies, died suddenly of heart or brain disease, leaving his son to reign in his place. The son, feeling himself rich enough for the moment, determined on a tour of the world, and selected as his companion a man much older than himself, who had business connections in several widely separated capitals. Even when Isaacson's position came to be known, he was not liked on board the Amazon. He did his best to be agreeable; he set his friend to talk of his wealth; he threw out hints himself about his perfect freedom from the minor annoyances that afflict other men: but still those conceited Indian civilians and military men held aloof from him.

"Jealous, no doubt," he used to say to his friend. "Besides, India spoils people, don't you know!"

Lady Lucy Leveridge and the Ellerslies were, in his opinion, far and away the best people on board, and he did his best to cultivate them. Lady Lucy tried to repress him, but she tried in vain. Every day he came up smiling to the group of which she formed the principal figure, and every day he received the same rebuffs with the same sublime serenity. Now it happened, on several of these occasions, that Thekla Ellerslie was sitting near her friend. Once, when Isaacson had been particularly persistent, and Lady Lucy even more proud and distant than usual, Thekla lifted her eyes and looked at him. There was nothing in the cold keen face, with its self-satisfied smile, to encourage her sympathy, and she dropped her eyes at once; but the momentary glance had a definite and very curious effect upon the young millionnaire.

He went off to the hurricane-deck, lighted up a cheroot, and began to meditate after his fashion. "What eyes the girl has! I've never seen the like of them before. She's not much to look at yet, but she'll be a stunner some of these days. Comes of a good stock, too; and if what they say is true, that dry old stick, Sir Richard, won't be sorry to have a rich husband for her. I'd take her without a penny—without a stiver——." There is no need to follow his musings further, for they were neither pretty nor profitable. Their result, however, appeared very shortly. Isaacson began to be exceedingly attentive to Sir Richard Ellerslie, and Sir Richard received his attentions kindly. "I find him a frank, pleasant young fellow," he used to say to Lady Lucy; "and if he is a little unformed, what matters? The world will form him soon enough."

So they came on to the first great sensation of the voyage—putting in at Gibraltar.

Thekla was too much excited to sleep late that morning, and when, looming out mysteriously from amber-coloured mists, the sloping, knife-like edge of the great rock cut the sky, she was on the hurricane-deck. Wilkinson, the young soldier, was out too, and as the outlines of the rock changed, and the chain of the Sierra Nevada came into sight, they talked—like the children they were—about dear old England and her victories.

An hour later, and everyone else was on deck, and arrangements were being made on all hands for parties to shore.

Lady Lucy claimed Thekla. "I want a good walk," she said; "and perhaps your father and sister will drive."

"I don't know about landing at all," said Marion, who, dressed in a bewitching morning costume, was standing close by. "It looks like rain."

"There will be a downpour presently; I am certain of it," said Sir Richard. "I shall stay where I am."

"So shall I. Silly-looking place! All up-hill and down-hill," said Isaacson.

"Did you expect to find Gibraltar a plain?" said the doctor.

Hinton, meanwhile, was pressing Marion to make one of the party to shore. "You can drive, you know, if you can't walk," he said. "Do come! It won't be half fun without you."

"What do you say, father?" said Marion.

"I say that you must judge for yourself. Never mind me. Isaacson and I will entertain one another."

There was a merry breakfast, and then they all started for the shore, where the walking party, on Lady Lucy's suggestion, set out for Europa Point.

Through the public gardens, where geraniums and heliotrope, datura and sunflowers, bloomed in the midst of tropical foliage, they went on gaily. Wilkinson was walking with Lady Lucy, Marion and Hinton drove, and Thekla, greatly to her delight, fell to Grierson's share. She liked him better every time she met him. He knew so much, she used to say to Lady Lucy; and he never seemed to think it a trouble to answer people's questions.

There is a wonderful sense of freedom in a first walk on shore after days of life on ship-board. This little company of travellers felt it; and as they wound up the steep road that leads to the Point, they laughed and chattered like so many children. How wonderful it all was—the heavily fortified sea-wall beneath them, and the scarped rock, riddled with wicked-looking holes for cannon above; and, here and there they looked down into a green glen, which reached deep into the heart of the rock, and as they went they saw in every rock and angle sentry-boxes hung up like wild birds' nests above the sea; and there were white terraces of soldiers' houses, and pyramids of cannon-balls; while the familiar sound of the soldiers' bugle-call echoing from rock to rock, and the sight of red-coats on many an eminence, reminded them continually that they were on an English camping-ground. "And oh! how strange it is!" breathed Thekla, who was full of excitement. "How could they ever have taken it?"

"There were giants in those days," said Lady Lucy.

"Old England will always find giants when she wants them," said the young soldier, with dignity.

"Well, I hope so," said Lady Lucy.

"But hasn't she always?" protested Wilkinson. "You don't mean to say that you think we are in our decadence?"

"We will discuss that presently," said Lady Lucy, smiling. "I can't argue and climb at the same time, you know. Ah! there is the Point."

"And there are Marion and Mr. Hinton waiting for us," said Thekla.

Near the Governor's country-house, which, with its little rock-garden, is situated at a giddy height above the sea, the walking party paused and took breath. It was a fine and inspiriting scene. For all the severity of their climb, they were not more than midway up the rock, which rose frowningly above them, a mighty fortress of Nature's handiwork; and when they looked down—sheer down to a depth that made Thekla shudder—they saw it rent near the sea-level into black caverns, through which the waves rushed perpetually, the hollow sound of thunderous reverberations rising to where they stood. "Listen! do listen!" cried Thekla, who—with flushed face and glowing eyes, and looking, Lady Lucy thought, as fresh and pretty a picture of youth and gladness as could be seen—stood near the edge, looking down. "What a boom! like thunder. Is that the sea?"

"The waves in close quarters," said Lady Lucy.

"And how large the sea looks from here; and how lonely!" said Thekla, with a little shiver. "And why is it that dull grey colour? The sky is blue."

"But clouds are coming up from the west. Look: a whole host of them!" said Michael. Then, with an impulsiveness which was unusual in him, "excuse me, Miss Ellerslie, you really mustn't stand so close to the edge."

"Hold me!" said the young girl, giving him her hand. "I must see down. There!" as his hand closed over hers. "I am all right now; I can't slip. Do those clouds mean storms?"

"They mean squalls. We shall have more tossing presently."

"Why do you talk to Miss Ellerslie about storms? Let her enjoy herself while she can," said Wilkinson.

"Oh! thank you. I think I am beginning rather to enjoy storms," said little Miss Superior demurely.

"Wait till we give you a touch of a cyclone," said Lady Lucy, laughing.

By this time Marion and Hinton had joined them. They, too, were in the best of spirits: Hinton, who was happier than he had ever been in all his life, rather more silent than usual, and Marion pouring out herself in little enthusiastic tributes to the sea and the sky, and "that wonderful old rock that has seen so much."

It was all very pleasant, and they would willingly have lingered, but Lady Lucy declared that the clouds meant mischief, and that if they wished to reach the ship with dry clothes they must be on the move. Marion was amiable enough to offer her place in the carriage to anyone who might happen to be tired, but no one accepted her offer; and Hinton could not even propose to relinquish his place. So they went down as they came, chatting and laughing merrily, the clouds, meanwhile, gathering up behind them in battalions, and the wind howling dismally, and the ancient rock that towered over their heads looking as gloomy as Dante's prison-house of spirits.

Lady Lucy's prediction came true, for Marion and Hinton, who went off in the first boat, were the only two of the party who escaped a wetting. All in a moment, when the second boat was midway between the ship and the shore, the storm broke. Large drops of rain came rattling down: the waters of the harbour rose to meet the waters of the sky: the wind raged about them like a wild beast in chains, and the little boat shivered from stem to stern. Then Wilkinson's voice was heard above the tumult. He assured everyone that there was no danger, but there was an agitated ring in his words that made Thekla tremble. She was thinking—poor child!—that each dip of the boat's head into one of those long green waves must positively be the last. She happened to be sitting near Michael Grierson. In her excitement she clutched at his hand, and as she felt his strong firm grasp, her terror all at once died down.

Later that day Thekla asked Lady Lucy why it was. "What is it about Mr. Grierson?" she said; "one can't feel afraid where he is."

"I suppose it is because he is never afraid himself," said Lady Lucy. "He has the power that comes of a perfect faith"—an answer that set the young girl thinking.

She had gone through an experience in the meantime that was not quite so pleasant.

The usual number of curiosity-sellers had come on board the Amazon, and when the storm in a tea-cup had cleared, they spread out their wares—fans and shells and embroideries—under the awnings on the main-deck, which was converted into a bazaar.

Thekla was going curiously from stall to stall, when she saw her father and Isaacson walking arm-in-arm. Sir Richard beckoned to her, and she joined them. "Well," he said, "do you see anything that you like?"

"I don't know. There are so many things. Do you think of buying something, father?"

"I do. Will you help me to choose, Miss Thekla?" said Isaacson.

She did not answer, for the rich young man was no favourite of hers; and the sound of her Christian name, although he had prefaced it with "Miss," was curiously offensive to her.

"Did you hear what Mr. Isaacson said, Thekla?" Sir Richard spoke, and there was an irritated ring in his voice.

Thekla turned red. "I beg your pardon, Mr. Isaacson," she said.

"I beg yours," he said jauntily. "I was asking you to advise me. I want to make a purchase."

"The fans are pretty," suggested Thekla.

"Pretty? yes; but they 're common, aren't they? I want something good."

"I believe there are embroidered stuffs further on."

"Ah! that sounds better. Come along and show them to me. You like these sort of things, don't you?"

"I am sure I don't know," said Thekla.

"Come now, you must have an opinion. Girls always know what they like and what they dislike. You needn't be shy with me, you know."

"I am not," said Thekla, colouring angrily.

"If you are not shy you can surely answer a plain question," said Sir Richard.

"Father!" She turned perfectly pale.

He looked at her with a frown. Isaacson was smiling blandly. "Oh, come!" he said. "This is all nonsense! See here, Miss Thekla!" He picked out the best of the embroideries, and held it up to the light. "Do you think this handsome?"

"Yes."

"Then I 'll invest in it." He threw down the price, and turned to her. "You 'll understand now why I bothered you for advice," he said. "I've bought this thing for you."

"For me!" cried Thekla, her large eyes blazing. "Thank you; I 'd much rather not."

"Why? Don't you like it? I 'll get something else."

"No, indeed you mustn't," interposed Sir Richard. —"I can't have you so fickle, Thekla. You said you liked this."

"But, father, I didn't know——"

"You know enough, I hope, to enable you to behave like a young lady," said Sir Richard, in a low, stern voice.

"Now, please don't scold her," began Isaacson; but Thekla heard no more, for she was running off to hide her obnoxious present and herself in her father's cabin.

He apologised for her in his grand manner. "My daughter is only a little school-girl yet," he said; "when she knows the world better, she will be more grateful for the notice of a man like you."

Thekla, in the meantime, was weeping her anger away. And the anger with Mr. Isaacson having gone, she began to be angry with herself. He liked her father, and wanted to give him a present, and that he should do it through her was perfectly natural. Her cheeks grew red until they tingled, as she thought it all over. What a little goose she had been! She did not wonder in the least that her father was angry with her. She had deserved it quite, and she would tell him so as soon as she could.

It was near the dinner-hour, and she waited on in her father's cabin, where she had hidden herself, until he came in to dress, when she apologised to him in the prettiest way. "I was just what you called me, father," she said: "a silly little school-girl; but I won't be so stupid again."

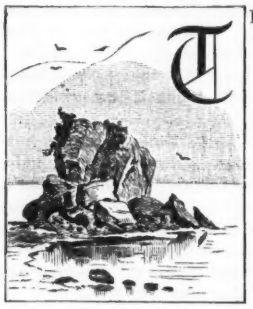
Never, in all her life, had Thekla seen her father look so kind and benignant as he did at that moment. He was not often affectionate to her, and the memory of the caress with which he received her apology, and his gentle hand upon her head, and the wise words of counsel in which he pointed out so clearly that the difficulty had arisen from her forgetting for a moment that he was wiser and more experienced than she was, lingered with her for many a day.

"I'll trust you another time, father; indeed I will," she said, half crying, when he stooped to kiss her. "I think I should to-day if Mr. Isaacson hadn't been so——"

"Well, go on, Thekla. Don't be afraid."

"I think Marion would have called him familiar."



Sir Richard smiled in a superior sort of way that cut Thekla to the quick. "Marion and you are different, my poor little Thekla," he said. "You are much younger, and you have neither her appearance nor her style. Not, of course, that you should tolerate impertinence any more than Marion; but you must discriminate. Until you can do that" (smiling again) "you must rely upon the judgment of others. Isaacson looks upon you as a child. I can't help that, can I?"

"Of course not, father."

"Well, then, look upon his attentions to you as attentions to me. I like the young fellow; and, to be frank with you, I think he may be useful to us. Don't be disagreeable to him."

"Indeed I won't, father; and I am very sorry I was just now," said Thekla earnestly.

CHAPTER IV.—THE SEA OF THE POETS.

THAT same evening Marion and her father had a little talk. "What do you think of Mr. Isaacson?" he asked.

"I scarcely know, dear," she answered—"except that he's not pretty."

"Girls never think of anything but a man's appearance," said Sir Richard. "However, so far as you are concerned, it doesn't matter. It is to Thekla that he seems to have taken a fancy, and I wish him encouraged. It would be the best thing that could happen—best for us all."

"Very well," said Marion. "But mind, father: he mustn't be allowed to fall in love with me."

"There's no danger of that. He would see the uselessness himself. You must marry well, however, Marion. You would be miserable in a life of poverty; and remember"—a bitter expression crossed Sir Richard's face—"that I can do nothing for you."

"My dear, dearest old dad!" said Marion very softly, "do you take me for a goose?"

"No, indeed I don't, Marion. But I know what young people are, and——"

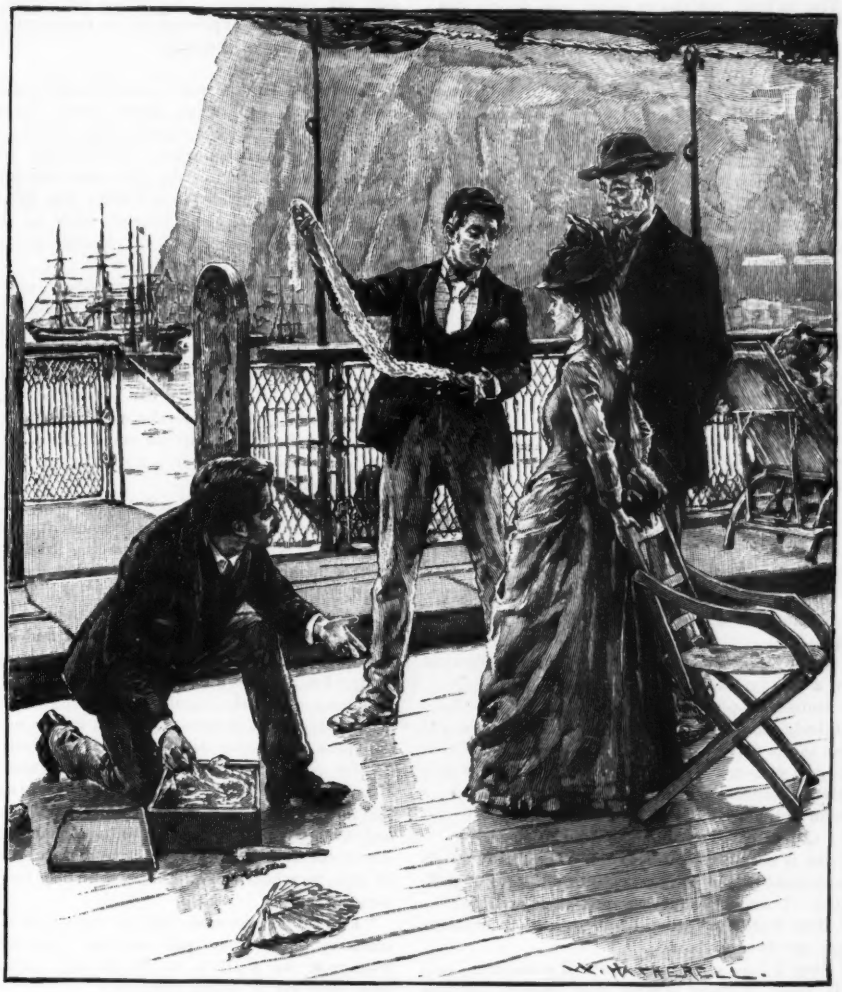
"Hush, dearest!" she interrupted, stopping his mouth with a kiss; "you're not at all nice when you lecture. Now, please don't look serious, or I shall be miserable; you know I must have a little fun!"

"You are certain it is only fun?"

"Positive! Now" (dropping a curtsey), "may I go?"

"Go and amuse yourself," said Sir Richard, smiling benignantly; for this bewitching little creature was the one thing in the world that he loved unselfishly.

That night they ran out into the Mediterranean. It was not the ideal sea, so beautifully blue, to which poets have devoted their rhapsodies, for in the night the darkness was as of fabled Erebus, and when in the morning the sad passengers opened their eyes, they saw a sea dark and sullen—the livid patches of foam on the crests of the waves making the blue-blackness beneath more awful—as it rolled on under sunless skies.



The next day was more dreary still. Few were about, and those who did appear in the saloons were all suffering from home-sickness, or some other form of depression. Lady Lucy talked of entertainments; but no one would listen to her. She had made Ronald Hinton her lieutenant. He returned from his first effort to beat up recruits unsuccessful. "No one will think of doing anything until the weather moderates," he said.

The misery reached its climax when, on the second night out from Gibraltar, they encountered a hurricane, which beat the ship about mercilessly. The racket was awful—creaking timbers, rattling yard-arms, smashing pottery, and the screw racing and plunging like a mad horse. Several on board felt perfectly convinced that their last hour had come. But morning came, and, finding themselves still alive, they plucked up heart and took courage.

The morning brought another misery, for the green water, which, no one seemed to know how, had found its way into the saloon, dashed into several cabins, and bitter were the wailings over the destruction that ensued. Marion Ellerslie was amongst the unfortunate. Over her little dainty slippers, and her crimson plush tea-gown, and a satin-lined travelling-bag that had been the pride of her heart, the water dashed, and she was so angry to see her pretty things destroyed that she began to cry helplessly. "This is only the beginning. We shall all be drowned," she wailed.

"Not a bit of it, miss," said Janet. "This is nothing, as you'll say yourself when you know the ways of the sea. Why, I've seen father's ship just heeling over till you'd think it couldn't rise; and mother and me not minding the least. Look at Miss Thekla, now! She's quite a good sailor."

"Darling, you mustn't mind," said Thekla, throwing her arms round her sister's neck. "It is getting better every moment."

"He picked out the best of the embroideries, and held it up to the light."—p. 51.

"Yes; that was the last wave that destroyed my poor pretty things," said Marion, sobbing. "It might have gone next door."

"Father will get you more, if you ask him."

"Oh yes, when the voyage is over and I haven't the least use for them. Thekla, get dressed, and go into the saloon. You are teasing me."

The long saloon, with its scattered groups of passengers—fiddles on the table to keep the plates and dishes in place, and pallid-looking stewards moving to and fro—looked anything but cheerful in the storm-darkness of the morning.

Thekla, when she went in, looked for her father, who was not to be seen, and then Lady Lucy beckoned to her, and Michael Grierson jumped up to help her along the saloon.

"Come along; I see you are a brave little sailor!" said Lady Lucy. "Sit here beside me. I know my neighbours won't appear. And how did you get through the night?"

"Very well, thank you," said Thekla. "But poor Marion is dreadfully unhappy. We had the sea in"—her great eyes dilating as she spoke—"right into our cabin."

"That's not an unheard-of accident on board ship," said Lady Lucy, laughing.

Hinton was sitting at the opposite side of the table; being greedy for news about Marion, he had listened to Thekla's report. He leaned over and said, in a voice full of concern—

"I am so sorry to hear of the water in your cabin. Was your sister much alarmed?"

"Yes, at first, but she is better now, thank you."

The ship gave a tremendous lurch.

"Take care, I beg of you," cried Lady Lucy. "You will be over here presently."

Hinton grasped the table with both hands and kept silence until Thekla had finished her breakfast, when he asked her if she would not like to have a look out at the sea.

"Oh, yes," she cried; and they went off together to the companion.

With a sigh and an ejaculation of pity, Lady Lucy looked after them.

"Do you know," she said to her companion, Michael, "I am sorry for them both. He is such a good, honest fellow, and I am sure he is loving hopelessly; and she——"

"Surely you don't pity little Miss Ellerslie?" said Michael. "To me she seems one of the brightest and happiest of human beings."

"Yes; but will it last?"

"Why not?"

"I don't know; but I fear she is too unselfish to be strong. She will be trampled upon."

"Do you call unselfishness weak?" asked Michael. "I call it strong—the strongest thing in all the universe."

"Oh! if you take it in its large sense."

"Does not the little follow the type of the large?"

"Amiability and unselfishness, then, run in couples."

"No, no," said Michael, smiling; "there is often not even a family likeness between them."

"Amiable people are sometimes surprisingly selfish," said Lady Lucy. "But we have wrangled enough. Come to the music-saloon, and try to sing that Greek ode—you remember—I heard you sing it first at Mrs. Ogilvie's classical fête in the spring. By-the-bye, a case in point—she is unselfish."

"I should call her amiable," said Michael.

"She is certainly self-denying. The funny people she pets and patronises get her into all sorts of difficulties. I wonder what her next craze will be?"

"There were signs when I left town of Orientalism being in the ascendant."

"Then I hope something else will come first," said Lady Lucy. "There is more than enough nonsense talked about the East—or, at least, about India."

"And not one in a thousand has any real knowledge of the subject," said Michael.

"You are quite right. English people look upon India as a great dark continent, inhabited by heathens, whom, for subtle reasons of our own, we keep in their primeval darkness. That is one view. Others see in it a rising nation thirsting for light, and ground down under the heel of the oppressor. Subtle purposes come in here again," said Lady Lucy, her keen dark eyes flashing, and her fine lips curling with scorn. "They are everywhere, those subtle purposes. I confess I am getting a little tired of them."

"Many of us feel as you do," said Michael; "but foolish and unworthy clamour about a subject cannot affect its importance. While they talk and agitate we can work."

"Yes; but this is a holiday. You can't help yourself, my good Michael. Come and sing," said Lady Lucy, the scornful expression of her face giving place to its usual genial serenity.

Thekla and Hinton were in the meantime standing together in the companion, gazing out at the restless waters and the dark, storm-swollen clouds. They were talking about Marion. Thekla, who was beginning to understand why this new acquaintance took so deep an interest in her sister, was filled with the keenest sympathy and interest, while he thought her affectionate enthusiasm for Marion one of the prettiest things he had ever met.

The sea became calmer as they talked, and silver rays of sunlight tipped the bank of blue-grey cloud in the west with a vivid radiance. He begged her earnestly to persuade her sister to get up.

"I am sure the air will do her good," he said. "Tell her that I will help her up the ladder, and I know a cosy corner where she will scarcely feel the wind; and I will see that no one disturbs her. She can be as quiet there as in her own cabin. Will you be kind, and tell her?"

"Indeed I will. I will tell her every word," said Thekla, smiling in her sweet, confident, infantile fashion, as, with his heart thumping like a blacksmith's hammer, the big young fellow helped her down the companion.

She was as good as her word; but Marion was disappointing. She was better, indeed, and she professed her readiness to go out on deck when she was ready; but at Hinton's message and Thekla's fervent rendering of it, she would do nothing but laugh, declaring over and over again that it was as pretty and quite as amusing as a comedy. What she meant Thekla could not so much as guess, and when Hinton, who had a dozen eager questions to ask, met her in the companion-way, she answered him briefly and seriously, passing on then into the music-saloon, where she found Lady Lucy surrounded by a knot of men, to whom she was talking in her lively, imperative way.

"I do think," she said, "we are the stupidest ship's company that ever set sail together. The day after to-morrow we shall be at Malta, and nothing has been done yet to amuse anybody."

"What can we do in this weather?" asked Wilkinson.

"We can make arrangements. You sing, I know."

"A little; but only at home."

"You are at home here; and you, Mr. Grierson—you can recite."

"No one would care for a recitation from me."

"Try us. I can answer for several. Two performers already!" said Lady Lucy, triumphantly.

"Marion sings to the guitar beautifully," said Thekla.

"Charming! And you?"

"I can sing a very little."

"What is your voice; soprano?"

"No: contralto."

"Then you shall sing a duet with me. My portfolio is on the piano; come and look it over, and try something with me; and then, Mr. Wilkinson, we must see what you can do."

There followed an impromptu concert, made all the merrier by its attendant difficulties, the efforts of the singers to preserve a perpendicular position, and the involuntary wanderings of the player's fingers over the keys when some heavier lurch than usual surprised them. The lunch-bell rang after a forenoon that had been unusually lively, and Thekla set off in search of her father and Marion.

Outside she met Isaacson, who looked miserable. Sir Richard was in his cabin, he said, suffering from a severe headache, and he was looking for one of those lazy stewards to get them something to eat.

"Give father my love, and say we are getting on nicely," said Thekla.

She went on a little further, and there was Marion, buried in cushions and furs, and looking soft and smiling. "Mr. Hinton has been so nice," she reported to her sister.

"Oh!" cried Thekla, "I knew you would like him."

Marion put her finger on her lips; for here was Hinton behind them, carrying with extreme precaution a steaming bowl of broth.

"Landed safely!" he said. "And I really consider myself clever. This was going into Mr. Larkin's cabin. I carried it off from under his very nose."

"Thank you! thank you! how kind everyone is to poor little me!" said Marion.

"Kind to ourselves," said Hinton, who was radiant. "And I declare you are looking better already."

Thekla went down to her lunch happy, being convinced now that Marion had only been teasing her, and that she did really like Ronald almost as much as he liked her.

The Churchyard on the Shore

THEY sleep beside the restless wave,
And from the hungry ocean crave
A few short feet of earth, a consecrated grave.

The lichened stones that, stained with age,
Have faced the ocean's mightiest rage,
Are crumbling in the war that time and tempest wage.

The little ivied belfry grey
Rings out its call to beach and bay,
And thither o'er the moor come fisher-folk to pray.

They pray the Lord of life that He Will guard their homes eternally;
And like a grand response resounds the mighty sea.

ARTHUR L. SALMON.

THE MANIFESTATION OF CHRIST TO THE GENTILES.

BY THE REV. GORDON CALTHROP, M.A., VICAR OF ST. AUGUSTINE'S, HIGHBURY, AND PREBENDARY OF ST. PAUL'S.

"When they saw the star, they rejoiced with exceeding great joy."—ST. MATTHEW ii. 10.

OU will remember, of course, that the witnesses of the resurrection of Jesus Christ—I mean, those persons who gazed upon Him after He had risen from the dead—were few in number, and were all of them disciples. God judged it best not to allow the risen Christ to be seen by the world at large. He "manifested" Him to a certain body of people prepared for the purpose, and it was to be their business to report to others what they themselves had seen and heard.

An arrangement of the same kind may be noticed in that other manifestation or "showing" which we are accustomed to call emphatically "the Epiphany." The great event, to which the lines of every other event had converged—the coming of the Son of God amongst men—had actually taken place; the Christ had been born in Bethlehem of Judæa. But with the fact—incomparable as was its importance to the human race—very few indeed had been made acquainted. A little handful of Jewish shepherds, godly men, keeping watch over their flocks by night on the breezy uplands in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem, had had an intimation conveyed to them by a choir of angels. Old Simeon and old Anna were taken into the secret whilst they worshipped in the Temple; and a little later on, some Eastern sages, led by a star, came to pay their homage to the infant Saviour, as He lay in a cradle in the cottage at Bethlehem. That was all! With the exception of scarcely more than a score of persons, the whole world was in profound ignorance of the most astounding event that had ever occurred in the annals of mankind.

Such was the character of the first of the Epiphanies. Some of them we may, perhaps, be able to consider by-and-bye. But on the present occasion I wish to direct your attention to the first of them: that in which the Gentiles appeared. Let us devote ourselves, then, to the visit of the wise men to the cradle in Bethlehem. The subject is certainly interesting from its very picturesqueness, and I think it will be found to supply us with what is of more importance than interest—I mean, practical instruction in the things which concern our everlasting peace.

I. Now, it cannot be decided with certainty from what country these wise men, or Magi, came; but in all probability they came from Persia. That there were in Persia men of such a class as we may well suppose these Magi to have belonged to—men influential in the State, and combining with the discharge of their political duties the study of astronomical and possibly of other sciences—is a matter sufficiently notorious. And if we suppose the visitors to Bethlehem to have been dwellers in that part of the world, we shall be the better able to understand why they should take an interest in a King of the Jews, and why they should be influenced by the appearance of a star. Their knowledge about Cyrus, King of Persia, who was so strangely and so intimately bound up, centuries before, with the history of the chosen people, would suffice to account for the one circumstance; and their recollection of the famous prophecy of the soothsayer Balaam, who had spoken of the "Star that came out of Jacob, and the Sceptre that should rise out of Israel," would sufficiently account for the other.

Let us, then, take for granted (of course under correction) that these men came from Persia; that they were inhabitants of the country; that they were held in high honour and esteem amongst their fellow-countrymen for learning, for intellectual power, as well as for the fact that they were amongst the most important advisers of the Throne itself.

Some two years, as it would seem, before the Nativity occurred, the Magi—probably whilst engaged in their characteristic occupation of watching the movements of the heavenly bodies—saw a remarkable and unusual star appear in the midnight sky. They did not recognise it as belonging to any of the constellations they knew. In fact, it must have been—though star-like—essentially different from a star. It must have been larger; it must have hung lower in the sky; it must have been more movable, so to speak, than any other of the bright denizens of the heavens. It must have been more of a meteor than of a star. And the philosophers were led by Divine intimation to connect it with the rise of some great and mysterious Personage, who was to be the Governor, the Shepherd of the people of Israel. Probably it did not occur to them, in the first instance, that they were to go to offer homage to this King. But presently they understood that the duty was laid upon them. And so, some time after the first appearance of the star, they set out, accompanied, as we suppose, by a considerable retinue, for the land of Judæa. They would have before them a journey of considerable length, and perhaps of no inconsiderable danger. Crossing first the Tigris, and then the broad and sluggish Euphrates, there would stretch before them the vast wastes of the Syrian desert. And when these had been traversed in safety, they would arrive on the banks of the river Jordan; and, passing over by the fords, make their way to the metropolis of the country and the residence of the reigning monarch.

What a stir their arrival would produce, we can easily imagine. The strange dresses; the foreign ways; the camels, with their trappings and golden ornaments; the escort of soldiers, armed with sword and spear and shield; the appearance of wealth; the hint of treasures brought with them; the grave and stately demeanour of the sages, who were obviously the centre of this singular and unexpected cortège—all these things would attract the curiosity of at least a very large part of the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and draw large crowds in the train of the newly arrived visitors. And then the question which they asked, how remarkable it was!—"Where is He that is born King of the Jews?" It added, of course, to the excitement, and before long the news had reached the Palace of Herod, and the lecture-rooms of the scribes and doctors of the law, and the whole city was stirred and troubled to its very depths. You remember what followed. The king gathers the chief priests and scribes together, to inquire of them where the Christ should be born; and, on receiving their reply, holds a final interview with the Persian philosophers, and sends them off to Bethlehem.

We see them then, as in a second picture, proceeding to the little village. As far as we can gather, no one has the curiosity to accompany them; but on they march, when lo! the star which they had seen in the East so long time ago, and which had been withdrawn from their view, suddenly flashes into the sky, and heralds them on their way, and they greatly rejoice at this proof of the fulfilment of their expectations, at this token of the goodness of God.

The star moves slowly before them, meteor-like, and at last it hangs poised over the part of the village—perhaps over the very house—in which the young child lies. And now they know that the object of their long and laborious journey is attained. Entering into the lowly habitation, they see the child, with Mary His mother. It is He whom they have been sent to find. It is the newly born King of the Jews; and falling down and worshipping Him they present unto Him gifts—gold, and frankincense, and myrrh.

II. We have thus accomplished the first part of our task by giving a sketch of the sacred narrative. Let us pass on to consider, in the second place, the lessons which the narrative may be intended and calculated to convey. It is interesting then, I think, to reflect that the men whose journey from Persia we have been watching, must have been very earnest seekers after God. Living as they did outside the borders of the chosen people, and therefore destitute of the help of a Divine revelation, they had peculiar difficulties to contend with. They were not idolaters, it is true, but the religious views of their country were exceedingly erroneous, and would of necessity confuse their minds. And in addition to this, their temptations to pride of intellect (seeing that they were scholarly, thoughtful, inquiring men) must have been neither few nor slight; and pride of intellect is one of the most serious hindrances that can possibly be imagined to the simple reception of the truths of God. But, in spite of their disadvantageous circumstances, these Magi were bent, above all things, upon knowing and serving God.

It is possible for men, as we know—at least, it is possible for men at a certain period of this world's history—to look up to the starry heavens, and when they behold the wondrous mechanism, the splendid constellations wheeling silently and majestically through space, the stars hanging out their bright lamps in the sky—when they observe the undeviating regularity, the unchanging order, each huge mass keeping its own place, and moving in its own appointed orbit, without the slightest approximation to jostling or confusion—it has been found possible, I say, for some persons calmly to believe that there is no need for the hypothesis of a God in order to account for the beauty and the grandeur, for the unutterable magnificence and wonder of the scene.

But so it was not with these ancient dwellers on the Persian plains. By the steps of Nature they mounted up to the footstool of the Eternal Throne. To them, as to the sweet Psalmist of Israel, the voiceless heavens proclaimed the glory of God, and the firmament showed His handiwork. Nor did they rest there. The Book of Creation revealed something, revealed much, but it did not reveal enough. And they gathered together, and pondered over the fragments of tradition that had floated down to them on the stream of time. They gazed with intense eagerness on the gleams and flashes that fell upon them through the parted clouds, from the Light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world. Need I say that to searchers like these God unveiled some at least of the glories of His face? In every nation, in every age, God seeketh such to worship Him, and He has always such to worship Him. And the Magi were ready, when the fulness of time had arrived, to spring forth at the Divine bidding, and fall before the feet of the new-born King of the Jews, who was—although as yet they knew it not—the Incarnate Son of God.

What, then, was the meaning of this coming of the philosophers and statesmen from Persia? It was an intimation of the future sovereignty of Jesus Christ over the entire human race. To the lowly in station—to the Jewish shepherd—is granted the earliest manifestation of the purpose of God. I think it has always been so, and perhaps always will be so. "Not many mighty, not many wise, not many noble, are called," said the Apostle Paul. Christianity rises upward from the lower to the higher strata of society. The poor man enters first; then follows the rich man, flinging aside the trammels of his self-indulgence; and with him the learned man, breaking through the meshes of his intellectual difficulties. But no one has a monopoly of Jesus Christ. He is the common property, the common blessing, of all—of Jew and Gentile, of wise and unwise, of rich and poor, of learned and unlearned; all barriers fall, all divisions disappear, before Him; and the time is ever hastening on (God grant it may come soon!) when the peoples of every clime and race and tongue shall bow down before Him, and call Him Lord.

We gather next from the narrative that these men—the leading men of science of their day—were characterised by a true and profound humility. Whilst in Persia they had their difficult problems to solve. It might have appeared to them, for instance, doubtful—perhaps very doubtful—whether it was a true voice of God, or only a delusion, which impelled them to journey across the pathless desert to the land of Israel. On the road misgivings of the same kind might have seized upon them. Certainly, when they arrived at Jerusalem, it must have been with a tremendous shock that they learned that no one knew—or, indeed, seemed to care much to know—about the new-born King of the Jews. "What! the very people to whom this King has come, to be ignorant of His existence?" And yet, once more, although the reappearance of the star did somewhat encourage them, they must have been perplexed to find that the palace of this great monarch had dwindled down to a little hut in a little Jewish village; and that the parents of the Monarch were a peasant man and a peasant woman, simple in their ways, and, to all outward appearance, in nowise different from the rest of the homely people by whom they were surrounded.

To us, now, these things are no difficulties; but difficulties they must have been to the Persian sages. And yet they believed; believed, in spite of appearances. They broke through their problems, their doubts, their difficulties, their misgivings, by the simple might of a simple faith; and they received the reward which those always obtain who hold themselves prepared to trust in the Word of the living God.

We mark, then, their humility. And why humility should not be always characteristic of men like these Magi—men of thought and science—it is somewhat hard to understand. The thinkers, who strive to push forward the boundaries of human knowledge, must feel, one would suppose, more keenly than anyone else does that a veil hangs between them and a mystery which they cannot solve, and they will bow their heads reverently in its awful presence.

Might it not be expected, then, that this conviction would fit them for the reception of Divine truth, because it would impart the child-like spirit to which alone Divine truth is to be revealed? Certainly it was so with these travellers from distant Persia, who bent the knee round the lowly cradle in which the infant Redeemer was laid.

I would notice lastly the character of their homage, and the gifts that accompanied it. By the gift of gold, it is said they recognise the dignity of the King; by that of frankincense, the mysterious nature of Him who was Divine (and Divine at that moment) as well as human; by that of myrrh—the recognised symbol of dissolution—the suffering, the death which that Child would be called upon to undergo. We may believe it to have been so. That the Magi knew the precise significance of their act is not, indeed, to be supposed. Their views about Christ were true and correct so far as they went, but they must have been inadequate and indistinct. We are quite at liberty, however, to believe that the men were Divinely guided in the selection of such offerings as should afterwards shadow forth, when the period of full intelligence had arrived, the true character of Him to whom they were offered.

It seems to be thus always that God works in matters of the Faith. One generation lays the foundation for the better and higher spiritual knowledge of another. We understand more than those who preceded us, and those who come after our day will have a wider survey of the Divine purpose, and a clearer comprehension of it than is, or can be, granted to us. St. Peter, as you will remember, describes the prophets as men with imperfect eyesight, who were led by a strange and irresistible impulse to paint a picture of the coming Christ. Their minds were filled with a grand idea; their hands were guided to move the pencil; but the results of their work they could only dimly and partially discern. Something they saw of the wonderful figure as it grew up on the canvas—enough for their own purposes, for their own spiritual wants; but it was for those who were to succeed them that they painted; it was "not unto themselves, but unto us—their successors—that they did minister these things." Yes; the Church of Christ at any one period of her existence holds a treasure in her hands which is perfectly sufficient for her own present necessities, but which has much more in it than she understands or even imagines. It is the Church of another period which discovers the secret beauty, the hidden value. And when the Church of the one period has done with it, she leaves much more to be discovered, much more to be used and enjoyed, by those who are to come after.

See this displayed in the history of these Persian Magi! To them, the opening of the treasure was just a natural and customary act of homage to the new-born King. To us, the opening of the treasure is the proclamation and announcement of the mysterious character of the transcendent glories of the eternal Son of God.

What, then, is the practical result of our discussion of this subject of the first Epiphany? Is it not this?—That our thoughts are lifted up to the mystery of the Divine-human Person of our Blessed Lord, to the wonder of His sufferings and of His atoning death, and that through these contemplations we are led to a more hearty self-surrender, to a more entire consecration, to a truer submission of ourselves to Him whom we know to be now seated as King at the right hand of the Majesty on High.

Come, ye sinners, poor and wretched.

Words by JOSEPH HART, 1759.

Music by JOSEPH BARNBY.
(Precentor of Eton College.)

3. Come, ye weary, heavy-laden,
Bruised and mangled by the fall!
If you tarry till you're better,
You will never come at all:
Not the righteous—
Sinners Jesus came to call.

4. Saints and angels, joined in concert,
Sing the praises of the Lamb,
While the blissful seats of heaven
Sweetly echo with His name:
Hallelujah!
Sinners here may sing the name.

TERRIE'S TWO COATS.

I.

TERRIE TARBOX lay on his back on the nursery floor. His two feet were propped up against the cupboard door, and his arms were raised to hold a book in a horizontal position before his eyes. Not a very comfortable attitude for study, one would think; but Terrie was a boy, and boys, as everybody knows, are creatures who do things that no other being under the sun would dream of. Besides, Terrie used to say he cou'd always think better when his heels were higher than his head, and he really was thinking hard just now.

"'He that hath two coats,'" he repeated to himself in an undertone, "'let him i-m, im, p-a-r-t, impart' (that must be the same as 'give'—all the rest's easy!) 'to him that hath none; and he that hath meat, let him do l-i-likewise.'"

"It must mean it," reflected Terrie, after a pause, and rolling over on to his side because his arms ached, "else it wouldn't be put here. I've got more 'n two coats. I've got this velvet one, that 's one; and the 'reefer' with the brass buttons, that 's two; and my new great-coat, and the old great-coat, and the one I had at the sea-side——"

"Master Terrie, get up this minute!" commanded nurse sharply. "A nice mess you'll be in with your velvet suit picking up the cat's hairs off the carpet! And got the Testament on the floor, too!" she continued, in a scandalised tone. "I 'm ashamed of you, Master Terence!"

Terrie did as he was told, but slowly, and poring all the while over the passage that had fascinated him.

"Nursie," he began presently, while his hair was being brushed to go out, "do you think there 's anybody in the world that hasn't got a coat—not a single one?"

"Scores and hundreds, no doubt, my dear!" answered nurse, as if it were a matter of course.

"And I've got seven!" exclaimed Terrie, raising his face so suddenly that he received a stroke from the scratchy bristles, on his little nose. "I've been counting up. There 's the new great-coat, and the old great-coat, and the one with the brass buttons——"

"That 's nothing at all to do with it," said nurse. "You have got them because your papa can afford to buy them. Everybody would have plenty of clothes if they could afford it, specially such weather as this."

"Why can't the other people afford it?"

"Because they are too poor. There, find your gloves."

"What makes them be too poor?" pursued Terrie, as he carefully guided his rebellious fingers into the apertures intended for them. His very fingers had got a little coat apiece, and yet some people hadn't!

"Drink, mostly," replied nurse, tying her bonnet-strings. "They spend their money on beer, and then they haven't got it to buy clothes."

"Do the little boys spend money on beer?"

"Why, no, of course not. But their fathers do, and then the children have to go short. Come along now; I'm ready!"

It was a keen, bright winter morning. Every leaf and twig and railing was encrusted with a transparent icy bloom, like the sugar on crystallised fruit; the horses' hoofs rang merrily on the white, frost-bound roads; the sky overhead was a clear, pale blue, and the golden sun was fast dissolving the hoary morning mist.

"Now, run with your hoop," said nurse, "and warm your feet."

Terrie did run a little way, but soon found himself walking again. The problem of the "two coats" and the "none" was weighing him down from head to foot. He wished his father or mother were at home, so that he could talk it over with them. But they had gone on a visit somewhere, and would not be back till next week.

Presently they came to a large sweetmeat shop. Instinctively Terrie pulled up, for he was never tired of gazing at the goodies within. Terrie had permission to buy a pennyworth of barley-sugar, which you may be sure he did not hesitate to avail himself of.

He was coming out of the shop, gravely considering whether the two long sticks he had just received would amount to quite as much as the three short ones and a little bit which he purchased for a penny a few days before, when he was confronted by the face of a boy about his own size that peered round the glass-paned corner of the doorway. It was a dirty face, surmounted by a perfect mop of curly red hair; the owner eyed Terrie's sweets longingly, and Terrie could not help looking rather hard at him, for he had on neither jacket nor vest, and the broken braces crossed over his checked cotton shirt had been supplemented by bits of string.

"I wish I 'd brought one of those other coats out with me!" thought Terrie; "then he could have had it. I wonder whether 'meat' means '*sweet*meat' as well? Anyhow, he 's got none.—Have a bit?" he concluded aloud, offering the coatless boy one of his sugar-sticks.

It was snatched at eagerly by a grimy paw, and the recipient instantly darted out of Terrie's reach, as though he expected that the prize would be reclaimed. For a moment then he stood still to stare in evident wonder at the giver, and, with his cheek already bulging with an enormous bite, sped round a corner and out of sight.

"He might have said 'Thank you!'" was Terrie's inward comment, as he rejoined nurse, who had been absorbed in looking at the bonnet-shop next door.

"But perhaps he's never been taught. I wish I'd brought out that other great-coat of mine, that I do! He must be one of those that 's got none."

They went into the park; most of the children there were well dressed and comfortable-looking, yet none the less did Terrie's text, illustrated, as it were, by the chilly cotton-covered shoulders of the red-haired boy, haunt his mind.

Presently nurse met a friend, and wanting a little quiet chat out of Terrie's hearing, she bade him bowl his hoop as far as the fountain and back again.

He did so several times, and was just pausing near a large clump of bushes, some distance from where nurse stood, to refresh himself with the last of his barley-sugar, when a voice at his elbow said, "I say! give us a bit more!"

It was the red-haired boy again.

"Haven't got any!" returned Terrie, crushing the empty paper in his hand and throwing it away. But the youngster lingered.

"Haven't you got a coat to wear?" asked Terrie, in a tone of sympathy.

The red head was shaken so energetically that every individual curl bobbed.

"Don't you ever have one?" he further queried.

"It's gone up the spout!" replied his jacketless acquaintance; "ever so long ago."

"What spout?" questioned Terrie, as an array of teapots, watering-cans, and pumps passed bewilderingly through his mind.

"At the top of our court," the boy informed him, not aware of any necessity for explaining that this was the common slang term for a pawnbroker's shop.

"It's a very funny place to put it," said Terrie; but look here! I've got on two; I guess I ought to be able to spare one of them, as you've got none at all. Which will you have?"

He unbuttoned his fur-trimmed over-coat rapidly as he spoke, and revealed the black velvet one underneath. "Which do you like best?"

"Go on! You're a-chaffin' me!" responded red-head, in derisive unbelief.

"I'm not! I mean it. We can go behind these trees and take it off. Nurse mightn't quite like it, but I'm sure mamma wouldn't mind; because it says so in the Bible, and she always tells me to do what the Bible says. She'd be pleased, I know. Now you can just have which you like."

The indoors jacket was adorned with beautiful gilt buttons, each bearing a glittering anchor on a plain ground; the ragamuffin silently pointed to these, his eyes and teeth shining with ecstasy.

The little velvet coat was soon stripped off and handed over to its new owner. Red-head, however, did not immediately put it on, as Terrie had expected and hoped. He rolled it up hurriedly into as small a bundle as it would make, stuffed it into the bosom of his shirt, and ran off as fast as his legs would carry him.

Terrie gazed after him with a blank countenance, and buttoned up his own great-coat again over his vest with a feeling of disappointment, not unmingled with regret.

"Anyhow, I've done what the Testament said," he told himself. "I've imparted—and mother's sure to be pleased!"

These thoughts and the word together brought him some consolation.

II.

THE red-haired boy scuttled off, I have said, as fast as he could go. Out of the park by a small side-gate, across the road, down a street, round a corner, down a narrower street, and round by the three gilt balls of the pawnbroker's, into a dingy flagged court.

Cold as was the day, most of the doors stood open. That of the third house on the left-hand side had a bit of board put across it to limit the wanderings of a baby inside. The boy jumped over the baby and board together, and rushed up the dirty dark stairs.

"Mother! mother!" he cried, bursting into a small back room on the second floor, "just you look here!"

He pulled out the little velvet coat with its shining buttons, and held it up to the gaze of a worn-looking woman, who sat stitching away at some white calico work with the contracted brow and feverish energy of one to whom every moment is of value.

But precious as was the time, she could not help pausing to glance at the garment her boy exhibited, and her hands dropped as if paralysed into her lap.

"Oh! Jimmy, Jimmy, what have you been doing?" she gasped, with trembling lips. "How did you come by that?"

"A boy—a young swell—gave it to me," returned the child. "He ast me which I'd have, that or the one he wore atop of it; 'cos he'd got on two, you see, and didn't want 'em both. And I ses 'This,' like a shot, 'cos o' the real gold buttons. Why, it'll fetch a bob—p'raps two!"

Forgetting for the time being the work which must be taken in at a certain hour, the poor woman questioned her son closely as to the circumstances connected with this remarkable transference of property, and the conclusion she arrived at was: "It's not ours! You'd no business to 'a took it, Jimmy! You oughter known better, if the little gentleman didn't. He meant it kind, I've no doubt; but he'd no right to go givin' his clothes away without his pa 'n' ma's knowledge. Whatever we shall do about it, I don't know."

"We must keep it now, anyhow!" said Jimmy. "We don't know his name, nor where he lives, nor nothin'."

"Here's his little handkerchief in the pocket—that may tell something. Here's a mark in the corner. Jer—Ter—what is it?" continued the woman, taking the small square of pink-bordered cambric to the dim light of the window. "'Terence Tarbox,' it looks like to me. Dear me, now! I've seen that name on a doorplate somewhere about here."

"You'd never go and take it back, mother!" cried Jimmy, in dismay. "P'raps they'd think you'd thieved it, and send for the bobby!"

"I shall, though, if I can find the house," returned his mother, stitching away again as if for dear life, to make up for lost time. "If we keep what we know people don't mean us to have, it's all the same as if we had thieved it!"

Poor Jimmy, on hearing this decision, sat down on the floor and howled dolorously. Such visions of hot beef and carrots for dinner, of "plum duff" and saveloys, of oranges and bread and cheese, had floated before his imagination as he hugged that gold-buttoned coat, that the disappointment, not to speak of some apprehension as to future retribution, was bitter indeed.

Terrie Tarbox, beneath the snowy curtains of his own pretty bed, was also crying quite as heart-brokenly at much about the same time. He had been consigned to this place of seclusion for the rest of that day, partly as punishment for his naughtiness, partly as a preventive measure against the "death of cold" he had presumably caught in consequence.

"A bad, wicked boy," nurse had called him, on discovering what he had done—"to go and give away what didn't belong to him. Didn't he know that all his clothes, and everything he had, belonged to his pa?"

"B-but I 've got so many!" sobbed Terrie, in protest. "And—and that boy hadn't got none! There's the new gr-reat-coat, and th-the old great-coat, and the co-oat with the brass buttons——!"

"It was snatched at eagerly by a grimy paw."—p. 61.

"Don't talk to me, if you please, sir!" interrupted nurse with severity. She was the more angry that she knew she ought not to have allowed her charge long enough out of her sight for the transaction to be effected, and expected a reprimand in consequence.

"I th-ought mother would be pleased!" blurted out poor Terrie, half-choked with tears, and thus inadequately expressing one of the notions that had been uppermost in his mind.

"Don't tell me that wicked story!" snapped nurse. "How could you think she 'd be pleased? Go to bed at once, sir, and remember Ananias and Sapphira!"

So Terrie wriggled and writhed in anguish of mind between the sheets, and soaked his pillow with tears, and got the bedclothes twisted up like a rope, and sobbed so convulsively that he bit his tongue, and was "plunged in a gulf of dark despair" indeed!

But he could not cry all day, and after an hour or so he grew quieter, and ate his dinner with calmness, if not enjoyment. Then he lay and watched the red afternoon sunshine creep along the wall and across the painted text, till it illuminated the lovely face of the "Good Shepherd" carrying a little lamb.

"He doesn't look as if He'd be angry with me for giving such a poor boy one of my coats on a cold, cold day!" thought Terrie. "I s'pose it was a 'stake. I didn't think about it 's not being all my own. But if I could get and cuddle as close up to Him as that weeny lamb, I'd whisper to Him all about it, and I do b'lieve He'd und'stand."

While gazing, Terrie fell asleep; and he had a dream. It was a very vague sort of dream, and he could not on awaking remember much of it but the feeling it gave him, and that was beautiful. He thought that he was being carried like the little lamb, snuggling as close as possible to the Shepherd's breast, and putting his arms tightly round His neck. Terrie could not recall the Shepherd's face, nor anything He said; he only felt his own heart full of love, and knew that the Shepherd knew all about the coat, and that it was all set right, and that he was just as happy as ever he could be.

It was nearly a week before Jimmy's mother, think as hard as she would, could remember where it was that she had seen that brass plate with the name of Tarbox on it. Then it came to her all at once. The very same evening she knocked at the door of the house where Terrie lived, with a parcel in her hand.

Terrie's mamma was at home by that time, and the poor woman, whose strange errand the servants could not comprehend, was taken in to speak to her.

In the conversation that followed, Mrs. Tarbox recognised in Jimmy's mother a former housemaid of her sister's, who had left service to get married. The story of how the once trim and respectable girl had sunk, and sunk, as the wife of a drunkard, is too sad to tell here, but kind Mrs. Tarbox was actually wiping her eyes before it was finished. When Jimmy's mother left, she was carrying a big bundle of clothes for herself and her little boy, and a basket of food; and Jimmy himself was sent later on for some more.

Mrs. Tarbox was both able and willing to assist the poor woman in many ways, and never lost sight of her or her child again.

"It was the beginning of a good time for us," Jimmy's mother often said. "But it wouldn't 'a been, you know, Jimmy, if we'd 'a been dishonest, and never 'ad took back that jacket, though the lady was kind enough to say we might keep it, after all."

* * * * * *

"So, you see, Terrie," said Mrs. Tarbox, "it did all come right, as you thought the Good Shepherd said. May He keep your little heart always tender and obedient to His Word, and willing to give wherever you see a need. Only, darling, while you are young, and don't know what is best, always consult papa or me in whatever you want to do, that the good you desire may be done in a right and wise way, and then nothing but good shall come of it." To read—2 Sam. xxii. 47.; xxiii. 7. Golden Text—2 Sam. xxiii. 5.

I.  HEAVENLY KING. (47—51.)—David's life and reign drawing to a close. As a religious man he reviews God's dealings with him. As a wise king he lays down some maxims for the benefit of his successor. These the two parts of this lesson. These verses end of a long psalm of praise to God (found also as Ps. xviii.), showing God's powerful help as a great and heavenly King to David His servant. These five verses a kind of summary of whole Psalm. Notice these points—

1. God lives. A present, not an absent God—always able to help. (Ps. xlvi. 1.)

2. God is a rock, i.e. protection against storms of troubles. also shadow from heat of persecution. (Is. xxxii. 2.)

3. God is an Avenger. Had subdued Absalom's rebellion.

4. God is deliverer from enemies. Had kept David safe from Saul. Given him victory over Philistines (2 Sam. viii. 12), Moabites (2 Sam. viii. 2), and Syrians. (2 Sam. viii. 13.)

Protected him from lion and bear, giant Goliath, and all his enemies.

What does this demand from him?

LESSONS. These two points to be insisted on.

1. God's power still exists for us. He is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever. (Heb. xiii. 8.)

(a) Power in nature. Sun, food, etc., providing for wants. (St. Matt. vi. 31, 32.)

Can put down Satan. (Rom. xvi. 20.)

2. Our duty to praise as David did. (a) In words, with heart and voice.

II. An Earthly King. The last inspired words of David.

1. The Man. (a) David, youngest son of Jesse.

(c) Anointed with oil for his office.

2. The King. His character declared by God's Spirit must show—

(c) Clearness—like the light of day.

His household. (a) In covenant with God. (Josh. xxiv. 15.)

(b) Well-ordered and peaceable. (Ps. ci. 6—8.)

(c) The ungodly put away. (Ps. ci. 8.)

Lesson. David an example to all.

1. Feared God both in private and public life.

2. Did his duty to his fellow-creatures.

Was respected, honoured, and loved. See his epitaph in Acts xiii. 36. May this be ours!

Nov. 24th. Solomon's Wise Choice.

To read—1 Kings iii. 3—15. Golden Text—Prov. viii. 11.

I. A Good Beginning. (3, 4.) Well begun, half done. How did Solomon begin his reign?

(c) He attended to public worship.

Find from 2 Chron. i. 3, that this was a public and state occasion.

All heads of tribes and public officers met at Tabernacle at Gibeon.

There Solomon made public and solemn act of worship.

What did he desire to show?

1. His own profession as a God-fearing king from the first.

2. His desire that all the nation too should serve God.

II. A Wise Prayer. (5—10.) Now follow young king to his own house.

Service at Tabernacle ended. Captains, etc., dispersed.

King finished evening meal, has lain down to rest.

Of what would he think? His great kingdom—his wise father—his own inexperience.

At last drops off to sleep. Hears God's voice in a dream speaking to him.

Hears the wide offer, "Ask what I shall give thee."

What might he be disposed to want?

(c) Long life of ease and pleasure.

None of these. What did he most earnestly ask for? (Golden Text.)

What does this request show on his part?

What a wise young king!

III. A Full Answer. (11—15.) Solomon's prayer pleased God.

God gave him all he asked, and more.

He asked for spiritual gifts, God gave also temporal gifts. What was he to have?

His judgment about the two babies.

His Proverbs and wise sayings.

His government of the country.

His alliance with Hiram, King of Tyre, and others.

(c) Honour amongst all at home and far off.

These given at once—another gift conditional, viz. length of days if he continued walking in God's ways.

Lo! it was a dream—but one which came true.

So Solomon went once more to worship.

Burnt-offerings for sin—peace-offerings for thanksgiving.

He and his servants rejoiced together.

Lessons. 1. "The fear of the Lord, that is wisdom; and to depart from evil, that is understanding."

2. "God giveth liberally and upbraideth not."

Dec. 1st. The Temple Dedicated.

To read—1 Kings viii. 12—16; 54—63. Golden Text—Hab. ii. 20.

I. God's House Built. (12—16.) Till now no fixed place for Temple.

Noah built altar on leaving Ark.

Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob built altars at each place in their journeys. (Gen. xxvi. 25; xxxv. 14, etc.)

The Tabernacle was moved with the Israelites.

The Ark was often moved from place to place.

At last David designed to build a permanent temple.

Not allowed because of his many wars.

He collected materials and designed plans—ordered the courses of Priests, Levites, singers, etc., to leave all in readiness for Solomon.

The Temple seven years being built. At last all ready, and this day dedicated to God's service.

Notice Solomon's words—

(a) God had said He would dwell in Jerusalem (another rendering of thick darkness; or "thick darkness" may refer to "Holy of Holies," where was the Mercy-seat).

(c) Blessed be God.

The following points may be noticed about the Temple—

1. No sound of any tool was allowed within the building. (1 Kings vi. 7.)

2. Hiram, King of Tyre, supplied most of the wood from cedar trees of Lebanon. Repaid by wheat from Canaan.

3. The Temple followed the same plan as the Tabernacle, of which God gave Moses the plan. (Heb. viii. 5.)

4. It was the king's and people's willing offering to God. (1 Chron. xxix. 6—9.)

5. It was exceedingly rich and beautiful.

6. It was accepted by God. His glory filled it this day. (Ver. 11.)

II. THE PEOPLE BLESSED. (54—63.) Solomon's prayer and supplication over.

Had prayed humbly, kneeling on his knees.

Had prayed earnestly, people all keeping silence. (Golden Text.)

Had prayed fully for all the sins and wants of the people.

Now he stands and blesses the people as follows—

(c) Pray that God would incline their hearts to Him.

(d) Then shall all the world be turned to God. (Ps. lxvii. 7.)

And now a solemn peace-offering is made; 22,000 oxen, 120,000 sheep.

Burnt-offering first made for sin. (Ver. 5.)

Then peace-offering for thanksgiving followed by a feast. (Ver. 65.)

Thus the Temple was dedicated or set apart for God's worship for ever.

LESSONS. 1. God comes to His house of prayer. (Ps. cxxxii. 14.)

2. Worship consists of prayer, praise, and thank-offerings.

3. God speaks—let all keep silence and listen. (Golden Text.)

DEC. 8TH. SOLOMON AND THE QUEEN OF SHEBA.

To read—1 Kings x. 1—13. Golden Text—St. Matt. xii. 42.

I. THE QUEEN'S VISIT. (1—9.) (a) Who she was—Queen of Sheba, S.W. of Arabia, on borders of Red Sea.

(b) Why she came. Heard of Solomon's fame probably through merchant traders. Remind of Ishmaelites trading between Egypt and Canaan in Joseph's time. (Gen. xxxvii. 28.) Desired to see and hear for herself.

(c) How she came. Long train of camels bearing gold and precious stones.

The Temple and all its wonders.

His servants in their gorgeous robes.

(g) What she felt. Overawed and delighted at it all.

She praised God for His goodness to the king.

(j) What she did. Gave the king gold, spices, and precious stones in abundance.

II. THE QUEEN'S RETURN. (11—13.) During her visit Solomon's fleet also returned from Tyre. What did that bring?

Gold from Ophir, noted for its purity.

Almug, or sandal wood, noted for scent.

Precious stones of great beauty.

So Solomon gave presents to the queen with unsparing hand.

She returned home, richer, wiser, better.

III. LESSONS. Notice these points about the queen.

1. Her spirit of inquiry. Having heard from others of this wise king who could teach her, was anxious to hear for herself.

"A greater than Solomon is here." "Learn of Me."

2. Her eagerness. Took long, dangerous journey to obtain what she wanted.

"So run that ye may obtain." "Ye must with much tribulation enter into the Kingdom of God."

3. Her satisfaction. Found all she wanted, and more. Received knowledge, wisdom, riches.

So with all who seek the "greater than Solomon." They will be taught (Prov. iii. 5, 6), satisfied (Prov. iii. 18.)

"The diligent soul shall be made fat."

None shall be sent empty away.

THE PARSONAGE GARDEN.

(See Frontispiece.)

IS the garden fair?
The north wind came with its searching breath,
And the snow with its treasures in drift and wreath;
The spring was lavish in silver showers
Through the gleam and gloom of her April hours;
And when the summer with crowning gold
Yielded her treasures manifold,
All that was pure and all that was sweet
Clustered around the gardener's feet;
From glowing calyx and chalice rare
Beauty and fragrance blessed her care.

Is the garden fair?—
The garden kept by a Viewless Hand,
And loved by the Lord of the fruitful land?
What hath the tempest of sorrow wrought,—
What hath the joy of sunshine brought?
Rooted and grounded in depths of grace,
Cedar and palm-tree should grow apace.
The Lord of the garden claims each hour
Richest clusters of fruit and flower,
From the dawn of day to the evening dim
Shall not His Garden be fair to Him?

CLARA THWAITES.

"MY GOD SENDS THEE HIS LOVE."

A CHAPTER FOR THE SICK AND INFIRM.

ONE bright Sunday morning I passed in with a stream of people to a large hall in London. Very soon the crowd filled the place, waiting—all with different needs, different cares—for a message from the God and Father of us all. And the message came; the preacher—the Rev. Mark Guy Pearse—told of Him who is good to all, and whose tender mercies are over all His works. "Would He feed insects, fishes, birds, and care for the trees and flowers, and forget you?" asked the preacher. "Nay, dear heart, He thinks of you, cares for you, provides for you." And to every lonely one, everyone sad in spirit, disappointed, or perplexed, there came a message which I pass on to you now, for it is living, glorious truth, "My God sends thee His love."

It did not seem to poor Job in bygone days, perhaps, that he had much share in the love of God, but by-and-bye he understood that the Lord is very pitiful, and of great compassion. Jacob thought everything was against him, and only darkness surrounded him, but all the time the loving Lord was remembering him, leading him on by the right way, and His thoughts towards that aged life were thoughts of good, and not of evil. Perhaps it may seem to you that God sends anything but love just now; He may be sending weakness, infirmity, perhaps even want and pain. All this may be dark reality around you, but the sunlight that breaks through the darkness is even more real: "My God sends thee His love." Could you count the mercies of the past, the good gifts your life has known, the times and seasons when the Lord your Shepherd has come to your aid and tuned your prayers to praise? You could no more count the mercies of the past than you could count the grains of sand washed by the waves; but what about the mercies of the present? Do not reckon up your troubles, and forget all about your blessings. Every good gift, every time of prayer, of Bible-reading or Bible-hearing, every text of comfort whispered to your heart by day or by night, proves this message to be true, "My God sends thee His love."

"Cheer up," said a lady, hastening to the bedside of an invalid; "I felt I must come and cheer you directly I heard of your illness, for I was just in the same state myself at one time, and you see I am all right now." The fact that she had gone through the same trouble made her long to cheer the invalid. And our Father wants you to listen to His message of cheer and comfort, for in the person of our Saviour has not God Himself gone through poverty, weariness, sorrow? He knows every need, every trial of life; the Master's eyes have been dewed with tears, His feet have been worn by earth's rough places, and so, in the sympathy which is more than pity, "My God sends thee His love."

"What good is your religion, after all? Could it help me if I lost all my money?" a scoffer asked once of a Christian man.—"Yes, it could," was the reply; "God can help and comfort, whatever may be lost." So you are rich, child of God, whatever else may seem lost, while the love of God remains to you. Think much about His love, and how He has proved it by dying for you, and by rising evermore as your living Lord and King, and in the fulness of that love find your strength, your peace, your rest.

"Lord, Thou knowest how he loves Thee!" cried a good man, praying by the bedside of a pastor laid low by weakness. "Ah, do not plead that," cried the invalid; "my love to Him is not my comfort: it is His love to me. 'Lord, he whom Thou lovest is sick.'" The same plea may go up to Heaven concerning you; amid all your need and weakness, you are the soul the Master loves, therefore fear no evil evermore.

God's free gift of love to you is worth more than any earthly gift could be, because no change—not even the last great change of all—can ever take it away. He has loved you with an everlasting love, which will light up the valley of the shadow, and fill it with heavenly music. Trust in God's love, lean hard upon His heart, and even in your feebleness, will you not try to pass on to some other life the heavenly message of hope and cheer, "My God sends thee His love"?

THE HEART OF THOMAS TITT; OR, THE BIG MAN AND THE BIGGER.

BY THE REV. P. B. POWER, M.A., AUTHOR OF "THE OILED FEATHER," "THE MAN ON THE SLANT," ETC.

"The mind's the measure of the man."—BURNS.

CHAPTER I.

I HAVE seen some giants, and some dwarfs too, in my day—such big giants, that one wondered how they got into the caravan; and, if they slept there, how it was that one did not see their great toes sticking out through the sides when they lay down; or that one did not see their heads sticking up through the canvas roof when they stood up.

And I have seen a dwarf or two in my day also—little bits of creatures—and the wonder with regard to them was, how in the world they contrived not to get lost; they were so small that they seemed to be uncommonly sharp even to be able to find themselves.

The giants were very big, and the dwarfs were very small; and there, so far as the caravan went, was an end of them. We paid our penny or twopence, as the case may be, and no doubt anyone of a reflective mind might have come away with a thankful spirit that if he were rather tall and occasionally bumped his head, he was not a giant out and out; and, if he were a little short, he was not trodden upon by anybody, and was not out and out a dwarf. For myself, I like moderation in all things; and if anyone were to ask me which I should like to be, a giant or a dwarf, my answer would be—betwixt and between; a judicious mixture would suit my views best.

Farewell, dear old Blunderbores, great giants of my early days; farewell, dear little men and women, at whose arrival in the yellow caravan I opened wide my callow eyes and mouth. I no longer shiver at the thought of the Rawheads and Bloodybones who ate a baby for breakfast, with unlimited buttered toast, and who liked the forequarter or the saddle of a little boy of about my own age for lunch. Farewell, dear little men and women; the time has long gone by since I believed that you were real generals or admirals of the fleet, or perhaps distant relations of the royal family, by reason of the enormous size of your epaulets, and the wonderful buckles in your shoes; yes, dear little women, and it is long since I blushed when you offered anyone of the company a kiss, and I was handed up to the platform for the dainty, for which one penny extra had to be paid. Your spangles, too, dear little ladies, no longer disturb me at night, and make me feel that I was ill-used by being obliged to live in a mouse-coloured suit of very unpoetic cut. I don't believe now that the stars got themselves somehow stitched on to your petticoats. I have grown old, and, I hope, wise; and though I don't wear spectacles (which at my age is so wonderful that I might almost ask the giants and the dwarfs to let me go about with them in the caravan), still I am able to see a great deal which I used not to see in those far-back days. I see a great many giants who, when I look at them with the eyes I now use a good deal, seem very small; and I see a good many dwarfs who, when I look at them with those same eyes, seem, some of them, a very respectable height, and—would you believe it?—some of them actually very tall.

There are the eyes of the head, and the eyes of the mind, and it is since I took to looking at people and things with these latter that I have seen giants dwindle, dwindle—oh, you great creatures, how small you got!—and dwarfs grow, grow—oh, you dear little creatures, how big you got)!

And so, good reader, you must take me as you find me; and when I write of dwarfs or giants, of big men and of bigger, you must please let me stand outside the caravan—out in the open world. We must leave the giants and dwarfs which the young eyes saw, and the pink-eyed lady and the alligator with three heads (two of which were stitched on with waxed thread), and all the other wonders; and we must have a look at the giants and the dwarfs which older eyes have seen—and do see; great big fellows, who might, so to speak, almost look in at the first-floor windows as they walked along; and poor, contemptible little creatures, who are worth no more than so many mites in a bit of cheese.

When Mr. Augustus Roundabut Swellingford condescended to come into this little world of ours, he was pronounced to be "a very fine baby—an unusually fine child." He was sixteen inches long and ten inches broad—i.e., measured round the chest—and he turned the scale at ten pounds one ounce. Moreover, he opened his eyes very wide, and stretched out his fingers very wide too. Fond parents and foolish nurses make all sorts of things out of babies and their doings; and much was made out of Master Augustus Roundabut Swellingford's.

"He'll keep his eyes wide open, I'll be bound," said Mr. Swellingford, senior. "There's nothing like beginning young, my dear," said he to his wife. "I thank you for presenting me with a Swellingford who knows what's what, as that child evidently means to do. He might have been a sleepy, heavy child" ("I wish, from the bottom of my heart, you were, you little wretch," said the old nurse to herself; "I can hardly get two winks at a time with you"); "his eyes are a little bit hazy—fishy, I might say; but they'll clear. We can't have everything at once."

"Bless you, no, sir," said the old nurse. "Children's eyes ain't passed through jelly-bags afore they're born: you can't clear them like coffee with an egg."

"If there were some means, now, of filtering children's eyes——!" said Mr. Swellingford, senior. "What do you think, Mrs. Rouse?"

"I thinks, sir, that if it could be done it would be a very bad speculation—very bad for such as follows the life I have to lead. It would be very pleasant, no doubt, for pas and mas that their little offspring should know them all in a moment, as soon as they are born; and, though they couldn't speak, for them to look as much as to say, 'That 's my dear pa—that 's my dear ma. Has any little baby got such a pa or such a ma?' But, Mr. Swellingford, if I may be bold to say it here and now, while I am in your employment, and in the service of this blessed new-born child, and in the presence of its mother, who is running over with the joys of a first baby, it wouldn't do for folk, who gets their bread in my way, if babies were to come into the world with their blessed eyes cleared with jelly-bags, or white of eggs, or filtered so as to make them as clear as running water. My ideas of babies is, that, they sees quite enough already; there 'd be no standing them if they could see much more—there 's that to be done to these blessed little ones as would make them very troub'esome in trying to get away from you when they seed what you wanted to be at; there 'd be no turning them over, or putting them to rights at all. This here little blessed new-born one of yours would be like an eel, out of that 'ere crib, and under the bed in no time; and if the eyes were very clear, in my opinion he wouldn't come out again, unless they fetched him. Nor would I," said Mrs. Rouse, candidly, "if I were in its place. It 's well for us in after life, Mr. Swellingford, that we forget what we went through when we were babies, or it might be too much for us. I 'm sure I never could have been a nurse, and do to this blessed baby what I do—and must do, if I do my duties—supposing I remembered all that was done to me. 'Do unto others as you would be done by,' would be too much for me—that is, looking at it from the baby's point of view. But though we can't mend its eyes—or leastways, make them clear before their time—we may take notice of its hands. That baby has a wonderful grip; when once it takes hold, it does not know the meaning of the words 'Let go'—the like by the bottle. And I 'll tell you the meaning of that, Mr. Swellingford. I 'm no fortune-teller, but I knows the meaning of some things—anyhow, as regards babies. It means—for I 've seen it in my own first baby—that, whatever it gets a grip of in life it will keep—and that 's the way to become rich; and this here Master Augustus Roundabut Swellingford, as you 're going to call him, will be a rich man. He opens his hands wide—that means he 'll get; and he shuts them tight—that means he 'll keep; and if you get and keep, how can you help but you must be rich?"

"'If there were some means, now, of filtering children's eyes——!'"

I forget at the present moment who it is that says that "The boy is father of the man,"* thereby implying in figurative language that as we are in our youth, so, more or less, shall we be in our maturer years.

Whoever says this, it is true anyhow in this—that the disposition and tendencies of our earliest days we find clinging to us as a part of ourselves, as we grow up through manhood to old age. If these be bad, we might have fought against them, and that, by the goodness of God, with success; but there is the old disposition—there the old tendency which showed itself in one way in the boy, trying to show itself (still itself), only in another way, in the man of maturer life.

I remember perfectly well some of the naughty things of youth; and I can find them trying to do me harm in one way and another, now that youth in volumes one and two has passed.

Therefore it might be said to be only according to the laws of human nature that the early proclivities of Master Augustus Roundabut Swellingford should accompany him, and develop themselves in his maturer years. But like all ordinary mortals, Master Augustus Roundabut Swellingford had to go through a process of development—he had to expand; he had, so to speak, to blossom and flower before he could fruit. Accordingly, our young friend passed in due time out of the filmy-eye stage into having his eyes very wide open, and very clear, and knowing exactly in his small way what was what. For example, he would clutch at a big lump of sugar in the sugar-basin when his mamma offered him a small one; he was known to pull the whole of the citron off the top of a cake of which he was offered a small slice, and to appropriate it so rapidly and so effectually that, even if it could have been recovered, it would not have been of much use to anyone else; and once he got hold of anything he liked, it was much better to leave it with him for the time, trusting to the chapter of accidents to recover it again, for out of his grip would it come only in shreds, which it would be very difficult to piece together again.

Arrived at the knickerbocker stage, to which he came in due course, our young friend became great in getting together slate-pencils, and marbles, and the spoil generally of the school to which he went. There he first felt the truth that and, bringing this within the practical range of his own experience, there did he feel that

"The proper study of mankind is man;"

"The proper study of a boy is boy."

To this study did Master Augustus apply himself with such diligence and success that there wasn't a boy in the school whom he did not know how to approach, if he wanted to get from him anything that he had.

And all the while Master Augustus was growing big—big in body, big in position amongst his fellows, big in his own estimation, big every way. His very bulk gave him importance; and though he condescended to do some very small things, still, somehow or other, the boys did not think them so small when they were done by so big a personage as he.

For Augustus Roundabut Swellingford was a personage at school. "Personage" is a relative term—that is, you might be a "personage" in one place, when you are scarce even a "person" in another.

Jeames, the footman, is scarce a "person" in the drawing-room, but you should see him in the servants' hall. He is a "personage" then. The boy in buttons trembles before him; the under-housemaid curtseys to him; the vegetable-maid ventures only to look furtively at him, while the scullery-maid absolutely hides herself when she sees him coming. Each calf of his leg swells proudly, as though it knew what it was helping to uphold—the body, the head, the self of it may be indeed only a "person" up-stairs, but a "personage" below.

Likewise is the parish beadle a "personage;" at least, when he has on his laced coat and cocked hat. He may be only a "person," and that a very ordinary one, at home, to Mrs. Beadle. Indeed, I am sorry to say she has been known to speak to him as though he were no more; but he avenges himself on all such occasions on all small boys when he goes abroad, and woe betide the one skedaddling round the church pillars, on whom he can then lay hold, bringing into as close contact as may be the tip of that youth's ear and the points of his own forefinger and thumb.

I remember a small boy who enlisted, and his colonel made a "personage" of him at once. He was to be in the band of a cavalry regiment; and his colonel told him "to put his cap on one side and walk through Canterbury as if the whole town belonged to him." I daresay our youth did just as he was told, though he was a nice modest lad in himself; and I can see him now, jingling his spurs and flourishing his whip, and with his cap on one side, marching through the streets of Canterbury, a spectacle enough to frighten St. Thomas à Becket if he could rise from his grave and see what the nineteenth century had brought forth in the way of boys.

* Wordsworth.

What boys are in this nineteenth century I do know; at least, I know a little about it; but what they will be in the twentieth, what living man can tell? I defy even Old Moore's Almanack to prognosticate; at least, old Moore, if you do, I am almost certain that you will be wrong, unless you can gather together some words of fearful import, which will contain ever so much more within them than anyone ever knew they had before. If I might make a suggestion, it would be that dynamite in some form, or as much of it as possible, be got into the word which is to describe the coming boy.

Well, our young friend Swellingford was a personage at school; and, while he lived in school life, acted out his young character in a way suitable thereto. That was as much as could reasonably have been expected of him, even by pa and ma, who encouraged him in his idea that he was "someone" even then; and that he would be someone much more by-and-bye.

That was what our friend always kept before his eyes: to be "someone"—to be a "big person" in whatever sphere of life he happened to be. He wished to be big in his own estimation, and in that of his neighbours too; and to do, and to be, anything, or everything, which would conduce to that desirable end.

Time passed on, and, from being a boy, Augustus Roundabut Swellingford became a man. A young man in due course of nature first; even as afterwards, from having been a young man, he became an old one. The process was quite natural, and he might be said to have slipped from the one to the other without exactly feeling it. He was not like those unhappy crabs, which had to draw or drag themselves painfully out of one shell, before they might be said to be quite ready for another; but he, so to speak, swelled out naturally. He was a kind of elastic; and so, though he grew bigger and bigger, he was always the same Augustus Roundabut Swellingford that had vexed Mrs. Rouse, the monthly nurse, in his early youth—that had diddled the little boys of Cumberland Hall out of slate-pencils and marbles—that had made the lesser humanities of that establishment shake in their shoes, and wish either that they had not been so small, or that Augustus had not been so big.

It was never Augustus Roundabut Swellingford's intention to go back. "Forward!" was his motto in life. He had, indeed, several mottoes; but none giving a hint of falling off in any direction. "Grip and get" was a favourite one; only he kept it to himself. What had the public to do with it—except, unknown to themselves, to help him to put it into execution? And "Bigger and Bigger," that was another; which, if Augustus Roundabut Swellingford had been a frog, and spoken in frog language, would have read, "Always swelling." Aye, and which, if Augustus Roundabut Swellingford had been a frog in the flesh, would have probably ended in an explosive catastrophe, seriously affecting Mr. Augustus Roundabut Swellingford's cuticle and general welfare in the flesh.

You must not suppose that our friend would have ever been satisfied with being big only in his own estimation. He was quite aware that there were plenty of other people in the world besides himself, and quite aware also of being big in their eyes; for by the law of attraction great masses draw smaller bodies to themselves, and sometimes they appropriate them and eat them up, as we are assured on very high scientific authority that the sun will; for, as regards this world, we are to be eaten up by the sun eventually, because the sun is much bigger than we are, and is to draw us in to himself; and we must go, as the little bird is said to hop into the snake's mouth, whether we like it or not. It won't be in my day; but I am sure that, whenever it occurs, whoever may happen to be looking at it from some distant planet will say that there is something very unusual going on.

"I know myself what I am," thought Mr. Augustus Roundabut Swellingford; "but that is not enough. Others must see me in the same light in which I see myself; and the world will not think me big unless I have what the world values; and what the world values are money and rank. Even if I were ever so great, it will price me, not by what I am, but by what I have. Therefore, I must get rich; and, moreover, I must become somebody, if I can—and I not only can, but will."

Accordingly, Mr. Augustus Swellingford set-to to make money and to rise in the social scale; and these two he thought he could do together.

The path on which he was to travel to this desired end was a commercial one. Money, he saw, was the great thing with mankind—at least, with the part of mankind that he mixed with or knew anything about; and so he applied himself to turning into cash whatever abilities he had; and very successful he was in the attempts.

Mr. Swellingford seemed so solid, so substantial—such a "presence"—that he was sought after as director to several companies. He looked a man to be depended on; he looked well cared for, and well dressed; he looked like a man that did not trifle with himself, and so would not trifle with others. And it was all quite true. Mr. Swellingford was really a substantial man, and a man of substance also; and the two do not always go together, as they did here.

Mr. Swellingford's business lay with the Stock Exchange—a very risky kind of business in general; but when it goes right, one which is capable of doing almost anything in the way of making a man's fortune.

Some of Mr. Swellingford's operations went wrong—he would be more than human if everything with which he had to do went right—but others went right, and the right ones were right enough to make his fortune in time.

'There wasn't a boy in the school whom he did not know how to approach.'—p. 70.

As our friend increased in goods, he steadily kept his eye on increasing in importance; he dearly loved the idea of being a big man; and, to be such, it was worth his while to spend what otherwise he might have been inclined to hoard.

That was why Mr. Swellingford bought a brougham and drove to the station every day, although he lived within three or four, or at the outside five minutes' walk of it. That was why, when he went to buy a horse, he gave his order for a high-stepping one, and that's why he made the poor beast wear a bearing-rein.

Never, after that horse and brougham were bought, did Mr. Swellingford walk those few steps to the station. He thought that it would have been letting himself down so to do; indeed, some of the simpler of his neighbours, notably a little clerk who had been saving for six months out of his wages to try and compass the purchase of a perambulator, would have thought it a great condescension in him to do so. Good little man! He once, when an opportunity offered owing to Mr. Swellingford not having returned by the expected train, ventured to pat that horse's neck, but the effects were very near being serious. Although the coachman had given him leave so to do, and he had said "Poor fellow!" in his most soothing and indeed respectful voice as he did it, he was so impressed with the liberty he had taken, and he conjured up before his affrighted imagination such terrible consequences as possibly coming from it, that he ate very little supper that night, and alarmed his little family by going to bed early, and hinting at the great uncertainties of life. It was not generally understood why, but that little junior clerk in the "Wind Bottling Company, Limited," changed his carriage, and for a week after rode in the one nearest the guard's van, that being the farthest he could get from the one in which the man he feared he had injured rode.

Mr. Swellingford kept always swelling, always increasing, always climbing up, always becoming bigger. He built his own house, he laid out his own grounds, he kept his own bag at the post office; the station close to which he lived ought to have been called "Swellingford" station, or there ought at any rate to have been a board up saying, "Here Mr. Swellingford alights."

There were two directions in which Mr. Swellingford was big. One was in his own direction, another in that of his neighbours. He thought much of himself. His observation in life had been —that, if you don't think much of yourself, and make much of yourself, your fellow-men will, for the most part, not make much of you. If you want them to listen, you must blow your own trumpet. You must make a flourish on it, as much as to say, "There 's somebody coming—look out!" Perhaps people would be offended if the trumpet could actually say, "Get out of my way;" but practically they knew that it meant, at any rate, what we have said—"There 's somebody coming—look out!"

It isn't everyone that will take you at your own price—that I know very well. There are always quiet, thoughtful people who will take a heavy discount off of you. What I mean to say is—that these pushing people often elbow out more modest and much more worthy men, and by sheer weight of their supposed bigness, throw themselves on this person and that, and this thing and that, and so make their way when others are left behind.

The neighbours all thought much of Mr. Swellingford in a certain way. He had a great name among them as a man who had a great deal, and who could do a great deal. He was looked upon as one who might be almost anything he chose. They were not certain but that the Queen herself would pay him a visit some day. Certainly the Lord Mayor would, in which case he would come, no doubt, with the gentleman with the big fur cap, and also with the mace.

But it wasn't the actualities of Mr. Swellingford that occupied all the attention of the neighbours; it was rather the potentialities; not what Mr. Swellingford did, but what Mr. Swellingford could do if he liked. He could buy up this one, and that one; he could keep a small man-of-war, or a torpedo boat, for a yacht if he wished; he could do no end of good, too, if he pleased—that is, if he did.

But herein lay Mr. Swellingford's misfortune (nay, why should I put it down as his misfortune?—herein lay his fault), that he would not do what he could in the way of good. The potentialities, the powers, the possibilities, were all against him—that is, he turned them against himself. In a word, they were so much the worse for him. A man is held accountable for what he hath, and not for what he hath not; and the powers of doing good which lay in Mr. Swellingford being unimproved, and not made anything of, were so much the worse for him.

Mr. Augustus Roundabut Swellingford, I want to tell you something. I would rather be a poor man with a broom, sweeping a crossing, than you. I should have less to account for—not but that I should have something to account for, then, too; but it would be only for one talent, or a bit of a talent, instead of for five or ten, or no one knows how many. I'd rather puff and wheeze all my life with bronchitis on my crossing, than puff and swell in my after-dinner arm-chair as you do, thinking of your bigness, when that bigness will only make you a larger mark to be hit by-and-bye with many stripes. Oh, Augustus! you are so big that it will be impossible to miss you. Oh, Augustus! you are so big that it will be impossible for you to dodge. Every stroke will have a broad back to go upon; you do not know what you were doing for yourself when you made yourself so big. Oh, Augustus! would that something had happened to shrivel you—to boil you down—to make you smaller, somehow or other; but no, on you went with all your potentialities, and nothing coming out of them—nothing but evil for yourself!

I have told you, good reader, some of the points in which Mr. Augustus Roundabut Swellingford was big—very big; now let me tell you some in which he was small—very small.

I must tell you, then, that he was small personally, and small positionally, and what I mean by these two I shall now proceed to unfold.

I shall have presently to tell you of a neighbour of his, Mr. Thomas Titt—Titt, of Tittsville, at the other side of the line from Mr. Augustus Roundabut Swellingford's; but all my trouble would be wasted if I were to leave Mr. Augustus Roundabut Swellingford here, and did not tell you a little more about him; and I am not a man who likes to take trouble for nothing, unless, if such a thing could be, I know the reason why.

Yes, Augustus, I know I am exposing you—I know that if I were within reach of your big fist it would soon make acquaintance with my poor skull, which, though tolerably thick, would be much the worse for a crack on its crown from you; but I will go ahead for the sake of any other Swellingfords who may be in the world, if only these lines may reach them, and for the sake of the Titts also. Ah, yes! the dear little Titts. You precious little creatures! you are the salt of the earth. There are birds of your name, with which I had acquaintance in my early youth, and I have met with folk of your kind in my maturer years who make Titt almost a hallowed name to me. You deserve to be enshrined, you dear little Titts, in print, and so far as I can do it, so shall you be here.

But your time has not come yet, though it will be here a very few pages farther on; so wait patiently, Tommy, until your turn comes, and I promise you you shall not be done out of any of your rights.

Augustus Roundabut Swellingford, I must return to you, giving you your big name in full, because, Augustus, the power of contrast is one which most affects the human mind, and you—you, Augustus—must now, if you please, come down; and having measured you by the human standard, and found you big—very big—I must now measure you by one which is not human at all, and find you small—very small. Who'd have ever believed it? But measured by the standard of the other world, you are small—very small; you are scarcely even a dwarf. If you were to be put into breeches at all, it would be hard to fit you, hard to get any small enough for you; even a small pair would have to be cut down to suit you.

NOTES OF CHRISTIAN LIFE AND WORK IN ALL FIELDS.

A STREET IN SHANGHAI.

"HOLDING ON TO JESUS."

SURROUNDED as we are by privileges, some of us of little faith may well adopt for our own the cry of an aged woman, helped by the deaconesses who are working for the Lord in Jerusalem. She told them she was "holding on to Jesus with both hands;" if we but do the same, triumphing over half-hearted trust, will not doubts vanish like the mists, and shall we not taste and prove the goodness of our God? Our friends of the "Church of England Women's Missionary Association" ask that these deaconesses and those labouring in Shanghai may be remembered in the prayers of God's people, for there are many hindrances, though already the blessing is great. The village medical work is most hopeful, as women meet with little or no opposition in their efforts, being counted as too insignificant. Well may these earnest Gospel workers exclaim, "Happy insignificance!" To the lepers they sing in Arabic of the Great Physician, and we are told that though the Turkish women object to prayer at the meetings, they join in singing of Him who can bring light and hope to their shadowed lives. The deaconesses at Shanghai are in charge of a school for Eurasian girls. They have only recently undertaken the work, but have received many applications for admission. "We hope," they write, "to have many girls entrusted to us to train up in the right way for His Name's sake, Who died for them." Of a Chinese girls' school worked by the American Mission, we hear that the scholars range from three to eighteen, and are well acquainted with several hymns in "The Christian Choir." Their unbound feet made a pleasing impression on the visitors—may the freedom be typical of the emancipation of these young lives, and through them of many another, from the thraldom of ancient superstition! We may add that the hon. secretary of the Church of England Women's Missionary Association, 143, Clapham Road, invites the help of ladies skilled in nursing or in medical knowledge.

"FERVENT IN SPIRIT, SERVING THE LORD."

Hard pressure is the tendency of the age; we rush through meals, through work, through pleasure-taking, knowing little of the benedictions of quietude and meditation (that "living principle of wisdom"), till sickness or old age comes to hush surrounding clamour, and we learn what it means to sit awhile at the Master's feet and hearken His voice of calm. In this nineteenth century Marthas are more plentiful than Marys—busy hands, energies overworked to fretfulness and fatigue, are more common in our midst than the peaceful learner, the still, sweet soul that drinks in heavenly teachings, and then in sight of all finds courage to pour out for Christ the devotion and fervour of love thus inspired. Mary could act on occasion as well as listen and meditate. Work has a grandeur of its own, but it loses much if no time be spared or made for soul-communion with our Lord, drinking in His spirit, stealing to His feet. When even spiritual duties dethrone the Master, when the Christian teacher or visitor gets no time for new draughts of the Fountain of Life, there is something wrong, there is danger; and unless a change take place, there will be weakness and decay. Not in monasteries or hermitages need we suppose the truly religious life can exist alone—we may be as worldly within the convent as the crowd; but though in the world—helpful, busy, energetic, fervent—we are not to be of it. This distinction can come forth alone by quiet communion, much prayer, lingering at the Saviour's side. A discussion once took place as to the superiority of Martha or Mary. Some extolled Martha, as the earnest, provident worker; some preferred Mary for her peace, her devoted heart, her docility of soul. It was asked which of the two would make the best wife, and a clergyman quietly remarked, "I should choose Martha before dinner, and Mary after it." There was a good deal of sense in his decision; the characteristics of both sisters are required for completion of character. What we must strive for is to keep the Master first, to fill even commonplace duties with the spirit of our religion, and to unite busy hands with adoring receptive hearts—

> "For if I face with courage stout
> The labour and the din,
> Thou, Lord, wilt let my mind go out,
> My heart with Thee stay in."

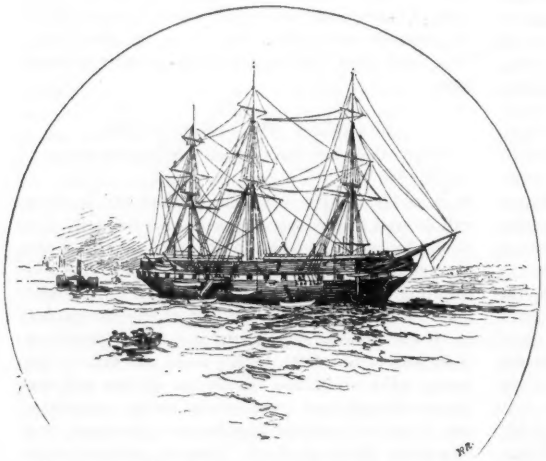
AN EXPERIMENT WORTH TRYING.

In the "Life and Letters of Mrs. Sewell" (Nisbet and Co.), we note some hints that workers among the poor might find it helpful to bear in mind. The writer of the sweet, homely ballads so well known and loved, remarked that the poetry in a book attracted her poorer neighbours first, and the parents listened with interest to rhymed recitations delivered by their children. Poetry in her opinion was to the toiler an almost needful relaxation from daily drudgery; some of us know by experience that the hymn or little poetic narrative will arrest attention where prose might fail, and, in encouraging our scholars to commit such to memory, we are sending home messages to their parents, sowing seed that may linger in heart and memory with fair and fruitful results. Leaders of mothers' meetings might with advantage try an experiment recorded by Mrs. Bayly, who writes this biography. After the Bible lesson, she would two or three times read a chosen verse of Scripture (telling the women she wanted to make it clear enough for their children to understand), and proceed to give a plain and simple explanation. She advised them to get their husbands or one of the older children to write out the verse, for each child to prick before learning it; then let the mothers choose some quiet time to repeat at home the Bible-class explanation of the text. The mothers often exhibited the verses pricked by the children, and were so anxious to learn for their little ones that though inattentive otherwise at times, the children's verse and lesson secured quiet, patient hearing. The result of this excellent plan was to set parents and older and younger children all thinking over certain Scripture words—a very definite result, and one most hopeful, to succeed the weekly Mothers' Meeting. The children look to "mother" for so much; let us try to aid her who dispenses the bread and clothing to her household, to dispense also the sure provisions of eternal grace, and break to her little ones the Bread of Life.

THE MALAGA ABORIGINAL MISSION.

Fifteen years have been spent by Mr. and Mrs. Matthews in the task of raising a community of mixed native tribes into a state of Christianity and civilisation; for a long time, we are told, the ground was rocky soil indeed, but at last came an outpouring of God's Spirit in answer to prayer, and a great work of conversion resulted. These missionaries, who may now be communicated with at 72, Cornhill, hope to form new mission-stations in New South Wales and Queensland. The Australian continent has a vast Aboriginal population, and efforts will be made to erect training-houses, form and strengthen missions, and establish orphanages and industrial schools for the young. For the furtherance of this work, it is desired to hold drawing-room meetings where practicable, and form branches of helpfulness in connection with schools and societies. Temperance work is carried on and found to be exceedingly necessary, and the people seem fond of music and responsive to musical instruction. Most important have been the patient endeavours carried on in these regions afar to uplift the natives from ignorance and vice to communion with God and the hope of heaven, and many children now growing up in the mission have taken their stand on the Lord's side, and form the hope and the promise of their race.

BREAKING OUR OWN BONDS.



> "When thou dost purpose aught within thy power,
> Be sure to do it."

So says George Herbert, and parents and teachers will do well to pay special heed to his counsel. Let us not be quite so ready to make promises; then our characters will not be weakened by unfaithfulness in fulfilling them. How often we hear threats and promises held out to children, and utterly disregarded by them, because they have proved the words of their seniors unreliable! We must not talk to the young folks about the sanctity of pledges and the beauty of truth and steadfastness, while we indulge the habit of making promiscuous promises, and forgetting all about them. Example speaks louder than precept; the children will more readily copy our ways than our words. We once deemed it rather hard in a very kindly father to lecture his young son most solemnly about a broken promise, but in Christian and business life he had learnt the value and importance of standing to one's engagements, and he wanted to impress upon the lad that "constancy knits the bones," and is of worth untold in the character. We have known young people, and older ones too, who at the New Year, or at some important epoch, have written out a list of "Resolutions," in fair and beautiful characters, but they have broken their own bonds too often, and the intention and caligraphy form the best part of the resolutions. Then the remembrance comes home to us all of promises made at the Mercy-seat, in God's house, in quiet prayer—promises in trouble and sickness, that with the dawn of prosperity have been forgotten or postponed as to performance. Has the Lord ever broken a promise made to us? Has He proved in aught forgetful, uncaring, unfaithful? God is ever as good as His word: what we have vowed to Him, that let us perform thankfully, speedily, with full purpose of heart; for God loveth a cheerful giver.

THE TRAINING SHIP "INDEFATIGABLE."

It is a matter of deep regret that one of the great difficulties which our foreign missionaries have to contend with, is the godless and unchristianlike example shown by the British sailor when ashore in a distant port. Any institution, therefore, that seeks to man our ships with God-fearing, Christian seamen, is doing much to further the spread of the Gospel. The training ship Indefatigable, for the sons and orphans of sailors and other poor and destitute boys, has been moored in the Mersey for the past twenty-four years, and during that time has sent forth some 1,800 young men, who have enjoyed the benefits of a true Christian training, and are prepared by word and example to advance their great Captain's message among their comrades and fellow-seamen. Many a lad who has, thanks to this noble institution, become a useful member of society, might, but for its sheltering aid, have fallen into the paths of vice and become a social outcast. The boys are under the able command of Captain Bremner, and one has only to look at their bright cheerful faces and frank sailor-like bearing to realise how beneficial is the healthy discipline that obtains on board. Their religious instruction and training is watched over by the Rev. Mr. Bridger, and a more impressive sight than divine service on board the roomy old frigate can hardly be imagined. The devotion and sincerity of the youthful worshippers prove that their religion is no mere lip-service, but the guiding principle in their every-day life. No wonder, then, that Indefatigable lads are eagerly sought after by shipowners and masters, such is their character for steadiness, efficiency, sobriety, and Christian spirit. We sincerely trust that such an institution as this will never be hampered in its great work by lack of support and subscriptions.

THE "INDEFATIGABLE."

CHRISTIAN WORK IN BILLINGSGATE.

Mr. F. A. Bevan is president of the Christian Mission, 83, Lower Thames Street, which was started about fourteen years ago for the benefit of those connected with Billingsgate Market. For these a day-refuge, reading-room, and library were established, and for the poor waifs of the neighbourhood arrangements have been made for free breakfasts, soup-suppers, night-lodgings, and daily supplies of food at the coffee-stalls. Difficulties occurred in 1886 respecting the mission premises, owing to municipal alterations, but, despite obstacles, the work has continued, and a most valuable site immediately fronting the market has now been secured. In this locality there is a daily attendance of about ten thousand men, to whom the coffee tavern with mission-hall will be of untold value. Assistance towards the building is greatly needed just now. It may be added that the work rendered is gratuitous, a yearly report is provided, and the new undertaking will be vested in the hands of trustees. As illustrations of the kind of work that has been done, the case is given of a barman, who threw up his place because drink had become a temptation to him, and who marched the pavement till nearly starved, when he was directed to the mission-room. Lodging and coffee-stall tickets were given to him, and a recruiting sergeant for the army of the Lord Jesus Christ spoke to him the message of love and peace. The wanderer was saved from despair, and yielded himself to the Saviour. He worked well, and clearly showed a change of heart, but while giving much promise of usefulness he was attacked by illness, and in full hope to the end he entered into rest. Many cases come under notice of runaways and those who have once been better off. The father of a youth who was induced to return to his home wrote to inform those who had helped his son that he never had any faith in missions, but if they returned foolish boys to their parents, they were "worth something, after all."

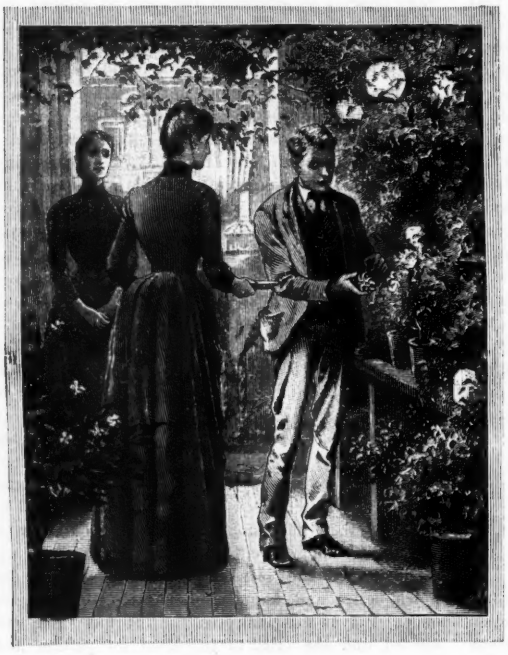
THE GUARDS' MISSION.

THE GUARDS' MISSION.



The work carried on by Sergeant George Pullinger (late Grenadier Guards) among his comrades commenced in the year 1863, and he is now employed as missionary in connection with the premises at 58, High Street, Ebury Bridge. Having been for many years in the service, he knows the temptations and difficulties of a soldier's life, and how important it is that special efforts should be put forth for his spiritual welfare. Men are visited in different barracks, tracts and copies of the Scriptures are distributed, and by individual conversations the men are reminded of the truths these Scriptures contain. The Brigade of Guards consists of six thousand men drawn from all parts of the country. What a power is here for Christian service, if these soldiers to fitness of body add, by God's grace fitness, of soul, and enlist under the Captain of salvation! We read that Sergeant Pullinger has received much blessing on his labours, and the mission-room will afford increased facilities for the work. Here are also reading and refreshment rooms, and several meetings are held during the week, some being conducted by Christian soldiers. It has been said that spiritual warriors, even if not always in battle, must ever be on the field; once enlisted, the fight must go on, but God will supply the armour and strength, and we may well urge with Grotius, "Who would not courageously descend into that combat, where there is a certain reward for him who conquers, and a certain conquest for him who fights?"

GOSPEL TRIUMPHS IN PARIS.

Eight missionaries have been earnestly at work, with many proofs of Divine blessing, in connection with the Paris City Mission. In eight low districts the people have been visited, and the pure Gospel has combated infidelity and superstition, while special services have been held in connection with the exhibition. It is sought to engage the services of a special agent to further Sabbath observance in Paris, for many a slave of Sunday trading is chained to counter and workshop, and things would be much more hopeful all around if the need of Sunday rest could be realised. The prevailing religion in Paris is active in its agencies, while infidelity has been in a way officially recognised, for 600,000 francs were paid for a new grammar in which God is not named, and in the hospitals no prayer or religious service is permitted at a funeral. At the annual meeting of the City Mission, the Rev. R. W. McAll testified that two excellent missionaries worked with him, and he hoped all Christians who visited the exhibition would aid these Gospel efforts. In many a lowly home the Word of God is now an open book, giving faith and courage, and leading to family prayer and Bible-study. One of the workers was told by a man whose employment was chair-caning, that he keeps his Bible close at hand when at work, and marks the passages that strike him. "Here is the finest I have found this week," he exclaimed, and pointed to Romans xi., verses 33 and 34. A sister of mercy was led to realise that Christ can give complete and immediate salvation, and she now seeks to tell others the joyful news. A father, mother, and daughter, when changed in life and heart, agreed to pray for the conversion of an aged woman, who said she would be cut in pieces rather than attend one of the services; but, seeing these so much better and happier, she agreed to come for once. Prayer was answered, the heart of stone was melted, and she cried to the Lord for pardon and salvation.

"TO MEET THE DAY."

This is the title which the long popular author of the "Recreations of a Country Parson" gives to a series of very brief meditations intended for daily reading. The meditations, often extending only to a few sentences, are upon a text quoted at their head, and are always concluded with a few lines or verses from some suitable hymn or poem. Messrs. Longmans are the publishers of this little work, which should prove generally helpful.—To their admirable series of "Men of the Bible," Messrs. Nisbet have just added "The Lives and Times of the Kings of Israel and Judah," by Professor George Rawlinson. Though the individual lives may not be so full of detail or of personal interest as those of David and Solomon, to which separate volumes in the series have already been devoted, there is no doubt much that is likely to be helpful alike to student and teacher in the lives which form the subject of the present volume. In Professor Rawlinson's hands, it is almost needless to say that the most useful points are brought before the mind of the reader in a clear and practical manner, and many a useful lesson may be gleaned from the pages of this unpretending volume.—We are glad to note that Messrs. Cassell and Co. announce an illustrated serial issue of Dr. Geikie's admirable work, "The Holy Land and the Bible." Such an edition cannot fail to be helpful as well as attractive to many thousands of Christian readers.

"A little posy for each."

CONSECRATED PARLOURS.

"It was like Fairyland," said some young people, belonging to our toiling classes, of a house kindly opened to them by Christian hospitality for tea, games, and music. What a change after the work-room or the shop! A few fairy-lamps here and there in the conservatory, a little posy for each, gentle faces and tones, and the knowledge that they went and were received in the name of Him who loves us all—these united joys left a memory behind that must for ever bless hostess and guests alike. We English people are naturally home-loving; no other place is quite the same to us as our own fireside, our particular corner, our special arm-chair, but let not the home-love degenerate into selfishness. Even though we may not have grounds and conservatories and rooms large enough to accommodate many, there is certainly room in our domicile for those who would value the change, were there only room in our hearts. From personal knowledge we can bear witness to an incorrigible scholar completely changed in behaviour by a tea with "teacher," and a quiet hour or two of social converse. "I never had such a tea in my life," he reported at home, though we noticed his eyes feasting rather than his palate, and the love of the beautiful finding gratification in a flower, a vase, or a picture. Some of us have reached the age when we like a quiet life, and think ruefully of muddy carpets, scratched furniture, unreverenced polish of linoleum, should we this winter try the plan of opening our doors to poorer lives, to working girls and boys, to the Master's aged pilgrims who have known little of brightness this side of the Jordan. We plead for such, and for lives poorer in love than our own, for those who sit by lonely firesides, whether well off as to purse or not. We shall not have lived in vain if we can so use our home-gladness as to make it shine out to a neighbour; thus will our houses own the Master Himself for Guest, and our souls will know the heavenly blessing promised to every life that considers the poor.

"LEAVE ME TO-MORROW."

"Are you not afraid, mother?" asked the kindred of an old body who, during the progress of an earthquake, remained calm, peaceful, and in good spirits. "No," was her answer; "I rejoice to know that I have a God who can shake the world." Some of us are able to realise the power and presence of our Lord in great and overwhelming difficulties, but we do not seem able to trust Him with to-morrow, with its little waiting cares, its daily round of duties, its manifold perplexities. The God who is in the earthquake is in the morrow that nears us so quietly; the Arm that can shake the world can smooth that rough place which causes us to shrink as we approach. Why are we bearing to-morrow's burden when to do so is to miss the blessing of to-day? The loving Lord will be living to-morrow, and His hand will still be open to supply our every need. We read once of a faithful negro who appeared at intervals before his master (all of whose horses had fled from the pasture) to tell him "de sorrel horse be gone," and then "de mare be gone clean away," and so on till his master began to question him as to whether any were left, when he found the servant had resolved to break his troubles to him bit by bit, instead of letting all come on him at once. We may be certain of this—the tempests at thought of which we shiver will never come together. One by one our perplexities will meet us, and one by one we shall overcome them by the unfailing power and tenderness of Him who knoweth our frame and remembereth our infirmities. Not all at once will troubles fall upon us, and it is faithless and un-Christian to permit our souls to be overwhelmed by afflictions that have not arrived. Leave to-morrow with Him who is mighty, compassionate, unerring, and whose love is pleading with each trembling heart—

"Did I not die for thee? Do I not live for thee?
Leave Me to-morrow."

HOW BEST TO USE THE SABBATH.

We have read of an aged Chinese convert that she was much distressed when her memory became treacherous, and she could not bear in mind the regular return of the Lord's Day. What was the remedy that occurred to her? "I will keep every day a Sabbath," said the aged disciple; and so she did till she died. Unless every day know something of the spirit of the Sabbath, the days of joy and gladness will have benefited us little; but the tendency of the present age, no less in educated circles than among the masses, is to smile at Sabbath observance as old-fashioned and Puritanical, and to wrest the meaning of the Master's words, "the Sabbath was made for man." We heard recently some powerful remarks on this subject from the pulpit. The preacher reminded his hearers that man consists of body, mind, and soul, and we have to ask what sort of Sabbath will help him best with respect to his diversified nature. To preach to him while he is starving would be cruel, but let us not arrange enjoyment for body alone, or even body and mind, instead of likewise taking into account the needs of the soul. Sunday excursioning, Sunday parties, are surely not the best means of helping man's soul. Those who remember what they owe God and what they owe their fellow-men will not want to rob mankind and the Divine Creator of the day He claims as His own; the Scripture promises prosperity and blessing to those who observe the Sabbath, and science adds its witness to the need by humanity of its rest. There seem signs of danger that the Continental Sabbath, which is a grief to many faithful hearts abroad, may in some quarters find a counterpart here. But whatever in the way of Sabbath-breaking may be alluring, cheap, or fashionable, let every soul to whom God's will is dear oppose word and example to the desecration. The Lord of the Sabbath knows the necessity for seasons of calm, refreshing, and strength; we cannot afford to do without them unless our spiritual life is to know decline. Those were solemn words once written by a thoughtful spirit as to this matter of Sabbath observance: "He that remembers not to keep the Christian Sabbath at the beginning of the week is in danger to forget before the week's end that he is a Christian."

"FIFTEEN MILLIONS!"

"THE QUIVER" FREE GRANT FUND: FOR SUPPLYING FREE COPIES OF "THE QUIVER" TO THE AGED AND SICK POOR.

THE aggregate income of all the readers of this magazine amounts, on the lowest actuarial computation, to about £15,000,000 a year.

FIFTEEN MILLIONS! How much of this is spent on works of mercy and loving-kindness? It is impossible to discover. A tithe, or tenth, of this enormous sum would produce a million and a half per annum—enough to provide an ample income for a large number of charities and missions.

FIFTEEN MILLIONS! It is almost impossible to grasp all the potentialities of this wondrous accumulation of incomes, every penny of which, let us remember, is due alone to the bountiful and provident hand of God. But this we do know—that every income, large or small, is a stewardship for which its receiver will have to render an account in the Great Day.

Anyone who is acquainted with our "Short Arrows" will understand how frequently the Editor is applied to for help by all kinds of persons and for all sorts of institutions. We are glad to know that those whose appeals for sympathy and support are exhibited in our pages meet with that frequent and generous response which is the recognised characteristic of the readers of THE QUIVER.

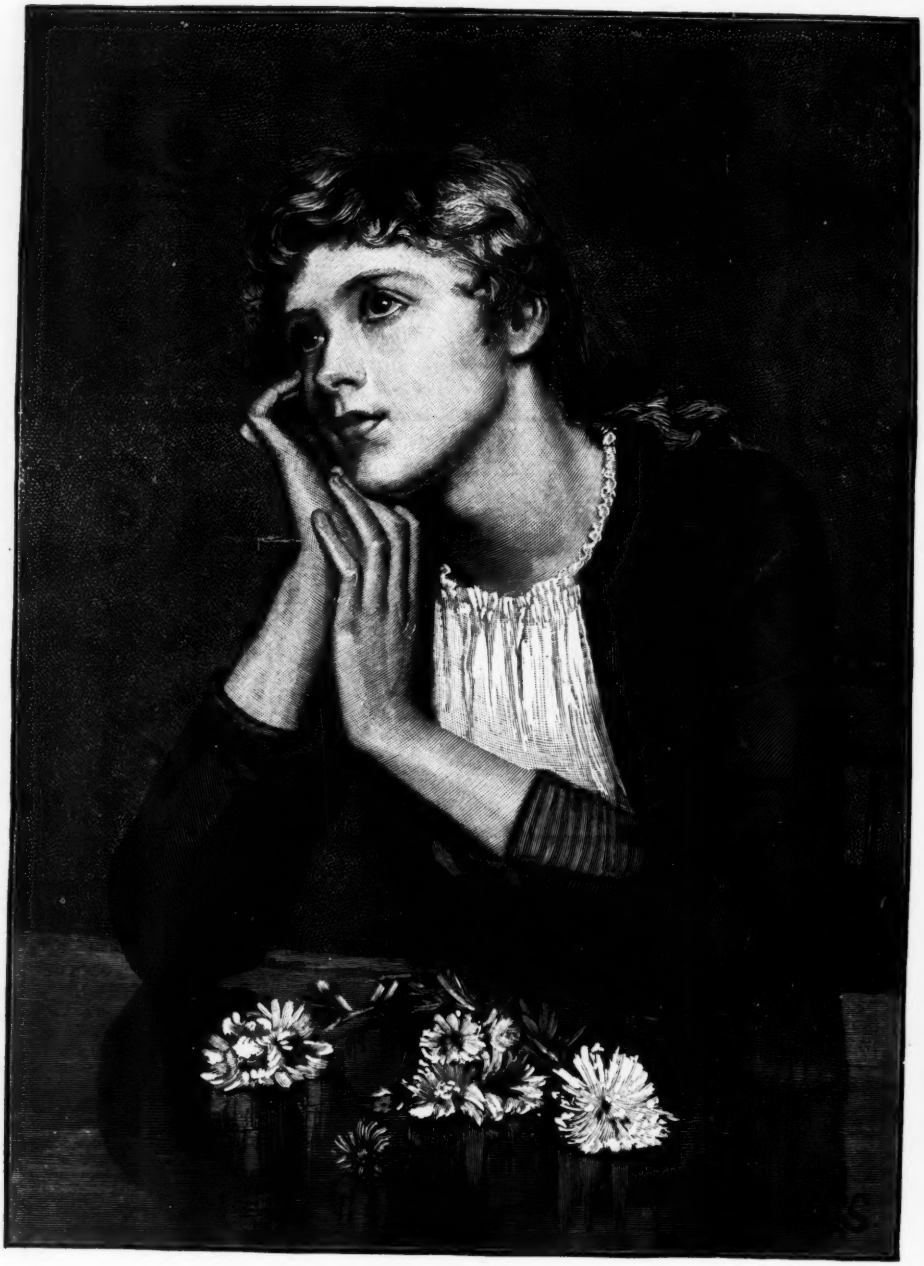
We are encouraged by this experience of their pious solicitude for others to bring before them the following request, which is only one of many. A poor man, stricken with paralysis, asks that he may be charitably provided with some numbers of THE QUIVER, of which, he tells us, he has been a reader since he was a boy. "I cannot endure," he writes, "to be without it, and yet I am too poor to buy it."

Of course, a few isolated cases of request could easily be dealt with in private; but our object in placing the matter before our readers is to organise a fund for the continuous supply of free copies of THE QUIVER to large numbers of sick and aged poor, many of whom have seen "better days," and who now sorely miss those recreations and comforts which, costing so little in themselves, are yet beyond their reach.

We will now point out two ways in which our readers can help forward this work.

The first is, to send to us the name and address of any poor person to whom THE QUIVER would be acceptable, but who is really unable to subscribe. This is not necessarily for publication, but for the Editor's due information. Such applications will be attended to in the order in which they are received, subject, of course, to the sufficiency of the Fund to meet the demand.

The second way is, to subscribe or collect a small sum at regular intervals for the support of the Fund. The subscriptions may be yearly, half-yearly, or quarterly, at the option of the donor or collector. Collectors residing in towns or large villages will find little difficulty in raising a quarterly subscription of one penny and upwards per person. Collecting cards will be supplied to all who ask for them.



All communications should be addressed: "The Editor of THE QUIVER, La Belle Sauvage, London, E.C." Those desiring acknowledgments of their contributions are requested to enclose a stamped directed envelope or postcard for that purpose.

While engaged in writing these lines, we have received a suggestion for the further development of the objects of our "Free Grant Fund." "In these days," we are asked, "when vitiating literature is so plentiful and so industriously circulated amongst every class of society, are there not numbers of cases in which the free distribution of a magazine like THE QUIVER might lead to blessed results?" Our answer is, that anything which can be done to stem the present torrent of bad and unwholesome reading ought most assuredly to be taken in hand, and we, for our part, will gladly take charge of and apply any funds which our readers may send us for this purpose. For ourselves, we will be responsible for the entire working or official expenses of the Fund, so that our readers will have the satisfaction of knowing that every farthing subscribed will be directly and promptly applied to its purpose.

FIFTEEN MILLIONS! Let each shareholder in this vast annual income, however small his particular share may be, do his best, and the success of this movement is assured.

MY JEALOUSY.

BY JOHN M. BAMFORD.

"Jennie put her lovely head over my shoulder."

I NEVER knew the value of a parent's love. Jennie and I were little children when father and mother died. I have spent hours in studying my mother's portrait, which was said to be the very image of her. Many a time have I drawn my chair beneath the familiar canvas, and traced the lines of the painter's brush, until her face became so imprinted on my memory that I needed no artist's skill to reproduce her countenance before me.

There was nothing in the portrait to suggest that she was a handsome or a remarkable woman; nevertheless, I never looked at her picture without feeling that there were depths in her nature of which I had no record.

The portrait was so life-like, I could imagine somewhat of her mind and disposition. I could build up, as I thought, a fair fabric of her character; but there was something wanting to complete the ideal, and what it was my fancy could not supply.

One day, when nearly lost in reverie before my mother's picture, Jennie put her lovely head over my shoulder, and playfully remarked—

"Sissie dear, if mother could speak, shall I tell you what she would say?"

"You silly child!" I answered; "no one could tell me that. I would give worlds to know it."

"Yes, I could," she continued; "I have looked at that picture until it has spoken to me, and when I have received my lesson here I always feel constrained to run up to my little room and pray."

"The portrait calls me to watch and work. Tell me what it says to you."

"Well, nothing very new," replied Jennie; "but something that will never get out of date between you and me: 'True love never dies.'"

And with that she pressed a long kiss upon my lips as the seal of her sisterly affection. It was plain that to my sister the picture was a revelation of the permanency of love. To me it was a revelation of its transientness and loss; yet I had no suspicion that Jennie's heart or mine would need any higher inspiration than our sisterhood to perfect the union between us.

Jennie and I were all in all to each other. We had been educated together, read together, grown up to womanhood together, and interchanged our views of life and work with such unbroken constancy, that our lives blended in a oneness which had never been disturbed. We found such interesting resources in each other's love, that we regarded any society which necessitated our separation as an infliction.

I remember how I held a grudge against the venerable vicar of the parish, who gave us special place in his pastoral care, because he ventured to advise us—for a time, at least—to live apart. He feared the range of our intelligence would be narrowed—that the mental horizon of one would never extend beyond the thoughts and opinions of the other. In his judgment, we were too much under the influence of each other's minds. We should lose our individuality, and sink into a monotony which, in future years, might prove tame and tiresome. "It is," he said, "high time the pastorate of this parish was enlarged by the ministry of another mind. The people are so familiar with my methods of thought and address that they begin to jog in ruts."

"I like ruts," I somewhat rudely interjected. "The fashion nowadays is to spin along on rails; the old ruts are more favourable to reflection."

"Not always," the vicar calmly continued. "The edge of what I say is often lost because my people profess to know what is coming. If another preacher opened up new ground, and let the light in here and there where I have failed to do it, my work would look fresher. There are contrasts in truth which produce the sweetest harmonies, and differences of mind often lead to lasting friendships. I have known a present farewell to lay the firmest foundation for a future welcome."

I never liked the old clergyman so well after that. I felt the force of the argument so far as it concerned him, but not as it concerned me. Jennie and I never wearied of each other. Our hearts were always fresh. Our love was like a fountain. The idea of getting tired of Jennie, or Jennie getting tired of me, was more than I could bear. Jennie was my world, and I cared for very little beyond it.

Shortly after the conversation referred to, it was announced in church that a Fellow of an Oxford college, recently ordained, was engaged as curate, and would commence his duties on the following Sunday. The intelligence somewhat excited the parishioners. All manner of expectations were stirred.

The gossips wondered what he would be like. Staunch old church-goers gravely doubted the wisdom of the new arrangement. They feared that a dual ministry might confuse the hearers—that criticisms and comparisons would disturb prevailing sentiments, and vex the ministers; nevertheless, they loyally resolved to stick by the church. A few who were approaching the fossil stage, said they should never care for anybody but the vicar. He had the "cure of souls," and from him alone could they receive their spiritual aliment; yet these were the persons in whose attachment the good vicar found least encouragement. I was prejudiced against the appointment solely because the vicar had been pleased to use it as an illustration to suggest new relations between Jennie and me.

As the curate entered the reading-desk to conduct his first service, I saw at once that he was no ordinary man. His face affected me in the same way as my mother's picture. It was not so much the intellectual cast of his head or form of his features, as the striking manner in which his countenance expressed an inner life. His sermon was full of vigorous thoughts, presented with a simplicity which helped the humblest hearer to understand his meaning. It was different preaching from the vicar's; yet, somehow, things which the vicar had said came up and intermingled with the impressions made by the new preacher.

"How dids thee like him?" said old Samuel Smith to his friend Simeon, as they walked under the overhanging yew-trees to the churchyard gate.

"Like him, Sam'l! Thou might'st as well ax me how my hosses like a bit o' corn. It wasna a dry mors'l—it wor a good feed; an' summut sweet to wesh it down wi'."

"He beats th' owd parson, Simeon, at th' first innin's."

"I dunna say that, Sam'l. My idee is that when we've getten in th' mill a bit o' th' owd preachin' an' a bit o' th' new, an' grun 'em up together, we shall hev very good vittals."

"Ah! Simeon; but thou knows it tak's a mony sarmons to fill a empty stomach."

"It tak's a appetite to fill it," retorted Simeon; "an' I reckon a mon wunna get much good out o' owd sarmons or new uns if he isna a bit keen for th' Bread of Life. If preachin' is to touch the sperrit, Sam'l, it mun come from the sperrit; an' that's why the new parson's preachin' suits me."

I confess, however, that when I put to my sister an inquiry similar to the one Samuel Smith addressed to Simeon, I was jealous of the answer, which I half-anticipated.

"Did you like the new minister, Jennie?"

"Yes, sissie; he touched my heart."

In that moment the dark brooding foe took possession of me. I settled down to hate the young clergyman, and for the wretched reason that his earnest preaching had reached my sister's heart. In the blindness of my selfish love, I could not discern between the fervency of a pure-minded minister of God and the passion of mere natural affection. I was infatuated enough to think that if my sister yielded to the one she would yield to the other. I steeled my heart against the good influences which to Jennie were so precious, and in a secret way I sought to undermine the impressions which were working in her a real nobleness of character. The fancy grew upon me that the young curate was in love with

Jennie, and as I could not brook a rival in her affections, I thrust myself between them, in hope of retaining the supreme place in my sister's heart. This unnatural and suppressed excitement began to tell seriously upon my health. I was stricken with brain-fever, and for weeks trembled in the balances between life and death. On opening my eyes for the first lucid interval of my illness, I saw Jennie and the young clergyman kneeling beside my bed. Behind them hung my mother's picture, which a sister's exquisite solicitude had removed to my room. The minister was engaged in prayer for me—that my reason might be restored, my wandering mind calmed to quietness, my health recovered, my heart refined and sanctified by the chastening discipline of God; that if there lingered in my nature any disposition false to the highest service of holy life, it might give place to the childlikeness which our Lord commended as exemplifying greatness in the Kingdom of Heaven. He prayed that my sister, who was grieving over my unconscious state and lamenting the interruption of the life-long fellowship which had never known any failure of trust or love, might be strengthened to honour God in trial; that the cross of suffering on me, and the cross of threatened bereavement on her, might prove but the call of Jesus nearer to Himself.

Had my mother knelt and prayed beside me, I could hardly have been more tenderly commended to the Divine sympathy. The petitions impressed me as coming from the same soul-depths which I had so often imagined in my mother's nature, and as reaching to the same Almighty Helper who was her refuge and strength in time of trouble.

As the prayer ended, I calmly responded, "Amen."

The next moment Jennie's arms were around me, and even tears fell from the manly face beside me. The prayer was answered; but not all at once. God gave me time to search my own heart—to see how vile and offensive was my selfishness—to make confession and restitution to those whom I had so unjustly wronged. Affliction was sanctified to my good. I was forgiven. A truer love enabled me to learn useful lessons of self-denial; and when later on the new minister, with Jennie's full consent, asked me to be his wife, I saw how subtle had been my temptation, and how unreasonable had been my jealousy.

CHILD LIFE IN A FOREST HAVEN.

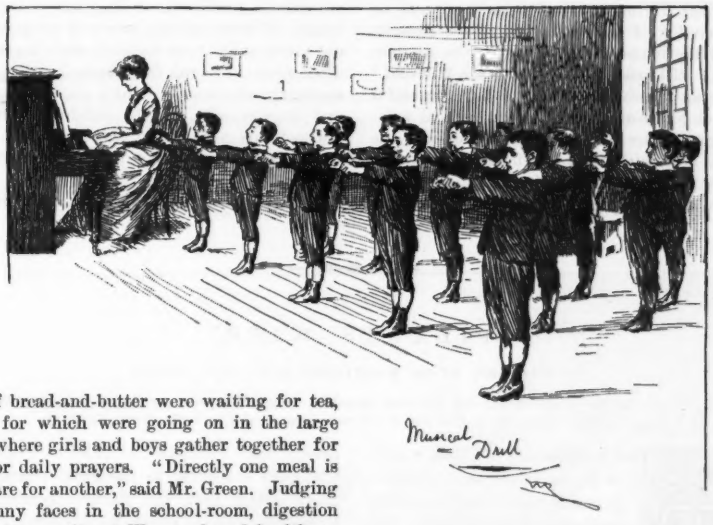
THE INFANT ORPHAN ASYLUM, WANSTEAD.

THE BABY.

FENCHURCH Street Station on a sultry day is not the most enchanting of retreats, and, finding ourselves in that region on an ideal summer afternoon, we were not sorry when we could seat ourselves in the 2.13 p.m. for Snaresbrook, whither we were bound with the hope of visiting the Infant Orphan Asylum at Wanstead, and seeing how it fares with the six hundred fatherless children whom this institution protects. On the way we had a glimpse of Dr. Barnardo's splendid Homes, with the inscription, "No destitute child refused admission." The shelter we were about to visit cares for another class of needy little ones—fatherless children whose friends may have occupied a good position in society, but whose means cannot well provide for support and education now. The children of military and professional people, of clergymen, merchants, and well-to-do tradespeople have been here freely received and thoroughly well educated. What this means to hundreds of care-worn widows perhaps few can realise, but surely such an effort must be dear to the heart of Him who has said,

"Leave thy fatherless children; I will preserve them alive; and let thy widows trust in Me."

We have always prided ourselves on the foliage of our own county, sylvan Surrey, but Snaresbrook was part of the ancient forest once, and it still bears charming traces of its high descent. Many a woodland pageantry this district must have known of yore, many a luxuriant vista of beauty, restful to the eye and calming to the heart. But neither Snaresbrook nor Wanstead (which seem conjoined as twin habitations) can ever have boasted anything of truer beauty and worth than this Christian mission on behalf of infant orphans, several of whom were playing in front of the beautiful building with wheel-barrow, cart, and other toys, almost as big as themselves. The senior and junior girls and boys have playgrounds, with swings, etc., at the back; "but the little things go where they like, and do pretty much as they like," tenderly remarked the secretary, Mr. H. W. Green, who kindly acted as our escort, and whose demeanour evidenced the deepest love and pride as concerns his six hundred charges.



IN THE NURSERY.

The baby of the establishment, a pretty little creature who tolerates ladies, but will have nothing to do with the other sex, was inspected ere we proceeded further on. This is a most sagacious child, we were assured by the matron when later on she regaled us with the cup that cheers—baby will kiss her nurse with readiness, but when asked for "a kiss for mamma" she kisses into the air, as though transferring her greeting for conveyance to the winds. In connection with the "tiny tot" department, we may mention that this is a land of toys; for this purpose a special bequest has been left, and many a parent, whose children have vanished into long dresses and tail-coats, sends the contents of the old nursery to Wanstead to make another generation glad.

Having admired the grounds and the lake, and heard with satisfaction that a swimming-bath is provided for the young folks, several of whom are quite adepts in the water, we passed into the entrance-hall, and our attention was caught by a delicately beautiful piece of sculpture, "The fatherless and the widow," executed by a former pupil, and presented by him to the institution. Old scholars have also placed in the chapel a window illustrative of scenes in the life of Moses, as a Jubilee token of their love and remembrance.

Everything seemed so quiet and orderly in the vast, handsome building, that one inwardly asked, "Where are the children?" The army of juveniles turned out to be in school; we came first upon a throng of junior girls, marching round a large, airy school-room, bounded on one side by dolls' houses. The march being over, a reading-class commenced, and the little things read in turn and with great distinctness a narrative that concerned the fortunes of an ichneumon and a chameleon, afterwards reciting some pretty verses apostrophising the robin. Wherever we went, a small scholar flew before us to open the various doors; evidently the Wanstead curriculum includes good manners. It likewise includes English history, for other little maidens were busy with good Queen Bess and the fortunes of Sir Walter Raleigh. In another school-room the short-haired lassies gave place to girls with longer tresses. Within a year or so of leaving, the hair of the girls is suffered to grow at will, and a very comely aspect they presented, taking their French lesson from an energetic master of whose labours the Government inspector speaks highly. Both girls and boys have indoor playgrounds for exercise in wet weather, and each has a locker wherein to stow away various treasures and belongings, so that nothing is seen lying untidily about. Every girl is taught music for a certain period, and unless taste for music be entirely wanting, this instruction is continued. The difficulty of so many musicians is met by separate compartments, sawdust-lined, each containing a piano, and running down each side of a large room. Shut into one of these compartments, the neighbours are scarcely heard at all. Of course, in the centre of the music-room one's nerves are apt to be tried at times. The dormitories seemed bright, and exceedingly well ventilated; the kitchen department is quite a triumph of ingenuity, every device employed here and in the laundry (where thousands of garments find their way) being calculated to save time and fatigue and bring the results as near perfection as secretary and committee can attain. Piles upon piles of bread-and-butter were waiting for tea, preparations for which were going on in the large dining-hall, where girls and boys gather together for meals, and for daily prayers. "Directly one meal is over we prepare for another," said Mr. Green. Judging from the bonny faces in the school-room, digestion waits on hearty appetite at Wanstead, and health on both.

All this time we had not seen a boy except among the wee ones in charge of the nurses. We were now conducted to another part of the building, where, to the strains of lively music, a number of bright-eyed little fellows were charging and stamping, and performing all sorts of evolutions calculated to bring every muscle into motion, and ending in a grand march round. A throng of still younger boys, for whom musical drill is still in the future, watched these proceedings with interest from a raised gallery. The learning evidenced among the senior boys, whom we visited next, was quite awe-inspiring. Here were lads restless with geographical knowledge, and stretching forth eager arms in their acquaintance with the capes and headlands demanded by the teacher; here was the head-master covering a blackboard with geometrical signs, and a quiet lad in the corner was pointed out to us as a veritable mathematical genius, to whom Euclid and Algebra were fields of conflict in which he but came, saw, and conquered. "We are proud of our children's handwriting," said Mr. Green, "and many employers are aware how well they write; applications often reach me for suitable lads—sometimes in excess of our power of supply at the time." Mr. Green does not guarantee to find a place for a scholar, who leaves at fourteen or fifteen with a good outfit; but experience proves that he does not seem to be quite content till he has in some way secured their future benefit. Several of the helpers and teachers (including the sick-nurse at the separate infirmary) were once in the Home, and this seems to secure a very kindly, considerate feeling between the juveniles and those in charge of them.

"THE FATHERLESS AND THE WIDOW."

"Do the children grieve much when they first come here?" we asked the matron, who replied that as a rule they soon took happily to their school-life, but instanced the case of one little fellow who refused to be comforted, and who evidently laboured under the impression that the end of all things had taken place, and that his mother's face was lost to him for evermore. His new friends sent for his mother, and after her visit he grew quite contented and reconciled; "we thought it best," said the matron, very sensibly, "to let him see his mother still existed, and could reach him still."

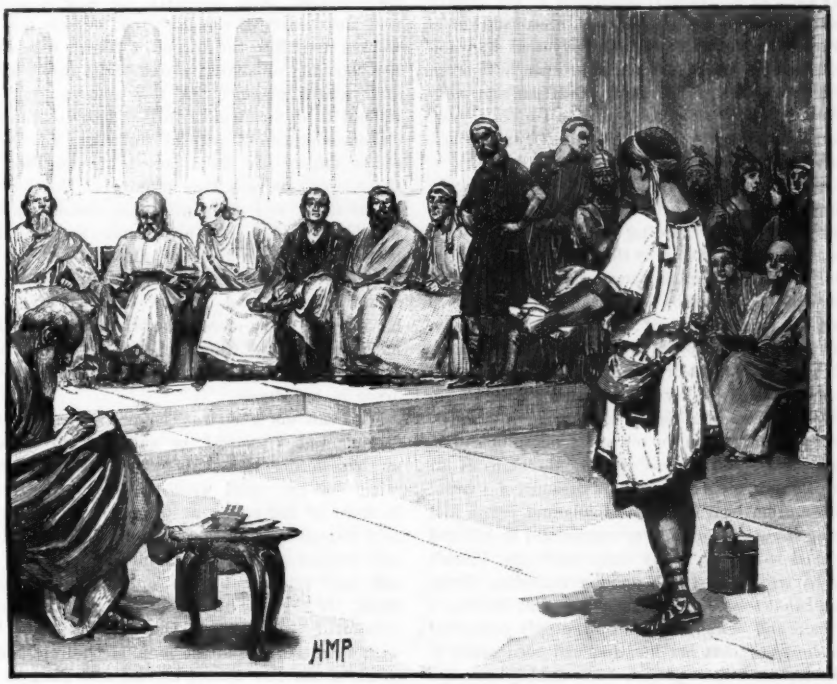
The building contains a simple but beautiful chapel; the children are trained on evangelical principles, and Sunday by Sunday the wee ones and the seniors meet here with their attendants, while the chaplain also undertakes their Scripture classes during the week, and conducts prayers. Had time permitted we should gladly have lingered for more than a couple of hours at this haven of refuge in the grand old forest district; it warmed one's heart to see room after room of young faces turned smilingly upon the secretary, who was evidently in favour with seniors and juniors—all but the not-to-be-won-over Baby, "who treats us all alike, chaplain and all," said Mr. Green, and consistently refuses to smile upon the sterner sex.

MARGARET HAYCRAFT.

PILATE'S WIFE.

BY THE REV. HUGH MACMILLAN, D.D., LL.D., F.R.S.E.

"When he was set down on the judgment-seat, his wife sent unto him, saying, Have thou nothing to do with that just man: for I have suffered many things this day in a dream because of Him."—ST. MATT. xxvii. 19.



THE interference of Pilate's wife in the judgment scene of Christ is one of the most picturesque incidents in evangelical history. St. Matthew was led by the spirit of inspiration to record it, for it serves a most important purpose in connection with God's over-ruling Providence. It brings out in the most forcible manner the fact that Christ was condemned to death in spite of every warning and hindrance that could be placed in the way. We hear it often said that there was a necessity laid upon those who took part in the great tragedy which they could not escape. They were delivered over by a Divine decree to do these things. The death of Christ was the fulfilment of an eternal purpose. He was delivered by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God; and all the details of His death were intimated previously by sacred prophecy. There was, therefore, no true responsibility resting upon those who compassed that death. But, in reply, it may be said that though the sacrifice of Christ was thus foreseen and foreordained, there was no fatal necessity compelling those who brought about that death to act as they did. Their individual freedom was not limited in the least degree. Each person acted out spontaneously what was in him. Pilate at any moment could have been true to his own convictions of Christ's innocence, and could have delivered Him. If there had been any Divine compulsion in the case, why should Pilate's wife have been allowed to warn her husband, since the effect of her warning might have proved disastrous to the whole scheme of grace? If Pilate had listened to his wife's remonstrance and released Christ, then God's plan of redemption, so far as we can see, would have been frustrated. We cannot, indeed, understand the mystery of God's sovereignty and man's freedom; we cannot, in the present case, reconcile the freedom with which those who were concerned in the great tragedy of Christ's death acted, with the pre-arrangements of Divine Providence and the prophetic intimations of Scripture. There are metaphysical difficulties implied which we cannot solve. We are assured, however, that those who condemned our Lord to death had not merely the misfortune to play a part, the guilt of which was consequently foreign to them, but they were free agents, acting throughout in character, and therefore responsible for what they did. Christ's death was not merely a necessity in the Divine order, it was an actual result of human sin. Sin was left free to work out what was in it; to blossom and fruit, and thus show its true nature in the culminating crime of the world.

Our curiosity is greatly aroused regarding Pilate's wife. We are told nothing about her in Scripture, except what is mentioned in this one incident. Tradition identifies her as Claudia Procula; and it has been conjectured that, bearing such a name, she must have belonged to the Claudian family—one of the most famous families in Roman history, whose founder, Appius Claudius, was the maker of the great Appian Way, and which gave no less than six emperors to Rome; the emperor who was sitting on the throne at the time of our Lord being Tiberius Claudius. Being thus of high station, it is probable that it was through her influence that her husband, Pontius Pilate, was made procurator of Judea; for Pilate's own birth was comparatively humble, seeing that the name Pilate is derived from the cap which was worn as a distinguishing badge by manumitted slaves, and the epithet marks him out as a freedman, or as descended from one. She accompanied her husband to Palestine; and it is a striking illustration of the truthfulness of the Scripture narrative that it was only during the reign of Tiberius Claudius that the wife of a Roman was allowed to accompany her husband to the Province which he ruled. In early times a law was expressly passed to prevent a magistrate taking his wife with him to the sphere of his jurisdiction, lest she should meddle with his administration, or unduly influence his public career. And this law was rigorously carried out; but at the time of our Lord the prohibition had fallen into neglect, and though shortly afterwards a proposal had been made to enforce it, it was not successful. Perhaps the wife of Pilate had received a special permission to accompany her husband, on account of her connection with the reigning family; and in any case her presence in Jerusalem at the time of our Lord's judgment indicates that the relationship between herself and her husband must have been one of deep and true affection. Pilate, if he had been an indifferent husband, might have left his wife behind at Rome, in conformity with the law of the empire; and his wife, if she had been less loving and devoted, might have remained at Cæsarea, which was the fixed official residence of the Roman governor, and the headquarters of the Roman army in Palestine, and not have accompanied him to Jerusalem, to which he had to go on the annual feast of the Passover, to preserve order among the great crowds of pilgrims which at that time filled the sacred city.

The voice of tradition further indicates that Pilate's wife had become a proselyte to the Jewish religion. This may have been the case; for many of the noblest Romans, men and women, had been attracted by the purity and elevation of the Jewish faith. We read in the New Testament of several centurions being converts; and Josephus tells us that later on, Poppæa, the wife of the Emperor Nero, had become a proselyte to Judaism, and had in consequence greatly favoured the Jews in Rome. Coming from a land teeming with idolatry, and with the social and individual corruptions to which idolatry invariably led, she must have been struck with the contrast of the Jewish worship of the living and true God, and with the purity of morals which it fostered. She would doubtless read the sacred Scriptures, which were accessible to her in the Greek translation, as Greek was the polite language of society everywhere at the time; and in them she would become acquainted with the marvellous history of the Jews, and with their ardent anticipations of a coming Messiah. Dissatisfied with her own worn-out creed, and unable to do without a religion, it is easy to believe that she found relief to the longings of her soul in the purest faith that was then known in the world. That she knew about Jesus previous to her dream there can be little doubt. For we may reasonably conclude that her assurance of His being "a just man," as she called Him, must have been derived, not from the circumstances of the dream itself, but from previous knowledge of His character and conduct. Pilate, in the course of his administration, must have often heard of the extraordinary man who was the wonder and mystery of His day, who uttered such wise words, and whose astonishing miracles were proclaimed over all the land. He must have made himself familiar with all the doings of One who was followed wherever He went by multitudes, who would gladly place Him at the head of an insurrectionary movement, and who might thus be exceedingly dangerous to the Roman authority. He knew how the chief priests and rulers regarded Him: how it was from envy that they delivered Him into his hands. And he must have often spoken to his wife of the strange Galilean, and wondered with her what manner of man He really was. All this would deeply exercise her mind, and form a subject of profound interest to her.

It is not difficult, therefore, to understand how, in the supreme crisis of Christ's life, she should have a most vivid dream regarding Him. We know that dreams are usually shaped by the circumstances of our waking hours. The phantasmagoria of our nightly visions are conditioned by the things that happened to us, and the surroundings of our life during the day. "A dream," says Solomon wisely, "cometh through much business." Jacob dreamed that the stones around the place where he lay formed themselves into a gigantic staircase, leading up to heaven; and Peter, fasting and hungry on the top of the house of Simon the tanner, whose trade was dressing the skins of all kinds of beasts, clean and unclean, dreamed of a vessel let down from heaven full of fowls and beasts and creeping things, which he was commanded to kill and eat. And so we can easily understand how Pilate's wife, having formed the opinion regarding Jesus, from all that she had seen and heard, that He was a just man, and being, consequently, deeply concerned when she knew that her husband had been asked to try Him, should have projected her anxiety into her sleeping hours, and woven out of it a painful nightmare. Some have said that her dream was a magical device of the devil to hinder Christ's atoning death; and others that it was an inspiration of God. But it is not necessary to have recourse to supernatural causes to account for it; it was simply the natural and necessary result of her waking anxieties. In all likelihood the dream occurred, not at night, but in the early morning of the very day on which Christ was brought before Pilate; for she says, "I have suffered many things this day in a dream because of him." And we shall not be far wrong, I think, in attributing the dream to the noise of the crowd that, before the break of day, was carrying Jesus as a prisoner to the magnificent palace where she was sleeping, and where the Hall of Judgment was. We are familiar with the strange effect which a sudden noise in the room where a person is sleeping produces upon the dream that the sleeper may be dreaming at the time; how it calls up new visions and combinations, often of a distressing and alarming nature. At the time that Napoleon Buonaparte threatened to invade our country, a gentleman in Edinburgh dreamed that the landing had taken place, that the volunteers were mustering, that the signal-gun from the castle was fired—and then he awoke. His wife awoke at the same instant, having had a similar dream; and it was discovered that the cause of both dreams was the falling of a pair of tongs in the room—acting upon the thoughts about invasion which were then dominant in their minds. And, similarly, we may well believe that the tumult of the multitude outside may have worked itself into the dreams of Pilate's wife, and led her thoughts of anxiety about Christ into a troubled and painful channel. A few moments may have sufficed to excite dreams full of long-continued and elaborate scenes of painful suffering; for we ourselves, during the short period of transition from sleep to wakefulness, have often gone through many experiences; and there are many dreams on record which appeared long to the dreamers and embraced a multitude of scenes and circumstances, and yet could not have occupied in reality many seconds. The shouts of the crowd that awoke Pilate's wife from her sleep may, therefore, have originated, in that brief moment of passing from unconsciousness to consciousness, the many things which she suffered because of Jesus in her dream.

We know not what was the precise nature of that dream. But it would be sufficient to cause her much suffering if it only reflected in the sensitive mirror of her mind what was actually happening in front of her palace at the moment; if she saw, as a distressing fata morgana of the soul, the insults and brutalities that were inflicted upon the meek and holy prisoner by the crowd athirst for His blood. If she saw in her dream the vision of the wonderful Galilean, with his God-like brow bound with cruel thorns, and the large blood-drops trickling slowly down His wasted cheeks, and his eyes filled with a sadness which pierced deeper than reproach, and yet gleaming with a pity that overmastered the utmost rage of evil, and with a love that triumphed over all its wrongs; and if a mysterious voice came to her at the same time and said that these wounds were caused by her husband's hands, that he was even now hastening to the judgment-seat to judge and condemn his God and hers, we can imagine how terrible would be her sufferings, and how she would awake with a start and with a crushing weight of sadness in her heart—a dread presentiment of evil, wrapping the soul in gloom, and chilling the very inmost springs of life.

It was a morning dream; and morning dreams, as poets say, are true. She had an irresistible conviction that it was a Divine warning specially sent to her; and therefore without a moment's delay she sent a messenger direct into court to stay her husband's proceedings, even on the judgment-seat. Her anxiety may have been mainly regarding her husband, lest he should perpetrate an awful act of guilt, and so bring himself into danger. But we cannot suppose, from what must have been the nature of her dream, and from what must have been her knowledge of the Prisoner, that she was not at the same time most anxious to protect Jesus Himself. The step which she took was a most uncommon one. To the Romans we are indebted for that unrivalled system of jurisprudence which has formed the model of every nation since. Everything connected with their judicial procedure was grave, orderly, and subdued to the majesty of law. A dignified and impartial administration of justice, with which nothing was allowed to interfere, was one of the noblest contributions of the Romans to the civilisation of the world. We can understand, therefore, how exceptionally daring was the conduct of Pilate's wife in venturing to interfere with her husband in the exercise of his magisterial functions. In ordinary circumstances such interference, even by the nearest relation of the presiding judge, would be considered as contempt of court and punished severely. But though she knew all that her act implied, the emergency was too great to allow her to stand on ceremony. As a faithful wife she would risk everything to save her husband from his awful danger.

We cannot imagine any omen more fitted to impress the superstitious mind of Pilate than such a dream, coming to him at such a time, and from such a source. It would vividly remind him of the famous dream of Calpurnia, the wife of Julius Cæsar, who saw the vision of her husband lying murdered in her arms, and who therefore strove to prevent him from going to the fatal meeting of the Senate, at which his death was decreed by Brutus. Its warning knell would ring in strange harmony with the alarm that was already pealing in his own spirit. The confession of the innocence of Jesus which came from his wife tallied with the impression which Jesus had produced upon himself. The noble and dignified bearing of the Sufferer had awakened his superstitious fears that He might be one of the heroes or demi-gods of his own mythology—especially as He was accused of calling Himself the Son of God. And gladly would he have yielded to these fears; gladly would he have followed his own instinct of justice, and resisted the clamour of the fanatical crowd, who, he knew, were thirsting for innocent blood. But his weak and vacillating nature had allowed the opportunity of asserting his authority to pass; and the decision was now taken out of his hands. He was compelled reluctantly to yield what he had not sufficient strength of will to refuse. His wife's solemn warning proved in vain. It only aggravated his guilt. Everything was brought home to him that could give him certainty regarding the sinlessness of Jesus. But even his own susceptibility to the higher feelings of our nature, and all the offered means for the discovery of the truth that were placed in his power, only paved the way to his ruin, since they could not bring him to a just decision. And though he afterwards ostentatiously washed his hands in the open court in the presence of the people, to absolve himself from the guilt of the fatal sentence, the act was a mere farce, as weak as it was unavailing. Nevermore could he free himself from the responsibility of the greatest crime that has been committed since the world began.

But though thus ineffectual as far as her husband was concerned, the dream of Pilate's wife may have been of great use to herself. It delivered her own soul from the guilt; and it is not improbable that by its silent agency—for dreams may bring conceptions of unseen and eternal things which our waking hours could never have formed—she was brought to know that Jesus was truly the Son of God; as was the Roman centurion who beheld the crucifixion, and the African stranger who carried the cross. She was indeed, humanly speaking, a fit subject for Christian conversion; for consider all that her interference implied. She had felt pity for Christ, suffered on account of Him, and her dreams about Him were the result of her waking thoughts. She spoke out boldly for Him when all others were silent, when His own countrymen were fierce in their denunciations, when His own disciples forsook Him, and one of the very inmost three who were nearest and dearest denied Him with oaths and blasphemies. She dared, in the face of the dread tribunal that had excommunicated Him as an impostor and blasphemer, to proclaim Him publicly a just man, righteous as well as innocent, and she bade her husband beware how he meddled with Him. A woman who could have so acted and spoken was not indeed far from the Kingdom of Heaven. Of her Jesus Himself might have said what He actually said of a countryman of hers, that He had not found such faith, no, not in Israel. We cannot believe that such a woman relapsed into the moral death of Paganism, or even remained in the living stagnation of Judaism. Rather do we sympathise with the Greek Church, which has always considered her to be a Christian saint. Perhaps in the case of one whose nature seems to have been so generous, the sorrowful and unjust fate of Jesus may have removed all her previous hesitation to become His follower, and precipitated a decision which in other circumstances might have been of slower growth. Who knows, though the Scriptures are silent on the subject, but she may have been with the women who stood afar off beholding the crucifixion of Jesus to the last, with hearts beating in tenderest sympathy for Him? for a woman like her would not be satisfied till she had seen the end of a tragedy in which she was so profoundly interested. Who knows but she may have been among the noble women who came nearer and—according to the custom among the wealthy ladies of Jerusalem to provide a soothing opiate at their own expense for the benefit of those who were crucified—compassionately offered to Him the wine mingled with myrrh to stupefy His senses, which he would not receive because He wished to look death in the face till the last? And may we not suppose that the unexampled portents of the Crucifixion, and the extraordinary events of the Resurrection, and of the outpouring of the Spirit at Pentecost, with which all the land was ringing, completed in her soul the conviction produced by her dream, that Jesus was all that He claimed to be—not only a just man, but her Lord and her God?

And what an admirable Christian she would make! Her picture is photographed in miniature in a single verse of Scripture by a single ray of light; but what captivating traits of natural character does it reveal! Devotion to her husband, tenderness of sympathy for the suffering, fearlessness in standing up for the truth, and boldness in confessing her faith. The grace of God consecrating and perfecting the beautiful moral portraiture would have achieved one of its greatest triumphs, and enlisted in the service of Christianity one of its noblest supporters. She suffered many things because of Christ. The sword that pierced Jesus pierced through her heart, as it pierced through the heart of her who gave Him birth, and as it pierces through the heart of everyone who takes up the cross and follows Him. And was this fellowship of His sufferings fruitless? Is it not easy to believe that she was a companion in the Kingdom and patience of Jesus Christ; that suffering with Him she reigned with Him? And thus while her poor weak Pagan husband, disobedient to the light that was in him, fell into political disaster, was recalled from the Judean governorship which he had disgraced by the perversion of justice, and finally died a suicide's dishonoured death in some obscure place of foreign banishment, his noble wife lived and died a fellow-citizen of the saints and of the household of faith.

We may regard Claudia Procula, Pilate's wife, as the pioneer of the remarkable band of Roman ladies who did such signal service to the cause of religion in the earliest years of the Christian Church. Descendants of the oldest patrician families which founded Rome, which had governed her during all her period of splendour and liberty, and which had enabled her to conquer the world, these ladies became in the end the humblest and most devoted servants in the Kingdom of Christ. It is most interesting to think that the last daughters of the Scipios and the Fabii—among the greatest names in Roman history—should have become followers of the meek and lowly Jesus, and thus crowned the long history of their illustrious race with its greatest glory; the star of their earthly splendour fading into the everlasting day of heaven. In those dim dawning years, when the might and the intelligence of the world were against Christianity, not many wise after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble, were called; but there were a few, and these few were the noblest of all. If they had much to leave for Christ, they glorified Him much. And we must never forget that it is to one who bore the same patrician name as that of Pilate's wife—Claudia, the wife of Pudens, mentioned by Paul in his Epistle to Timothy, who is supposed to have been a British princess, the protégée of Pomponia, the Christian wife of Aulus Plautius, the Roman commander of Britain—that we can trace the introduction of Christianity into our country, ages before the famous landing of St. Augustine and his monks on the shores of Kent.

The lessons which such an incident as that connected with Pilate's wife teaches us are manifold. Though much that I have brought forward concerning this remarkable personage is only conjectural—the conjectures, however, being based upon a strong foundation of probability—yet much is plainly revealed and obvious. She gave her testimony regarding Jesus openly and fearlessly, when there was no one to uphold her and all the world was against her. If there was nothing else true regarding her but that, that one thing has a moral worth which is simply inestimable. Persons of such a strain, be they men or women, are by native right the leaders of the great host of God, and their example inspires others to do and dare the right. There is nothing more striking in connection with the last scenes in the life of our Lord than the devotion of women. It stands out in marked contrast to the cowardice and cruelty of men. If the sin of the world came through the temptation of woman, women nobly redeemed their character in connection with the redemption of the Cross. How the Saviour honoured women throughout His life! And how they strove to repay Him by their love and service! They ministered to Him of their substance; they confessed Him when there was none else to stand by Him; they wept and bewailed Him as pitiless men led Him through the streets to His execution; they were last at His cross and first at His sepulchre. In these days of scientific scepticism and materialism, we sometimes hear it said with a sneer that only women believe in the Christian creed. But this, so far from being a proof of its unreality, is the highest evidence of its power. Would that women everywhere knew and exercised the vast influence which their Christian faith gives them! In the days of chivalry, the armour of the knight was buckled on by his lady's hand; and this, as Ruskin finely says, was "no mere caprice of romantic fashion, but the type of an eternal truth—that the soul's armour is never well set to the heart unless a woman's hand has braced it; and it is only when she braces it loosely that the honour of manhood falls." Christian wives, seek to win your husbands to Christ when they behold your chaste conversation, coupled with fear! Daughters and sisters, make your fathers and brothers strong and faithful to confess Christ by the witness-bearing of your own devoted lives! And let each of us, men and women alike, do what we can to save by the grace of God those whom we love and can influence from the guilt of crucifying the Lord of Glory afresh, and from that sin that hath never forgiveness, either in this world, or in that which is to come.

CHAPTER V.—MICHAEL GRIERSON'S QUIXOTIC CRAZE.

THEKLA'S own life was very pleasant during these stormy days. She loved to help people, and all her days were spent in acts of thoughtful kindness. She delighted in being liked, and she was a universal favourite. Everybody praised her, and laughed kindly at her, and quoted her. Little Miss Ellerslie's last amusing speech would always be going the round of the ship. Even the grim old general, the most distinguished and the least approachable person on board, took friendly notice of Thekla.

The blue Mediterranean, meanwhile, gave the Amazon no rest. There were fine seas and invigorating breezes, and glorious sunset skies; but day and night the wearisome pitching and tossing continued.

It was early on a morning which followed a stormy night that the worn-out passengers were aware of a delightful change. They were in smooth seas, the keel of the ship was level, and the screw, which all night had been racing mercilessly, had resumed its regular vibrations. One or two—and Thekla was amongst their number—to whom the storm-music of these rough nights had been nothing worse than a lullaby, were awoke by the sudden stillness; and when they looked out they saw a beautiful still sea outspread under a sky of radiant blue, and the cream-coloured stone of the fortifications and churches and houses of what looked, from this distance, like a dream-city, rising from the sea-board, and repeated in soft reflections of gold and sapphire upon the shining waters of a wide and lovely bay.

It was Valetta, the chief city of Malta. They dropped anchor about half an hour before breakfast, and the decks were immediately converted into curiosity marts, and all the little world of the Amazon—their troubles vanished with the darkness—came crowding out to bargain with the dealers in curiosities, and to make arrangements for the day. Lady Lucy and her little circle—the Ellerslies, Ronald Hinton, Wilkinson, and Isaacson, who had become Sir Richard's shadow, were together as usual. Isaacson asked to join Sir Richard's party, if no one objected. Thekla did object; but not venturing to say so, looked pleadingly at Lady Lucy, who said she wanted a companion, and begged Sir Richard to lend her Thekla for the day.

"Certainly," he said courteously. "We shall be a party of—let me see——"

"Four, if I may join you," said Hinton eagerly.

"Of course you may," said Marion, with her most winning smile. "Father wants taking care of as much as I do, and Mr. Isaacson's head is always in the clouds."

"And who will take care of us?" said Lady Lucy.

"I will, I will!" cried Wilkinson, pressing forward. "If," despondently, "I'll do."

"Oh yes, you will do.—He is a good boy generally, isn't he, Thekla?—Now, where, I wonder, is Mr. Grierson?"

Thekla had been wondering too, for Michael was generally out first in the morning.

"Here is the doctor: he will tell us," she said.—"Doctor, have you seen Mr. Grierson this morning?"

The doctor had on his grimmest expression, and it was only a great desire for information that would have induced anyone to speak to him.

"Yes," he answered shortly, "I have seen him."

"Well," said Lady Lucy, "and did he tell you what he was going to do?"

"I told him. He is to keep as quiet as he can all day."

"Is he ill?" said Thekla, turning pale.

"He is very much upset; and no wonder."

"What has he been doing?" said Lady Lucy.

"Oh, nothing either extraordinary or new. Poor Murchison was troublesome, and he spent the greater part of the night walking up and down the decks with him. It was bitterly cold, and a cough which I hoped he had left in England has come back."

"What was the matter with Mr. Murchison?" asked Lady Lucy.

"The ordinary thing; only he was a little worse than usual. He threatened to jump overboard. I believe if it hadn't been for Mr. Grierson, we should have seen the last of him in the night."

"Of Mr. Murchison? How terrible! Why?" cried Thekla, who had been listening with pallid cheeks and dilated eyes.

"Because he is a fool. Excuse me, Lady Lucy. I am afraid I have too little sympathy for people of that type. I maintain that a man ought to have backbone enough to bear his calamities, and not make other people's lives a burden to them because he happens to be miserable. Can you guess what our Quixotic friend Michael has done?"

"No; tell me. I believe him capable of anything heroic."

"This is heroic, if ever anything was. He has had the unfortunate fellow transferred to his cabin, paying the extra passage-money himself. He says he believes he can save him. Imagine! a man whose restlessness passes belief! I couldn't live with him for a day."

"And Michael is one of the most sensitive of men. How fine of him!" said Lady Lucy, her eyes glistening.

"I only hope a few more of the first saloon passengers will be of your opinion," said the doctor. "But I have my doubts. Well, I mustn't stand talking; I have work to do."

The day on shore was pleasant, although to Thekla a cloud was thrown over it by the absence of Michael Grierson, and the vague terrible hints which the doctor had thrown out about her friend Murchison. Over and over again they came back to her like the pricking of a pin. Could anyone—anyone in all the world—be so unhappy as to wish to die? The thought made her shudder. And if he had—if no one had been near him when the mad fit came—if last night he had leaped into the dark and stormy sea, what then?

It was almost too terrible to think of, and she tried not to think.

There was enough of novelty and movement about her to divert her thoughts, for the sun was shining and the sky was blue, and the gay island-city was at its best. The long flight of steps that led from the shores of the harbour to the town, and the steep narrow streets which seemed to be slanting right up into the radiant blue atmosphere, and the carved stone balconies and oriel windows, whence dark-eyed Maltese beauties looked down upon them, and the pretty Strada Reale lined with shops, where lace and jewellery, and fine Oriental stuffs were spread out for sale, and the little piazza in the heart of the town, thronged with travellers, and guides, and touters of every description, and Maltese citizens who came and went up and down the wide steps of the Church of the Knights—the men in crimson caps and sashes, and the women in black silk hoods, swollen out behind them with the wind—all these things delighted the young travellers, and they in their frankly expressed pleasure were enchanting to Lady Lucy.

Exploring, and shopping, and driving out into the arid sun-burnt country that lies outside the town, took them all the forenoon. They went then to the hotel where they had agreed to lunch and rest. Marion was there before them. They found her in the hotel drawing-room, looking pretty and radiant, and surrounded with parcels. "Oh dear!" she cried, "what a delightful place this is! Such shops! We have been going in and out of them all the morning."

While Lady Lucy, who was thirsting for news, seized eagerly upon an English paper, she began to open out her treasures. "See! I have Maltese lace enough to last me all my life. A flounce: isn't that a good pattern? and a shawl, and several scarves. And look at these ornaments! Dear old dad would get them. I told him he was very extravagant. And there are some pretty Oriental stuff. they will help to furnish our rooms in India."

Thekla expressed her admiration warmly, whereupon Marion said, with a meaning smile, "The best shall come last. I have something for you."

"From father?" said Thekla, the happy colour flooding her face.

"No, not from father. There!" opening a casket, and showing an exquisitely wrought necklace and pendant of gold filigree-work.

"How lovely!" cried Thekla. "Did you buy this for me? Oh, Marion!"

"I? Why, you silly little goose, don't you know I have no money? It was from—can't you guess?—someone who likes you very much."

"It was for you, Marion, not for me. Please keep it," said Thekla, all her pleasure in the pretty trinket gone.

"I keep it, when it was given to you? What nonsense!"

"But I dislike him, and how can I take his presents?"

"I advise you not to let father hear you say that."

"He gave it to father, and father gives it to me?"

"If you like to have it so! It doesn't really make any difference. He has given me several things, and I wasn't so silly as to make a fuss."

"Must I thank him?" said Thekla, holding the obnoxious present doubtfully.

"Not unless you like; father and I can manage that. Ah! there they are—come to tell us lunch is ready. Pray don't behave like a school-girl, Thekla," said Marion in a low voice.

The poor girl had the casket in her hand. Isaacson, who followed Sir Richard into the room, saw her holding it, and looked at her with a benevolent smile.

"It's only a trifle," he said jauntily; "but your father thought you'd like it, and I didn't like the idea of your being out of everything."

"It was very kind of father to think of me," said Thekla, and once more she looked up at him.

There was something new in the eyes—something that interested and puzzled him. "I rather think she has a spice of temper," he said to himself later. "It would be funny if she tried to defy us. Two or three can play at that game, my pretty little Thekla. I wonder if you would be surprised to hear that I like you all the better for those flaming eyes? They are magnificent—there's no question of that."

What would have surprised him, had he known it, was that Thekla did not consider for one solitary moment whether he liked her better or worse. She took her golden gift, and she thrust it deep down in her box beside a certain sealed-up packet, of whose existence no one knew but herself and one other, and in a very short time she forgot that she possessed it.

They left Malta in the evening. Early on the following morning, when Thekla ran up to the hurricane-deck to see where they were, she found one of the two of whom she had been thinking so pitifully.

"Oh! Mr. Grierson," she cried, holding out her hand with frank delight, "how glad I am to see you out!"

"Thank you," he said; "and I am glad to be out again. I wanted to go on shore with you yesterday, but Dr. Murray forbade it. You enjoyed the excursion?"

"Yes, I enjoyed it. But it would have been pleasanter if you and Mr. Murchison had been with us. I was so sorry, so very sorry, to hear such a bad account of him. How is he to-day?"

"I left him asleep. But I think he will be better now, and a day like this will do us all good."

"It is delightful," said Thekla fervently. For all the wind had gone, and the air was balmy, and the sea, flattened down to a perfect level, looked like shining oil, soft and wonderful, with opaline reflections where the sunlight smote it, and, under the shadow of the ship, of a dark crystalline blue.

"It is like Coleridge's 'painted ocean,'" said Michael.

"And there—there is the enchanted ship!" cried Thekla, pointing to where a little brigantine lay idly, her sails flapping against the masts, and her black hull reflected in the mirror-like sea. They talked about the sea and its wonders, and the progress they were making, and how they would touch soon upon the coasts of Egypt, which to Thekla was a treasure-house of wonders; and presently, when she had exhausted all her questions, Michael led back the conversation to Murchison, for whom, he said, he wished to enlist her sympathy.

"He has it already," said Thekla. "We have had several talks—he and I, and little Mabel Andrews. The child loves him. He lifts her up to stroke Prince, and you should hear how nicely he talks to her. Oh! Mr. Grierson," her eyes filling with tears, "is there something really wrong about him?"

"You shall hear his story, and then you shall judge," said Michael. "His father was a man of property, who wished him to take up a profession. But he had no literary tastes, and with the view of giving him something to do, his father started him on the Stock Exchange. He was never strong-minded, and the lust for gain seized him. He speculated, and was successful. With golden visions before him, he plunged in again, and again he won. Then he became connected with a well-known and extraordinarily successful financial firm, and he lost. How it came about even he does not seem to know; but they went on winning fortune and honour, while he lost his money, and his credit too. His father stepped in to save him, lost all he possessed, and died of misery. His mother soon followed, and now he is on his way out to India as clerk to a commercial firm."

"What a sad, sad story! No wonder he is unhappy," said Thekla.

"Yes; but unhappily he has been trying to drown his sorrows in a very ignoble way. Once or twice lately he has been unruly, and frightened the people at the other end. He is painfully sensitive, poor fellow, and their remarks when he was in his sane senses have nearly maddened him. I saw things were going from bad to worse, so I persuaded the purser and doctor to transfer him to the first saloon. I know I am risking something," said Michael, with a smile; "but if I can persuade one or two of my friends to be tolerant for a few days of any little eccentricities, and not to shun him, I think we may bring him round to more healthy views. You will help me, I know!"

"Oh! yes, yes; he is my friend already, and there will be others," cried Thekla. "Lady Lucy for one, and Mr. Wilkinson: he is quite young, and he has such nice ideas about being chivalrous and that kind of thing; and I will speak to Marion and father; and Lady Lucy, you know, can make the girls do whatever she likes."

"Thank you, thank you," said Michael warmly. "It is very good of you to take so much interest in us. Do you know, I think we shall be quite strong enough to live down opposition?"

"And I am sure of it," said Thekla.

At this moment, when her cheeks were glowing and her eyes were dancing with excitement—she felt it delightful beyond expression that Michael, her wise man, should ask her for advice and help—she saw Murchison coming up the ladder. The poor fellow, being very well aware of the talk there had been concerning him the day before, and conscious too that he had only himself to blame for it, felt like a child in disgrace that morning; and when he caught sight of Thekla, looking so radiant and happy, though he wished very much to speak to her, he made only a slight salutation, and was passing on to the other end of the deck.

"'Here is Lady Lucy back.'"—p. 103.

But Thekla would not have it so. Blushing in the prettiest way, she darted forward to meet him. "Are you going to see Prince?" she said; "and if so, may I go with you? Mabel and I have been looking for you these two or three days."

"Have you, really? How stupid of me not to have been in the way!" said Murchison. The colour had risen to his pale face, and his eyes had brightened.

and he looked twice the man he had done when he first came out. "And how is my little friend Mabel?" he asked, as the three of them walked together to the poop-deck.

"Ah! poor little Mabel! She was miserable yesterday because her people would not take her on shore, and almost all of her friends had gone. There was such a crying-fit when I left."

"Now, if I had only known!" said Murchison. "I was on board all day long. But I shall see more of her after this, for I am coming to your end of the ship."

"Are you? I am so glad," said Thekla heartily. "Where will you sit at table?"

"Not near you, I am afraid. On the other side."

"Where the doctor and Mr. Grierson and Mr. Isaacson sit?" said Thekla.

"Isaacson?" he echoed.

"Do you know him?"

"I knew one man of the name of Isaacson," said Murchison, his face changing curiously; "but it can't be the same. No, of course. The name is not uncommon."

"It would be curious if it were the same," said Thekla. They were standing under Prince's box, and he was craning his beautiful neck forward to be caressed. "Did you like him—your Isaacson, I mean?"

The question was put carelessly, asked more for something to say than for any other reason, and no sooner were the words out of her lips than she regretted them, for all in a moment the dark colour leapt to his face. "Like him!" he said, in a voice deep with passion. "I hate him! He is my enemy—the cause of my ruin. But for him and his false friendship I should not be as I am now. If that man were on board——"

"Peace!" said Grierson, putting his hand on the excited man's arm. "You are frightening her."

"No, no; only I am sorry I asked. It was a silly question," said Thekla.

"It is I who was silly—silly and wicked!" cried poor Murchison, in his exaggerated way. "I beg your pardon a hundred thousand times."

She assured him that it did not matter in the least, and having talked for a few moments about Prince and his groom, and the ship and the weather, they went back to the saloon for breakfast.

It was as the doctor and Lady Lucy had feared it would be. Considerable annoyance was expressed amongst the first-class passengers when Grierson's proceeding became known, and at the breakfast-table that morning an incident happened which strengthened the hands of the hostile party. Murchison and Grierson had been at the table for some time, when Isaacson, who occupied a seat opposite to them, came bustling in. Up to this Murchison had been so quiet and reasonable—he looked, moreover, so refined and gentleman-like—that those about him wondered what the people at the other end could have found to complain of. No sooner, however, did his eyes light upon the rich young man than his face and manner underwent a change. He rose from his seat abruptly, made as if he would have spoken, and then stood silent, his face as pale as death, and his lips and nostrils quivering. It passed in a moment; but it created a sensation. A tremor of excitement passed through the company, and the sensation-lovers made up their minds to a scene which would give them food for indignant comment for the whole voyage. They were disappointed. The words which were trembling to the lips of the excited man never came. Grierson looked at him, and he left the saloon quietly.

Slight and unsatisfactory as the incident was, it gave food for clamour. Isaacson was particularly indignant. He complained loudly about a madman being brought on board: said that if any mischief were done he would hold the Company responsible, and insisted upon the purser giving him another seat at table.

Several of the passengers backed him up; and disputes about Murchison ran so high that it required all Lady Lucy's tact and talent to set her entertainment going. She triumphed, however. On the second evening after they left Malta the Amazon season opened with a concert, which everyone said went off brilliantly. Lady Lucy and Thekla sang together, and were applauded to the echo; Marion evoked the warmest enthusiasm by her graceful rendering of some Spanish love-songs to the guitar, Wilkinson sang a melancholy song to the banjo, provoking uproarious laughter, two of the girls played a duet, and another a brilliant fantasia, and there were merry choruses, in which everyone joined. But the "hit" of the evening was the performance that cost Lady Lucy the greatest trouble to fit in—Michael Grierson's recitation. What he gave was perfectly simple: only a ballad of human love and sorrow, and the faith that conquers death. Yet there were few present who did not feel their cheeks turn pale and their hearts throb more quickly as they listened to it, while there was one little girl who was fain to hide her face in her hands and weep. Michael was triumphant that evening. The ship forgave him even for his late Quixotic craze, and to Thekla he was more of a hero than ever.

The Amazon now became a very sociable little world. Friendships progressed, and love-makings went swiftly forward, and needlework, and books, and games were brought out and everyone settled down as if the voyage were to last for years instead of days. There were one or two who wished it might. Of course they were lovers; no one else could form such extravagant desires. That they should, one cannot wonder, for if they live a hundred years, life, it is certain, will bring them nothing sweeter than these sweet love-poems of the sea. They are so delightful and entrancing that we need not be surprised to find the real sometimes simulated by the false: young people who wish to be in love fancying that they are, when actually they are only following the example of others and obeying the gentle influence of the time. So it was with Marion; but Ronald Hinton was in deep, dead earnest. He had not much fear for the result of his wooing, for Marion, who was, he felt sure, the frankest, as well as the sweetest girl in the world, had shown him in a thousand little ways that she preferred him to others; Sir Richard was friendly, and that charming child Thekla was, he very well knew, only longing for the time when she could openly call him brother. Ronald, too, was perfectly well aware of his own advantages. And yet the days drifted on, and the momentous question remained unspoken.

In the meantime, it happened on the voyage as in the world. His love, absorbing as it was, did not occupy the whole of his time and thoughts. An amusement committee had been formed, and he was its most active member. He beat up musical recruits, discovered dormant talent, wrote out florid notices, devised attractive programmes for entertainments, and was the heart and soul of the athletic sports. A contest took place on the afternoon before the ship touched at Port Said, in which he won distinction. The artful youth would go in for nothing that could have shown him in a ridiculous light. The greased planks, drenching buckets, and dusty wind-sails of the obstacle race he left to meaner mortals; and he would neither run as a wheelbarrow, nor hop in a sack, nor chalk the cock's eye, nor sling the monkey. But he leapt and ran and threw with grace and success, looking so brave, handsome, and happy that everyone applauded him; and when, as would happen now and then, he caught the dark eyes of Marion Ellerslie, full of a dreamy speculativeness that made them more beautiful than ever, fixed upon him, his colour would rise, and his own eyes would shine with a wonderful lustre, and he would look so much the finest fellow there that Marion would sigh to herself the pity it was that he could not be as rich as he was handsome.

The sports were memorable to others besides Hinton. Murchison, who was by this time tolerated, if not liked, by all but Isaacson, had been persuaded to take part in them. He was light and active, and chiefly for Thekla's sake—she was watching him with vivid interest—he threw himself into them heart and soul, and he acquitted himself creditably, coming in a good second in the obstacle race, while in the steeple-chase, which he ran with marvellous ease and neatness, he distanced all competitors. The applause when he came in was deafening, and none cheered him more heartily than Thekla and his little favourite, Queen Mab.

All the same, the exertion was too great for him. Although he did not complain, seeming happier and livelier indeed than ever before, there was a wanness, a spirituality, about his face that touched many to sad forebodings.

To the inexperienced, meanwhile, the voyage had become more interesting than ever, for they were nearing the East — the land of story, the home of mystery.

It was on the evening after the sports that Thekla saw for the first time that soft rose-lilac glow which, when the sun has gone, makes the skies of Egypt for a few moments so entrancingly lovely.

She was standing on the hurricane-deck, talking to Michael Grierson. Down below, dinner was in full swing; but finding it long, she had fallen into the habit of slipping in late, and Grierson was never in with the first course.

"How lovely!" she said, looking up. "What is it?"

"It is the light of the East," said Michael.

She turned and looked at him, and her eyes, full of ardent interest, seemed to draw out his words.

"I can sympathise with you," he said, in a low voice. "It is a strange moment. You are on the threshold of a new world. The world of the East, great, mysterious, dark, unfathomable, is opening out before you. It is like the ocean. We come and we go: we float upon its surface: we are superior, patronising, benevolent—this to-day, that to-morrow; but what do we know of that which lies below the surface? So with the nations of the East. While we come and go, they go on—generations arriving, generations departing—the same, always the same! It is almost terrible to me sometimes, this changelessness. And yet, how strange the contrast is! The highest and grandest thoughts which have ever come to humanity have come to us from the East. It was in the deserts of Arabia, it was on the shores of the Galilean Sea, that the truths which lie at the root of all our Western culture were given to the world."

He paused, and Thekla said timidly, "We have had the light from them. Can we not take it back?"

"We can—we must—we will," said Michael.

Like a prayer his strong words fell upon the silence. Then the young girl looked up, and saw that the rose-purple glow was fading, while, like glittering spear-points twinkling faintly from the zenith, the shining suns of space looked down upon them.

CHAPTER VI.—THEKLA RECEIVES A WARNING.

THEY reached Port Said, that strange little town between desert and sea, late in the evening. Thekla was extraordinarily excited. This was the meeting-place of the nations; these were the portals of the Eastern world. She got away by herself to watch its approach, and saw a wonderful sight. Strange at any time is the narrow sea-highway where East and West touch; but, in the darkness of a moonless night it is fantastic beyond expression. The waters, black as pitch under the vast hulls of the ships that lie crowded in their narrow space, and quick elsewhere with a myriad reflections; the lights—a whole host of them—from the houses and restaurants that line the low shore, from tiers of yellow portholes, from the swinging mastheads of steamers, that, with their white and crimson radiance, seem to pierce the ebon shadows of the upper air, and from the black coal-barges, manned by dusky Egyptians, who, in the fierce flame that beats upon them from flaring torches, bring to one's mind vague memories of classic myths—of Pluto and his servants ferrying the dead over nameless rivers in Hades; the noises—orders shouted, warning cries, wild singing, ringing of steamer-bells, and chattering in harsh, unknown tongues—these and everything else are strange, suggestive of mystery. Thekla finds herself repeating Michael Grierson's words—

"The East—great, mysterious, dark, unfathomable."

She is not allowed to indulge in dreams, for here is Wilkinson at her elbow, talking fast and excitedly.

"You'll come with Lady Lucy, won't you? I am going, and so is Mr. Grierson."

"Where is Lady Lucy?" says Thekla.

"Miss Thekla"—this is in another voice—"Sir Richard has sent me to find you."

"Tell him——" begins Wilkinson.

Isaacson cuts him short. "I believe he wishes particularly to see you."

"Oh! I'll go at once. Ask Lady Lucy to wait for me.—Where is father, Mr. Isaacson?"

"On the main-deck. Take my arm—won't you?"

"No, thank you. I prefer to walk alone."

Sir Richard is standing near the gangway, about to step into a boat. Marion and Hinton are with him. "Come along, Thekla," he says, in an impatient, irritated voice. "What upon earth have you been doing?"

"Mayn't I wait for Lady Lucy, father?"

"Certainly not. We are going to spend the whole evening on shore, and come back late. In with you!"

"Mightn't I just tell them, father? They may be waiting."

"And keep me waiting another half-hour! Most decidedly not."

"We must all obey orders, you know," says the voice that Thekla dislikes. It makes her feel desperately inclined to rebel; but she conquers herself, and in the next instant she is in the long rowing-boat, crossing the short interval that separates them from the shore, and looking back with regret at the ship.

The evening proved as dreary as she had anticipated. Port Said was far more romantic at a distance than close at hand; and Isaacson, who kept by her side during their walk through the little sandy roads flanked with lighted shops and restaurants, and who sat near her in the café chantant into which they turned for lack of something better to do, irritated her more than ever by his manner and style of talk. For the vexing part of it was that no silence of hers made any difference to him. He never once seemed to doubt his power of amusing her. His self-satisfied smile, his bland expression, the little chuckle with which he would emphasise his wit, and his peals of noisy laughter after some ton-weight jest, made her nearly wild.

She was glad, however, that she had succeeded in being comparatively complaisant when she found that she had pleased her father. He took her for a walk up and down the deck that night, and his manner was so kind that she felt a new love for him springing up in her heart. This little girl had a passion for being loved which had never been adequately gratified.

A curious little incident, which she did not think much of at the time, happened to her that evening. Murchison, who had looked paler and more shadowy than ever since the sports, had been hanging about her in rather a perplexing way all day. Two or three times she thought he had something to say to her, but when she gave him the opportunity of speaking he said nothing of any moment. When she went down to the saloon, which was emp y but for this one figure, she found him close to the passage that led to her cabin. She was passing him with a good-night, when he stopped her. "Miss Ellerslie," he said abruptly, "I want to speak to you."

"Well," she answered, smiling, "what is it?"

He paused for fully five seconds, began to speak, broke off, and then saying brokenly, "I can't to-night; it might spoil your rest," turned and left her.

This was curious and embarrassing, and Thekla began to fear that the poor fellow's brain was affected by his misfortunes. Certainly there could be nothing else.

She went on into her cabin, where further perplexities awaited her. Marion, who was lying alone in her berth, having dismissed Janet for the night, reproved her sharply for being so late.

"I have been walking up and down with father," said Thekla indignantly. "Ask him, and he will tell you."

"Father would never wish you to neglect me, and I mean to speak to him. You must really be less independent, Thekla—amusing yourself all day long with all sorts of people. They are spoiling you, that is what it is, and you never deign to notice where I am or what I am doing. I am left at the mercy of everyone. It has been nothing but a battle lately to prevent that goose, Ronald Hinton, from proposing to me, and I am becoming tired of it."

Thekla stood open-mouthed. "Why," she cried, as soon as she could command herself, "don't you want him to? I thought you liked him?"

"So I do."

"Then why——?"

"Do not ask me. I do wish you wouldn't look at me so, Thekla. With your sentiment and your innocence, you are enough to send a person wild."

"I am very sorry, Marion"—there were tears in the big grey eyes that welled over slowly as she spoke—"I think you are saying it to tease me."

"Indeed, no. So you thought I meant to marry him, did you?"

"You will if he asks you, surely?"

"That indeed I won't. Marry an Anglo-Indian civilian: nothing but his pay, most likely bury myself in some absurd little station, or wander about with a tent and horse! No, thank you."

"But, Marion," cried Thekla wildly, "he loves you."

"Well, little innocence? I don't suppose I am the first girl he has liked, and I am quite certain I shall not be the last."

"Oh! but I am sure you are wrong. Marion, you couldn't be so unkind. You have made him love you; he thinks you love him. If you draw back now it will break his heart." And here Thekla pulled up, for Marion had turned as red as fire, and there was an angry light in her eyes.

"Go on," she said haughtily. "What more have you to say about my conduct?"

"Darling, I beg your pardon," said poor little Thekla. "I am afraid I don't understand. He is so good and kind and brave. I haven't met anyone nicer in all my life; and he will be so dreadfully miserable. I have seen how sad he looked when you spoke to other people and wouldn't attend to him. Oh! do think better of it."

"I believe you are half in love with him yourself," said Marion; "and as soon as the voyage is over you are welcome to him. You can marry a pleasant and handsome man, if you like. I must marry for riches, or be miserable."

"What do you mean, Marion?"

"Nothing, nothing. You worry me into saying things I hate to say. Now, please don't talk any more. My head is aching so that I can scarcely see out of my eyes."

"Poor darling! I am so sorry. I will fan you, and then you will soon be asleep."

So she sat down and fanned Marion, and in a few moments her eyelids dropped, and then Thekla stooped and kissed her, and thought how pretty she was, and gave a tender regretful thought to poor Ronald, who loved her so—and no wonder!—and said a little prayer by the bed, and went to rest peacefully. Poor little girl! It was the last peaceful night that she would know for some time. But she, happily, could not know this.

She was awake early the next morning by the light of the orange Egyptian dawn, and when she ran up to the hurricane-deck she saw that they were in the narrow riverine road that crosses the desert. It was a delightful morning; the sky high and pale, the sands flushed with a rosy light, and the air that swept them keen and invigorating.

We love the "Earth, fair mother—the sweet, live Earth"—but our love is like that we have for those whom we live with always—a dormant, though ever-present emotion. It needs separation to call out our affection for our own, and it is when we are fresh from the perils and delights of the sea that we realise our deep love for the warm and homely earth. A rapture, such as she had never felt before, was at the heart of this little country maiden that morning. The sight of the earth and the smell of the earth intoxicated her. She longed to leap out of the ship and run along the bank, and bathe her hands, like a child, in the soft clean sands. Everything was novel—everything was enchanting; and yet it was the earth—the dear earth she knew. As, with dancing eyes, she stood gazing out, she saw a long string of camels pacing the sandy shore slowly, each one led by its blue-gowned driver, and they amused her so much that she burst out laughing. They looked, she thought, as if they were trying to be disdainful, and could not quite manage it.

So far, she had the outside world pretty much to herself; but presently she saw little groups of men, barefooted and arrayed in strange, many-coloured garments, gathering on the main-deck; and next came an army of Lascars with streaming hose to wash down the decks. To escape a wetting, Thekla found a quiet corner in front of the chart-room, and gathered herself up upon a bench.

She had scarcely done so before she heard a step behind her. She looked round, expecting to see Mr. Larkin, who often gave her greeting in the morning, and met the wild eye of Murchison. That he should be there was not surprising; but why did he look so? She recalled his words of the evening before, and a vague sense of terror took possession of her. Conquering herself with an effort, she answered his good-morning pleasantly, and made an ordinary remark about the beauty of the day. Then there was a pause. Thekla could not get away, for the decks were streaming with water, and he stood near her like a sentinel, not speaking yet, but looking as if he meant to speak. She felt awkward and uncomfortable. She wished to talk and get rid of her uncomfortable feelings, but she did not know what subject to start; while Murchison, who had worked himself up by uneasy brooding to a passionate excitement that could only find its vent in passionate words, was unfit for ordinary conversation. At last it came, like the first grumbling of a thunderstorm. "Miss Ellerslie, I want to ask you a question."

"Please don't, if it is serious," she said feebly. "Everything is so gay and beautiful this morning. I don't think I could be serious if I tried."

There was a plaintive appealing in her voice that touched him to the heart; but he went on. "Heaven knows," he said wildly, "that I would spare you if I could. But how can I? I put it to yourself. If you saw a friend—one who had been good to you, and whom you loved—standing at the brink of a precipice—if hands—trusted hands—were pushing your friend down—if you saw it—knew it—felt it—what would you do?"

"That is a strange question," said poor little Thekla, her cheek blanching. He was certainly out of his mind. What he said could mean nothing to her. And yet she trembled.

"I entreat you, as you love your own safety and peace, to answer me," he implored.

"But if I don't?" she said, trying to smile.

"I will put it more strongly—if you value your honour."

"What do you mean?" cried the girl, alarmed by his passionate earnestness.

There was a moment's pause. He seemed to be struggling for composure—struggling to say what he had to say calmly; but his feeling was too much for him, and fiercely his words leapt out. "This is what I mean, Thekla Ellerslie. You are in that awful position. At this moment your feet are on the brink of a precipice, and hands that you love and trust are pushing you over—a step, and you will go down into depths which you cannot even imagine."

It was not the words alone—it was the force, the passionate conviction, with which they were thrown out that was terrible. He was mad, of course. There could be no meaning in his wild ravings. And yet, if there were——! As, shivering, she turned away from him, a fear such as she had never known before struck cold at Thekla's heart.

"You turn away from me," went on Murchison. "You think me mad. But believe me, I was never saner than I am at the present moment."

"But how dare you speak to me so?" cried Thekla, her breast heaving with childish sobs. "I in danger, when my father and sister are with me! I know it is not true—it can't be. But I wish you hadn't frightened me so!"

"And I wish with all my soul it had not been forced upon me—I, of all people in the world! I have fought against it. I have said, 'Let someone else speak; she will hate me; and if she hates me, I shall die.' You were the first here to speak to me kindly. Do you remember that day? I was standing beside Prince. You came near me with the pretty child. I looked at you, but I would not speak to you. I knew what they called me on board. I felt myself an outcast. And then you spoke—talked to me as if I were just like others; and the little child trusted me. I saw you again and again, and hope revived in my mind. I said to myself, 'I am not an outcast. I will live like a man.' And then—I could not venture to love you, Thekla Ellerslie," said the poor fellow brokenly; "you were like an angel to me—a white saint; but I felt—ah! how shall I express it, little friend and sister? I would gladly buy your happiness with my life, and how could I grieve or distress you without cause? Listen to me for one more moment. I must say what I have to say now, and then never again, either to you or anyone else, will I mention the subject, for your fate will be in your own hands. The man whom they are forcing upon you——"

"Stop! stop!" cried Thekla passionately. "I will not listen to you."

He looked at her very pitifully.

"Grant that I am wrong, and still listen to me," he said. "I tell you—I who know—that Montague Isaacson is a bad man. He is base: he is cruel: he is selfish. To be allied with him would be degradation. Forgive me; I was bound to tell you this."

"No, you were not," cried Thekla. "What is it to me that he is bad or good? I have nothing to do with him."

"You have received presents from him?"

"I hated them. My father——" and here the poor child stopped, and the red colour flooded her face, and her eyes shone angrily through indignant tears. "What are you making me say? It is all quite natural and right. My father said so. Why do you make things that are natural look dreadful and ugly?"

An expression of bitter pain crossed Murchison's face.

"I may be mistaken," he said; and his low voice, instinct with earnestness, thrilled Thekla to the heart, making her feel for one terrible moment as if everything he had told her were real. "If I am, I beg and entreat you to forgive me. I know, from terrible experience, how we drift into the things that ruin us. With closed eyes and dulled senses we go on, till we awake bound hand and foot to some shameful and miserable fate. This has happened to others. I was afraid it might happen to you. I know now that it will not. Your eyes are open. I have warned you."

"I believe you meant kindly, but you are very, very much mistaken," said Thekla. "And please don't say any more. I know what you mean."

He did not attempt to speak again. He turned away, and left her alone with her sad and troubled thoughts.

What terrible thing was this that she had heard? Her father—but it could not—it should not—be true! The poor fellow meant well, no doubt; but he was a madman. Mr. Grierson, his best friend, had said that his mind was warped by his misfortunes. And yet, it was strange that this idea, of all others, should have come to him. Could it be that there was anything in it? Her limbs trembled so that she could scarcely stand, and her face turned as pale as death. She had left her nook by the chart-room, and she went close to the bulwarks of the ship and leant over, her eyes wandering on and on till they were lost in the boundlessness of the sandy waste. "If I thought so, I would go away. I would lose myself," she said to herself. "It would not be difficult to be lost here."

There was a small black spot in the distance. It grew as they approached it, and she saw that it was an Arab gipsy encampment—a little ragged tent hung on a pole; two or three wild-looking figures squatted in front of it, and in the midst the blue smoke of a fire rising into the air. "It would be better to live so," said the poor child, a wan smile crossing her lips. "Better to die!"

There was movement on the main-deck. Ladies and children in their pretty white dresses, and men in flannels and tweeds, were coming out. The hurricane-deck was a favourite place for observation, and in a few moments she was sure her solitude would be invaded. She made a gallant effort to cast her gloomy thoughts aside. To the rapture of the morning, her childish longing to bathe her hands in the clean warm sands, her vivid interest in the sweet live earth, she could not return just yet. But there were other thoughts. There came to her suddenly something that her friend Michael had said to her in one of their many talks, and she murmured softly, "The secret of a true life is self-giving, and I am thinking only of myself. But," with a little sob, "I will not. I will trust to my Father in heaven, and all will be right for me."

CHAPTER VII.—"RULE BRITANNIA."

LATE that afternoon the Amazon steamed into the silver expanse of water that goes by the name of the Bitter Lake, and took up her berth for the night. There were eight large steamers in, and when they all lit their lamps, throwing so many columns of vivid white flame across the water, while the crimson of a fierce Egyptian sunset, narrowed down to a flame of blood-red low down in the west, made the distant sands look like a pavement of fire, and the zenith grew tremulous with suns and planets and star-dust innumerable, the spectacle from her deck was strange and very beautiful. Most of the passengers, however, could only give it a cursory glance, for they were busy. The prize distribution and grand entertainment, which were to form the great event of the voyage, had been announced for that evening, and there were still many preparations to make. Thekla, as usual, was at the service of everybody, and she was kept so hard at work all day that she had no time to think: which was well for her.

The ship dinner that evening was particularly lively. Most of the men were in evening costume or uniform, and all the ladies were as gaily dressed as the resources of their limited toilettes would allow. Dress has a certain effect upon manners, whatever the serious may say, and it is certain that this evening the gentlemen were more entertaining and the ladies readier to be entertained than usual.

Sir Richard Ellerslie, to please Marion, had put on a Court suit, which became him well. He had been unusually handsome as a young man, and his aristocratic features, his fine figure, and the quiet serenity of his face and manner, made him singularly distinguished still. When, a little later than usual, he took his place at the long table, there was a little repressed buzz of admiration.

As for Thekla, she experienced a curious revulsion of feeling. For the first time in all her life her father's dignity and graciousness awed her. What thoughts she had been having, and how wicked, how shameful, it was of her to have given place to them for a moment! As she looked up at her father, the red colour came tingling to her face, and then it died down, and with a happy smile, which he answered by his most benignant expression—for he liked to be admired, even by his children—she nestled up to him.

"You look lovely, father darling," she whispered—"lovely!"

"Foolish little girl!" he said softly, patting her hand.

That was a happy dinner to Thekla, who, in the casting away of her vague fears and suspicions, felt the world growing beautiful to her once more.

The entertainment was to be held on the main-deck; part of which had been curtained off by a sail from the space about the music-saloon and companions. Mr. Larkin, the first officer, had taken in hand to decorate and light it, and he would admit no one until his own time came. So two of the officers guarded the entrance, while the guests stood grouped in and about the companion, indulging in airy witticisms and criticisms that, weak as many of them were, gave rise to plenty of laughter.

Thekla was in the crowd. As it happened, none of her particular circle were near her. She was thinking of looking for Marion, when she heard a voice behind her. "Miss Thekla!" She started and looked round. "Don't be frightened," said the voice; "it's only me. I wanted to tell you that we're to sit together. Sir Richard asked me to keep seats for him and you."

"Oh, thank you," said Thekla, blushing to the roots of her hair, "I'd rather not. I mean—I have a headache, and I don't think I shall go in."

"Oh, nonsense! that's all gammon! You must, you know," said Isaacson.

"I say, Isaacson," cried a voice from the front. "Come and give a hand, there's a good fellow."

"Coming," he answered; and to Thekla, "Well, we shall meet again presently. I'll keep your seat."

"No, please don't," she said; but he had gone. Her annoyance at his cool appropriation of her was so great that she could have cried; and she went towards the companion-ladder, with the view of keeping out of the way, when Ronald Hinton met her.

"Is anything the matter, little Thekla?" he said kindly.

"Oh no, nothing really; only I don't think I shall go in," said Thekla, trying to fight down her tears.

"Why? Has someone been annoying you?"

"Oh, no, no; they didn't intend to. I mean——"

"I believe it's that popinjay Isaacson again," said Hinton. He had before this noticed and resented the young millionaire's manner to Thekla. "What has he been doing? You may as well tell me, for I shall be sure to find out."

"He said he would keep a seat for me, and when I said I wasn't going, he said I must. You see, it's nothing," said Thekla, "so please don't mind me. I am very silly."

"You are exceedingly sensible, on the contrary, not to like to sit beside that lout. I tell you what"—laughing—"we'll just go in to the prize distribution, and then we'll hide; and after the concert's begun, when he's well wedged in at the front—he'll find a seat exactly under the footlights, of course—you can drop into a chair at the back. How will that do?"

"Delightfully," said Thekla.

At this moment the sail-curtain was lifted, and everyone pressed towards the entrance of the entertainment-room, and exclamations of pleasure and surprise were heard on every side, for the main-deck was so extraordinarily transformed that no one would have known it. Shut in by canvas, which was completely covered with gaily-coloured bunting, and brilliantly lighted with Japanese lanterns and electric lights, it made as fine a concert-room as anyone could have wished.

The little improvised platform, where the singers were to stand, was at the stern. The seats of the audience were piled up round the canvas walls, for the most important part of the proceedings—the distribution of prizes—was to precede the entertainment.

"We'll stand here, out of the way," whispered Hinton to Thekla. "The chief is keeping Isaacson busy."

"Where is Lady Lucy, I wonder?" said Thekla. "She was to give away the prizes."

"I think the chief has a little mystification on foot," said Hinton. "Ah! I thought so. Come this way; you will see them better."

"Who? who?" cried Thekla. "Why, here they come! What fun!"

At a signal from the chief, "Rule Britannia" had been struck up on the piano, and as everyone present shouted the song, the screen of sail was lifted again, and a number of Lascars, guided by two or three officers, drew in a car, on which, in a nest of cushions, Lady Lucy, dressed as Britannia, and Marion, in a pretty costume of ship's flags, as Amazonia, were seated. Very few were in the secret, which had originated with the first officer, and the strains of "Rule Britannia" were merged in deafening cheers, while the two ladies passed, smiling, through the little crowd of their friends and shipmates. Then the car was drawn up into a commanding position, pretty Amazonia descended gracefully, and Britannia proceeded to give away the prizes that had been won in the athletic contests.

Several names were shouted in succession, their owners coming forward to receive their reward.

"Mr. Murchison won something," whispered Thekla. "Have you seen him?"

"No: I don't think he is here."

"Ah! that is his name, and Mr. Grierson is answering for him. I hope he is not ill," said Thekla.

"Probably he didn't want to come up. Murchison is a queer fellow," said Hinton. "But they are putting up the seats. If we want to escape, now is our time."

"I am ready," said Thekla. "Come!"

When, a few minutes later, Isaacson, who had been making himself busy, looked round to find Thekla, that he might place her in the seat he had secured for her, he found that she had gone.

He supposed that she had executed her threat of staying down below, and he spoke of it with some annoyance to her father. "I don't think myself that she was the least ill," he said; "she took offence about something."

"Offence? Impossible, my dear fellow!" said Sir Richard blandly. "It's not the child's way: and with you, of all people! It would be absurd—so good-natured and kind as you always are to her."

"Well, now, I really do believe I am. I have never taken so much trouble about anyone before: and she isn't the least grateful to me."

"Oh! but she will be. Just you wait a while. Come and see us in India, after she has mixed for a few months in society; she will appreciate you then."

"Will she?" said Isaacson bluntly. "Well, we'll see about that."

"Yes, yes; you are both young," said Sir Richard hurriedly.

On the upper-deck, meanwhile, "away from the madding crowd," Thekla and Hinton were pacing up and down together. He was speaking; she was listening. It was a sad tale he had to tell. He was pouring it out, poor youth, in the hope of receiving comfort, and Thekla's heart was heavy because she had no comfort to give. Ah! how sorry she felt for him! His voice, so sad and tender, penetrated to her very soul. Had he ever spoken to Marion so, and, if he had, could she—could she be cruel still? At this moment Thekla thought that she would have died rather than have given such bitter pain to one like Ronald.

"I am all astray," he said, "and that is why I come to you for advice. Yesterday, at Port Said, it seemed all right between us. To-day she has changed. I am not a lady's man, I know," said the big young fellow humbly. "I've had so many other things to attend to all my life; and perhaps I have offended her in some way. We men are so rough and stupid, and girls have such delicate fancies. If you could just tell me a little what she likes and what she dislikes—give me a few hints, you know—I should bless you all my life."

Poor little Thekla! Tell him what Marion liked and disliked! Give him hints! How could she? Did ever any man ask such unreasonable questions before? In her helplessness and pity she began to cry, which alarmed Hinton dreadfully.

"My poor dear child," he said, "have I vexed you? I am very sorry to have troubled you so."

"Oh! but it isn't trouble," she interrupted. "It is that I don't know how to help you."

"Well, never mind. Try and forget that I ever spoke to you about it. Things generally come right in the end, don't they?"

"But that's not much help when they are going wrong, and the end is a long way off," said Thekla, trying to smile.

"Nearer than some of us think," said Ronald; and then abruptly, "Come down and listen to the singing."

"Yes," she said, but paused for a moment to look at a group at the further end of the deck. "Is that the doctor?" she said. "What is he doing?"

"Bringing up an invalid for air, I suppose. Never mind them," said Hinton.

The entertainment was in full fling when they went down. It began with wax-works, which were exceedingly amusing, and caused plenty of laughter and cheering; and between the exhibition of the groups there were songs and recitations. Most of the audience were seated close in front of the stage; but some were in the background. Amongst these sat Lady Lucy and the General. They saw Thekla and Hinton, and Lady Lucy took them to task smilingly for their disappearance.

"I suppose you have been star-gazing?" she said.

"Yes," answered Ronald. "It is grand up there to-night."

"Did you chance to come across Mr. Grierson?"

"No; isn't he in the audience?"

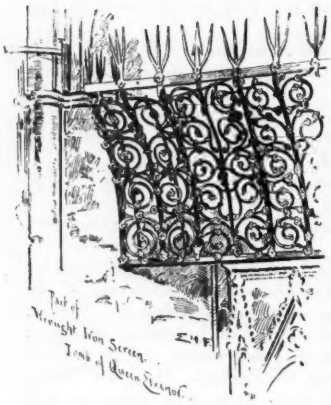
"I believe not. I have seen nothing of him since the prize distribution, which makes me fear that poor Murchison is very ill. I think I shall go and inquire. Take care of the General till I come back, Thekla."

"With the greatest pleasure," said Thekla.

This was in one of the long intervals between the pieces. Isaacson, bound on a search for Thekla, saw her, and came up to them.

"Why did you run away from me?" he said reproachfully. "I have kept such a good seat for you up there. Come now!"

"I beg your pardon, sir. Miss Ellerslie has promised me the pleasure of her society for the next half-hour," said the General.



"Thank you," whispered Thekla, as Isaacson, who stood in considerable awe of the General, moved away. "I did not want to sit near him."

"I thought so," said the General grimly. "That young man may have all the treasures of Golconda, but he is in uncommonly bad style, and I don't wonder at a nice girl objecting to him. I shouldn't mind taking him down a peg or two; so if he worries you, just you let me know.—But, dear me! here is Lady Lucy back, and she looks as if something serious has happened.—My dear friend, is anything wrong? Can I help you?"

"No, thank you," said Lady Lucy. "I don't think there is anything to be done. I want Thekla for a few moments. Excuse us, General; you shall hear what it is all about presently."

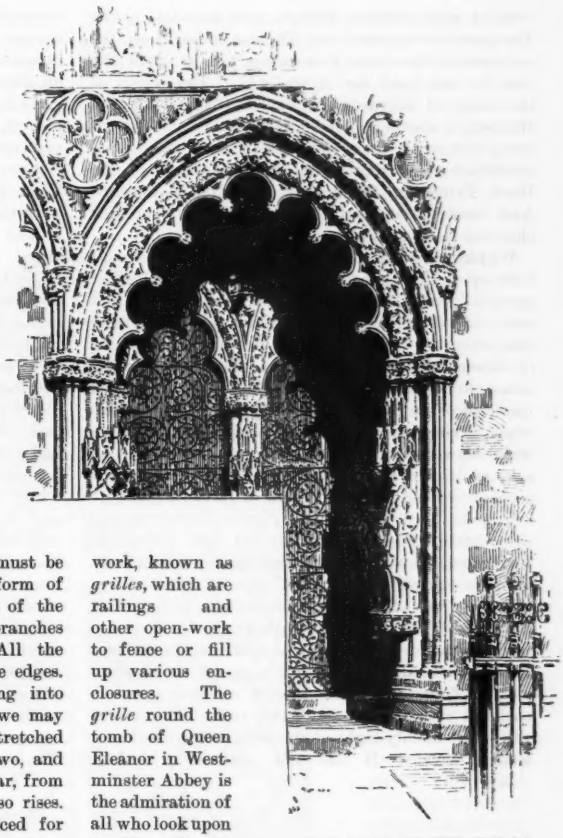
ANCIENT CHURCH IRONWORK.

IN the course of the building of our old churches, no sooner was the site marked out, and the mason had lowered his foundations into the ground and begun to pile up his "wondrous work of wall-stones" into a fabric, than the smith was called to give his mighty aid. That is to say, as soon as the masonry on either side of the places where the doorways were to be was a couple of feet or so high, the smith came to put in securely the strong iron crooks in which the hinges of the doors were to revolve afterwards. It was important that these should be imbedded deep in the stonework, and have a particular hold upon it, and so, as has been said, before the carpenter appeared upon the scene with his beams and rafters, strong doors and fittings, or the plumber came with his lead-work, or the glazier with his almost priceless glass-work, the smith was welcomed. His art and skill are more evident, however, in the floriated hinges and intricate locks he eventually placed upon the doors, as well as in other more ornamental work that he wrought when the building had made further progress.



There is a beautiful door on the south side of Turvey Church, in Bedfordshire. It opens in the centre, and has the same pointed, arch-shaped outline as the doorway. Each half of the door has two huge strap-like hinges on it, which diminish in size till they terminate in fleurs-de-lys; and from these straps curve foliated scroll-work, till the door is completely covered from edge to edge with the flowing lines; except on the pointed heading, for which some extra scroll-work of precisely the same character, but not attached to the hinges, has been devised; and the ends of every curve of the scrolls is beaten out into the most graceful flowers and foliage. This intricate ornamentation broadens out in a convenient place to receive two rings for handles, for the purpose of entrance and exit; and below one of the rings is a square 'scutcheon for the lock. All this ironwork stands up in bold relief, and is studded with the nails by which it is fastened to the woodwork. As we look at it we may picture the smith beating it all out patiently, till he saw the perfection at which he was aiming. Perhaps he could tell of the frequent mention of iron in the sacred writings, and associated some of the passages with which he was most familiar with his work.

In St. Marie's Church, Norfolk, there is a single-leafed door with similar floriated scroll-work, uncurling and unfolding from the hinges all over the woodwork, which is quite as handsome, though of less size. There are, too, some ancient iron hinges and plates on the door on the south side of the chancel of Morpeth Church, so rusted as to peel at the touch, but still answering the purpose for which they were made. We have many more examples of greater simplicity. The hinges on the door of Hartley Church and Northfleet Church, in Kent, and Tinwell Church, in Rutlandshire, for instance, have ornamental work, but are comparatively plain by the side of these. Dartmouth Church has some very curious ironwork, on a door bearing date 1631, that must be more particularly described. It takes the form of a central tree, passing up the full height of the door, showing its root at its base, vine-like branches on its way upwards, and a leafy top. All the leaves are curiously large, and notched at the edges. Across the door and across the tree, passing into its stem by the way, extend two animals we may suppose are intended for lions, with outstretched limbs and enfolded tails; and between the two, and midway across the door, stretches a wavy bar, from which the same kind of vine-like foliage also rises. There is a ring of twisted ironwork introduced for a handle, and one of the leaves is pierced for a key-hole. The date mentioned is also introduced in iron numerals, and many nails stud the singular work. The most splendid example in this section of the smith's art is perhaps the ironwork on the door of the chapter-house in York Cathedral. We are told King David prepared iron in abundance for the nails of the doors of the gates of the Temple he was not permitted to build because he had shed blood and made great wars. We may see, too, iron in abundance was also prepared for this doorway, in like manner. There is a stone column midway in the centre of it, consequently the door is in two leaves, or parts. The ironwork completely covers it, twining and curving, and climbing and winding, and unfolding and uncurling in the most graceful configuration equally all over it, till the beautiful embellishment terminates in the figures of birds at the summit of the design. The western doors of Lichfield Cathedral also present us with a fine specimen of the same kind of light and delicate work. The south door of Durham Cathedral is also covered sumptuously with ancient floriated work. The skill and feeling of the smith are, however, still more apparent in such ornamental ironwork as is independent of any woodwork for a back-ground. We have many specimens of masterly work, known as grilles, which are railings and other open-work to fence or fill up various enclosures. The grille round the tomb of Queen Eleanor in Westminster Abbey is the admiration of all who look upon it with any knowledge of the subject. Everyone is interested in the effigy of the wifely, virtuous, and beautiful queen who shared her husband's fortunes in the Holy Land and his campaigns in Wales, who tended him so faithfully when wounded, and who, following him to the north, died on her way through Lincolnshire, whence she was brought—we all know with what deep regret and great ceremony—to Westminster. It has lain on the smooth grey marble these six hundred years. The beautiful features, the delicate hands, the folds of her robes are uninjured, and scarcely show the marks of the centuries, save in a certain indescribable mellowness; and around the queenly figure is the same protecting grille the clever smith put there at first in the old Plantagenet days. It consists of a series of main concave bars, rising at equal distances from one horizontal bar to another, with terminals of spikes that are as light and sharp as aloe-leaves; and from each of the curved bars to the next, pass tiers and tiers of the most graceful flowing and floriated and intertwining lines of ornamentation. The necessary fastenings, in the way of bolts, rivets, and nails, are all treated as enrichments, and hence the work is studded with rosettes, foliage, and animals' heads. The name of the smith was Thomas de Leghtone, the accounts of the queen's executors tell us; and the sum he was paid for it was £12. The screen of the tomb of Edward IV., in St. George's Chapel, Windsor, is another splendid example of ancient ironwork, rich with tracery, pinnacles, and other ornamentation; and that round the monument of the Black Prince in Canterbury Cathedral is another. And most of our cathedrals and many of our churches have further specimens.

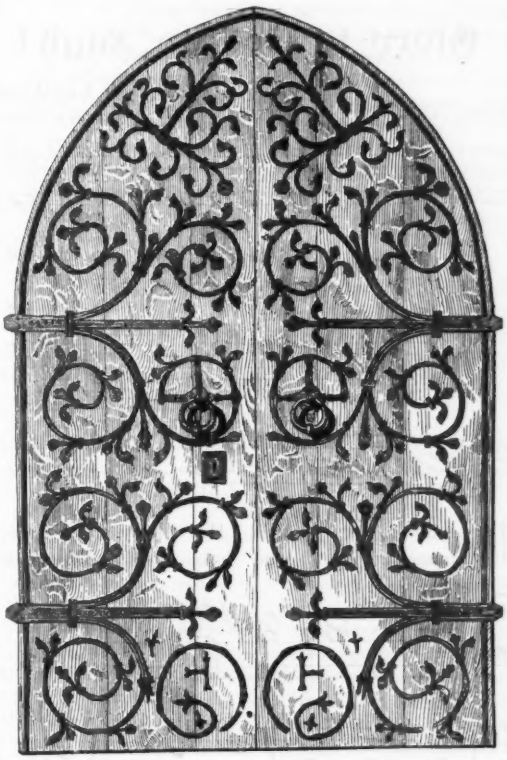
We have also marvellous gates that we may almost look upon as aspirations to depict in metal those mystical doors that signified dominion, or those that were called the gates of righteousness, or those that were bid to lift up their heads that the King of Glory might come in. The brass gates giving access to Henry VII.'s Chapel—to mention another masterpiece in Westminster Abbey—are very handsome. There is a central gate, eight feet six inches wide, between two piers of stone, and one on either side of it five feet wide. Above all three runs a cornice crowded with angels, like a gallery filled with an angelic host. The central gate is eleven feet and three inches high, and is divided into sixty-eight perforated compartments, almost square, in which are wrought various devices, the arms of Westminster, heraldic lions, fleur-de-lys, falcons, the initials H.R. crowned and tied together with knotted cords, roses in combination with a crown, daisies also associated with crowns, all of which have special significance; and the framework encompassing all these panels is enriched with dragons and Tudor roses. The smaller gates have twenty-eight of the same panels filled with similar devices. It has been noticed, in looking narrowly, that the masons left too large a space for the central gates, or the smith made them of insufficient dimensions, for additional stonework has been added on either side of them. There are some curious iron gates leading from the nave to the chancel of Arundel Church, Sussex. These consist, however, only of perpendicular and horizontal bars riveted together.

Some church doors were furnished with knockers. There is a fine ancient bronze knocker, representing a grotesque head, on the door of Durham Cathedral. It was used by the fugitives who sought sanctuary there. There is a French example on the north door of the Cathedral of Puy-en-Velay that is very similar to it, and is allowed to be the work of a smith in the eleventh century. Some ancient knockers were small mallets, and in some cases the handle of a door did duty as a knocker likewise.

Coronæ, candelabra, and brackets for lights in our old churches, in the days of old, also called forth the taste and artistic ingenuity of the smith. We have had very few specimens left to us, for the use of gas has caused them to be displaced in countless instances where they had been preserved until its introduction; and the facility with which they are melted down, and the metal made use of again, has militated against their preservation. Brass was, probably, as frequently made use of as iron for this purpose. There is a brass chandelier now in Wrenthorpe Church, in Yorkshire, which was once in All Saints' Church, Wakefield, and thence, when it was taken down to make room for gas, was removed to East Ardsley Church, where it remained for upwards of twenty years, when it was again taken down, and eventually passed on to Wrenthorpe Church, where it was hung up in the chancel. The central stem of it has a ball at the base and a bird at the top, and in the course of the length of this stem are three tiers of brackets or branches made of scroll-work, some of which curve upwards to hold candles, whilst the others are ornamental only. It is remembered there were several similar chandeliers in the fine old church at Wakefield, but this is the only one of them that has not passed out of all identification. There was, and probably still is, an ancient chandelier in the Temple Church, in Bristol, in which two sets of leaves served as sockets.



DARTMOUTH CHURCH.

Sometimes it was a smith who was deputed to make the pulpit. There are still some examples of iron pulpits, as at Middleham, in Yorkshire, and we read of others that have been removed, as in Durham Cathedral. The frame of the hour-glass was also his work. The vane, too, was assigned to him, and he also assisted at the hanging of the bells. It was the smith who bound with iron the chest that held the church valuables, and who made the marvellous lock, with plate upon plate of tracery work, till it seemed set deep in mouldings, that was to help to secure its contents, and the key that was fit to hang from the girdle of a prelate. He also made the ironwork that ornamented some of the gables and some of the gablets over bell-turrets. Moreover, the lectern was frequently also made by him. Many lecterns, or letterns, were made of wood, but there were also many made of metal. Those that were wrought in brass in the form of eagles, with extended wings for the books to rest on, are especially noteworthy. One of the best known examples is that in St. Gregory's Church, Norwich, in which there are three lions on the three feet, as well as the superb eagle at the summit. Who shall say we are not all richer for the work these men have left us to possess?

The first mention of iron in the sacred writings occurs in connection with the appointment of the six cities of refuge for the Israelites, where it is affirmed that if anyone smite another with an instrument of iron he is a murderer. The second time it is mentioned is in the account of the overthrow of Og, King of Bashan, and the demolition of his threescore cities:—"For only Og, King of Bashan, remained of the remnant of giants; behold, his bedstead was a bedstead of iron: is it not in Rabbath of the children of Ammon? Nine cubits was the length thereof, and four cubits the width of it, after the cubit of a man." Afterwards, it is occasionally spoken of in a figurative way to signify hard conditions, as when the slavery in Egypt is called the iron furnace, and when those who are disobedient are threatened that the heavens over their heads shall be brass and the earth under their feet shall be iron, and reference is made to ruling with a rod of iron, and to yokes of iron. Again, we read that Judah drove out the inhabitants of a certain mountain, but he could not drive out the inhabitants of the valley, because they had chariots of iron; and that Sisera had nine hundred chariots of iron. We are told, too, Goliath's spear was like a weaver's beam, and his spear's head weighed six hundred shekels of iron, and that when David took Rabbath he brought forth the people that were therein, and put them under saws and under harrows of iron, and under axes of iron. We know, at the building of Solomon's temple, all things were so prepared before it was commenced, that neither hammer nor axe, nor any tool of iron was heard; but there are various allusions elsewhere to bars of iron, fetters of iron, pens of iron, and a pillar of iron. Moreover, the prophet Daniel described the great image that was seen by Nebuchadnezzar in his dream to be made of gold and silver, brass and iron, with the legs of iron, and feet part of iron and part of clay, and interpreted the vision to mean that the fourth kingdom that should arise after his days would be as strong as iron, and yet, as the feet were partly of clay, would be divided, and partly strong and partly broken. In the Acts of the Apostles there is special mention of an iron gate, when the angel appeared in the prison to Peter, and told him to cast his garment about him and follow him:—"When they were past the first and second ward, they came unto the iron gate which leadeth unto the city: which opened to them of its own accord: and they went out, and passed on through one street, and forthwith the angel departed from him."

THE SOUTH DOOR, TURVEY CHURCH, BEDS.

Seven times there is particular mention of smiths, including Demetrius the silversmith and Alexander the coppersmith. The first time was in the days of Saul when it is said, "Now there was no smith found throughout all the land of Israel; for the Philistines said, Lest the Hebrews make them swords or spears." The next is in the Book of Isaiah, when idol-makers and idol-making are discussed: "The smith with the tongs both worketh in the coals, and fashioneth it with hammers, and worketh it with the strength of his arms; yea, he is hungry and his strength faileth; he drinketh no water and is faint." And again: "Behold, I have created the smith that bloweth the coals on the fire, and that bringeth forth an instrument for his work." We are told Nebuchadnezzar carried away to Babylon all the princes, the craftsmen and smiths; and

Jeremiah, writing to the captains to build themselves houses and dwell in them, and plant gardens and eat of the fruit of them, dates his words as sent to them after Jeconiah, the king and the queen, and the eunuchs, the princes of Judah and Jerusalem, and the carpenters and the smiths, were departed from Jerusalem.

When, therefore, we look at our ancient iron-work in our churches—the beautiful hinges, graceful grilles, majestic gates, traceried locks, pulpits, candelabra, lecterns, and other relics of our skilful smiths, we should remember they probably put into their work all the feeling that such associations would evoke, as well as all the power their daily experiences measured out to them; and we should value it accordingly. 3. Join, all the ransomed race,
Our Lord and God to bless:
Praise ye His name!
In Him we will rejoice,
Making a cheerful noise,
Shouting with heart and voice,
Worthy the Lamb!

4. Though we must change our place,
Yet shall we never cease
Praising His name:
To Him we'll tribute bring;
Hail Him our gracious King;
And, without ceasing, sing;
Worthy the Lamb!

A LOYAL LITTLE MAID.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "MISS HILARY'S SUITORS," ETC. ETC.

IT was in late autumn when the unexpected order came down from the War Office for the Forty-first Foot—the "Loyal Devon," as the regiment was always called—to prepare for a move to India, and when the news spread through the barracks, though some of the younger officers rejoiced at this sudden end to the stagnation—professionally speaking—of a small depôt, and half the privates hailed the notion of a voyage as a "jolly" escape from dull daily drill, yet the tidings carried woeful dismay into one military home.

The Wilsons had thought themselves sure of another year at Crouchester, with perhaps only a move to Aldershot at the end of that. Now, when the Major came into their sunny little morning-room on Abbey Terrace, and in a low voice told his wife what was at hand for them, a most expressive silence followed his words. He knew only too well what a blow he had just dealt the tenderest mother in the world. She understood only too clearly what caused the faltering voice of the soldier, who was as kind and gentle as he was brave. Neither dared look at the other, but both turned instinctively an anxious glance upon the point of their present trouble, the great delight of their lives, their one child, Ina. A bonnier, brighter child than this never gladdened any household—or so the Major thought—and from the day, near seven years ago, when, in the far-off land to which they were now again ordered, a dusky Ayah had laid his little blue-eyed daughter in his arms, she had grown dearer and dearer to her father, fonder and more companionable to her mother every hour. The delicacy small Ina at first shared with so many children of English parents in India only served to double their affection. Happily, the regiment was drafted home when the much-prized baby was but a few months old. Once in England, she throve apace. Now, taking their darling back to that scorching clime, and in the height of its summer too, could not be dreamed of, and yet——

It was not so long since Major Wilson had recovered from a sharp illness. He was not beyond wanting his wife's best care and nursing still. To Meerut she would never let him go alone. On the score of health he might have escaped going out at all, or he might have exchanged to a home-keeping regiment, but either course would have curtailed the chance of his getting his next step speedily: that colonelcy with which he would be content to leave the service, and which would provide—what he did not yet possess—a sufficiency for his little Ina's future.

He then must go. Assuredly his wife would be his companion. And Ina—must be left behind!

That was the prospect which sent the father to gaze dimly out of the window, unable to smile even at the awkward squad drilling below, and turned one of the child's drollest picture-books into a dull blot before the mother's eyes.

The little one herself, playing on a big tiger-skin, was presently struck with her elders' silence. Father's return from the orderly-room was generally the liveliest part of her mornings. Why did he not want her, call to her instantly, as usual? Running to her mother's knee, she put the question earnestly, "Papa is not going to be ill again, is he? Why doesn't he speak?"

Then one took her in her arms and the other drew her fair head to his breast, and both together, as best they could, told this much-loved child how she must be left awhile: for, being their only one, Ina was the entire confidante of their life's movements, sharing their cares as well as their pleasures.

Curious training, perhaps, for such a little thing!—making her thoughtful, self-reliant beyond her years: "old-fashioned," some people called it; but her lively temperament kept her absolutely childlike under the system, and its happy result showed itself in her power now to comfort her troubled parents better than many a wiser counsellor could have done.

Intensely sensitive, she was instantly in touch with their pain. Blessed with the rich inheritance of unselfishness, she swallowed a nasty lump in her throat as, pulling her father's face down to be kissed, she answered valiantly—

"Don't mind for me; I'll be good while you're away. I shall be safe till you come back, if you go and take care of father, so put me where you like, mother."

Where they liked, indeed!

An easy-sounding choice, but what a hard one when they came to grapple with it! For the Wilsons had no relatives ready to take their nestling in; no nursery full of cousins for her to run loose among; no friend whose home would be open and exactly suitable for her. "Leave her with us," said General Martin's wife, who was always loading the pretty child with ornaments her mother would not let her wear, and bonbons she could not let her eat; but the kind old lady had never had bairn of her own, and knew less of the management of children than of cockatoos. That was not to be thought of. Colonel Maude, Ina's chief grey-haired chum, would willingly have adopted his "Loyal Little Maid," as he called this pet of the Forty-first, for the time being, but as he would certainly have fed her chiefly on chocolate creams, and his entire establishment would have made a charming toy of her the whole while, that idea could not be entertained. Schools were questionable: so-called "homes" doubtfully desirable when their heads were individually unknown.

What was to be done, then?

Ina solved the difficulty herself.

"Let me go to Margery's," she exclaimed after three days of perplexity that made her mother pale and worn; and the idea sounded like a happy inspiration, one it was strange they had not thought of before.

For Margery had been Ina's one English nurse. Belonging to the neighbourhood of Crouchester, she had been sent by another officer's wife to the Wilsons on their first return from India, had stayed with them, devoted to her little charge, for six years, proving through sundry removals from depôt to city what an appreciable comfort is a good servant; and proving, moreover, that she was as steady-headed as warm-hearted.

Vainly had a colour-sergeant, a corporal, the Major's own man, and certainly half a dozen privates, attempted to woo the pleasant-faced Essex girl. Nothing shook her allegiance to an honest young country fellow of her own parish, and when Andrew Wood stepped into the post of "looker" or bailiff on an off farm of a large landowner at Wyndchurch, why, then Andrew urged his new home could scarce be managed without a wife. No just cause or impediment preventing this, Ina had to dry up her tears over the parting; Margery went about red-eyed a week before her wedding, and only left Camp Terrace on the very morning of the auspicious day, in her pretty blue dress and her mistress's own pony-carriage.

Since then many a visit had kept alive the kindliness so many years of service had planted among them all. Margery's home was a bower of bliss to Ina. It was a roomy old one-floored farm-house, whose thick lichen-tinted thatch offered the great charm of sparrows in the early morning all the year round. It was by a wood, where pigeons cooed all day. It had a garden, where gooseberry-bushes jostled up against tiger-lilies, and sweet-williams grew as thick as grass. The apple blossoms, when she first, and the apples themselves when she last, went there were a delightful recollection. If any spot on earth could be really nice while her father and mother were away—about which Ina had her doubts, but kept them strictly to herself—why, Wyndchurch was that place; and when the elders found that "Needle's-eye," as the homestead was called, was just far enough from the village for the occupants to be all to themselves; that down the meadow and over the brook was the Rectory, where Ina could share the lessons of other children; that Margery and her husband, moreover, were exceedingly proud and delighted at undertaking the charge proposed—then the Wilsons felt the best thing they could do was to leave their child there, and made preparations accordingly.

All too soon came the day when the auctioneer's men carted off the pretty furniture from No. 7, Camp Terrace, and Ina was driven to Needle's-eye, very subdued, indeed, but quite determined not to let out that she felt rather choking. Margery gave them tea in her best room, which they tried hard to seem as if they were enjoying; then Major Wilson took Ina under his rough ulster cape, and talked with her a brief while out in the soft starlight, giving her that best of all medicines for loving hearts—something to do for those they are loving.

Little did he think, though, how the child-mind would translate his orders.

"It is so good of Margery and Andrew to have you, darling," he explained; "it comforts your mother and me so much. Our Ina will be very good with them while we are away?"

"Yes, father, I—I'll try," clinging to him very close indeed.

"And any single thing you can do for them you will? To show them how thankful we are, you know."

"Yes, I—promise."

A few minutes later Ina had said, "Our Father" for the last time by her mother's side. She was left smothering her sobs in her little snow-white bed; the great wrench was somehow over. Sadly desolate, the officer and his wife drove away from Wyndchurch, and the very next day started from Gravesend, their hearts sore with a sadness such as civilians only rarely have to suffer.

CHAPTER II.

INA had not chosen ill in electing to go to Margery Wood.

Habit made the one-time nurse the best of caretakers. Andrew, in his slow, quiet way, marked all the winning manners of the delicately reared child, chuckled over her wise sayings, and frightened his wife dreadfully by pronouncing her too sensible and nice-behaved for this world. Being promptly told, however, not to talk such nonsense, for Miss Ina was only "the very moral of her mother," Andrew withdrew his alarming observation, and merely paying their charge the compliment of brushing up his own behaviour to match hers, became Ina's very humble and willing attendant whenever Margery allowed him to wait upon her.

Besides the birds and cats, too, another delightful playfellow was provided in the shape of Bob, an amiable, not very well-bred retriever, who would actually desert his master for a game with the new inmate of the farm; so, altogether, "little Miss Wilson," as they all but Margery called her, was happy enough, save that—as she once confessed to her friend, Colonel Maude, who often drove over in his tall dog-cart to see her—"she couldn't help always feeling rather hungry." "Not," she hastened to add, as the Colonel broke out angrily with "What! don't they feed you well, lady-bird?"—

"Not hungry for eating, you know; Margery is always giving me nice things. But oh, I am so hungry for father and mother!"

With this came such a yearning look in the little maid's eyes as made the old officer feel quite womanish, and inclined to think that the child ought to have gone with her nearest and dearest at almost any cost. He lingered at Needle's-eye, extra tender over bidding the child good-bye that day, and stooped down from his dog-cart to give her golden head one more stroke before starting.

"You know I write to Meerut very often," he said, "so mind you let me know if there's anything you want me to tell them. Done your last chocolate, eh? Bring you some more next time I come, shall I? And whatever you want or wish for, just you say it to me; I'll see you have it. Drop me a line if I don't happen to come, you know."

"But I can't write properly," said Ina.

"Oh, fudge!" cried the Colonel gaily; "printing will do for our love letters! Mind, now"—nodding to Mrs. Wood as he drove off—"I shall expect one some day."

"But I don't think I shall have to send it," said Ina gravely, to careful Margery, who was holding her back from the cart-wheel, "because, you see, you give me everything I like—almost."

A wistful ending Margery quite understood, and promptly sought, by a visit to some week-old lambs, to chase the shadow from the thoughtful little face.

These lambs, with their ridiculous attempts at playing, and the delicious congregation of young life about Needle's-eye, and first the fluffy buds upon the sallows, and the white anemones up-springing, and then all the hazy green of the wood outbursting in May, and after that the warm, sleepy delight of summer, when she and Margery nearly lived in the hay and harvest field—all these carried Ina through what was expected to be half her country sojourn. Major Wilson would most likely return next spring. Her vivid joy when Colonel Maude carried that news was pathetic. Not less so were the quick caresses she lavished on Margery to atone for seeming ungrateful by showing the least wish to leave her. For faithfully she tried to keep her promise to her father—to be good to her guardians always; though what to do for them the child was continually puzzled to think.

Her range of usefulness was so uncommonly small. She knew perfectly well Margery could count the daily ingathering of eggs, and put them in their proper baskets, just as well as she could, though it pleased Mrs. Margery to thank her, and say, What should she do without her? And Mr. Wood didn't really want her help at making sample seed-bags. His wife would have done them better and more quickly, only he chose to be very polite, and praise Ina's handiwork profusely. That was to please her, of course. Ina could quite see through it, and it rather troubled her, for Andrew was always being kind to her. If it rained, and he had to bring his light cart round by the road and fetch her from lessons at the Rectory, he was never cross. If, on summer days, she ran down with governess and children, and called to him from the other side of the brook, just to save her going round by the bridge, and to get her back quicker to Margery, he would come in an instant, and with bared feet fetch her through the water, Bob splashing about in attendance, and would carry her half-way up the meadow-side, and never be impatient or say his arms ached, though she must have been heavy.

Clearly she owed a great deal to Andrew, and how to requite him she could not devise. "I wish I could," she said one day, thinking her thoughts aloud as he was carefully carrying her over the stream.

"Could what, Miss Ina?" said Andrew.

"Make it up to you somehow. You do so many things for me, Mr. Wood."

"Ay, ay," said Andrew; "now don't you worrit yourself about that. 'Tain't a long account 'atween us two. You'll square that right enough sooner or later, I'll warrant."

And curiously enough opportunity gave her the chance she so earnestly longed for very soon indeed.

Autumn was nearly over: the apple-gathering finished all but one tree, a beauty that stood with fruit as red as poppies, and as hard as its own trunk, till the first touch of frost had mellowed it. That first touch came all in a hurry early in November. Margery brought Ina's woolly clothes out next morning, and wrapped her up most prudently before taking her apple-picking at noon-time. The very lowest boughs were left for her; a lad off the farm climbed among the top ones, for Andrew was busy with thrashing, fields away. Margery herself, anxious for her handsome crop, was busy in all directions, up chairs and steps and ladder, armed with a big basket and huge wooden rake. But for once she was too active. Just when they were merriest a laden bough tempted her too forward, then broke as she grasped it. Down came the apples, and, alas! down came Margery too, to lift herself up presently most horribly shaken, with a dislocated shoulder and a face as white as ashes.

Then the boy had scampered off for Master Wood. Soon had come the village doctor, and Margery's mother from the next parish, and the rector's wife from across the brook, and this last bore Ina off to stay among her own children till young Mrs. Wood had recovered from the awkward accident.

That was not for many days; and so long seemed the time away from Needle's-eye, that Ina rapturously received Andrew when he came one morning with leave to take her back.

"My Margery is quite well now?" Ina questioned eagerly as he drove her along; and her face fell as he answered gravely—

"Nay, not by a good bit, Miss Ina. She've got to keep very still, and be bothered for naught, the doctor says, for a good bit yet. But she wasn't easy without you, so we thought we'd best fetch you back. You'll help to keep her quiet, won't you, now?"

"That I will!" said Ina; and after the first warm hug of return the child went about her nurse's room as mute as a mouse when she slept, as bright as a sunbeam when she was awake, and for a day or two all went well.

Then just when he ought to have been getting easy and pleased, Ina noticed something amiss with Andrew.

"He would fetch her through the water."—p. 111.

It was one dark afternoon. He had been away and busy all day, and he came in and stood before the fire deep in a brown study for half an hour, looking exceedingly queer.

When Margery called him to go to her room, he seemed to do it unwillingly: he who had spent every spare minute at her bedside till now, and had sat up with her unwearied night after night. This evening he told Margery he was very tired after his day at Crouchester Market—and—and—— "Wasn't he hungry?" she asked anxiously. "Oh yes, he was very hungry, too." And yet he ate hardly a morsel at tea-time, left the house on some plea as soon as he could, and Ina saw no more of him that night.

Next morning was worse still. Never very talkative, now Andrew hardly spoke a syllable, and looked as if not one bit of sleep had he had all night long.

"I've heaps of things to do to-day," he just said, putting his head into his wife's room before her blind was drawn aside, "I mayn't be in again till dark;" and then he went off, looking much worse than when he had the toothache in the spring, and returned no more till evening.

Ina had been in bed and asleep she was not sure how long when the sound of voices near woke her up. Since Margery's accident her room had been changed, and opened on to the square, comfortable "house-place" where they all sat for meals, and whence every word now reached her clearly.

It was Andrew and Margery's mother who were speaking, and the young bailiff's tone was broken and troubled.

"I tell you I'm certain. I had the whole of it just as Mr. Morriss, the corn-dealer, gave it to me over his counter. Five notes there were, and five sovereigns, all done up tight in the leasest of my sample-bags. I wrote the receipt out, and signed it 'Andrew Wood, for W. Hazledean, Esq.,' and I took the money straight away with me. Then when I put my hand in my pocket to feel for it just before I came in this house yesterday, it—wasn't there!"

"Where'd you been, Andrew, afore you started home?"

"Nowhere. I felt that done with harassin' after Margery, and that sleepy for want of proper rest, I wouldn't have stayed out longer than I was forced, no, not at a shillin' an hour. I'd sent the teammen home in the forenoon, and only waited for Mr. Morriss to pay me the money. When he gave it to me, I went right to the Crown stables, and I looked to see if Bess had finished her feed, and I harnessed her, and came back here without a minute's stop. But I tell you, outside our own door I found the money was gone!"

"Lad, lad, you must have dropped it, then!"

"Ay, I must. But where—is more than I can tell. I took the lantern, and I trod every step of the road back from here to the Crown last night, but I got nothing by that. I told old Joe at the stables the fix I was in, and he was downright sorry. He and me hunted through the straw, but it was no good. If he'd found it in his yard, he'd have kept every penny for me. But let a stranger happen of it, and there's no chance of me seeing it again. And if there's no chance of that, why, I know the master well enough. He's a hard man where money comes in. And he's a right to his own. If I have to face him to-morrow noon without that thirty pounds, why, out I shall be packed from here with a bad name, and my poor Margery——"

Here ensued some very queer sounds, hastily checked by the hearer.

"Hush, lad, hush! Now, don't take on so. It'll do no good. It'll only wake your wife up yonder. And she's none too well to-night. She's fidgeted 'cause she fancied you weren't comfortable without her about, and didn't speak to her cheerful like."

"I tried, that I did," said poor Andrew gruffly; "but I do tell her everything, and it came so hard to keep this back. It'll come harder, though, for her to hear it. And leavin' Needle's-eye like this 'll just be the death of her. Oh, that thirty pounds! That thirty pounds!"

A minute's stillness. Then said Margery's mother:

"If on'y I'd the money! But I haven't five pounds, to say nothin' of thirty. Ain't there anyone you can borrow it of, Andrew?"

He answered with a groan.

"Borrow thirty pounds! Who that's got so much would lend it to me, I wonder? Why, nobody! I feel that bad that if it hadn't been for Margery layin' here at home, I believe I should have gone to the bottom of the pond this day, that I do!"

"Lad, don't talk such evil," rebuked the old woman. "You must go lay down in the little back room, and get a bit of sleep to-night. Say your prayers, do, and get you to bed. Happen something 'll bring you out of this to-morrow."

Soon this advice seemed taken. The farthermost door in the passage off the big sitting-room was shut. Old Mrs. Carr moved softly about, clearing up for the night, then went to her place by Margery. In a few minutes all was still, though not dark, for the lamp was left burning in front of the safe cinder fire, for fear the invalid should want anything during the coming hours, and from this a streak of light shone through Ina's just open door.

It shone on a sight that would have startled the other inmates of the silent house: on Ina sitting bolt upright in her bed, eyes sparkling, cheeks flushed, heart beating fast over all she had just heard. Andrew was in distress. He wanted thirty pounds directly. The money would save him leaving this pretty home. It would save Margery from dying. They had no one to get thirty pounds from. Well, then, she would get it for them! Had she not said she would do anything she could to show she was really grateful? Had she not been longing and longing for the chance that never seemed inclined to come. Now was her time. Everything fitted in most beautifully.

This was her plan:—Colonel Maude had bidden her ask him for any single thing she wanted. Now she wanted money. Her father would pay him back by-and-bye. And Andrew wanted his thirty pounds early to-morrow to give his master. So she had better go for it to-night, and had no time to lose.

As brisk as any little bird, she hopped out of bed, slipped on her clothes, fumbled herself into her fur jacket, and, looking like some bright-eyed pixie, was stepping noiselessly into the sitting-room—for Margery must on no account be waked—when a thought struck her.

Perhaps her friend the Colonel might be out. It was rather late—near midnight, really—he might even be asleep. What if she couldn't wake him or his house? Why, of course, she had better write him a letter. That was what he had once told her to do, just as if he had known this occasion would be coming. So now for her note! Correct paper was not easily come-at-able, but that was no consequence. Her copy-book lay on a table near. Ina gently abstracted a leaf, which had the great advantage of lines ready ruled. A-tip-toe by the table, she cedar-pencilled her missive—a mingling of printed capitals and proper letters—for Ina, dear little maid though she was, was confessedly something of a dunce. This finished and folded, without a sound she slipped the bolt of the house door, and stepped out under myriads of shining stars.

Fearlessly she started on her long lonely walk, for she had never been taught to dread the night; moreover, was she not doing what she had promised her father? Quickly the child's feet traversed the winding wood path and the broad high road. Not a living creature did she meet between the farm and the church, a mile away. A cart passed quickly then, and nothing else whatever till she was close on the outskirts of Crouchester. A carriage or two rolled by her there—from late parties, perhaps. Her mother sometimes, in most charming dresses, had gone to such. Ina could have danced for joy on the pavement as she thought of how soon she should see that dear mother again. She gave a happy little jump as the prospect flashed on her of telling a fully approving father how Andrew had got the money he needed just at the right time, like a real fairy tale. A few yards after that frisk she was at the Colonel's door—for, like many other retired officers, he lived at the edge of the town. And it was just as she expected: the house was all shut up, every blind drawn down; the only door she tried with both hands fast locked as an iron safe.

"Well, never mind. How lucky," thought Ina, "that I've written to him." Carefully she slipped her letter into the box, knowing, by the experience of frequent visits, that it would so reach him on his breakfast-table. Then, her heart very light at having achieved so much, she tucked her cold little hands up the sleeves of her jacket, and set off for home again as fast as she could go.

But the second journey was none so easy as the first. The great excitement was over, and she was so tired. It wouldn't matter much, though, if she couldn't go quite so fast, she kept thinking, for even at a snail's pace she must get back before Andrew's waking time next—no, this morning. Then it occurred to her as quite an unpleasant shock that Margery's mother might go to look at her in the night. Margery often used to see if she was tucked up. After all, she had best hurry on. But the more she made haste the more tired she grew, and oh! so sleepy. The stars went in, too; the cold became intense; her very feet, for all they trotted their best, grew heavy and numb. When she reached the cross-roads she could hardly keep her eyes open, and somehow couldn't remember which turn she ought to take, so she took—the wrong.

On stumbled the small figure some weary half-mile more; then she felt forced to rest her chilled limbs a minute on a friendly stile.

She made another attempt at going on presently, wishing very much she could remember some of her happiest good-night hymns to cheer herself up with. Somehow, though, she could only recollect:

"Death will be to slumber
In those gentle arms."

Crooning that again and again, she struggled on almost blindly, for a funny feeling came over her as of cold feathers lighting fast upon her face; and just about that time she dropped into—no feeling at all.

CHAPTER III.

WHEN Andrew Wood came in at eight o'clock that morning to the breakfast he didn't want, poor man! Mrs. Carr met him with surprising words: "Why, I thought little Miss Wilson had run over to the stable to look at the horses with you. Where is she?"

"I don't know, mother," he answered, knocking his boots right and left on the scraper; "in the house somewhere, though. It's not fit for her to be runnin' out this mornin'; it's snowed a deal in the night."

"Well, she's not in bed," said the old woman, puzzled; "for I went to get her up and the room's empty."

"Gone and crept in with Margery, maybe, then. Let her stop there if she is, till I'm gone, mother. She's that quick, she's sure to find out there's somethin' wrong with me. And I can't make believe there isn't. I haven't got the spirit."

And Andrew sat down with his face so haggard and wan, that old Mrs. Carr, after an expedition to Margery's room and a thorough look round under pretence of hunting up a cat, scarcely dared worry him further with the strange fact that no Miss Ina was there. "Nor haven't been, for Margery asked after her. So wherever is she?" whispered the old woman anxiously.

Promptly, though not easily, the bailiff roused himself from brooding over his own calamity, and sought about the premises in every possible place for their much-prized charge. But there was no finding her—no hint discovered as to where she was gone. The only clue was that her hat and little fur coat were missing too.

"Would she be run to the Rectory early?" suggested Mrs. Carr, and thither sped Andrew, only to return all too soon, his honest face furrowed with new fear.

In his home tribulation reigned supreme. Margery had asked so urgently for Ina: was so certain the child was ill by her not coming in as usual, that it had been impossible to withhold from her the truth—the incredible truth—that her Miss Ina, her mistress's one dear child, the charge she never could make enough of, was—lost!

Up she got, heeding no remonstrance, and went trembling from room to room, crying, "Miss Ina, my pretty, my dear, come along; here's Margery looking for you!" No gay young voice replied by a sound.

When Andrew opened his home door, his wife met him on the threshold, her one hand seizing him with distracted pleading. "I never dare meet her mother without her," she cried. "Oh, Andrew, find her, find her! Don't rest one minute till you have got her somehow, and fetched her back to me!"

As he put his arm round his half-helpless wife, the man looked overwhelmed, as white as she did.

"Eh, poor fellow!" the elder woman exclaimed unguardedly, "but he has got a peck of troubles all at once!"

Margery turned a quick glance on her.

"What do you mean, mother? Is there something else?" Then scanning rapidly her husband's drawn features, "Why, Andrew, you're ill! There was something the matter with you yesterday, and you wouldn't tell me. But you must now. Directly. Everything!"

To quiet her, they had to disclose the story, thus far hidden, of the terrible loss of their master's money: the ruin that hung over them. Crushed under the double blow, Margery sank down by her fireside. "I'm—I'm dizzy with it all," she murmured, turning sick and faint; and indeed they were all bewildered for a while, past any power of rational reasoning.

At ten, Andrew called his men off the farm, and all joined in searching for the child; but vainly.

Every nook of the house was explored without a trace of her being found. Not a single little footmark was there on the thick fallen snow to guide them. Deeper and deeper grew the anxiety. Then came one that made their pain ten times worse.

Along the road muffled sounds of wheels drew near, and Colonel Maude reined up by the gate and alighted, calling out cheerily, "Come along, Ina! Here I am according to command. Well,"—nodding kindly as he came in—"where's your little lady? Sit down, sit down, Mrs. Wood; you look anything but strong yet. Now then, what does my little maid think you want thirty pounds for? Her letter didn't go into particulars."

"Her letter!" cried Margery.

"Thirty pounds, sir!" stammered Andrew.

"What, you didn't know she wrote? Oh, but she knew the right quarter to apply to! Look here!" And the Colonel put Ina's queer little scrawl into Margery's shaking hand.

"Dere Maudie. Plese come to-morrow and bring thirty pounds, do come. I want it verry much. Be sure and come, becors of poor Andrew and poor Margery. Come verry erly plese. Ina."

"There, that was in my letter-box this morning before seven. So off I came as soon as I had breakfasted. I've brought the money. Now, who is it for?"

Margery gave one terrified cry. Andrew sat down and sobbed like a baby.

"Oh, good patience! she heard us talking, me and Wood, all about the thirty pound. Her door stood ajar, to be sure; but we never thought of that. And the poor little thing must have got up and wrote, and gone off with her letter when we were all asleep," explained old Mrs. Carr, quavering with fright. And that, when they were able to talk of the wretched chapter of mishaps, and to tell of their money loss, seemed the only solution of the child's disappearance.

"Never should she have known of it if I'd been up," wept Margery; "but it's all just a dreadful lot of accidents; and oh, sir! whatever shall we do?"

The Colonel, in his grief for his little favourite, could hardly give a coherent answer. The horrible fact of the small thing having wandered about the road that bitter night—his loyal little maid, for once too brave—opened the way to every species of fear. "Which way would she come back?" he asked at last, and Andrew answered—

"By the high road you drove, sir, or"—dropping his voice, awestruck with fresh alarm—"or over the fields and the stream by the foot-bridge."

"Has the bridge got a good railing?"

"N—o, sir. None at all."

"Then," said Colonel Maude, turning his head aside to hide something old soldiers are not fond of showing, "come with me now, Wood. You can pay your master presently. The poor little thing's wish shall be carried out if I can do it. But first we'd better go and have that stream dragged!"

They dragged it up to where it narrowed to a mere rill, and down to where it joined a wider river, but to no purpose.

People from all over the parish came to help, and scoured the country for half a dozen miles, searching hayricks, hedgerows, church porches, anywhere that she might have crept in for shelter: all unavailingly.

Colonel Maude set the police at work. They only found out that a dealer late on the road had passed a child; had thought of offering it a lift, but had a cart full of live goods, and so didn't. When the officer and Andrew went up at dusk to Needle's-eye, they could take half-distracted Margery not a single scrap of comfort. Even Rob, who had joined the search all day almost with the sense of a human being, lay down utterly fagged out, and thoroughly dejected.

"And the cruel thing is," said Colonel Maude—"I wouldn't tell you if I could help it, but I'm bound to do so—Major Wilson and his wife will be here almost directly. Your master got his promotion unexpectedly last month, Mrs. Wood, and under doctor's orders started straight for England. I only knew it this very morning, and should have been up to-day anyhow to tell you. The Jumna was expected at Devonport last night. I shouldn't be surprised if they reach here to-night, wanting, first thing of all, to see their child."

This was the last drop in Margery's over-full cup.

"May God help them!" she said brokenly, "and me too, sir," and then fainted clean away, and before consciousness returned to her the Colonel's forecast had actually come true. A Crouchester cab drove up. Ina's father and mother were in their midst, asking eagerly for their darling.

Colonel Maude always says since that his hottest battle—and he was a "Mutiny" hero—didn't take it out of him anything like those next few minutes.

Which of the two women was the wretcheder it would have been hard to say. Margery's tears fell like rain. Too generous-spirited to reproach her servant, Mrs. Wilson's mute agony was pitiful to behold. No one dared speak of consolation yet. Not a spark of hope glimmered among them all. The wind that wailed and sighed outside the house seemed but in sympathy with this unhappy group of people within.

Its fitful gusts acted on the nerves of Rob, who lay in the firelight, apparently cogitating profoundly over the mournful non-success of his day's hunting. At an extra-vehement swirl he got up and went towards the door, whining uneasily. Something without he could hear sooner than these sad, self-absorbed men and women. His whines broke soon into short, peremptory barks.

"Hush, doggie, hush!" whispered old Mrs. Carr persuasively; but Rob was not going to hush for anybody while those heavy stranger wheels he had been first to notice came grinding up the road. His clever black head all to one side one moment as if listening intently, the next he was sniffing and scratching at the door like an animal demented.

"Let him out," said the Colonel, and as Andrew obeyed, the intruding wheels stopped by the gate; the light that streamed out from the farm-house shone on a big basket-covered caravan, towards which the dog made a wild rush, with barks that set the hillsides echoing again, while mingled with his noisy joy they all heard——

What?

Why—"Rob, Rob, Rob! here I am! Yes, this is Margery's. Take me out, please. Oh!" with a shriek of rapture, "here's MOTHER!"

And a big man, all corduroy and red comforter, came forward into the blaze of lamp and logs, and put the little maid into the outstretched arms that clasped her—ah! as if they never meant to let her go again.

"I daresay, now," said the new-comer, genially gazing from one glad face to another, "you was a wonderin' where that little 'un were? Now, wasn't you? Well, we picked she up 'most starved wi' cold i' the middle of last night as we was travellin' to Endford Fair. Know she, us didn't. Speak to we, her couldn't. So bein' as us was forced to jog on, my missus let she sleep the day nigh through. And this arternoon when her woke up, an' told we wheer to bring she, why, us took an' done it! And here the little 'un be!"

Neither pen nor tongue can tell that minute's joy. Let any living heart to whom kind Heaven has given back the nearly lost imagine it without description. And then, as if their mercies, like their troubles, were not to come singly, who should jog up to Needle's-eye but old Joe from the "Crown," flourishing something at sight of which Andrew turned violently red.

"The bag, man! Wherever did ye find it?"

"Why, the far corner of the manger, lad—not an hour ago. You must have laid it there your own self, bein' sleepy and dull like, when you fetched Bess out, for I brushed the place down this arternoon, and there ter was under a wisp of hay. 'Drew 'll be rare an' glad of this,' says I, and sets off with it fast as I could travel. And you've got the little lady back too, haven't ye? Seems to me you've plenty to be glad of, then, to-night!"

To-night! Ah! and as long as they live. For from the bottom of their hearts do every one of those concerned say still, as they said then, "Thank God!" when they recall this ending to the strange journey of their dearer than ever, most LOYAL LITTLE MAID!

THE ROSEHEATH CLASS FOR YOUNG WOMEN.

"WE want your advice about something," said young Mrs. Blyth, turning a bright, eager face upon the peaceful-looking mistress of Roseheath Cottage. "Hilda and I are in exactly the same state of mind just now, and only you can help us."

Mrs. Granger looked just the one to respond to an appeal like this; people in predicaments usually did seek Roseheath Cottage, for they knew that the widow lady with hair prematurely white, and dear ones laid to rest amid Australian flowers, had yet

> "A heart at leisure from itself
> To soothe and sympathise;"

and the helpfulness of one whose mind is stayed upon the Lord of love and mercy.

"Everyone has heard about your successful class for young women," said Miss Berkley, who was slower of delivery and statelier in aspect than the young wife she was visiting, but an earnest Christian at heart, and full of longing to do good.

"Yes, indeed," interrupted Mrs. Blyth, "when we first came after our furnished house at Roseheath, I saw a framed notice of the meeting at the confectioner's where I had lunch; your class is a real blessing to the girls of the neighbourhood, Mrs. Granger, and when I go back to Riverlea, and Hilda to Pinedale, we should so like to undertake similar work, if you would advise us a little on the subject. I feel I ought to be of some help to the girls in Edward's mills, and Hilda has already been asked to interest herself in a meeting for the young women of Pinedale; so now please tell us how we are to make such work successful. It would be dreadful to find one's efforts a failure, and gaze on a handful of members and long rows of empty seats!"

"The more the better, of course, my dear," said Mrs. Granger with a smile, "but numbers do not make or mar success. One immortal soul is priceless; one student of God's Word may mean the salvation of hundreds to be influenced by that quiet, earnest study. Our Master's message is the same whether spoken to a 'handful,' or a crowd; our part is to speak it right home to some hungry, wandering heart."

Hilda looked up wistfully; she was shy of speaking of you choose us a favourite hymn?' But singing is not the end and aim of our class, my dear; my first and chief thought in prayer and work is to bring each member and attendant to the Master in loving obedience, in devoted consecration. Show them the Lord Jesus Christ more and more fully—that is the beginning and end of your work as leader."

"I did try to take a class of the mill-girls once," said Mrs. Blyth, "but I felt so discouraged and disappointed; some would not open their lips, some were over-free with their conversation, and many were on such subjects, but the throng of shop-girls and dressmakers and young women of various callings, who seemed in need of a Christian woman's help at Pinedale, had long been on her mind and heart.

"What is your chief aim in this class at Roseheath, Mrs. Granger?" she asked. "I hear the singing is a great attraction."

"Yes, we stay later every other week for a singing practice. Some of our girls have beautiful voices, that amply repay any trouble in training, and now and then during the meeting we arrange to have a solo or duet to enforce the lesson we are studying. At every meeting we have plenty of singing; any glimpse of fatigue prompts me as leader to give out a verse or two even during the lesson, and I can generally put an end to furtive glances at the clock by saying, 'Now will one quite haughty towards me. I get on much better with my Sunday-school class of boys at Riverlea; boys are so frank and open—young women are often so cold and critical and unapproachable."

"And I took my cousin's class at Kensington for some weeks," said Hilda, "but I heard afterwards they did not care for me as a teacher; they said I was too 'stand-offish.'"

"And the Riverlea girls said I wanted to patronise them," said Mrs. Blyth. "What is one to do!"

"Get to know them and to love them," answered Mrs. Granger, "and let them understand you do love them. Love is the great leveller, or rather the great uplifter. A teacher who wants thawing should get the ice melted first on her knees ere she carries Christ's message; and one who goes to her class full of patronage, making a mighty descent from the heights of her greatness, fails to represent Him who came in the form of a servant in meekness and humility. The best preparation, be sure, dear girls, for any work like this, is lowly and fervent prayer, and then comes earnest Bible study; you must not give the meeting that which has cost you nothing."

"How did your class here begin?" asked Hilda.

"At the bedside of a young dressmaker," was the reply. "I formed her acquaintance when I first settled here; she was a power for good in the place—she could go to no meetings, so she just did what she could. She gathered together five or six of the most friendless girls in Roseheath, and by her bedside they met for singing and Bible study and prayer: this meeting developed into a roomful at last, and when she entered into rest, I took the class as her legacy; and, as you know, we fill the large schoolroom every week. I always have printed notices in circulation among the members and in some of the shops, also I advertise the class in our local papers; Christian friends visiting the neighbourhood often look in upon us, and I have thus secured many helpful addresses for the class."

"Do you take it yourself as a rule?"

"I used to, always; but so many helpers have come to my aid of late that we have now arranged for quarterly programmes announcing the subjects and the leaders for each week; during the winter if I am single-handed again, I shall return to my former practice of going regularly through a certain portion of Scripture. In either case, the members of the class always know what we shall study the following week, so that they can read the lesson over and help us with thoughts concerning it, or ask questions of the leader."

"Ask questions!" cried Mrs. Blyth. "I am sure that would frighten me; suppose one could not explain everything to them!"

"Who can explain everything, child?" said Mrs. Granger gently; "if you take up this work you must not discourage questions. We found the members too shy to ask them at first, so we started a question-box in which they were put anonymously. Believe me, a spirit of religious inquiry is the promise of glorious things. You will lose nothing in the opinion of the members by confessing sometimes that you do not know the right answer; be honest, but promise likewise to search out the matter, and mind you keep your word. I invite the members also to think it over, and offer their explanations next week."

"I think you must want an immense amount of tact for such a class," said Hilda; "do you know each member by name?"

"Certainly, dear; that is most important. Every leader should get there early and leave last; the welcome and the personal 'good-bye' are invaluable. Also I place great stress on the personal appeal of letters that can be read at home in quiet, and preserved and thought about. Social gatherings in the home, garden, or drawing-room must not of course be forgotten, but, above all, I attribute our success here to the fact that some of us have long been accustomed to make each member a subject of special prayer, and we rest satisfied with nothing short of a decided stand for the Lord."

"How do you sit?" asked Mrs. Blyth. "The mill-girls would sit at the end of the long schoolroom at Riverlea, and I felt so dreadful, perched up there on the platform with dreary rows of seats between us."

"Oh, that would never do!" said Mrs. Granger, with a smile; "take care they know you better, and they will not want to sit so far away in the future. We sit in a sort of horse-shoe form; it looks more homely, I think, than regular rows of seats."

"Do the young women pray at your class?" asked Hilda.

"Yes, my dear; we generally have six or seven short prayers, some of them occupying not more than two or three minutes. I never dream of forcing a member to pray; I speak to them privately about it first; some decline through self-consciousness, which wears off as they grow nearer the Master; and some are sweet, shy souls that can scarcely bear the sound of their own voices—with the bloom of their timidity I dare not interfere. But nearly all join in reading the portion verse by verse, and we always end by uniting in the Lord's Prayer."

"Do you devote any portion of the time to needlework?" asked Mrs. Blyth.

"Not on the Thursday evenings; we keep that for our Bible class, but supplementary meetings have grown out of our class. Once a week we meet to sew for an orphanage, and once a fortnight we hold our essay society, at which the girls read compositions on subjects chosen by their own vote. In the summer we have our botanical club, and our tennis association——"

"Tennis!" cry the girls with wide-open eyes.

"Yes, my dears; our young women have lungs and muscles as well as yourselves, and get much less exercise. So each subscribes a little towards expenses, and sympathisers subscribe a little more, and we have many a merry game in the summer evenings. Of course we have a lending library; we want to develop our young women all round—soul, mind, and body—and make them healthy, good, and happy."

"Do you keep an attendance register?"

"Yes, and thus we become aware of absentees, and send some other girl to look up the wanderer and take her in charge. I do want to promote mutual interest and sympathy among the members; I try to study their dispositions, and to secure for each some friendship that will be a mutual help and benefit."

"I will try what I can do at Riverlea," said Mrs. Blyth, "but I fear all my work will be thrown away on those careless mill-girls."

"Careless they may be outwardly, dear, but each has inward needs that God only can satisfy. I think of their influence in coming years—our young women are potent to drag down or uplift England's manhood—how can we strive too earnestly to claim their influence upon the Master's side? Be sure you will never meet in His name without a blessing. Some lay stress on the importance of associating our young working women with culture and refinement and education in the contact of Christian gentlewomen; but it is Christ's presence that will refine them, give them help and rest and salvation and power for service. Pray for your class and get the members to pray for it; success is sure and eternal; only be faithful, I entreat of you, in pointing every member to Jesus, and leave the results with Him."

Hilda listened silently, wistfully, her heart recording the decision that as concerned the young women of Pinedale she would put her hand to the plough. The bright-faced young wife said hesitantly, "It must be hard work to go on as you do all the year round; it must mean giving up so much leisure, and I should think it gets very tiring at times." But the tender-faced teacher of the Roseheath class looked out to the red and gold that proclaimed the ending of the working day, and softly repeated:—

"As labourers in Thy vineyard
Send us out, Christ, to be—Content to bear the burden
Of weariness for Thee.
We ask no other wages,
When Thou shalt call us Home,
But to have shared the travail
Which makes Thy Kingdom come."

A QUIET POOL.

SHUT in by overhanging trees it sleeps,
A quiet pool scarce flecked by the sun's rays,
And, undisturbed on wildest, stormiest days,
A calm unruffled face it always keeps.
Yet 't was not ever so! In years gone by,
Ere tree-surrounded, it would sparkle bright
'Mid the fierce sunshine; or, at tempest's height,
Would writhe and leap and moan with tearful cry.

Type this of calm old age! Surrounded now
By sweet forgetfulness and dreamy rest,
No storms of care or passion touch its brow,
Each passing joy is but a minute's guest;
And so in quiet peace it lingers on,
Till the Creator calls, and it is gone.

G. W.

THE CHRYSANTHEMUM; OR, "GLORIA MUNDI."

BY THE REV. P. B. POWER, M.A.

I WENT a short time since to see the last flower-show of the year—that of chrysanthemums in the Temple Gardens.

There was something ineffably sad about it; it was Flora's last effort of the year. Her roses, and lilies, and all the bravery of her laburnums and lilacs, her painted tulips, her ever-shifting kaleidoscope of colour and form, were all gone; and, whatever she might do again next year, this year she could do no more. The chrysanthemum is a kindly flower; it tarries with us when all else has gone; and amongst those in this show were the very best which could be produced of their kind; and very beautiful, after their kind, no doubt, many of them were.

I had not gone far into the show, when my attention was arrested by a very large, well-shaped, and perfectly coloured flower; and the label it bore was "Gloria Mundi"—"the glory of the world."

Alas! its glory had already begun to be dimmed; its head was drooping, its leaves at the outward edge were beginning to shrivel—the flower had heard the whisper of death, and responded to it; the echo of the whisper was to be heard in the shrivelling of the flower's outward fringe.

"Even thus it is," thought I, as I looked on the departing beauty. "'Sic transit Gloria Mundi'—so passes the glory of the world."

Yet but a very little while, and the blossom so proudly labelled would be thrown out with the refuse of other things, the "Gloria Mundi" undistinguishable from what never had any higher claim than to be trodden under foot.

I could not separate "Gloria Mundi" from the "Sic transit" which so commonly goes before it, and which, sooner or later, plays its part in the history of all earthly states, all earthly people, all earthly things.

I do not know for certain the origin of this phrase, "Sic transit Gloria Mundi." There was a custom in Rome that when the Emperor went out on some grand day in all his imperial pomp, there was appointed an officer to burn flax before him, crying out, "Sic transit Gloria Mundi," and this was done to put him in mind that all his grandeur and honour should soon vanish away like the smoke of the burning flax. Perhaps it comes from this.

The burning flax, the fading flower, the wrinkling cheek, the dimming eye, the crumbling palace, the hard bite of the rust, the subtle fretting of the moth! The cold bright stars look down on a world of perishing glories, and the wail goes up to them that the whole creation groaneth, and a voice as from a wilderness reaches them, crying that "the world passeth away, and the lust thereof." Yet this is not all: this for the present, indeed; but there is a beyond—the groanings of creation for the birth of a new glory which shall not pass away; and the voice tells us how that "he that doeth the will of God abideth for ever."

A few thoughts on this subject at the end of the year may do us good; they need not make us unduly sad.

The glory of the world: what is it? It is its show, and possessions, and honours, and positions, and titles, its glitter, its pomp, its pride, its grandeur, its riches: all those things after which men gape, not so much for their own sakes, but because they appear to lift them up above others. These are all passing, and passing, so far as this world is concerned, into nothingness—for how many have they entirely, and in some cases almost ridiculously, passed?

To begin with: when you come to analyse it, what a poor and miserable thing any glory is, which is not connected with absolute and essential good—the glory which is attached simply to the individual!

Let us take the great kings and warriors of the world. In their day they gathered hosts of their fellow-men under their command. They were called "General" or "Emperor," or anything else you like; with these men they murdered a number of other men; and they made what were left give them money, under the name of tribute; they were merely highwaymen on a large scale. But thousands upon thousands halloed and shouted when they made their appearance—they trod upon each other's toes, and squeezed in each other's ribs, to get a sight of them. The sun shone upon their burnished armour just as it does on my fish-kettle and frying-pan, when they are kept as they ought to be; in a few minutes the road on which their triumph passed was just as it was before they came—only a little more dusty, that's all—and nobody knows anything about it now.

And at last they came to die. Then they saw what it all was. A moment before Saladin the Great died, he called the herald who had carried his banner before him in all his battles, and commanded him to fasten to the top of a lance the shroud in which he was soon to be buried. "Go," said he, "carry the lance, unfurl this banner, and while you lift up this standard proclaim, 'This, this is all that remains to Saladin the Great of all his glory.'"

"Christians," said Saurin, "I perform to-day the office of this herald: I fasten to the staff of a spear sensual and intellectual pleasures, worldly riches, and human honours. All these I reduce to the piece of crape in which you will shortly be buried. This standard of death I lift up in your sight, and I cry, 'This is all that will remain to you of the possessions for which you exchanged your souls.'"

Yes, it must all go, whatever form it takes. Poor Cardinal Wolsey, who held an orange to his nose to keep away the smell of the common people, who built Hampton Court Palace for himself, had to give his palace away, whether he liked it or not, and was deserted by all at the last, and uttered this melancholy exclamation, that, if he had served his God as he had served his king, he would not have been deserted as he was. So went human honour. But this very glory of honour passes sometimes even before the end.

Isaac Disraeli tells of a Polish king who left his companions while hunting; he was found a few days after disguised as a common porter in a market-place, lending out his shoulders for a few pence. His courtiers expostulated with him, but his Majesty having heard them, replied, "Upon my honour, gentlemen, the load which I quitted was by far heavier than the one you see me carry here—the weightiest is but a straw when compared to that under which I laboured. I have slept more during four nights than I have in all my reign. I begin to live, and to be king for myself. Elect whom you choose. For me, who am so well, it is madness to return to court." Another Polish king, who succeeded this philosophic monarch, when they placed the sceptre in his hands, exclaimed, "I would rather manage an oar!"

Pope Adrian the Fourth in early life suffered great hardships from poverty, and he told a friend that all the hardships of his life were nothing in comparison to the Papal crown.

The Emperor Diocletian found the crown so heavy that he laid it aside and retired into private life; and Charles V. gave up his and went into a monastery.

Very often the glory of the world, which we think has not yet passed, but is present, has really passed for those whom we are inclined to envy; so that after all it might be that what Queen Elizabeth (called glorious Queen Bess) said to one of her courtiers is true: "They pass best over the world who trip over it quickly, for it is but a bog; if we stop we sink."

Well, life ends, and we follow some of the world's great folk to the grave.

> "Our lives are rivers gliding free
> To that unfathomed boundless sea—
> The silent grave;
> Thither all earthly pomp and boast
> Roll—to be swallowed up, and lost
> In one dark wave.
> Thither the mighty torrents stray,
> Thither the brook pursues its way,
> And tinkling rill;
> These all are equal—side by side
> The poor man and the son of pride > Lie calm and still."

And yet "Gloria Mundi" has tried to make its way down into the very grave itself. And there, in a kind of way, it has continued to maintain itself for awhile. At least, the people above ground thought it was there; but from the poor creature lying in the grave "Gloria Mundi" has departed for ever. His coffin might have been filled with diamonds, but he would not have known it—crowns, sceptres might have been laid there with him, but to him they would have been naught. "Gloria Mundi" in the tomb is one of the most ridiculous ideas of man.

At the time of the great French Revolution the mob burst open the tombs of the Kings of France, and a little black earth was all they found in some.

There was some "Gloria Mundi" there in the shape of silver sceptres, coronets, rings, etc.; they were all taken away; the coffins were melted down to be made into bullets; and the bones and bodies of the Sovereigns who had reigned over France for fourteen centuries were all thrown into a pit near the church, and the grass now grows over their common graves.

A QUIET POOL.

See p. 119.

Alexander the Great finding Diogenes in a charnel-house, asked him what he was seeking. He answered, "I am seeking for your father's bones, and those of my slave; but I cannot find them, because there is no difference in their dust."

The great Charlemagne built a chapel for his own burial, and there he was laid in great state—"Gloria Mundi" and he having, so far as "Gloria Mundi" could take a part in it, and so far as he could take a part, the vault to themselves. There the corpse was seated in a throne-like chair of white marble, arrayed in royal robes, crowned, sceptred, and with his familiar pilgrim's pouch by his side. In silence and in night there had he sat for nearly two hundred years; but at last one, Otto III., broke into the sepulchre, and poor Charlemagne was treated no better than a fowl, bone being separated from bone, and almost all the little bits which went to make up the great monarch when he was alive, being distributed about, here and there—and relic-hunters, and saint-mongers, and monasteries and shrines, got possession of what was left of his clothes and of his bones.

So that of him and many like him, who filled the world with their name, we may again take up the poet's words:—

> "What is their prosperous estate,
> When high, exalted, and elate
> With power and pride?
> What but a transient gleam of light—
> A flame, which, glaring at its height,
> Grew dim and died?"

Yes; if we looked onward, the grave would be the great corrective of the dazzling and deceit of "Gloria Mundi." Man walketh in a vain show and disquieteth himself in vain, and in one form or another "Gloria Mundi" has much to answer for as to this. The law of this world, and of all belonging to it, is this—"the world passeth away, and the lust thereof"; the heart would sink but for what follows—"but he that doeth the will of God abideth for ever": not here, but in "the world without end." Even

> "A life of honour and of worth
> Has no eternity on earth—
> 'T is but a name;
> And yet its glory far exceeds
> That base and sensual life which leads > To want and shame."

It may be that many of my readers say, "Oh, I have nothing to do with 'Gloria Mundi.' I am in very middling circumstances; I am nobody. I don't put up for being a statesman, or a soldier, or a man of mark; I don't keep a carriage with silver harness; I haven't a coachman with a full-bottomed wig, nor a pair of footmen with two pairs of silk-stockinged calves behind my carriage."

A word with you, if you please, Mrs. De-la-Nie. Now, you know very well that your name is Delany, and I want to know why you call yourself De-la-Nie. I want to know why you repudiate that honest name, which is "Delany" over the grocer's shop in William Street, but which is De-la-Nie in your semi-detached in the suburbs.

I want to know, Mrs. Delany, why you get out of the tram at the corner of your road, and walk up the rest of the way, when you know you are sometimes so dead beat coming from town that you'd be thankful (if only your neighbours couldn't see them) if the rails were laid right through the hall door, or, still better, the back door of the semi-detached, right up to your sofa, and if without more ado the gallant conductor handed you out of the tram into your arm-chair.

When you gave a little dinner-party—for the semi-detached would not hold a great many—and when Mr. Rayson, with whom your husband has commercial dealings, after a great deal of difficulty was hooked, with Mrs. Rayson, to dinner, I want to know why you didn't entertain them according to your means, and why you splashed out with a hired epergne, and with a guinea pine-apple, and with two German waiters to attend.

I have not done with you, Mrs. Delany; I should not have done with you if I wrote six pages instead of three. It is very rude to make a remark on a lady's dress—I know that, Mrs. Delany—unless it be to say how well she looks in it: then it is admissible. But I am not going to say that of you. I am afraid I am going to say just the contrary, if I say anything on the matter at all.

"Well, why have you that velvet dress?"

"It was bought for dear Juliana's wedding."

"And what business had you to buy it for Juliana's wedding?"

"Oh, she was marrying the descendant of a man whose godfather was knighted in the reign of Queen Anne; and, moreover, there were going to be some folk at the wedding who knew some other folk in high life, and I thought I must be equal to the occasion."

"'Gloria Mundi,' Mrs. Delany: you carried it on your head in that bonnet as much as if you had on a crown. You carried it on your back, Mrs. Delany, as much as if you were in Coronation robes; you had it in your hand in the form of that three-guinea bouquet, as much as if you held a sceptre. The world was on your head, and on your back, and, worst of all, Mrs. Delany, it was in your heart. You had no business to give more than seven-and-sixpence for a bouquet; you had no business to buy a velvet dress; the bonnet is the only thing which by stretching a point I can excuse—but the world, and the glory of being as good as others (it may be a little better), the delight of being thought, as you supposed, a well-dressed woman—a somebody—or at any rate not a nobody, was too strong for you. 'Gloria Mundi' pinched the dinner-table at the semi-detached, and tightened several domestic economies for some time, and made Mr. Delany cross, and nothing good came out of it after all. For you were observed and commented on as a woman whose face didn't match with her back, nor her bouquet with her hands (you know you shouldn't have taken off your gloves), and one of the kind ones repeated this to you; and so, when your little strut was over, 'Gloria Mundi' took its departure and that velvet was not likely to have a chance of being used—nobody knows when again—and, like Charlemagne, it is practically entombed, to be disinterred, no doubt, some day, for what melancholy cutting-up purposes who can tell?"

O world! you are full of Mrs. Delanies, from Duchess Delanies down to Charwomen Delanies, and the "Gloria" must pass from you all.

But could there be a Charwoman Delany—or De-la-Nie?—Yes, indeed; her "Gloria Mundi" is of the glow-worm type, shining, so to speak, in the hedge—but it is "Gloria" to her, and in her little world, all the same. For "Gloria Mundi" is of various kinds, and is in different forms for different people. Mrs. Scrubs, our laundress, carries about a brass brooch with a piece of glass in it, wherewith she cuts out, and makes look small, and desires to annihilate Mrs. Softsope the charwoman, and all her ilk. In her own estimation, at any rate, she is as big as Charlemagne was in his.

What a dream the whole thing is! There go the scarlet liveries, the coach all painted and gilt; the trumpets sound, the people shout. And an hour after the whole thing is as though it had never been; a cab with the shilling fare has possession of the road, the rumble of carts, and the bawling of costers, take the place of cornet, trumpet, and drum. Where is it all? "Gloria Mundi," you passed by very fast; it wasn't worth while having to stand on tip-toe to see you, besides being trodden on in the matter of a susceptible toe, and dug into the ribs by the elbows of a lean and sharp female, and almost rolled over by the avalanche of a very fat one, and having the small of my back—O English language! help me to an expressive word. I have it!—thank you for them both—"worrited," "gouged," by an umbrella. Ah! that lady, I am sure, had a new ferrule on that umbrella during the preceding week, and it must have been made of steel, which my vertebræ, I feel quite sure—or as nearly sure as any man can be of anything—are not. A very few hours—sometimes a very few minutes—does "Gloria Mundi" last; and very little, that I can find, does it leave behind.

"Gloria Mundi!" The statesman has had it in his way, the Sovereign has had it in his, the society man has had it in his, the intellectual man in his; even, after a fashion, supremely ridiculous as it is, those who have but little of this world's position or wealth have had it in theirs; and where is it all now? Past; and very few indeed are the cases in which it has left anything behind.

Well, all this being so, what has it got to say to us? A good deal. The world, and the things of the world, and the conditions of the world, are all of use to us if we use them aright—

> "Did we but use it as we ought,
> This world would school each wandering thought
> To its high state.
> Faith wings the soul beyond the sky,
> Up to that better land on high
> For which we wait."

The very realisation of the transitoriness of the world's glory would be our best preservative—or, anyhow, one of the best preservatives—against it. "All these will I give thee, and the glory of them," would be a Satanic temptation less powerful than it often is now.

And not only of the world's glory, but of all that therein is. The chrysanthemums which this young girl had plucked to decorate her home will soon fade, it may be that her day-dream of life will soon fade too. It is but a few moments ago that I heard of the death of a beautiful girl—a friend of mine—which shall I say, "that she faded from a twelve-month home," or "that a twelve-month earthly home faded away from her"? Ah, it matters not which. She was a beautiful flower in every way for the owner to pluck. These chrysanthemums, my child, will fade, as will all of earthly homes; the flowers of the heavenly homes, and they alone, fade never—never.

These are some of the lessons which a due estimate of "Gloria Mundi" teaches us:—

One is, not to envy those who have the "Gloria." When we envy, we little know what a silly thing we are doing. The very people we envy are often bored to death with what we envy them for. Perhaps their being used to the possession of what we and others so much admire makes it of little moment to them. We know that possession often brings indifference.

If you envy anyone what he has, and want to change with him, you must do so all round; and perhaps you would get more than you bargain for, if you did.

Very often those you envy have not as much as you think. George the Third, in one of his walks, met with a scare-bird boy sitting on a gate. The boy did not know the king—he said he was in Georgey's service, and that all he got was his wittles and his clothes. "And that is all that I have," said the king. So it is: it comes down, more or less, to one's petty personality at the last.

Envy no one—mind that. Envy can turn all you have, and are, into gall.

Do not put undue value on anything. See how much "Gloria Mundi" is in it; and take all that out before you settle the price. "What will it profit a man if he gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?" will be something very useful to remember when you are at your appraising work.

Remember that most things have a fictitious as well as a real value; and a great deal of the fictitious is "Gloria Mundi."

Even if you could get "Gloria Mundi," remember how short a time you can keep it. The world itself will soon jostle you out of it, and sometimes too in a very unexpected, and perhaps disagreeable way. Haman had a good deal of it; he was up as high as he could go—but, alas! Mordecai was a dead fly in the apothecary's ointment, and he was sent a little higher; the "Gloria Mundi" of the king's gate was gone, and there was none on the top of the gallows twenty cubits high.

Let us not sacrifice the true for the untrue, like the unwise dog, which dropped the real bone, as he crossed the bridge, to grasp the shadow which he saw in the water. O dog! you were no more foolish than many a man.

Let us be satisfied to see much pass us by. Many a fine carriage passes me on the road; I have to be content that I am not in it—I am thankful for the temporary use of my legs. There is no "Gloria Mundi" about a pair of strong boots, but they keep out the wet. And I think people in carriages often catch cold.

But let us not be dead to the idea of glory. Only let us be filled with the idea of "Gloria Dei," and not of "Gloria Mundi"—that which is not of the world, but of God. There is honour which cometh from God only—there is glory, and honour, and immortality for even those who seek for it by patient continuance in well-doing. There is a crown of glory which fadeth not away: and there let my heart be set, where the true joys are to be found.

Even earth's fairest flowers warn me to look away from the earth in which they grow; they show me to-day a brilliant colour and a perfect form, and to-morrow a faded bloom, a shrivelled leaf. And for him that hath ears to hear they are eloquent in their decay, and what they whisper to us is this—"Sic transit

INTERNATIONAL SERIES.

DECEMBER 15TH. SOLOMON'S FALL.

To read—1 Kings xi. 4—13. Golden Text—1 Cor. x. 12.

I. SOLOMON'S SIN (4—8). So far, Solomon's has been a glorious reign. Remind of what he was, and what he had done.

(c) Had built a magnificent temple for the Lord.

But now in his old age he goes astray. What was the cause?

(a) Display—making houses, vineyards, walled cities (ix. 17, etc.) to increase his own glory and splendour.

(b) Riches—given him to make a good use of, but used for self-gratification. (See Eccles. ii. 8.)

(c) Pleasure—having a large number of wives.

See what special warnings God had given in His law against these three very things. (Read Deut. xvii. 16, 17.) What was expressly forbidden?

And what was expressly commanded for the king? (Deut. xvii. 18, 19.)

Solomon had broken these commands and neglected these duties. Hence was led into fresh sin. What was that?

Set up places of worship for false gods!

Ashtoreth—goddess of the Zidonians.

Milcom (or Molech)—fire-god of the Ammonites, to whom living children were offered in sacrifice (2 Kings xxiii. 10).

Chemosh—god of the Moabites.

And gradually similar places for the gods worshipped by his other wives.

What a terrible sight in the holy city Jerusalem!

The king who built the temple building heathen altars.

The king's wives sacrificing and burning incense to false gods.

LESSONS. Solomon's three sins very common still. (1 John ii. 16.)

1. Lust of the flesh—indulging the body.
2. Lust of the eyes—love of show and display.
3. Pride of life—forgetting God.

Take heed lest ye fall. (Golden text.)

II. SOLOMON'S PUNISHMENT. No wonder God was displeased! What had God done for him?

(a) Appeared to him twice. (iii. 5, ix. 2.)

(c) Warned him expressly against this very sin. What was the punishment to be?

Yet see how God remembers mercy.

LESSONS. 1. Pride goes before a fall.

2. I will sing of mercy and judgment.

DECEMBER 22. CLOSE OF SOLOMON'S REIGN.

To read—1 Kings xi. 26—43. Golden Text—Eccles. xii. 13.

I. SOLOMON'S SUCCESSOR. (26—40.) Solomon's troubles began with his sin.

Two adversaries had already risen up against him.

Hadad, an Edomite, who obtained help from Pharaoh. (22.)

Rezon, who made a rebellion in Damascus. (24.)

Now another formidable opponent appears—

Jeroboam, of tribe of Ephraim, a servant of the king. Notice—

His character. Mighty man of valour.

Industrious and trustworthy.

His position. At first set over city of Millo.

Afterwards ruler over whole tribe of Joseph, i.e., Ephraim and Manasseh.

Thus accustomed to rule, being trained for future work.

His call. From God, who sent the prophet Ahijah to him.

The story told to him of Solomon's sin and intended punishment.

Solomon's son to have one tribe left to him. Why?

His sign. His garment rent by the prophet as Saul's garment (1 Sam. xv. 27) had been rent by Samuel.

His commission. To reign over the ten tribes of Israel.

His security. To walk in God's ways and keep His statutes. (Golden text.)

His future. Should have a sure house, i.e., be firmly established in the kingdom.

Such was God's intention for Jeroboam. What did Solomon do when he heard it? Sought his life. How different was David's way of taking his punishment! He bowed to God's ordering, e.g., when his child died (2 Sam. xii. 20), and when the destroying angel drew near to Jerusalem. (2 Sam. xxiv. 17.)

LESSONS. 1. Who can resist God's will?

2. Humble yourselves under the mighty hand of God.

II. SOLOMON'S DEATH. (41—43.) Died after a reign of forty years, and received honoured burial. Notice about his reign—

It was long—forty years—same length as Saul's and David's.

It was prosperous. God honoured and blessed him.

It was sad at the close—like a brilliant day ending in a dark bank of clouds at sunset.

LESSON. Be thou in the fear of God all the day.

DECEMBER 29. REVIEW OF THE QUARTER'S LESSONS.

HAVE had twelve lessons on reigns of David and Solomon.

What have been the leading facts?

I. CIVIL. The twelve tribes at first all united under King David—the country prosperous. Enemies refrain from attacking. Alliances made with foreign kings, such as Hiram, king of Tyre, and the Queen of Sheba.

BUT at last the kingdom to be divided into two parts, because of Solomon's forsaking God.

LESSONS. 1. Fear God, honour the king.

2. God makes a good man's enemies at peace with him.

3. How good and pleasant it is to dwell together in unity!

4. Evil shall pursue sinners.

II. RELIGIOUS. 1. The ark brought with great rejoicing to Zion.

2. The temple built and dedicated to God.

BUT altars built by Solomon for heathen gods.

LESSONS. 1. We have thought of Thy lovingkindness in the midst of Thy temple. (Ps. xlviii. 9.)

2. I was glad when they said, Let us go into the house of the Lord. (Ps. cxxii. 1.)

3. What concord hath Christ with Belial? (2 Cor. vi. 15.)

III. PERSONAL. 1. David serving God fully.

BUT giving way to great sin with Bathsheba and Uriah.

Forgiven on his repentance.

2. Solomon asking for wisdom.

BUT letting pleasure lead him into folly.

LESSONS. 1. Let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall. (1 Cor. x. 12.)

2. If we confess our sins He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins. (1 St. John i. 9.)

3. Know thou that for all these things God shall bring thee into judgment. (Eccles. xi. 9.)

IV. DOMESTIC—

1. David grieves over Absalom dying in his rebellion.

2. David commends his son Solomon to the elders.

3. Solomon, to please his wives, builds altars to strange gods.

LESSONS. 1. A foolish son is a grief to his father. (Prov. xvii. 25.)

2. Hear instruction of thy father. (Prov. i. 8.)

3. Turn not to the right hand nor to the left; remove thy foot from evil. (Prov. iv. 27.)

V. GENERAL. We are taught during this period—

1. The beauty of holiness.—God's house, God's people, are all sanctified to His service. Must be holy as He is holy.

2. Sin must be punished.—A king's sin, a son's sin, a nation's sin. There is no respect of persons with God.

3. There is forgiveness.—David was forgiven. Solomon lived to see his folly, and was pardoned.

INTERNATIONAL LESSONS. FIRST QUARTER.

JANUARY 5TH, 1890.—THE FORERUNNER ANNOUNCED.

To read—St. Luke i. 5—17. Golden Text—Mat. iii. 1.

I. INTRODUCTION.—Begin a new course of lessons with New Year. The life of Jesus Christ as told by St. Luke. Message of salvation through Christ called a "Gospel," or good-news. St. Luke's Gospel, written for Gentiles, tells most about the human life of Christ—His birth, boyhood, daily life, etc.—but first of all tells of the messenger sent to announce His coming, and prepare the way.

II. THE FATHER. (5—9.) Always interesting to know something of the parents of a great man. Notice about Zacharias—

(a) He was a priest of the course of Abia—one of twenty-four courses appointed by David for regular service of the temple. (1 Chron. xxxiv. 19.)

(c) He and his wife Elizabeth were godly.

III. THE ANGEL. (10—12.) The time—of public prayer and worship—either 9 a.m. or 3 p.m.

The place—the Holy place at the altar of incense—i.e., the table of acacia wood. (Ex. xxx. 1.)

The messenger—an angel sent by God from heaven, probably bright and spirit-like.

The appearance—sudden and unexpected—causing fear, as it did to Manoah (Judges xiii. 6, 22), and to the Shepherds (chap. ii. 9.)

IV. THE MESSAGE. (13—17.) God has heard Zacharias' prayer. A son shall be given him—to be called John. Notice these points.

To make people ready for coming of Christ.

The meek spirit and mighty energy of Elijah.

LESSONS. 1. Why was Zacharias so honoured?

Because a man of faith, prayer, holiness.

2. How was St. John to be great?

In character, office, and success.

3. Why is this greatness best?

Because it is within the reach of all, and it lasts.

4. How can we copy Zacharias and St. John?

By serving God, and being diligent in prayer.

JANUARY 12TH. THE SONG OF MARY.

To read—St. Luke i. 46—55. Golden text—verses 46—47.

I. INTRODUCTION. Last lesson told of angel's visit to Zacharias. Six months later same angel Gabriel sent to Virgin Mary at Nazareth, told her she should be the mother of the Saviour—also told her of her cousin Elizabeth. Mary leaves home to visit her cousin. Journeys from Nazareth to Judæa. Arrives at house of Zacharias. Tells her tale. Elizabeth speaks of the high honour of receiving a visit from her. Mary breaks out into hymn of praise.

II. PERSONAL. (46—49.) Praise to God for His personal mercies to her.

She was poor—only able to offer pair of turtle doves instead of a lamb. (Compare Lev. xii. 8, and chap. ii. 24.)

She was of humble birth.

Yet rich in being the mother of Christ.

Would be held in honour by all generations.

Truly God was through her doing great things: a great thing that a Virgin should bear a son; and that Christ long looked for should now be born.

LESSONS. How are we like Mary?

Poor, lowly as regards this world.

Yet God always doing great things for us. What?

We have knowledge of this same Saviour.

We have blessings through this same Saviour.

We should daily praise Him for His personal goodness to us.

II. GENERAL. (50—55.) Nothing selfish in Mary's song of praise.

God's goodness to her similar to that shown to all the world.

Example:—Hannah blessed with a godly son, Samuel. (1 Sam. i. 20.)

Example:—David enabled to kill the giant.

(c) Proud put down, and their devices made of none effect.

Example:—Chief priests in plots against Christ.

Example:—Nebuchadnezzar driven from his kingdom. (Dan. v. 21.)

Example:—David, a shepherd, became a mighty king.

(f) Hungry filled. Examples:—(a) Feeding five thousand. (b) Descent of Holy Ghost on Apostles.

(g) Israel helped—in remembrance of promised mercy.

Example:—People restored after captivity in Babylon. (Ezra ii. 1.)

(h) Covenant kept. In Abraham's seed all the world was to be blessed. (Gen. xii. 3.)

Christ, lifted up, draws all men unto Him. (St. John xii. 32.)

LESSONS. 1. God's goodness to be remembered.

2. God's mercies continue to all generations.

3. God's faithfulness knows no end.

THE CHILDREN'S HYMN.

SWEET Saviour, once again the year
Brings to the happy earth
The season, held for ever dear,
On which we hail Thy birth!

While hall and cot, for Thy dear sake,
With leaves and boughs are drest,
We need Thee in our homes to make
Our Christmas doubly blest.

We think of Thee as once a Child
Who sought a mother's face,
An Infant, innocent and mild,
Who grew in years and grace.

Our wills and tempers, Lord, control,
And give us eyes to see
The tender heart, the loving soul,
The mind that was in Thee!

J. R. EASTWOOD.

"ON THE SPUR OF THE MOMENT."

THE senate-house has resounded hour after hour and night after night with the eloquence of rival party-leaders, measuring oratorical weapons in a great debate. But a critical moment comes for which the managers of Ins and Outs are equally unprepared. A speaker usually verbose has for once been brief, and every calculation is awry. Unless someone rises to the rescue, the debate will collapse. Only the members who with conspicuous self-denial "make a house" while others dine are here, and not one of their number seems immediately desirous of catching Mr. Speaker's eye. The pause grows awkward. Suddenly it is ended by the first tremulous sentences of a maiden speech. A hitherto silent member has got upon his feet on the spur of the occasion, and is putting the old and wearisome arguments in a surprisingly new way before an interested, if scanty, audience. His listeners did not know that he had it in him. He is astonished at his own temerity, and ignorant yet of his own powers. But the breaking of the ice is everything. If the veil of the future could be lifted, it would be seen that the first step has been taken in a brilliant career.

The next scene is widely different. It is laid amidst pleasant trees, very nigh to a grand old manor-house. Rustic festivities connected with the coming of age of the heir to the estate are in full swing. But cares creep in even upon gala hours. There are present whispering tongues which poison truth; and a young girl listens as in a dream to the smooth protestations of a man she does not love, and who is found at her side simply because she is an heiress; and yonder another woman winds a web of flattery about the feet of the hero of the day, who is dearer than life to the resentful watcher. The sight is a keen pain, and at the moment of sharpest smart—looking back on acts and words that seem now belied—the calculated question comes: "Will you be my wife?" Pique, and pique only, dictates the answer: "Yes." And on the spur of an evil moment, a pledge has been given which pride will never allow to be revoked, and a long life-tragedy begins.

Again place and people are changed. This is a waiting-room in a great railway station. An intending traveller, whose erect form, and stiff carriage, and stern face and forehead, with the storm-line crossing it, all indicate possession of strong passions and an iron will, comes briskly in out of the searching winter wind. But he stops—irresolute, perturbed—on the threshold. Standing by the grateful fire is a duplicate, but younger, copy of himself. It is a brother, long alienated through the usual cause: faults on both sides. Neither has planned the meeting; either would have gone five miles out of his way to avoid the other. But a strange impulse, making for reconciliation, carries the new-comer forward after the first quick recoil. He holds out a hand. Do the few spectators see an olive-branch in it?

"How d'ye do? All well at home?" he hoarsely asks, and the hand is shaken, and the queries are answered, and an old feud is safely buried, and if indeed a wild nor'-easter is blowing outside, here is warmth and peace, and within two hearts the airs of summer are at large.

Life-vignettes are these, and perhaps they have their several lessons concerning that common crisis in everybody's days which is spoken of as a die cast—maybe irrevocably—at the bidding of caprice, or passion, or a generous emotion, or at a sudden glimpse of flying opportunity

The first has been placed last here, but its intrinsic importance is not least. Many definitions of genius can be unearthed, in lexicons and elsewhere, but the facets of that gem baffle the inquisitor. Yet if the great gift has been fairly described under one aspect as the faculty of taking infinite pains, it may surely, with as much propriety, be sketched from another point of view as the knack of fitting effort to season, adventure to the challenge of events, the song to the silence, the utterance of wit or wisdom to the hour of intellectual twilight. It is related of Fenimore Cooper, the creator of "Leather-stocking," one of the most original and striking characters in all fiction, that he literally formed the decision which made him a writer on the spur of the moment. He had been reading an excessively dull tale, and he lost his patience and threw the book down in disgust. "I could do better than this myself!" he cried. And he set to work and verified his statement, and became America's first noteworthy writer of fiction. Charles Reade has left it on record that reading the Times newspaper on a certain September day in 1853, he came upon a passage which touched his heart, and then and there inflamed his imagination, and gave him the motif of his first important work, "It is Never Too Late to Mend." It was by action taken upon the spur of the moment that Daniel Webster achieved one of his earliest successes at the bar, and took a long stride towards eminence. He was advocating the cause of a poor man, who was being wronged by a rich one. Convinced of the existence of fraud, he yet had no evidence that he could lay before the court, until examining an adverse witness of little or no education, he stumbled on the trail of the deceit. A legal phrase came rather too glibly from the man's lips, and it darted upon Webster's mind that the witness was reciting a lesson. He determined, in his own phrase, to "make a spoon or spoil a horn." And deliberately walking across to the witness-stand, he demanded the paper from which the man was testifying.

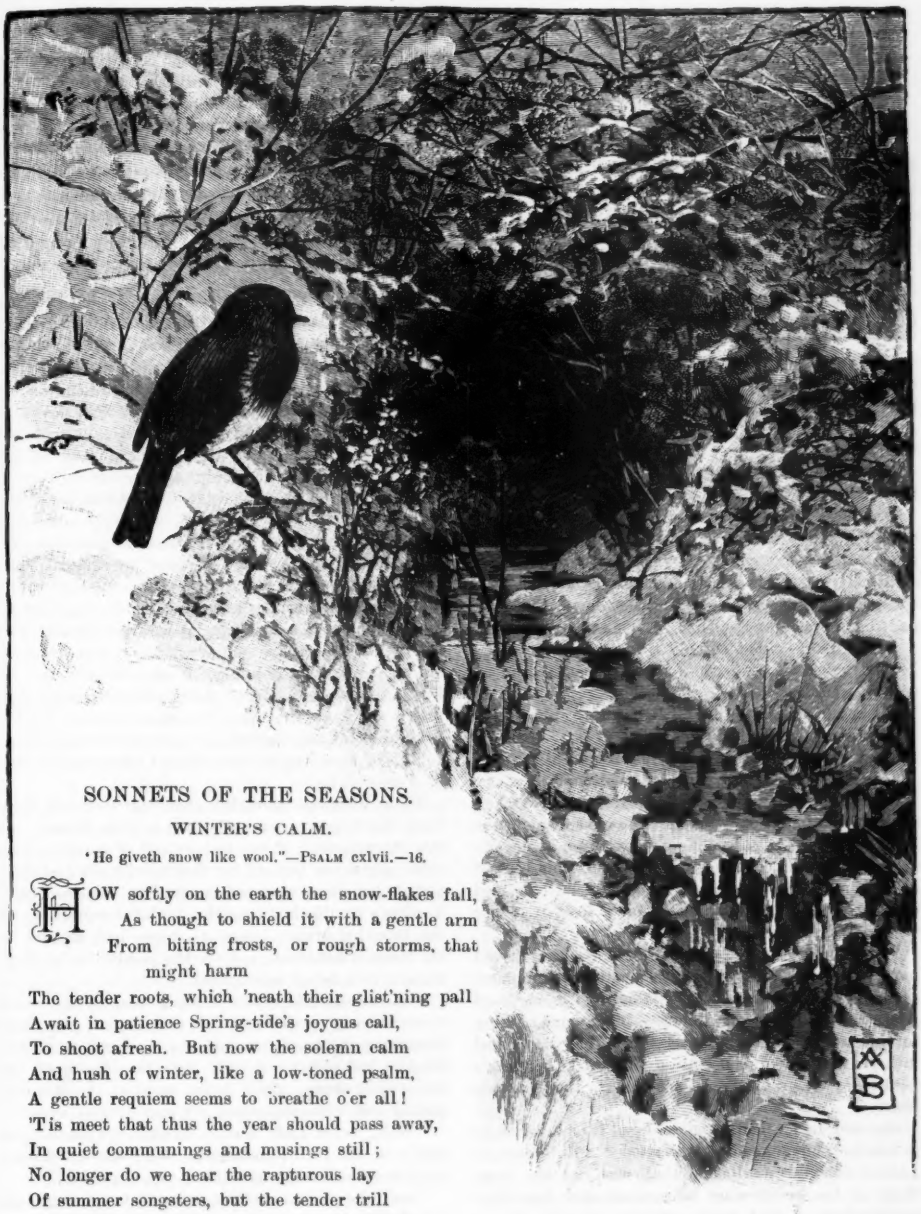
Confused and magnetically impressed, the witness drew it from his pocket. Webster's victory was secure. One last illustration: Sherwin, the eminent engraver, and the favourite pupil of Bartolozzi, was in early years a wood-cutter, employed on the estate of a Mr. Mitford, near Petworth, Surrey. It happened one day that he was called into the drawing-room to receive some instructions from his master. The young ladies of the house were sketching, and Sherwin watched them with so much interest that he was lightly asked if he could do anything in that way. It was the challenge of opportunity, and Sherwin met it. He took the offered crayon, and produced a sketch that surprised all present, and that on exhibition to the Society of Arts gained for the untaught, but not unskilled, artist the Society's silver medal. A bevy of laughing girls had done young Sherwin a notable service.

It is the incontestable truth that a rise in life has often resulted from a gallant effort made on the spur of the moment, and very possibly with a hope in the breast so feeble and faint as to be hardly distinguishable from despair. Stimulus should be found in the fact. If an enterprise is lawful, and devoid of other risk than that of disappointment, and unexpected opportunity seems to beckon, the inward prompting to a forward step is best obeyed. The story of our captains of industry, of our inventors, of our merchant princes, of the honoured heroes in every department of life and labour, is largely a story of timely advance.

The next typical picture involves a set of sadder considerations. To be put upon one's mettle is sometimes to have dormant powers called into activity, or to reveal to surprised observers worth that otherwise might remain for long unsuspected. But to be tempted by influences that belong to the worst side of human nature into rash decisions is to invite misery, and put a premium on defeat. The suggestions that come to us in some instant of crisis from the sinister source of passion need to be examined with exceeding care, and with an apprehension of conceivable consequences, near and remote, that is rarely secured in the seasons when the mind seems a maëlstrom. Mistakes are so easy; rectification is so hard. There is a familiar and pitiful example in the case of the wife of Richard Arkwright, the inventor of the spinning-frame. In the outset of his active career, Arkwright was a barber at Bolton, and his thoughts were continually brooding over mechanical problems that had little relation to his trade. Mrs. Arkwright was impatient at apparent neglect of the main chance, and one day an unkind and a dangerous impulse came to her. On the spur of the moment she destroyed a number of her husband's models of machinery, the product of prodigious pains, and even thus early the proofs of his budding genius. She had shattered more than a few ingenious hints at coming labour-saving appliances. The home concord was gone, never to return. The act led to a permanent separation between husband and wife. Regrets come to us all, but they would be fewer if we were less prone to yield to the spell of chagrin or temper. It may almost be entered as an axiom amongst the rules of life that whenever the impulse of the instant has its origin in self-love, second (and third) thoughts are best.

But not invariably so when it is a generous, kindly, self-sacrificing, forgiving inclination which gets us abruptly into its grip. It is said that a pathetic story of a living lady writer, dealing with the wretchedness of a divided house, has so beneficently influenced some of its readers that long-estranged hearts have been brought once more together, and bound with the golden band of love. Such happy repentance—the knowledge of which must be a rich reward, for the writer—was surely quick in its manifestation. A great wrong has been done; yes, but is not alienation a greater wrong yet? If the feeling that it is time for everybody's sake that bygones were bygones moves the heart to an effort at reconciliation, it is well to act on the spur of the moment, to go out and tap at the neglected door, to speak the healing word, to sit down at the desk and write the magnanimous letter. Surely this is the teaching of our third simple parable.

What of the last of these life-vignettes? Do we not all know these Reubens of to-day who are unstable as water, and cannot excel, who are the slaves, and not the masters of circumstance, whose wills bear the mark of every successive mould into which events cast them, who are at the mercy of stronger men, who are always acting on the spur of the moment? These are our failures, industrial, political, social, and, alas! moral. They promise well when fancy looks upward to the high places to which stout heart and sure foot may hope to climb. They volunteer for service in every field. But quite as quickly they swerve from the toilsome path, or desert in the face of the enemy. They are persistent in nothing except irresolution. Under pressure of conviction, when faults are pointed out, they repent, and vow amends, and under stress of new temptation—"just this once"—they repeat the old folly.



But to weave into a noble and lovely pattern the web of our days, we must have staying power as well as beginning power. To venture forth on the spur of the moment and attempt a new work is sometimes a wise, if a daring procedure. But not if the heart is soon to faint, and the hands to tire.

To gain life's successes, to earn in any sphere—even the lowliest—to earn a good name, and the commendation of conscience, there must be a stern resistance to many foes, within and without, that in unwary moments menace persistency of aim or integrity of conduct. A watch must be kept against freaks that would also be falls.

The subject is many-sided. Surveying the great field of mystery which we call human life, and realizing how large a part apparent accident plays in determining the progress whether of the individual or of the race, feeling how inexplicable are often our own most weighty decisions, and how trivial a thing may issue in momentous change, it is a deep solace and joy to know that through every devious way an unerring Providence guides the children of the King. The world is not given up to chance. "On the spur of the moment" may perhaps sometimes be man's phrase to designate the leadings of the Power ——"that shapes our ends, Rough-hew them how we will."

WINTER'S CALM.

'He giveth snow like wool."—PSALM cxlvii.—16.

HOW softly on the earth the snow-flakes fall,
As though to shield it with a gentle arm
From biting frosts, or rough storms, that might harm
The tender roots, which 'neath their glist'ning pall Await in patience Spring-tide's joyous call,
To shoot afresh. But now the solemn calm
And hush of winter, like a low-toned psalm,
A gentle requiem seems to breathe o'er all!
'Tis meet that thus the year should pass away,
In quiet communings and musings still;
No longer do we hear the rapturous lay
Of summer songsters, but the tender trill
Of trustful robins cheers the short-lived day,
From alders, drooping o'er the silenced rill!

WORTHY TO BE LOVED.

BY E. NEAL, AUTHOR OF "MY BROTHER BASIL," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER V.

LADY ROSALIE'S NEIGHBOURS.

"Along the cool sequestered vale of life,
They kept the noiseless tenor of their way."—GRAY.

LADY VEREKER and Lancelot drove home together along the leafy Warwickshire lanes, where the trees met across the narrowest places, and the hedges on either hand were starred with dog-roses, and the banks gay with stitchwort and ragged-robin.

The tender evening light lay on the broad green fields; there was a faint blue mist under the distant trees, while the sunset shimmered through the nearer branches, and turned their leaves to gold. The square tower of Warwick Church rose above the meadows, recalling both to mother and cousin the distant "Maudlin" where their boy was, as they both fondly imagined, working hard for his degree; and neither spoke till the great tower, with its airy pinnacles, was out of sight. It had been a very silent drive all the way, for both had been busy with their own thoughts, and disinclined for speech.

"Well, Lance, what do you think of her?" Lady Vereker asked at last; and Lancelot answered, in an odd, constrained voice—

"It is not what I think, but what Ray thinks that matters, isn't it?"

"Ray cannot help thinking her beautiful."

"He did—at Easter," said Lancelot drily.

"It is only three months ago," said Lady Vereker, with some impulse of defence. The next moment she laid her hand on Lancelot's arm with an apologetic gesture. It seemed almost a wrong to this best of cousins and of friends that she should have deemed defence needed. But Lancelot only looked at her with a radiant smile.

"Did you ever know a fancy of Ray's that lasted more than two?" he cried, with a sort of triumphant gladness she could not understand. The sight of Avice had made her very doubtful if any man's liking for her would be the passing fancy that Ray's had hitherto been, and consolation built on her son's fickleness was scarcely acceptable to the mother's heart.

She and Lance had often deplored it or laughed at it together, but somehow there seemed a difference in Lance's tone, an exultation that was not the same thing as the overflowing admiration and love that could afford to find fault, because every fault was held at worst a virtue in disguise. Fickle? Of course Raymond was fickle, they had agreed a hundred times, but it only meant that he was so impulsive and warm-hearted, and so generously ready to believe in everyone. It was not his fault if his idols fell short of his first expectations, and the celerity with which they succeeded each other only showed the hopefulness of his nature and the goodness of his heart.

This was how Lady Vereker and Lancelot had hitherto spoken of the little weaknesses that proved Sir Raymond mortal; but the mother's fine ear detected a difference in Lancelot's tone to-night. He said no more, whipping up the ponies and driving silently along the sweet silent lanes, and Lady Vereker leant back amongst her cushions, silent as himself.

Her own feelings were too perplexing and engrossing to allow her to speculate on Lancelot's. While she had been under the spell of Avice's beauty, under the magic of the soft serious glances and sweet magnetic tones, she had not been able to resist their influence, or to regret that the girl her boy was said to hold dear was such a one as this. Even the almost professional singing that jarred on the aristocratic ears of Sir Raymond's mother had only half broken the spell. But now, as she drove through the familiar lanes, the feelings which had been temporarily in abeyance, overpowered by the onrush of new emotions, re-asserted their sway. Avice Meredith she still confessed to be of a beauty she had never seen before, with looks of marvellous sweetness, and a manner of quite exceptional charm; but it was not a question of beauty, of sweetness, or of manner, but of suitability. Was this unknown friend of Lady Rosalie Finch's, of whose pedigree Lady Rosalie frankly confessed she knew nothing, was she—however beautiful and sweet and charming she might be—was she, or could she be, a fitting bride for Sir Raymond Vereker of Verecroft?

These were the thoughts that had weighed upon Lady Vereker ever since she had left the Rosery. It was characteristic of her, and, indeed, of Lancelot also, that—given the fact of Sir Raymond's admiration—neither had for a moment doubted its return. Lady Vereker's trouble had been the doubtful suitability of the intended bride; Lancelot's hopes had centred on his cousin's fickleness, not on the possibility of Raymond's love being unrequited.

And meanwhile, Lady Rosalie and Avice were unconsciously retaliating on the guests who were discussing them. Hilda had not returned, and Lady Rosalie had thrown herself into the largest of the many easy-chairs, while Avice stood at the window, gazing out with abstracted air and dreamy eyes.

"Well," cried Lady Rosalie briskly, "what do you think of the future mamma? Will she do, Avice? And do you like her as well as you expected?"

"As if I expected anything!" said Avice, laughing. "And I was not thinking of Lady Vereker."

"You own the soft impeachment, then?" said Lady Rosalie. "I expected you would affect a blushing ignorance, and ask me whom I meant."

"Not when I knew. I own to nothing but the possession of an average amount of intelligence, but after all the nonsense you have talked about Sir Raymond, half the average amount would have enabled me to know you referred to Lady Vereker."

There was a flash in Miss Meredith's eyes that made Lady Rosalie disinclined to argue the question.

"Well," she said placably, "and how do you like her?"

"Better than she likes me, I fancy. She looks sweet and good—not at all like her son."

"Isn't he sweet and good?" cried Lady Rosalie, with many notes of exclamation in her voice. "Is that how you speak of an absent friend?"

"I don't mean that, of course," in half-offended tones. "Those are not words one applies to a man. But they just fit Lady Vereker. She is certainly sweet and good, and I could imagine her being very fascinating. I think she would be so to anyone she liked; but she did not like me."

"My dear, that is nonsense. I am sure she admired you immensely."

"Oh, very likely," said Avice calmly; "but admiring and liking are different things."

Miss Meredith was quite above the affectation of pretending to be ignorant of her own good looks. The average intelligence she modestly claimed made modesty on this score simply impossible. She neither ignored her beauty nor held it cheap, but was grateful for it, as she was for her fine voice and English birth, for her mother and her sister, and whatever other good gifts a kind Providence had bestowed upon her for no merit of her own. It was not a gift she would have coveted, she thought.

"Does any woman want to be loved because her nose is straight, or her eyes a darker grey than other people's?" she had said with some indignation, when Lady Rosalie had prophesied "crowds of lovers" on the ground of these distinctions. But that was when she first came back from Germany, three months ago, and since that she had found a dignified indifference the best defence against Lady Rosalie's too open admiration. She was very fond of Lady Rosalie, but there was a strain of over-familiarity in the kind, big, fussy woman that set Avice's nerves on edge, and made her put on her most dignified and touch-me-not air. It was so apparent now, that Hilda Jackson, strolling in from the garden when the sound of the Verekers' carriage-wheels intimated that the coast was clear, inquired what her friends were quarrelling about.

"Quarrelling! We never were further from it in our lives," affirmed Lady Rosalie. "Wasn't it lucky Avice came in before Lady Vereker went? She has made quite a conquest, I am sure—and if you had only heard her sing!"

Avice laughed good-humouredly.

"I shall run away if you talk such nonsense, Lady Rosalie," she said, taking up her hat.

"Why, my dear, you know perfectly well that if your face wasn't your fortune your voice would be. I've heard nothing like it since Clara Novello."

"Rather my voice than my face," said Avice proudly. She said no more. She could not tell Lady Rosalie how it hurt her to have such things said, and if she could have stooped her pride to do so, she knew quite well that Lady Rosalie would not have understood.

"There's been nothing like her since Clara Novello, has there, Hilda?" the kind, obtuse woman went on, appealing to Hilda, who was looking from one to the other with much covert amusement. "I assure you, when she was singing that air of Mozart's I could fancy I heard the angels, and my poor dear Charlie's voice——"

There were tears in Lady Rosalie's eyes, but Hilda objected to sentiment, and crushed it ruthlessly.

"Considering that 'poor dear Charlie' had the mildest and flattest bass it was ever my lot to listen to, it isn't much compliment to Avice to talk like that," she observed. "Dry your eyes, Rosalie, and don't be a goose. I want to know all about Lady Vereker's visit, and if Avice is to go to Verecroft with us on the twentieth."

"I never thought of the twentieth, and I don't believe Evelyn did either. But Avice shall go, if I have to beg for an invitation on my knees."

Miss Jackson laughed at her friend's enthusiasm, but Avice looked imperial disdain.

"Do you think I would go anywhere where you had to beg for an invitation for me, Lady Rosalie?"

"Well, well, my dear, I dare say not," conceded Lady Rosalie, who would have accepted any invitation that suited her, with entire indifference as to the means by which it was procured. "You need not be afraid. I shall manage it without that, I've no doubt."

"You will 'manage' nothing for me, please," said Avice gravely. "You mean to be kind, I know, but you do not understand. If Lady Vereker asks me of her own accord, I will go. If not, nothing should induce me."

She wished her friends good-bye, and went away, and Hilda Jackson broke into a laugh almost before she was out of hearing.

"A nice hoity-toity young madam, upon my word! But come, Rosalie, tell me all about Lady Vereker. Did she make mincemeat of you for letting her cosset darling entangle himself? And what did she think of Miss Avice?"

"I thought they got on very well; but, of course, she had heard some exaggerated account of Raymond's attentions, and I fancy she thinks he's in earnest for once. She wanted to know all about Avice and her people—but really there wasn't much I could tell her."

"Particularly little, I should think! It always strikes me as very odd how little you seem to know about them, and how ridiculously Mrs. Meredith shuts herself up. I don't believe they know a soul in the place but you."

"And Mr. Collingwood."

"The vicar? But that goes for nothing. Clergy always have to know their parishioners more or less. Mrs. Meredith has lived at the Hermitage as long as you've lived here; and if it hadn't been for the scarlatina, I don't believe you would ever have been inside the house."

It was true: more entirely true than either Hilda Jackson or Lady Rosalie imagined. Mrs. Meredith had come to the Hermitage, the next house to Lady Rosalie's, about fifteen years ago, with two little girls whose extraordinary beauty was the talk of the place, but she had brought no introductions, and evidently desired no society. A few people called, and amongst them Lady Rosalie Finch, but Mrs. Meredith was at home to no one, and returned none of the calls. She was never seen except on Sundays, when, attired in the deepest widow's weeds, she attended the nearest church, and Mr. Collingwood, the vicar, assured people that Mrs. Meredith's spirits were quite unequal to the reception of callers.

Time went on, and the widow's weeds gave place to less funereal garments, but Mrs. Meredith preserved her strict retirement. It became understood that the widow lady at the Hermitage did not desire to be visited, and for many years her privacy had been invaded by no one but Mr. Collingwood, who paid a parochial visit twice a year; and Lady Rosalie Finch, whose utter inability to feel a snub, made her go on calling long after more sensitive people had given up the attempt to make Mrs. Meredith's acquaintance.

Lady Rosalie was not sensitive, and she was very good-natured. She was sorry for her neighbour's lonely and solitary life, and she had no perception that her efforts to ameliorate it were unwelcome. She fraternised with the two pretty children across the hedge which divided the Hermitage garden from her own, bought them bon-bons, and lent them books; finally, on hearing that they were both laid up with scarlatina, she took the Hermitage by storm, insisted on helping to nurse the children, and bound the mother's heart to her for ever by the devotion with which she performed her self-imposed task.

Since that time the Hermitage doors had opened freely to Lady Rosalie, but to no one else. Entreaty and argument had alike failed to induce Mrs. Meredith to accept her lively neighbour's invitations. She was pleased to see her at the Hermitage, but she would not go to the Rosery, or allow Lady Rosalie to introduce her to Leamington society. The girls were sent abroad to school, and till they grew up Mrs. Meredith persisted that she had no heart for gaiety, and no desire for any society but Lady Rosalie's.

Avice and her sister had been home three months now, but it seemed as if the habit of seclusion were too strong for their mother to overcome. She still shrank from society in what Lady Rosalie considered a quite unaccountable manner, and accepted her offers of chaperonage for the girls with almost disproportionate gratitude.

And so it came to pass that Avice and Margaret Meredith made their entrance into society under Lady Rosalie's wing, were seen at all the little dinners, the "musicals," and afternoon teas that made the Rosery so popular, and went with their kind and vivacious friend wherever she could procure an invitation for them, or felt intimate enough to take them without one.

CHAPTER VI.

"WHILE THE STARS SHALL SHINE."

"There is in souls a sympathy with sounds;
Some chord in unison with what we hear
Is touched within us, and the heart replies."—COWPER.

NEVER were sisters more dissimilar than Avice and Margaret Meredith. Avice—proud, imperial, passionate, reserved—seemed a different order of being from the bright and engaging Margaret, whom no one could call strictly beautiful, but whom many decidedly preferred to her stately and unapproachable sister.

"The plain Miss Meredith," Margaret called herself, with loving delight in her sister's superior beauty; but if she was not beautiful, she had one of the pleasantest faces in the world, full of dimples and smiles, of archness and drollery, of childlike innocence and gladness. It was altogether a round and childlike face, with soft blue eyes, big with love and wonder and trust, a small freckled nose, a mouth that disclosed a row of tiny teeth, small and white as a child's, and a broad fair forehead, framed in clustering rings of soft brown hair.

Avice—stately Avice—had never been called by a pet name in her life, but Margaret was hardly ever called by her own. Daisy was her usual appellation, and even Mrs. Meredith, the least caressing of women, found endearing epithets for this youngest child of hers, and called her Mavourneen or Mignonette when she did not call her Daisy.

Lady Rosalie sometimes reproached the mother for her partiality for Daisy, but Avice was not jealous. She was not of a jealous temperament, and indeed she knew there was no cause for jealousy. Between Mrs. Meredith and her elder daughter was the fine instinct of intuitive comprehension, born of close resemblance, and scarcely ever found except in those united by ties of blood. Under ordinary circumstances it would have been nature's closest bond, but with this mother and daughter it seemed only to deepen their natural reserve. For confidence, if it is to exist between natures so finely attuned to each other, must be mutual, and Mrs. Meredith had a secret she had never confided to her children, and which she prayed they might never know, and the consciousness of its existence rose up daily between the mother and the daughter who knew and felt and understood every look in her mother's eyes, and every inflection in her voice. Mrs. Meredith loved the daughter so like herself with a passionate intensity that Daisy could neither inspire nor return, but she set a guard on her lips and locked her heart against her, and seemed indifferent and cold, when she was only afraid of herself and of what she might betray.

And Avice understood, at least so far as to know that the coldness was not indifference. But though she understood, she felt the chill. Confidence could never have been easy, perhaps could never have been possible, to Avice Meredith, but there was no doubt that her mother's reserve deepened her own, and, well as they loved each other, it seemed to the girl sometimes as if they were like friends who wave farewells across an impassable stream.

Mrs. Meredith and Daisy were in the garden when Avice came back from Lady Rosalie's. She saw them, but she did not go to them. She went up to her own room, and watched them as they paced up and down the walk at the end of the lawn, and felt an unreasonable sensation of relief that she had not yet to give an account of her afternoon, to meet her sister's lively comments, or feel that her mother's absence of comment was more significant still.

She lingered over the adjustment of her dress, smoothing the unruffled hair that owed its perfect arrangement to her own clever fingers, and pinning fresh flowers to her dress with a carefulness innocent of coquetry, and guilty only of an unaccountable desire to postpone the meeting with the others. She did not admit the desire to herself, but when she went down and found that they had not come in, the time that might elapse before they detected her presence assumed quite distinctly the aspect of a respite.

"Avice sat down under the lime-trees."—p. 135.

It was all the more foolish, she told herself, because there was nothing she wished to conceal. There was no possible reason why they should not know that she had met Sir Raymond Vereker's mother, nor even that she had felt the meeting to be not entirely a success. Her mother and Daisy were too sensible to have put any faith in the nonsense Lady Rosalie had talked about Sir Raymond. And for herself, though she had understood the empressement with which Lady Rosalie had introduced her to Lady Vereker, she had not shared in the feeling which induced it. She had liked Sir Raymond very much, until—well, until he had made a goose of himself; but she was not so foolish as to believe in the raptures and sighs, the high-flown words and love-sick glances, that would have been all very well on the stage, but that seemed to have a note of unreality in an English drawing-room.

Miss Meredith laughed a little now as she recalled her young admirer's tragic looks and tones, and the little romance Lady Rosalie had so evidently built upon them. It was so like Lady Rosalie, it was not worth while to be angry about it, or Avice could have found it in her heart to be very angry indeed. The idea which underlay Lady Rosalie's complacency, the idea that she was to be congratulated on the conquest of so eligible a parti as Sir Raymond Vereker of Verecroft, was an affront to her pride and an outrage to her self-respect which Avice Meredith found it hard to forgive. She could have taken Rosalind's advice and thanked Heaven for a good man's love; but she would not be thankful, nor allow Lady Rosalie to be so, because the man happened to be a baronet.

"Avice, have you got back? We thought you were at Lady Rosalie's still," exclaimed Daisy's joyous voice, as that smiling little person flitted back to the house at last, while Mrs. Meredith's trailing black draperies swept more slowly across the lawn. One of the points in which Avice and her mother resembled each other so closely was a certain regality of movement, especially in walking, and the train the elder lady wore gave her dignified gait an additional stateliness. She had left off weeds long ago, but she always wore black, and her abundant hair, bright as Avice's still, was covered by a plain white cap.

"Have you enjoyed yourself, my dear?" she asked, as she came in and saw Avice. "We hardly expected you back so soon."

"There were not many there," Avice said indifferently, and her mother asked no more. It was Daisy who cried, with a bewitching little pout—

"You might tell us all about it, Avice, for you know we always like to hear. Who were there? and what songs did you sing?"

"Nothing but what you have heard a dozen times. And no one was there but Lady Vereker."

"Lady Vereker!" The name was repeated in tones of surprise, but it was Mrs. Meredith who uttered it. She looked at Avice with sudden interest.

"You have seen her at last," she said. "What is she like? How does she look? She must have altered very much since—since she was young."

"Did you know her when she was young, mamma?" Daisy asked, her round blue eyes rounder than ever with surprise and curiosity.

"I saw her once, many years ago," said Mrs. Meredith, in what Avice felt to be a repressive tone. She could not have asked her mother another question to save her life; but Daisy did not feel repressed, she only felt curious and amused.

"You knew her, and you never told us? How very odd!" she laughed. "Was it when we first came here, or before you were married, or when?"

Mrs. Meredith did not answer Daisy's question directly.

"It is a long time ago," she said, "and I only knew her slightly. She has probably forgotten me, and certainly I have no wish to recall myself to her remembrance."

"Oh, but I should!" said audacious Daisy. "It would be so much nicer for Avice and me. You do shut yourself up so, mamma."

"Nonsense!" Avice interposed sharply. "Why should we want to drag mamma out if she is happier at home? Come into the garden, Daisy; it is too hot for anything in here."

She went out into the pretty little garden, where the lilacs were in all their first freshness and beauty, and Daisy followed in some surprise.

"Why do you tease mamma with saying things like that?" exclaimed Avice. "Can't you see she doesn't like it?"

"But, Avice, indeed I think it is true, and somebody ought to say it. Lady Rosalie is very kind, but it would be so much nicer if mamma went with us. It would make us seem, somehow, of more consequence, don't you think?"

"I don't think anything, except that I am sure mamma would not like it, and that we ought not to tease her about it. We do very well with Lady Rosalie: and as for being of consequence, no one is that who is as poor as we are," said Avice philosophically.

"But if mamma knew Lady Vereker, we should be asked to Verecroft, and Lady Rosalie has never taken us there. You would like to go to Verecroft, Avice, wouldn't you?"

"Yes," said Avice frankly; "I should like it very much, if Lady Vereker asked us of her own accord. I should not like mamma to try and renew an acquaintance she evidently does not care for, in order to get an invitation, or for Lady Rosalie to scheme for it, as I'm afraid she does sometimes."

"Well," said Daisy, "I believe we shall go without either of those dreadful things. Sir Raymond will take care of that, you will see."

"I—I am not sure that I want Sir Raymond to take care of it. He is a very nice boy——"

"Boy? when he comes of age next month!" exclaimed Daisy, with the deep respect of her seventeen summers for the magnificent age of twenty-one. "And, Avice, you know how much he likes you."

"I know how much he says he does. I don't think it goes very deep—he talks too much for that."

"I thought you liked him," said Daisy, in a disappointed tone that made her sister smile.

"So I did, so I do—when he isn't silly," said Avice, with an evident reference to Sir Raymond's florid protestations that Daisy thought ungrateful and unkind.

There was nothing silly in adoring Avice, thought the loyal little sister, who wished success to Sir Raymond's wooing as heartily as Lady Rosalie herself. She was not proud—or, at least, not in Avice's way—and thought besides that any man ought to feel he had won more than his deserts if he won Avice's love. She would have liked to talk longer about Sir

Raymond Vereker, but her sister did not encourage the subject, and Daisy found the short indifferent answers disappointing, and presently flitted away to water the flowers in the tiny conservatory.

Avice sat down on the bench under the lime-trees, which was her favourite seat. There were bees humming amongst the blossoms, and a thrush singing on one of the branches. She could see the dark outlines of her mother's figure as she sat at work beside the open window, and Daisy's white dress fluttering amongst the flowers. The long sunset shadows were lying on the grass, the bells of one of the churches were calling to a week-night service. It was all very sweet and peaceful, but Avice was restless and disturbed. She would not have owned that the events of the afternoon had anything to do with it, and yet they had made an unacknowledged crisis in her life. She had been unwilling to discuss them, but she could not forget them, and as she sat and mused under the limes she seemed to live them all over again. Her mother and her sister, the flowers around her, and the swaying shadows on the grass faded from her sight; the distant bells and the thrush's jubilant song no longer reached her ear. She was not in the Hermitage garden; she was in Lady Rosalie's drawing-room singing, and a young man she had never seen before was coming in at the door, and looking at her as no other man had ever looked.

"I am thine while the stars shall shine!"

She drew in her breath in a long-drawn quivering sigh, and the colour mounted to her brow. What had those strange looks meant, and why had she been singing just those words?

CHAPTER VII.

CASTLES IN THE AIR.

"In this fool's paradise he drank delight."—Crabbe.

"I HAVE had a letter from Ray," said Lady Vereker, looking across the breakfast-table for Lancelot's sympathy.

Mrs. Kenyon always breakfasted in her own room, and Lancelot thought the meal he shared with his dear benefactress was the pleasantest of the day. He looked back at her with the smile that came so readily to either face at Raymond's beloved name.

"From Ray? So have I. How good of him to write to us both!"

"Is there anything particular in yours?" asked Lady Vereker, with the pleading look that meant "Show it me, if you can."

"No," said Lancelot, handing it to her. "You will see he is full of the boat-race last week, and can write of nothing else. He wants to know if we couldn't get up something of the kind for the twentieth."

"It would be very pretty, wouldn't it?"

"But the Avon is not the Isis. And where are the boats to come from, or the rowers?"

Lady Vereker allowed herself to be convinced, but she sighed, as she always did when any of Ray's desires were found to be impracticable.

"I suppose it would not do; and if you explain how it is, perhaps he will not mind."

"He will not mind," said Lancelot confidently. "You know how hot he is about everything at first, and how quickly he cools down again."

Lady Vereker agreed, but she looked uneasy still. Lancelot had been fond of referring to his cousin's love of change ever since the day he had driven her into Leamington. He had meant it well, no doubt, but, after all, he could not know Raymond as well as she did, and the letter she held in her hand was a refutation of the very point he seemed always trying to prove.

"He does not cool down about everything," she observed. "He wants me to ask Lady Rosalie to bring the Miss Merediths on the twentieth."

Lancelot looked up in unaffected surprise. He did not speak, for it suddenly seemed to him as if he had lost the control of his voice.

"You thought he would have forgotten all about her by now," said Lady Vereker plaintively; "but this does not look as if he had forgotten."

"It is not the twentieth yet," said Lancelot. He had found his voice again, but he spoke with an effort, and with the air of a man arguing almost against his convictions. "It is not the twentieth yet," he repeated; "and I don't see how he could avoid asking Lady Rosalie to bring the Miss Merediths, when he knows they always go out with her. The only wonder is we never thought of doing so. Lady Rosalie must have thought it very odd, after Ray's being there so much at Easter."

"I wish you had been at home at Easter," sighed Lady Vereker. If Lance had been at home, she thought, Raymond would have had no temptation to spend his days in Leamington; but Lancelot had spent his Easter with a college friend, and had only got back the day before Sir Raymond returned to Oxford. She had been sorry for the cousins not to meet, the cousins who were so much more like brothers in their attachment to each other, but perhaps she had purred a little over the thought of having her boy entirely to herself. And after all, she had not had him. He had spent his days at Lady Rosalie's, and she had only thought that he found Verecroft dull, and never even guessed at the attraction the Rosery had held for him.

She tried to think that Lancelot was right, that it was all over now, and that the request to include the Miss Merediths in Lady Rosalie's invitation was only a formal civility, which could not have been omitted without positive rudeness. Of course she would ask them, the docile mother decided; and when the acceptance came, she tried to think that she was glad.

Telling Mrs. Kenyon would be the most disagreeable part, because she never understood Raymond as Lancelot did, and would be sure to regard the invitation as more significant than it really was.

And indeed, Mrs. Kenyon smiled her most sarcastic and unendurable smile, when she saw that the Miss Merediths' names had been added to the list for the twentieth.

"I am glad your son's choice meets with your approval, my dear," she said, with incisive scorn.

"'Forgive me, forgive me,' she cried."—p. 140.

"The young person does not belong to the class from which the Verekers have been accustomed to take their brides, but if you are satisfied, I suppose no one can complain."

"I do not know that Miss Meredith is my son's choice," said Lady Vereker. "I am not asking her for any reason of that sort, but because she is a friend of Lady Rosalie's. You are mistaken, mother, if you think that our asking her is anything but an ordinary act of civility."

"Then the county will certainly be mistaken too! The county will regard it as a public approval of Raymond's suit; and if the girl is not a fool, she will think so too."

"Miss Meredith is a beautiful and ladylike girl," said Lady Vereker, with unusual spirit—for might not Avice Meredith be her son's bride even yet?—"and I do not think there is any fear that she will misunderstand. Lancelot quite agrees with me."

"Bah, my dear! Lancelot would agree with you if you told him my best black velvet was a white grenadine! Lancelot, indeed! Lancelot!"

Mrs. Kenyon walked away in high disdain, but as it had become practically impossible to please her mother, at least where Raymond was concerned, Lady Vereker was less distressed than she would have been a few years ago. And after all, she thought, why should not her Ray please himself? Surely a Vereker had blue blood enough for himself and his wife too! A Vereker ought to be able to mate where he pleased, if that was really in his thoughts; and if it was not, there was no harm done.

So Lady Vereker looked forward to the twentieth with almost unalloyed delight, while Lancelot awaited it with a feverish impatience exceedingly unlike his usual calmness and self-control. To see Avice Meredith again! To hear the matchless melody of her beautiful voice, and feel the soft regard of those incomparable eyes! He had not been to Lady Rosalie's again. He felt that he could not present himself there except as Avice's suitor, and it was impossible so to present himself till he had Sir Raymond's assurance that his own suit was withdrawn—supposing that it had ever been actually paid. He knew what Ray's florid manner was, and how apt people were to misunderstand it, and think it meant more than it did. And though Ray had raved about her to himself, she was by no means the first girl he had raved about. The thought of Sir Raymond's fleeting fancy for Miss Meredith was not enough to disturb his cousin's peace; it was only enough to keep him away from the Rosery, and give to his passion the determining force which the possibility of opposition brings.

There was much to be done in Leamington just now that only Lancelot could do, and though he avoided the Rosery, from a delicate sense of honour that seemed even to himself Quixotic and overstrained, he met Avice sometimes in the town. It was no wrong to Raymond, surely, if, when his business was done, he strolled down the Parade, before going back to the livery-stables where he had put up his horse. The Parade is free to all, the shops are inviting, the mere sight of the great elms where the rooks still build is refreshing on a hot summer's day.

And sometimes he was rewarded. Sometimes—stepping, Mr. Vereker thought, like the goddess of Virgil's fancy—Avice Meredith would pass by, and smile ever so little, and bend her beautiful head, and the wide, bright modern street would suddenly become enchanted ground.

There was one day he always remembered, a day when the sun blazed on the Parade, and seemed to have driven everyone but himself from it. He had done his business unusually early, and he turned away from the glare of the hot white pavement and went into the Jephson Gardens, where there is always the shade of dark-leaved trees, the splash of fountains, the coolness and beauty of smooth lake and velvet lawns, the Leam gliding cool and green under the cool greenery of drooping willows.

A few people were walking about amongst the ilexes, and on a seat directly in his path were Lady Rosalie and Avice Meredith. Lady Rosalie was frankly glad to see him, and if Avice was less frank, there was nothing to suggest that she might not be a little glad too. She was very quiet, he thought, and there was something that might have been shyness in anyone less perfectly graceful and self-possessed.

He was much too shy himself at the sight of her to be able to improve his opportunity, as Sir Raymond might have done, and was certainly far too self-conscious and disturbed to be a fair judge of anyone else's demeanour. For the love which had taken such sudden and complete possession of him was humble, as the love of a very proud man always is, and Lancelot Vereker was dumb and awkward as a schoolboy before the girl who had become to him the "one woman in the world."

"He has not half such good manners as Sir Raymond," Lady Rosalie said, when he had gone.

Avice said nothing. She only smiled a little, and sat looking at the soft green lawn before her, with the tiny lakelet sparkling in the sun, and a swan floating on the still surface, and mirrored in the glassy depth below.

"What are you thinking of?" Lady Rosalie asked rather tartly. She detested silence, and Avice had not opened her lips since Mr. Vereker went. They curved now into a rather incomprehensible smile.

"I was thinking how beautiful everything is," she said simply.

To her, as to Lancelot, the memory of that sweet summer day would be immortal. Always she would remember the sunny lakelet set in the emerald lawn, the white cups of the water-lilies, the swan that, like Wordsworth's, "floated double, swan and shadow." Always she would hear the splash of the fountains, and the distant murmur of the weir; always she would remember the bending willows and the dark, still river, and the church, with its rose-shaped window and graceful spire, rising above them all.

She would remember it, but she could not talk of it to Lady Rosalie. That was impossible—as impossible as it was to enjoy the privilege of silence when her vivacious ladyship was by.

"I see nothing particularly beautiful in the day," Lady Rosalie said now, in rather an injured tone. "It is just like any other day at this time of year, only a good deal hotter. Leamington is unbearable in summer, and if it were not for the Verecroft affair, I should be off to the sea next week. I am glad Lady Vereker sent you an invitation, for really, it is for your sake I am going, Avice."

"For my sake? How good of you, if you do not really care about it," said Avice gratefully.

Her eyes shone; she pressed her friend's hand affectionately. She had professed a good deal of proud indifference on the subject of the Verecroft fête, but the thought of not going to it seemed suddenly intolerable. How could she ever have fancied that she did not care to go?

"It is very good of you to stay," she said, with grateful iteration. "I hope you don't mind it very much."

"It was Hilda who minded. She hates Leamington in hot weather; but now Captain Hallam has come back, she will be glad enough to stay."

"Captain Hallam? Who is he?"

"Surely you must have heard of him? He is a great friend of ours. You must have seen his likeness in Hilda's album; she has him in every conceivable position—full face, profile, three-quarters——"

"Oh, then I know! Only I didn't know his name. I supposed it was someone Miss Jackson was engaged to, so I did not like to ask about him."

"Nonsense, my dear," said Lady Rosalie, on whom refinements of delicacy were always thrown away. "Whether they are engaged, or whether they ever will be, is more than anyone knows but themselves. All that I know is that it won't be her fault if they 're not."

"Poor Miss Jackson! She would not like you to say so," said Avice, shocked at what she regarded as a breach of friendship; but Lady Rosalie only laughed.

"What does it matter when she doesn't hear?" she said comfortably. "And though I'm very fond of Hilda, I know it is absolutely true. She spends her days in running after him whenever he 's with his regiment at Warwick, and I 'm about tired of playing gooseberry for her."

"Oh, Lady Rosalie, are you sure? Perhaps you only fancy things——"

"Fancy? No, there 's no fancy about it, as you 'll soon see now he 's come back. Why, what do you suppose she asked Daisy to walk on the Warwick road for, except for the chance of meeting him?"

"Oh!" cried Avice, in shocked, indignant tones. "She should not have done it! Daisy is so young—oh! Lady Rosalie, why did you not tell mamma, or me?"

Lady Rosalie stared at her agitation in uncomprehending astonishment.

"My dear child, there 's no harm done," she protested. "Daisy will have had a pleasant walk, and if they do meet Captain Hallam, even your mother couldn't object. He is one of the pleasantest men I know, and one of the handsomest, to say nothing of his being a perfect gentleman."

"But if he knows—or guesses——" murmured Avice with burning cheeks.

"Whatever he knows or guesses, he will have the sense to know that Daisy has nothing to do with it."

"It is putting her in a false position," the elder sister said. "Oh! if I had only known, she should not have gone!"

"It is nothing to be so vexed about, I assure you. Hilda wanted me to go, but as I told her this morning, I draw the line at Warwick. I don't mind going on the Parade, for there are always the shops to amuse you there, but to play gooseberry on a country road is a little too much?"

"And so you sacrificed my sister!" Avice thought indignantly. She was very angry; but to say any more would have made an open breach; and the thought of Lady Rosalie's many kindnesses forbade the thought of that. It would probably have been quite useless too, and Avice did Lady Rosalie the justice to believe that she was quite sincere in saying she saw no harm in Miss Jackson's proceedings. She had spoken of them with amusement rather than reprehension, and Avice knew that her own view of the matter would be scouted as high-flown sentiment. She could only give up the hopeless task of convincing Lady Rosalie, and content herself with determining that Daisy should go no more walks with Miss Jackson, at least while Captain Hallam was at Warwick.

She walked back home with Lady Rosalie, in more annoyance than she allowed to appear, and was relieved to find that Daisy had already arrived.

The sweet childlike face was "sunning over with smiles," and Daisy had evidently enjoyed her walk, undisturbed by any doubts as to the accidental nature of the meeting with Captain Hallam.

"He knows Lady Rosalie and Miss Jackson quite well," Daisy explained, when she had related how they had met Captain Hallam near Emscote, and how he had turned off with them into the Guy's Cliff fields. "And, Avice, he wants to know you so much, for Miss Jackson has told him all about you, and about your singing; and he is coming to the Rosery to-morrow night to hear you."

"He is very much mistaken if he thinks I shall go," said Avice, with her stateliest air. "I dare say he is very pleasant, Daisy, but from what I hear of him from Lady Rosalie, I feel sure I should not like him. I would rather you went no more walks with Miss Jackson while he is in the neighbourhood, for I don't consider him a desirable acquaintance, and I don't believe mamma would like us to know him."

"He is a son of Lord Blackstone's," Daisy ventured to observe, with rather a crestfallen air.

"Lord Blackstone! A law lord! That is not the slightest guarantee that his son is a gentleman!" said Miss Meredith crushingly. And if Daisy looked as crushed as she felt, she must have looked very crushed indeed.

CHAPTER VIII.

SIR RAYMOND'S RETURN.

"It is not fantasy's hot fire,
Whose wishes, soon as granted, fly."—SCOTT.

THE twentieth of June was close at hand—so close, indeed, that the sun going down behind the Verecroft elms in a crimson sky that augured a cloudless morrow, would rise on the eventful day itself.

Sir Raymond had come home an hour or two before, and Lady Vereker was full of delight and satisfaction quite past expression. Sir Raymond had inspected and approved all her preparations, and pronounced them perfect, and now they were sauntering back from the park, where the tents were already pitched, and the tables laid, and even the wickets in place.

"But it is not me you must thank—it is Lancelot. I could have done nothing without Lance," Lady Vereker said, with an affectionate look at the tall figure on her other side. She was always so afraid lest Lance should feel himself neglected when her boy came home. But Lance had no small jealousies, and was perfectly content that his cousin should be first in his mother's heart, as a son has a natural right to be.

It was impossible to look at this son, as he walked by his mother's side, and doubt that he enjoyed his rights to the uttermost. Lady Vereker could hardly take her eyes from his face, and it was a face on which no mother's eyes could have failed to rest with love and pride. Sir Raymond Vereker was a very handsome man, and though his dark complexion and magnificent eyes made Lady Rosalie call him a brigand, and had earned him the name of "Frenchy" at school, where that convenient appellation sums up all European nationalities but our own—there was something distinctly English in his manner and style—the seal which Oxford sets upon her sons and which, when the priggishness has worn off, produces some of the most finished gentlemen in the world.

And yet, handsome as he was, generous and frank and open-handed, he was not as popular at Verecroft as his cousin Lancelot. He had grown up there from babyhood, but he was not in touch with the people in the village, or even with the servants whose master he would be to-morrow.

"He means well," said Mr. Hopkinson, the gardener, when he retired to his pretty cottage, after showing Sir Raymond and his mother and cousin over the gardens that were in a state of almost painful precision in readiness for to-morrow. "He means well, but he 's a deal to learn yet. 'Stiff,' he called my carpet-beds, and I could see he didn't like 'em. My lady, she leaves it to me; she understands what 's what, and Mr. Vereker too. But Sir Raymond ain't like either of them, nor like any Vereker as I ever see. If I could only raise a orchid, or a seedling dahlia, as unlike the parent stock as he is, my fortune 'ud be made. A freak—that 's what we should call him in our perfession, and a very handsome freak, too; but he might show a little more consideration for a perfessional man's feelings. Mr. Vereker, he 's different; he turned round and said how well the colours contrasted in the beds, and what a eye for colour I must have, just for the sake of saying something pleasant, and showing he understood. He 's a deal more of a Vereker than Sir Raymond, though he is only a poor relation, and dependent on my lady for everything he gets."

Mr. Hopkinson wasted a sigh on Lancelot's hard fate, that would have considerably astonished the object of his pity. Dependent as Lancelot Vereker might be—nay, as he actually was—pity was the last thing he gave himself, or desired of other men. If he was dependent, it was a dependence so delicately veiled, so overlaid with kindness and consideration and true affection, as to leave no room for bitterness, but only for gratitude and love. He was dependent; but only as a younger son may be, to whom all comes by the free gift of parental affection, and his future was as well assured as any younger son's. He had been made to understand this from the first, but he was to have still further proof before the night was over.

It was one of the exquisite summer nights, when it seems as if the day that has gone for ever were only sleeping, and not dead. There is no darkness, and the tender dusk seems rather a veil than a pall. There are no shadows, for there is no light strong enough to cast them, but we can see quite clearly the familiar outlines of house and trees; the white gates stand out from the green around. As our eyes grow accustomed to the soft dim light, we can distinguish the white or yellow petals of the brighter flowers. The moon hangs a silver crescent on the low horizon; a few stars throb faintly in the sky, that is still almost blue; little birds still dart and twitter here and there; a thrush still sits full-throated on a bough close by us, and will not say good-night.

"One could fancy it was a nightingale," Lady Vereker said. She and Lancelot had come out again after dinner, for Mrs. Kenyon had intimated that she wished her grandson to remain with her, and could dispense with their society.

"And I should not like dear Ray to vex her to-night, of all nights," said Lady Vereker, as she and Lancelot went out on to the terrace, in obedience to the old lady's wish. "No shadow shall come on his birthday if you and I can help it, shall it, Lance? And my mother is always impatient with poor Ray, and sometimes, I am sure, not quite just."

"She is never just to Raymond," said that young man's faithful and constant defender. "Do you know what she wanted him for to-night?"

"Partly; and I think she meant me to tell you when she asked us to leave them together." Lady Vereker paused a moment, and when she went on there was a note of pain in her voice that went to Lancelot's heart. "You know, Lance, that my mother has always had your interests very much at heart, and I think she fancies sometimes that I do not quite consider them as I ought."

"Dearest and best of friends, you shall not say such things!" cried Lancelot. "Do you want to make me feel a monster of ingratitude and baseness? What does it matter what Mrs. Kenyon thinks or says? Has she ever loved me or cared for me as you have done? She has been very kind; she has given me whatever money could buy; but it is you, it is you who have given me your love. It is you who have been like a mother to me all these years, who have made this house the happiest of homes, who—— Oh! I have no words to say what I feel, but if ever I can show it——"

He broke off, visibly moved, and Lady Vereker was scarcely less so herself.

"Dear Lance," she said softly, "it is good of you to feel like this—my own dear boy, my other son. I hoped—I knew—that we loved each other too well for any doubt on your part to arise."

"Doubt! Doubt of you!" The scorn in his voice was grateful to her.

"No, no! I knew you too well! But my mother thinks—and she is right—that there should be some definite arrangement now Ray has come of age. It could not be before, when it was all in trust for him; but now the estate can be charged, and Ray will be only too glad. I ought to have seen that you could not be dependent on him just as you have been on me, but you and Ray have always been so like brothers——"

"We are like brothers—we are brothers!" cried Lancelot. "There is the same blood in our veins, for are we not both Verekers? And do we not love and reverence the same dear mother? If we were both your own children, could we be more entirely brothers than we are?"

"Dear Lance, I know, but I know too that my mother is right. We must talk about it to-morrow when the lawyers are here, and whatever is fair and right Ray will agree to, I know. Now, I will not hear another word! You may be content—nay, I know you are content—but you will not always be so. When you marry——"

"When I marry!" he repeated blankly. Had his precious secret escaped him unawares, and did Lady Vereker know or guess at the thoughts and hopes that lay hid so deep in his heart that hardly had he dared to acknowledge them to himself?

"You will marry some day, I hope," she said, with the vague optimism with which we all regard a future untrammelled by any visible connection with the present, "and when you do, you will be glad to know exactly how you stand, and what your prospects are."

Lancelot breathed more freely. It was evident that his secret was safe. But the chance allusion had turned his thoughts into a channel from which they were not easily withdrawn. Lady Vereker still paced the terrace by his side, wondering a little at the silence that had fallen upon him, and perhaps even misunderstanding it; but Lancelot was scarcely conscious of her presence. The love he had professed for her, the love that had grown with his growth and strengthened with his strength, was real, and true, and steadfast, but it did not, it could not dominate his being as this other love that had sprung into existence in a moment always must and would. He was one of the men of whom it would always be said—"Who loved one woman, and who clave to her," and now, in the first exaltation of this one and only love, other women were for him as though they were not. Even Lady Vereker, dear friend and almost mother as she was, sank into insignificance before the vision that filled the night with the beauty of the one matchless face, and peopled the silence with the echoes of the one beloved voice.

He had not spoken of Avice to Sir Raymond yet. Anxiously as Lancelot longed to know how far his cousin was still influenced by the feelings that had seemed so strong at Easter, so strong that surely they must have burnt themselves out in the flame of their own fierceness before this, he had not found opportunity (or was it courage?) to utter her name, and Sir Raymond had been equally reticent. In the few short intervals in which the cousins had been alone together, Lancelot had been nervously silent, and Sir Raymond had talked of Oxford, and of the arrangements for to-morrow, as if he had no other interest in the world. Whether it really was so, or that he shrank, like himself, from touching a deeper chord, Lancelot could not determine, but he felt that he must know before he slept to-night. He wished that Raymond would come out, or that Lady Vereker would go in and put an end to that interminable tête-à-tête. He wondered irritably what Mrs. Kenyon and her grandson could be talking about so long; and then suddenly the sound of angry voices struck a discord on the sweet peaceful night. They were Mrs. Kenyon's and Sir Raymond's; hers sarcastic and bitter, his passionate and defiant.

Lady Vereker and Lancelot looked at each other in alarm, but before they could stir or even speak the voices stopped. A door banged loudly, and silence ensued. They went in and found Mrs. Keynon alone. She had risen from her chair, and stood leaning on her stick, facing them with glittering eyes.

"Mamma, what is it? Where is my boy?" poor Lady Vereker cried. Mrs. Kenyon laughed sardonically.

"Shall I tell you?" she asked. "Could you bear to know, or would it kill you, as they said it would twenty-one years ago? Your boy! That is all you can think of still. If you knew what I have dared for you, what I have borne for you all these years—the misery and the self-reproach——"

She sat down suddenly and hid her face. When she raised it, it was wan and grey, and Lancelot saw that she was shaking like a leaf.

"What have I said?" she whispered faintly, looking from one to the other. "I have said nothing, have I? I couldn't—after all these years! Your boy, Evelyn, has gone to his room, that is all. We had a little difference of opinion, as we do sometimes. You had better go to him. And, Lancelot, come here."

Something in her tone compelled obedience, low as it was. She did not speak till Lady Vereker had gone, and then she looked at Lancelot as if she would read his very soul.

"If anyone had wronged you, Lancelot Vereker, could you forgive?"

"I—I hope so," stammered Lancelot, too astonished to say more. The question was so utterly unlike anything he had expected, and Mrs. Kenyon's expression was so strange. "Why do you ask?" he cried. "Who has wronged me, as you call it? How can I tell if I can forgive, unless I know the offence, and the offender?"

Mrs. Kenyon shuddered. It almost seemed as if she shrank away from him.

"I cannot tell you," she said huskily. "Not now—not to-night—it would kill her! I thought, when that young man angered me just now, that I could do it—but not when I saw Evelyn. Do not ask me, for her sake!" And then, to Lancelot's amazement, she fell on her knees at his feet.

He stared at her in utter perplexity. Decidedly, he thought, Mrs. Kenyon was bereft of her senses. He tried to raise her, but she only clung to his hand.

"Forgive me, forgive me!" she cried. "For Evelyn's—for Lady Vereker's sake!"

"You know there is nothing I would not do for her sake," he said soothingly. "Dear Mrs. Kenyon, if there is anything to forgive, you may believe that it is fully and freely forgiven. You are not well—you are troubled—let me take you to your room."

It was some time before he could induce her to consent, but at last he succeeded, and left her in her maid's hands while he went to find Lady Vereker and send her to her mother's assistance.

Lady Vereker was with her son, and as Lancelot explained his errand, she looked at Sir Raymond reproachfully.

"Ill, do you say, Lance? Oh, Ray, you should have been more patient! You forget how old she is."

"I forgot everything but the things she dared to say of her," Sir Raymond said. Nevertheless, he looked distressed. The storm of temper was hardly yet passed, but anger and contrition lay always so close together in the impulsive, generous heart. "Ask her pardon for me," he said, as he opened the door for Lady Vereker to pass out. "I said more than I ought, I'm afraid. But there are some things no man can hear in silence."

Lancelot looked at him with a curious tightening of the heart. Of whom had Mrs. Kenyon been speaking, he wondered, that Ray should resent it thus?

"What was it all about?" he asked, with dry lips, when Lady Vereker had gone.

"About? Goodness knows! Mrs. Kenyon chose to be interfering and insolent. She insulted—but there, I cannot trust myself to speak of it yet. The upshot was that she vowed she would cut me out of her will, and stick you in instead; and I'm sure I hope she will. I wouldn't touch her money now, and it will be in the family still."

"Nonsense! you know she will come round."

"I know nothing of the sort. I only know that neither she nor any other meddling old woman shall come between me and the girl I love."

Lancelot put out his hand with a groping action. Was it suddenly dark, or was there a mist before his eyes?

"The girl you love!" he repeated. "Tell me, Ray, who—who she is. You always tell me, you know," with a faint attempt at a laugh.

Sir Raymond looked at his cousin in undisguised astonishment.

"Why, my dear fellow, I told you ages ago! You knew all about it at Easter, didn't you? It is Avice Meredith, of course."

THE YOUNG SAILOR

BY T. C. IRWIN.

I.

HALF the earth is in shadow, the polar winds blow
O'er an ocean miles deep, amid lightning and snow,
As a vessel rolls on through the circuit of night,
With sails and shrouds shattered, in piteous plight,
Every wave breaking over the prow, as her form
Drifts slanting, o'erblown by the surge of the storm.

II.

That night in her tops, in the numb icy blast,
On his watch many hours, a young sailor was cast,
And while all around filled his heart with despair,
He breathed, while life lived in him still, a deep prayer
For those then gathered round the kind fireside of home,
Far removed from earth's chances of danger and doom.

III.

Lost in darkness and space, still he tried to retrace
For the last time, perchance, that familiar dear place,
That hour when the cottage was safe from the blast,
The windows close shuttered, the doors bolted fast,
While his mother, unconscious of danger or dread,
Joined the children's sweet hymn as she put them to bed.

IV.

As he thought o'er this scene, the wild wintry wind cold
Sudden shifted and ceased; soon the high sea went down;
From the South vapours white as the warm summer's crown
O'er the course of the warm tropic Gulf Stream unrolled;
And as the poor sailor-boy, frozen aloft,
Descended, the broad wind around them blew soft.

V.

As the crew who had toiled through the dread hours of doom,
While ocean and sky seemed a vast icy tomb,
While the moon, beaming over rich coasts and their isles
Of the South, in mid-heaven lit the wreck with her smiles,
And the morning star rose o'er the waves' rosy play,— Ere they turned in, the men gave a grateful "Hurrah!"

VI.

And another, when—now the dark tempest being o'er,
And the vessel 't was found would by noon reach the shore—
The captain served round unto all who had borne
With such courage the perilous night overworn,
While the boy who had watched from the tops, in sweet sleep
Dreamed of Home and those dear 'mid the dawn-dazzled deep.

THE MANIFESTATION OF CHRIST TO HIMSELF.

BY THE REV. PREBENDARY GORDON CALTHROP, M.A.

"Wist ye not that I must be about My Father's business?"—ST. LUKE ii. 49.

N the last occasion on which we considered together the subject of the "Epiphanies," or manifestations of the Lord Jesus Christ, I commented on the visit of the Persian Magi to the little cottage in Bethlehem. I have now to remind you that, shortly after the visit, the young child was carried by Joseph and Mary into the land of Egypt. There they remained for some weeks, or months, and at the expiration of the period returned, under Divine direction, to the land of Israel. They did not, however, settle down again in Bethlehem, but moved northward to the province of Galilee, and to the village of Nazareth, from which indeed they had journeyed, in the first instance, to the city of Jerusalem.

Now as to the sojourn in Nazareth, we believe, of course, that every minutest detail of the wondrous life of Jesus, which was the life of God manifest in the flesh, was ordered and arranged by the wisdom of the Eternal Father. If so, there must have been reasons for the selection of the province of Galilee to be the cradle of the Redeemer's boyhood, the scene of the training and education of His human character. But what were the reasons? Well, amongst them may probably be reckoned the circumstance that the province of Galilee was one of exceptional fertility and beauty. There was, we are told, a hardness—a bareness—indeed, to a certain extent, a gloominess about the neighbourhood of Jerusalem, and about Judæa generally. This, no doubt, was more than compensated for by the interest attaching to the Holy City, and to the towns and villages of the adjacent locality; but in the upbringing of a child the loss of beautiful and attractive scenery would have been a more serious matter than perhaps we are apt to imagine. And if it be well for a boy to spend his earlier years in the country—where he may imbibe a love of nature, and be unconsciously led up from nature to nature's God—rather than amidst the bustle and hurry of a crowded city, we can see reason enough why the child Jesus should have been familiarised from the beginning with the sights and sounds of simple agricultural life; with the fair lakes and broad harvest-fields, and bountiful orchards and flowing streams, that everywhere surrounded Him; with the glitter of the distant snow-topped Hermon, and the noble majesty of the pine and cedar forests of the two Lebanon ranges; and with the leafy glory of the promontory of Carmel, pushing itself boldly forward into the sheen of the Mediterranean Sea.

But we can imagine another and a better reason still. In the metropolis and its neighbourhood the influence of the ecclesiastical party of the day was supreme, and the result was seen, in religious matters, in a spirit of the most narrow and exclusive bigotry. In the upper province the intellectual air was freer by far. The proximity to the Gentile races, and the tide of commerce which flowed through the principal towns, brought with them dangers, no doubt, but they brought also a greater liberality of sentiment with regard to God's general dealings with the human race, and a greater sympathy with man as man. And, again, we may say that, for one who was to be the common property of mankind—the Saviour of the Gentile as well as of the Jew—it must have been a more advantageous thing to have been educated even in a little out-of-the-way village of Galilee than amidst the rigid nationalism and the hair-splitting controversies that disfigured the religious life of the great city of Jerusalem.

That in other ways the development of the Holy Child's character was sedulously cared for we may be well assured. We reject, of course, the figment of the immaculate conception of the Virgin. We believe Mary to have been tainted with sin; needing to be washed, as you and I need it, in the atoning blood; needing to be strengthened and sanctified by the Holy Spirit of God. But for all that, whilst holding this view, we are left perfectly free, as I take it, to believe also that the mother of Jesus was a woman of such a character, of such goodness, such holiness, such consecration to God, such gentle wisdom, and such intellectual ability, that to her, rather than to others, could be safely entrusted the task of training her Divine Son. And this task she fulfilled, not conscious, indeed, of the full mystery of the person of Jesus (for then she would hardly have dared to undertake at all the office of His instruction), but knowing only that He was in some sense Son of God as well as Son of Man, and that a great and grave responsibility had been laid upon her. She would teach Him His first lessons, she would help Him to lisp His earliest prayers. She would read with Him, and explain as best she could the Holy Scriptures. And when He was old enough, she would probably send Him—as other Jewish children were sent—to the little simple village school, where He would sit, a boy amongst boys, conning His daily tasks, and obeying the orders of the master placed over Him.

I. In this way Jesus passed His first twelve years, in a childhood perfectly blameless, as we know, but in other respects probably not much unlike that of other children of His age, when an event occurred which constituted a sort of crisis in His history. We have the account of it in the closing verses of the second chapter of the Gospel according to St. Luke.

His parents were in the habit of going up to the metropolis every year to attend the Feast of the Passover. This year they resolved to take the lad with them. It was suitable for Him to go then, in order that He might be brought into acquaintance with His full responsibilities as a member of the covenant people. And, accordingly, when the time came, they set out with Him, in the midst, probably, of a large company of their friends and neighbours bound also for Jerusalem. They would move quietly along, traversing the fair scenery of the land, and beguiling the fatigues of the road by singing the Psalms of David, until at last they arrived within view of the Holy City. What the sight would be to the lad Jesus we can partly imagine. Even if we allow for the natural partiality of a Hebrew poet, Jerusalem was "a fair city, beautiful for situation, the joy of the whole earth." And the appearance of the Temple—that huge, majestic mass of white marble laced with gold, rising from out a sea of houses and palaces, of street and arches and colonnades—must have been magnificent in the extreme. But though the spectacle would have its charms (as we believe) in the eyes of the boy who gazed upon it, it was not the magnificence and the beauty that chiefly attracted Him. It was the thought that here lay the centre and the heart of the wondrous Jewish worship, and that this was the place in which the Jehovah of Israel manifested Himself especially to His believing and worshipping people. And this feeling deepened within Him as He trod the courts of the Temple, and witnessed the sacrifices and ceremonies, or watched the long processions of the white-robed priests, or took His part in the prayers and praises which rose up from time to time from the assembled multitude. Gradually the meaning of it all unfolded itself, and gradually the boy became so absorbed in the contemplation, that all thought of the little outer world to which He belonged passed away, and the vision of the Eternal Father alone took entire possession of His soul.

Meantime, whilst Jesus was thus engrossed, the feast had come to an end, and His parents, joining the caravan of pilgrims for Galilee, had issued from the walls of Jerusalem, and had travelled some distance on their homeward journey, nothing doubting but that the lad, who had never in all His twelve years given them a moment's anxiety, was somewhere in the company. On finding, however, that He was missing, they were greatly distressed, and returned at once to the city, seeking Him. Had they understood the boy's character, they would have gone at once to the right place; but their impulse was to search for Him amongst "their kinsfolk and acquaintance." And not until the greater part of three days had elapsed did they bethink themselves of turning their steps in the direction of the Temple. When at last they went there, there they found Him. And how was He engaged? Not as our painters misleadingly represent Him, in lifting up His hands and speaking to the company round Him, but sitting in a reverent attitude, with a childlike unconsciousness of manner, on a little stool at the feet of the aged men, hearing their explanations of the Word of God, and asking them questions for His own information and guidance.

His answer to His mother's gentle and loving expostulation is remarkable. She blames Him for the anxiety He has brought to her and Joseph. But it has never occurred to Him that He is deserving of blame, or that they would fail to understand where He was, and in what occupation He would be found engaged when they wanted to find Him. To Him it was the one thing He had to do—to be employed about His Father's business. That duty was paramount, and must of necessity override every other. And it was no want of respect or consideration for His earthly parents that led Him to stay behind in the Temple, but the simple, and for a boy the most natural, belief in the world that they were both of them in perfect sympathy with His feelings, and would be fully aware of the cause of His protracted absence.

"Wist ye not that I must be about My Father's business?"

II. Let us turn now, in the second place, to an interpretation of the narrative with which we have been concerned.

It seems clear that there must have been a period in the history of Jesus of Nazareth when He was "manifested to Himself"—that is to say, when He came to understand Who He really was, and what was the work that He was intended to do. His humanity being real, and not illusory, the infant in His mother's arms—God-man though He was even then—could not possibly have grasped the thought of relationship to God. Nor could the boy Jesus have done so. He could no doubt have apprehended the general notion of God as a Father; but the special thought of Divine Sonship, the belief that He was the Only-begotten of the Father—the Son of God in a sense in which no one else could be called "the Son"—must have required for its apprehension an expansion of the mental faculties which is never to be found in so early a stage of our human career. That this expansion did take place in the case of Jesus we are informed by the sacred writer himself. "Jesus," he says, "increased in wisdom and in stature." In fact, he tells us that Jesus was subject to the law of growth which is common to all human beings. We are justified, then, in inferring—indeed, we are compelled to infer, unless we abandon the doctrine of our Lord's true and real humanity—that the child Jesus, the youth Jesus, even the man Jesus, did not at one time understand things which He understood at another; or, to put it somewhat differently, that He came at a certain period to know what at a previous period he had been totally ignorant of. It is this thought, Christian brethren, which, unless I am much mistaken, gives us the key to the remarkable narrative before us.

Up to the time when He was twelve years old, Jesus was unacquainted with His own real self and with His real mission. I would not, indeed, say that He had had no presentiments on the subject. I believe He may have had them. He may have had ideas of mysterious greatness, of alliance with Heaven, of a wonderful future awaiting Him, floating round His mind; but not taking tangible shape and rooting themselves in it. But I mean that it was on this particular occasion that He first grasped firmly the belief of a special relationship to the Eternal Father, and of a special call to a great work for God and man. It was, in fact, the time of the "revelation of Christ to Himself." He cannot be said to have been revealed to the Doctors in the Temple, for they saw Him and yet saw Him not. What they beheld was a wonderful lad, whose insight into spiritual truth astonished them, and whose simplicity of disposition and modesty of demeanour charmed them to an unusual degree. More than this they did not perceive; His real character was concealed from them. But what Jesus saw in Himself was the Son of God, and the worker who must, as speedily as possible, be engaged in doing His Father's business. And when we come to think of it, this time of revelation must have been a most momentous crisis in the history of the Saviour's spiritual and intellectual development.

III. We turn, in the third and last place, to a few simple remarks of a practical kind.

We notice, then, the early exhibition of our Lord's devotion to His God and Father in heaven. One of the most striking features of His character is His sympathy with man; His deep and intense interest in everything that is human. This was no new feeling of His. Long before Jewish days—indeed, I suppose we may say long before the foundations of the world were laid—His delights were with the sons of men, and He anticipated with eagerness the time when they should appear on the earth.

At a later period He followed the fortunes of the chosen race, appearing among them as the "Angel of the Covenant;" and we are told that "in all their afflictions He was afflicted, and the angel of His presence saved them. In His love and in His pity He redeemed them; and He bore them and carried them all the days of old." And when at last He appeared in the flesh, a man amongst men, He gave evidence of His unchangeable regard—in the tenderness which gathered round Him all the outcast and fallen, all the weary and heavy laden, in His making common cause with every child of Adam who was willing to come to Him and to trust in Him, in His giving Himself up with an unsparing self-immolation in order to secure the highest and truest interests of the human race. But, strong as this feeling was in the heart of Jesus, it was subordinate to another, and that other was the feeling of devotion to His Heavenly Father. Man was much to Him, but God was more. I suppose we may say that man was so much to Him because God was more than man. He loved man, in God. And here in this narrative we have the earliest recorded manifestations of what perhaps we may venture to call the "ruling passion" of the life of Jesus Christ. He whose entire existence was permeated with the thoughts of the Father; who spent whole nights in communion with the Father; whose meat it was to do the will of the Father, and to finish His work; whose greatest and most agonising trial was the overclouding of the Father's countenance, which had ever hitherto been turned to Him with an approving smile—began His career in the Temple, at twelve years of age, with an intense realisation of His own personal relation to the Father, and with a profound consecration of Himself to that Father's service.

XUM

Again, we notice the readiness of Jesus to wait until the time appointed for the commencement of His public ministry had arrived. Jesus was on fire with a Divine zeal to be about His Father's business. And who was so qualified as He to do the Father's work? But the Divine command came to Him, and immediately He withdrew His hand from the plough (for the time for ploughing had not yet arrived), and went away; went away to obscurity in a country village; went to association with the simple peasants of Galilee; went to the quiet fulfilment of ordinary and monotonous duties, to the workshop and the market-place, to thought and meditation and prayer, and the study of the Word; went, in fact, to eighteen long years of silence and patient waiting, until at last the summons came, and He was called to go forth in earnest to the work of His life.

We notice, lastly, the submission of the Saviour to constituted authority. Is it not wonderful that He should thus put Himself under human limitations? But He did put Himself under human limitations. With the Divine secret treasured in His breast, Jesus—knowing now Who He is, knowing Himself to be the Eternal Son of God—returns to Nazareth, and places Himself under the control of human parents, themselves encompassed with infirmities, themselves liable to make mistakes, and themselves needing to be guided by that unerring wisdom that cometh down from above. "But so," He would have said to us if we had expressed surprise, "it becometh Me to fulfil all righteousness." And certainly in this, as in other matters, He has left us an example that we should follow His steps. All through His career Jesus renounced the way of self-will, and trod the lowly path of submission and obedience.

THE HEART OF THOMAS TITT; OR, THE BIG MAN AND THE BIGGER.

BY THE REV. P. B. POWER, M.A., AUTHOR OF "THE OILED FEATHER," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER II.

IN order to see how small Mr. Augustus Roundabut Swellingford really was, we must take him first of all in his individuality—i.e., to put it as plainly as possible, in himself. I don't think much of you, Augustus, in that light, and there are a great many others—those who look at things, and people, with an eye to something beyond this world's things and ways—who probably would say the same.

You were small in your range of thought. If the mind be indeed the measure of the man, you did not measure much. Shakespeare tells us that "the mind has no horizon, it looks beyond the eye;" but then Shakespeare did not know you, Augustus; and when he said that, he was thinking of people who really had a mind, which, in the meaning of the word, you had not.

You were small, Augustus, I say, in your range of thought. Whom did you really ever think of except yourself? Your big self was so big that it took all your time and all your energies to think enough about this great subject. You really never got beyond yourself. Your mind had no room for anything, or any person, but yourself. You had some opinions, Augustus, and they were very narrow ones—but you had no thoughts. An opinion is very often a notion of our own, taken up without any thought; and so you had your opinions about this and that, which might have been altered in some cases at any rate, if only you had given yourself the trouble to think.

How about that old church, Augustus? It was your opinion that everyone should contribute alike to its restoration. Each person took up as much room in it as you did (though I don't believe that either). You didn't see why you, an individual, should do more than any other individual; they had as much benefit out of it as you. There was not a big thought in the whole of that big body of yours. Perhaps, if people thought with their stomachs, you might have had some big ideas—or with their bankers' books; but there are such things as heart-thoughts, and of these, my friend, you knew nothing. And yet, God meant men to be big—to have great thoughts—not always big head-thoughts, for many people are not clever, but big heart-thoughts, for all have hearts. "The liberal man," we are told, "deviseth liberal things"—he devises them with his heart; but you were not a liberal man, and so you could not devise anything that had any nobility in it.

Not but that you once gave £1,000—aye, a good cheque on the Bank of England for £1,000, which the cashier paid too in due course—gave it to the famine in Bunduckipore—when I say "gave it," I mean nobody knew that you got anything for it—but, my friend Augustus, you knew it yourself—you meant to get something for it; and you did—it helped you on, with two or three other donations of the same kind, towards being what you aimed at—that was, being Lord Mayor of London. Now, observe, Augustus, I am not saying one word against the Lord Mayor—not a word that would take away in the smallest degree from the great dignity for the year that it lasts. I admire the Lord Mayor in his robes in the daytime, and in his grand diamond badge when I have the pleasure of meeting him of an evening. I admire him in the Mansion House when he's at home, and in his carriage when he's abroad—even if I saw him walking like anybody else, I dare say I should admire him then too; he looks well in the justice-room, and I dare say he doesn't look amiss even when, like the rest of us poor mortals, he is in bed; I only mean to say that when a man gives big charities—not for charity's sake, but to push himself on, and up, to being either a Lord Mayor or anything else, he is not working out a big thought or having a big thought—he is working all the time out of the narrowness of his own little heart, and in his own little circle; he's not having a heart-thought at all—he's not going beyond himself; and he who cannot get beyond himself is and must be small.

Mr. Augustus Roundabut Swellingford aimed at being Lord Mayor of London; he passed altogether beyond being satisfied with having a Lord Mayor to dine with him; and so he did all such things as were likely to help him on to the desired end. Folk said of him, what a liberal and generous man he was! but they didn't know that he was only liberal and generous to himself. No, Augustus, you were not generous to yourself—not to your real self—not to the "self" that shall live long after the magnificent figure of Augustus Roundabut Swellingford shall have departed from the streets of London, and from the Mansion House, and bidden farewell to sword and mace for ever.

And as our friend was small in his thought, so of course was he small in his real actions. "Action," as the poet says, "ever treads the path in which we think we follow good, or flee from evil." Now, to follow good was, in Mr. Augustus Roundabut Swellingford's view, to follow what would make the most of himself, and for himself; and so, looked at apart from himself, he never did a big thing. Not but that his transactions were big. Mr. Swellingford dealt with hundreds of thousands even at a single stroke; in his business transactions he had written the name Augustus Roundabut Swellingford in full at the foot of many a cheque for £10,000; but in the region in which the personality, or influence, or profit of Swellingford was not to be found, there also were none of his deeds to be found either; so that his range of influence, of life—of real life—was very small indeed.

And so, good reader, you can easily understand that, Mr. Swellingford's action, and thought, and affection being very limited, his whole being was very limited; he was big only in the make-believe of real greatness. He was big as the world, or as the unthinking part of the world, would call bigness, and that was enough for him.

Yes! Mr. Augustus Roundabut Swellingford was small, very small in relation to heaven, and to humanity—to his kind, amongst which he had the means of being big indeed, had he been so inclined. What he was in himself, he was in his position as regards heaven and earth; he was a poor, lean, skinny, wizened, shrivelled, withered creature; halt and maimed, and blind and poor; he was no bigger than a mite in a Stilton cheese, even if he were so big, and I beg the cheese's pardon for having associated its name with him at all. Yes, all you little mites which dwell in that cheese, I beg all your pardons too, for I have no doubt you all live up to your lights, and your responsibilities, and capacities, which, so far as I know, are simply to eat cheese morning, noon, and night, and finally to disappear, I won't say where or how, only certainly to disappear, and be heard of in this busy world no more.

Farewell for a while, Augustus, farewell, until we meet again—grow bigger, and bigger—as big as a man can grow; everyone owns that you are big, at least most people—all people of your own ilk. I put this in, because you know, or ought to know by this, that "everybody" doesn't really mean "everybody." I have lived long enough to know that there are a great many people outside "everybody," and some of them very important people too. You'd be surprised, good reader, at the number of people I have met with in the world, who were not amongst the "everybodies;" and who in the world can they be?

Amongst those connected with Mr. Augustus Swellingford, I can tell you of one at any rate, though he is certainly only a very small one, and that is Mr. Thomas Titt, of Tittsville, who lived a few hundreds of yards from big Mr. Swellingford, and big Mr. Swellingford's big house, and big Mr. Swellingford's big belongings of every kind.

Yes, Tom Titt, or Tommy Titt, or Mr. Thomas Titt—it is right that we should not be too familiar, and should make the most of you (though you yourself, good soul, are the last who would make any demands in this way)—yes: you are worth all this poetry, and a good bit of prose too, which I shall not, however, give the reader; for people nowadays, if they quote much, no matter how good it may be, and how much to the purpose, are apt to be thought prosy: a deadly fault in the opinion of a sharp editor who is up to the mark.

But this much I may do: I may go back to your earliest days, when, in the course of nature, you were smaller—aye, a good bit smaller than you are even now.

Tom Titt—Mr. Thomas Titt—you are a dwarf. You were very small when you were born, and as if that were not enough, your nurse must needs drop you, and so bring it about that you could never grow up big. There are some little babies which are like the grain of mustard-seed, the smallest among all seeds, but grow up into something very big by-and-bye; and you might have grown, Tommy. Anyhow, you might have touched five feet. I don't mean to say that folk would have wanted a step-ladder when they had to whisper to you. But five feet—that, I think, you might have got to, but for the carelessness of that woman, who, with you in one arm and hand, and her tea-pot in the other hand, actually, when she stumbled, held on to the tea-pot, and let you drop, so that the tea-pot escaped a broken snout, and you got a broken back.

I don't know whether I should hang all nurses who drop babies, but I should certainly do something dreadful to them, more especially if they did not say anything about it.

I am not alone in my opinion. Tom Titt's father held the same. He was often heard giving vent to it.

"Look here, mum," said he to the new rector's wife. "Here, mother, you strip Tommy's back. There, mum, look at that; you've come from London, mum, where there's a great many sights. I hear, mum, that the wax-works is wonderful, and a part of 'em dreadful; but did you ever see the like of that, and all through burglary, mum? 'Burglary' I calls it, and the one who did it I call a burglar, and it was a woman we had in to nurse the little boy while his mother was ill, who burgled him; and he's come out as you see him now."

"But why do you call it 'burglary'?" said Mrs. Jamieson.

"Because burglary is next to murder," said Mr. Titt senior, "and it's an awful-sounding word; and to break a boy's back is next to murdering him; there's breaking both ways—breaking into a house and breaking a boy's back; where's the difference? You break into a house and make off with a man's property—silver spoons, if he has any—and the like; and you break a boy's back, and make off with all his chances of getting on in life; the next thing to hanging is, I say, what should be done to every one who drops a child. That boy was diddled for life."

"What do you mean by 'diddled'?" asked the new vicar's wife. "I never heard the word before."

"'Diddled,' mum, is the short for 'done for'—'dished'—there ain't nothing before him in life; he can't come to anything; all that is the meaning of 'diddled,' mum." And Mr. Thomas Titt senior looked at the vicar's wife as much as to say, "Well, I'm proud at having had to turn dictionary to the like of you," and as an after-thought he gave a second look, the meaning of which was—"Let the dictionary beat that if it can."

"If that is the meaning of being 'diddled'," said the vicar's wife, opening her big eyes wide, and talking in her sweetest, gentlest voice, for she saw that she had to do with a wounded spirit, "I am very grieved to hear that such a thing should have happened to your little boy; for I am afraid that nothing can ever be done for that poor back."

"That's just it, mum; he's diddled, and the meaning of being 'diddled' is that nothing can be done for you. The Queen herself couldn't put that boy's back right: no, not with a regiment of horse or a man-of-war."

"I'm afraid not," said Mrs. Jamieson, with a sigh.

"You're very good to sigh, mum," said Mr. Titt senior, "very good, mum; it shows a feelin' heart. Most people laugh at the poor lad; and it isn't always that feelin' hearts and broken backs come together. I hope my poor lad's broken back may meet with the like going through life; he'll need, poor child, all the help and pity he can get. 'Diddling' ain't fit even for a dog. I say a man hain't the heart of a man, as would diddle a dog."

Mrs. Jamieson—the Hon. Mrs. Jamieson, as we must call her, to give her her proper rank—was the daughter of a lord; and had not been long married to Mr. Jamieson when he became the vicar of the parish in which he now was. Her mode of life and circumstances had not led her much amongst the poor up to the present, but her heart had been always amongst them; and she was delighted when she found herself by her marriage enabled to visit and sympathise with them. Indeed, it had been the vision of her life for many a year; and to help her husband in his labours was her greatest joy.

In the society in which she had hitherto moved, she had never heard the word "diddled," hence it came as a new kind of revelation to her, and a very dreadful one too. She could never have believed that one word could have contained so much misery. "Dished," too, was something dreadful. It had been used to explain "diddled," but, like many an explanation, it left what had to be explained as hard, if not harder, to be understood than before. But what could be understood was dreadful enough, and plain enough. Mr. Titt senior had said that his son Tom could never come to anything—that nothing could be done for him.

"Only to think, dear," said she to her husband that evening, as they talked over their day's experiences, "only to think that life should be so hopeless for that poor little thing: to think that he must carry that dreadful word about with him as long as he lives. It isn't as if he were an old man, with life nearly at an end, with only a short time to carry his mortifications and his sorrows; but this poor child has all life before him, and to go through it with that dreadful word upon him, a 'dished' and 'diddled' boy—that is what the father said—it is dreadful."

"Aye, my dear, and there are many like him who have to start life 'done for,' or partly 'done for,' from the very beginning. Some are 'done for' in their minds, and some in their bodies, and some in their circumstances; some are called 'gutter children.'"

"What children?" said Mrs. Jamieson.

"'Gutter children,' because they begin to spend their young life in the slums and streets, and so from their earliest youth become accustomed to what lowers and degrades them, and from very habit prevents them from rising in after-life."

"And can't we do anything?" said Mrs. Jamieson; "can't we help? What good are we in this world if we see all this under our very eyes, and don't do what we can to change it, and make it better?"

"That's just what you've married me for, my dear," said the clergyman. "You and I have got to do our best to help all we can, to lend a hand to all the 'diddled' and 'dished' people both for this world and the next: to give them a lift on their present weary way, and to be the means, under God, of showing them at the end of it something that was worth living for, and worth bearing for, and worth striving for. That's what you married me for."

"Part," said Mrs. Jamieson.

"Part!" said the clergyman, in a tone of half surprise.

"Part for yourself, you know—anyhow, a little part," and Mrs. Jamieson felt herself getting rather rose-coloured in the cheeks.

"Yes, I do know; and now as the parish and I are one, I won't ask you how much for each. Anyhow, you have us both; and now you must make the most of us, and the best of us too. Suppose now you begin with this 'dished' and 'diddled' little Titt. This is your first day in parish work, and you can't do better than begin with such a dished and diddled scrap of humanity as this diddled Titt. But mind you, Mary, you mustn't spend all your money, or all your sympathies either, on this one specimen of diddledom; for you'll find these diddled people in one form or other only too plentiful in the world."

From that day forth our little friend Tom Titt had a sunbeam cast athwart his life. Heaven's light had come into the humble abode where he lived, and it had come in human form. Once Heaven's great light, the Sun of Righteousness Himself, came into earth's poor abodes in human form, an infant and a man; and ever since, rays of this true celestial Light come in human forms into homes of wretchedness, of weariness, of disappointment, of want. These have sunlight in their eyes and in their smiles, and on their lips; and even their very footfalls drop music across the thresholds of the sad. He who ministered in the flesh ordained that after Him, and after His example, there should be ministries in the flesh, the ministries of his followers, the reflections of the light-rays which have fallen on them from Himself. A binder of wounds is the Great Physician, and binders of wounds are they, in a world which has not only broken backs, but broken hearts, and broken hopes; and the outer frame oftentimes not half so marred as the spirit that tabernacles within. No, Thomas Titt, mercy and grace were in store for you that day, when the new minister's wife began her ministering rounds with you; and her great eyes opened wide, and her great heart opened wider, as she looked upon and took into her very soul such a "dished" and "diddled" specimen of humanity as yourself.

I must now, however, tell you, good reader, a little more about our young friend the "diddled one" himself. At the time of which I write, our little friend Tom was nine years of age. He did not look that when Mrs. Jamieson's eyes fell upon him, but by reason of his smallness he might have passed for some five or six. He was, however, nine; and had had some of the experiences of life suitable to that age. These experiences were chiefly in the form of troubles, childish troubles it may be, but troubles still; the troubles of a child are for a child, even as the troubles of a man are for a man.

And little Thomas had his share. He was destined not only to be "diddled," but to know and feel that he was "diddled," and this latter element of his bitterness was perhaps the greatest. Little Tom, it is so with us all, whether we have humps upon our backs or not; little Tom, there are many burdens as big and as heavy as humps, though folk can't see them. It is in proportion as he who has them feels them, that they are his plague through life.

It was a sorrow to little Tom Titt that a boy no older than himself, but ever so much taller and stronger, cheated him at marbles, and then added cheeking to cheating, and, squaring out before him, told poor Tommy to get them back if he could. He was wronged because he was weak and defenceless. He was so, because he was not like others who could fight for their own.

It was a sorrow to little Tom when his feelings were hurt by the boys threatening to show him as a dwarf, especially by one big fellow who threatened to sell him to the next caravan, telling him that "the showman would make a fortune out of him."

When the tears ran down poor little Tommy's face at the funeral of a little boy belonging to the Sunday-school, it was hard upon him that other lads, who were as unmoved as brass, should call him a "snivelling little idiot," and threaten, if he didn't stop that snivelling, to tie him up in his own pocket-handkerchief and throw him into the river, where he would find plenty of water.

It was hard, when others went to play football and cricket, that he should have to stay at home, or to sit down amongst the old men, who had played cricket some fifty years before, but were good for nothing now but to look on. When one and another talked of what they would do in life, and how they would get on, did not the iron enter into poor Tommy's soul, when he felt that for "diddled" ones like himself there was no future, no getting on. Tommy had a brave little heart. He had fought the village gander in a drawn battle, and he had read of great victories by sea and land, and how quite poor boys had risen to be captains of ships, and generals, and worn medals on their breasts; and he had seen one great fellow who stood six feet two, and who had enlisted in the Grenadier Guards, come back to the village in a spick-and-span new uniform, with a cap that made him look ever so much bigger again, and this great and grand creature had said to him, "Halloo! Is that you, little one? You have not grown a bit since I was here last. Why, you ain't the size of one of our fifes." And this was gall and bitterness to one who had heart to fight that bird, of which it was said that Farmer Jones himself was afraid. Moreover, there were the home influences. They were a trial and a sorrow to little Tom. He was brought up strictly with the thought that he was a "diddled," and "dished," and "done-for" boy—that he had no future—that whatever chance there was for him in the other world, there was none in this.

And so it came to pass that gradually the poor boy's mind fell into the groove that circumstances seemed to hollow out for it; and he felt and lived as one who had not a right to have anything, or to expect anything either. To be humble to everyone, to be kicked about by everyone, to be laughed at by anyone, never to be of any good in the world, either to himself or anyone else—that to all appearance was the present and the future of Mr. Tom Titt.

Such was the condition of little Tommy Titt, when Mrs. Jamieson took him in hand. There lay nothing before him in this world; and, for the matter of what he knew, nothing in the world to come. A little of that went a great way in the Titt household; and so not much had come to Tommy's share.

The Hon. Mrs. Jamieson's husband took an immense interest in her helping work in the parish. He was a man of good practical common sense; and though he smiled at some of her mistakes, which was quite natural, he knew that he had in her the stuff for a good helpmate, and that she would be of enormous use to him in his work. But alas! she soon came to grief; for, slipping on an orange-peel in the dusk, she sprained her ankle; and so, her parish proceedings for the present came to an untimely end.

It is an ill wind that blows nobody good, and this bit of orange-peel was an important link in the history of our worthy little friend. It is possible that, but for that orange-peel, Mrs. Jamieson's attentions might have had to be divided among so many that her thoughts could not have been given to him as they now were. But the orange-peel stood Tom Titt's friend.

And I may remark, in passing, that we never know upon how small a thing depends our getting harm or good. In this case, the orange-peel turned out the making of little Titt.

"Always longing to get out into the parish, my dear!" said Mrs. Jamieson's husband one day, as he sat by her sofa's side.

"Well," said she, "I long to be doing good. I read all day, and I do this and that, no doubt, with my needle and my pen; but you see, Arthur, I should like to be amongst the living, needing people themselves."

"Well," said Mr. Jamieson, "suppose you have one or two of them up here—what do you say to your little friend Tom Titt? Do you know he has been asking after you? Betsy saw him sitting outside the gate for a long time; and at last she went out to ask him if he wanted anything, and he said, 'No.' So she said—'What are you sitting there for, then?'—'I hope it isn't any harm, ma'am,' said he, 'but I thought the lady might come to the window, perhaps, some time in the day, and then I might have seen her—it does me good to see her—it does my back good—it does me good all over. How is the poor lady's foot? I wouldn't mind,' he said, 'giving her my foot, if only it would make hers well.'—'And what do you want to see her for?' Betsy asked.—'Because I love her,' said the mite; 'and she does me good.'—So I think, Mary, you had better have Mr. Titt up every day until you're able to get about in the parish again; as you can't go to the parish, the parish will be coming to you—at least, a little scrap of it. There, I'll go to his people, and tell them to send him up to-morrow as clean and respectable as they can; and worse than that might happen to a little boy who is 'diddled' and 'dished.'"

During the remainder of that day this mite Tom Titt took up the most of Mrs. Jamieson's thoughts. She might have wished to have been at some greater things in the parish than ministering to such a scrap of humanity—a single one, moreover; but afterthought corrected this idea. "This is the work," said she, "that is sent me; and therefore, it is the work to be done by me—the work which we wish to do might never be sent to us; our business is with what comes to hand. Who knows what little Titt might develop into—at any rate into something more than he is now. So, welcome, little Titt"—and on the following morning he was welcomed when he made his appearance at the parsonage, dressed in what was his very best; and scrubbed, and cleaned, until he almost shone. So pleased were the Titt family at his being invited, that they would have polished even the very hump, and made what artists call a "high light" of it, if they could.

Now, by the time that our little friend had arrived at his destination, Mrs. Jamieson had made up her mind very plainly as to what she ought to do with reference to him. She had turned him over in her mind so often that, had he been there in the flesh, he would surely have come forth in the form of a ball.

Her determination took the form of the enlargement of Tommy Titt. She would make him expand, grow, feel himself worth "something," be "somebody," "something." I need not say that this view was chiefly with reference to his mind; with the body she feared that, comparatively, at any rate, and possibly positively, little could be done.

The lady with the large eyes and the sweet voice,—the lord's daughter, the parson's wife—took little Titt, accordingly, in hand. This juvenile having been duly well washed, and dressed in his best—which was not very good even then—came up every day at eleven o'clock to be enlarged, grown, developed, and made all that he could be made of by Mrs. Jamieson.

And this to some purpose too. It was no doubt a long process. Thomas Titt did not come by all he knew in a day, or in a year either; but he did come by it in the end; and that was the main point.

Mrs. Jamieson's confinement to her sofa was more than a matter of weeks. She remained there nearly, if not quite, two years; the little injury developed into a greater one in the knee-joint; and she was a prisoner for many a long day.

Now, all good-doing has its reward, and Mrs. Jamieson's was no exception to the rule. To some of us the reward comes in one way, and to others in another; hers came through Tom Titt himself. Not only were her lonely hours partly solaced, but her own mind expanded more and more; for the more she taught Tom Titt, the more she seemed to get to know herself. Talking to Titt of all things good, something or somebody within her seemed to talk more and more of good to her. Do good, dear reader, do good; it will come back to you and upon you, how and when you know not; but it will surely come. "He that watereth others shall be watered also himself."

MODERN DISCOVERIES CONFIRMING REVELATION.

BY THE REV. TRYON EDWARDS, D.D.

"ALL human discoveries," says Herschel, "seem to be made only for the purpose of confirming more and more strongly the truths from on high contained in the sacred Scriptures." And the remark is strikingly illustrated and confirmed by the wonderful discoveries made of late years at Nineveh and Babylon, and in Egypt. One or two instances of the light thrown by such discoveries on the statements of the Bible may be both interesting and instructive.

Daniel, as the Bible tells us, for interpreting Belshazzar's dream, had a chain of gold put about his neck, and was made the third ruler in the kingdom. "But," says the objector, "why third? For he was made next to Belshazzar himself, and Belshazzar was evidently the first in the kingdom." And this for a time seemed a real and great difficulty; for while the Bible speaks of Belshazzar as the last king of Babylon, and as slain when Cyrus took the city, all the Greek historians say that Nabonidus was the last king of Babylon; and he was not killed, but was with his army in Borsippa, and lived for many years afterwards; and by the Greek historians no mention is made of Belshazzar.

Now here was what seemed a serious if not an insurmountable difficulty, and objectors were not slow to make the most of it. But the monuments and records above alluded to make the matter entirely plain, and show that both statements are right. They tell us that Belshazzar was the son of Nabonidus, and that for three years he was associated with his father on the throne; that for several years Nabonidus had remained at home and sent Belshazzar to command the army, but that in this last year he himself took command of the army, and left his son Belshazzar in command at Babylon. And this is further made plain by the curious fact, that there have been found thousands of records on the little clay tablets discovered, which have been kept for centuries in the office of the recorder of deeds in Babylon, just as we keep copies of such deeds in our county records. Out of one hundred and sixteen years, there is not a single year lacking, in which from one to thirty deeds have not been found thus recorded, every one of which is carefully dated. And one of these deeds—just one—is dated exactly in the third year of King Belshazzar. His first two years are credited to his father, with whom he jointly reigned, while in this, the third year, he was reigning alone in Babylon. And this third year is the only one mentioned in the Book of Daniel. Thus it is plain why Belshazzar promised to make, and did make, Daniel the third ruler in the kingdom. He could not make him second, for he himself was second, his father being the first, and so Daniel was made third in the kingdom.

Take another illustration of the justness of Herschel's remark. Isaiah says that Manasseh, the son of Hezekiah, was carried captive to Babylon. "A likely story," says the cavilling objector, "that the king of Assyria, who was reigning at Nineveh, should take his captives to Babylon!" And the statement did seem so improbable that some of the best commentators have thought there might have been a mistake in copying the original of Isaiah, and others have frankly admitted that they did not see how the difficulty could be explained.

But now, within a few years, we find the whole story of Esarhaddon's life written by himself; and in it he tells us that when his father Sennacherib died, the populace of Babylon were in such a state of excitement and ferment that he felt it best to go down and live among them; and that, in addition to his palace at Nineveh, he built another palace at Babylon, and made that place his head-quarters through all the remainder of his reign. So now it is plain why Manasseh was carried to Babylon, and not to Nineveh; for it was just for that part of his reign—not before and not afterwards, but for just that part of his reign—that the king was to be found at Babylon, and not, as before, at Nineveh, and that his prisoner was taken where he himself was.

Such illustrations of the light thrown on statements of the Bible by modern discoveries might be given almost without number, showing that God, in His providence, has been treasuring up His facts that in due time they might be found endorsing His Word, as they have done on the bricks of Assyria and the once buried but now risen relics of Nineveh and Babylon; so that at the cavils of doubt and disbelief the very stones cry out, and echo to us the truth of the written Word of revelation. Sceptics and doubters may question the records of Moses, but the body of Pharaoh the oppressor of Israel, and that too of Seti his father, whose daughter found Moses, now come up as by a resurrection from the dead, and bear their testimony to the narrative of the great teacher of Israel!

SHORT ARROWS.

NOTES OF CHRISTIAN LIFE AND WORK IN ALL FIELDS.

"CHRIST FOR THE WORLD."

E lately heard a missionary from New Guinea speak with earnest appreciation and gratitude of the work carried on by native Christians, and of their heroic efforts as pioneers of the Gospel. "Some would dismiss all mention of these our fellow-workers as 'blacks,'" said he, "but it is to their courage and perseverance, their love and faith, that the white missionaries and the societies at home owe a debt of reverent admiration and thankfulness." One of these native Christians was refused a home upon the place he sought to evangelise, and had to live alone on an island, where his enemies hoped and expected he would die. Having no fresh water where they lived, they frequently came into his neighbourhood to fetch it, and grew surprised and indignant to find he still survived—thinner and weaker-looking, indeed, but with gentle looks and tones for them still. They poisoned the waters he would be likely to drink, but his life was mercifully preserved. At last they grew tired of their persecution, and invited him to make his home among them, to which he replied he would live with them gladly, and persuaded them to build him a church and listen to his preaching. A native evangelist from the South Seas found his way before an Australian mission committee, and offered himself for work in New Guinea. Difficulties, almost amounting to impossibilities, were presented to him, but he stood undismayed in face of them all. "Are there men living there?" he asked. "Yes; ferocious, wild, and savage," was the reply from a well-meaning gentleman, who was alarmed at the notion of his venturing thither. "If there are men there," he answered, "the Gospel has to be preached to them; it must be taken to every nation, and I must go." It is recorded of this heroic spirit that he met with much to frighten, dismay, and discourage him, but he was overheard one day saying to his wife, "Whatever may lie before us—even if it be death at the hands of these people—we can bear it; we can go through anything and everything for the Master's sake." And the Lord has owned and blessed the faithful service of hearts like these, so that the way has been prepared for English missionaries to confirm and strengthen the work of the pioneers, and in New Guinea, as in countless other districts of darkness, the Gospel has brought light and order, and mercy and peace.

VISITORS IN THE TREDEGAR SQUARE CRÈCHE, BOW.

MUCH-NEEDED ENTERPRISES.

The object of the new Crèche, in connection with the Rev. W. Evans Hurndall's East London mission work, is to take charge of children from three weeks up to five years old, while the mothers are working for the daily bread. The Crèche is at 53, Tredegar Square, Bow, where the little ones are well looked after from eight a.m. till the evening, the mother being charged threepence a day, which includes the necessary food. Visitors are admitted from twelve to five any day except Saturday and Sunday. When we remember how many a mother has to take part in the daily-bread struggle, and how many young lives must necessarily have been lonely, neglected, and tearful, we realise the urgent need for such refuges, snug, bright and warm, with wholesome nourishment and careful nurses to give the children of the poor a start in life, and gladden them with toys and pictures. Mr. Hurndall's work is many-sided, fighting starvation, despair, and sin. Whether they attend the services or not, the really needy are helped by food, clothing, tools, blankets, sewing-machines, mangles, and the like; emigration has also proved a great success, as many letters of gratitude testify. One lad writes: "The good Lord has not forsaken me, though a stranger in a strange land; they have made me leader of the singing, so that I am being made of some service to them and to the Lord. I am getting on first-class with my work." Another says: "I am comfortably situated on a farm; the people I am with are good old Methodists, and very kind to me. I get four meals, so I think I shall soon get fat." One branch of this East End mission specially ministers to hairdressers and coffee-house keepers, who have special temptations to Sunday trading, and blessing and progress are reported concerning this effort. Free services are held at the Bow and Bromley Institute; these have become extremely popular, and a branch has been started now by the suggestive name of the "Bring-someone-else-with-you Society."

"THE GLORY WHICH THOU GAVEST ME."

"How can I lose self?" a discontented spirit once asked a certain bishop. "Self seems to follow me in everything."—"I think," was the reply, "the place where you will lose self is the place where you will find your Saviour." Heaven does not require of us needless austerities, humiliating penances, the starvation of every yearning for the bright, the glad, and the beautiful; but every true Christian ought to know something about self-denial, which a preacher well described as the glory laid upon our Master, and bequeathed by Him to us. There is a point at which comfort reaches self-indulgence, and becomes un-Christian, while the bodies and souls of our brethren have need. This is a matter between our own souls and our Saviour, but all honour to those lives that have caught His Spirit, and have set the Father and the brethren above all appeals of self! An East-End Mission House for the Jews was established through the quiet self-denial of a humble Christian, who brought in his generous contributions, saying almost apologetically, "I cannot live on less than a hundred a year, but I can spare £600 more for this mission." This man suffered from ailments needing continual treatment; he has since entered into rest, leaving an inspiring memory. We heard of a gentleman, described as peculiarly neat, dapper, and particular about himself, who undertook to visit some cottages. In one he found a sick woman, alone, and amid very dirty surroundings. Neighbours had formerly come in, but now everyone had given up coming, and she could not get things clean herself. That gentleman washed the floor, got everything clean and tidy, and when all was in order proposed to read the Bible to the poor sufferer. Before she died, the invalid bore witness it was his absolute self-forgetfulness for Christ's sake that made her at first believe in the religion her heart afterwards accepted.

ALL ABOUT HYMNS.

All who work among the young know the added interest that is given to a hymn if something can be told of the circumstances under which it was written, and the life-story of its author. One teacher who has made it a practice to tell the children in his school any little fact bearing on hymns and their authors that seems suitable for their hearing, says that more than once he has been met with the query at the end of the day, "Is there nothing to tell us about any of the hymns to-day?" All teachers who wish to do so may now learn with ease something about the principal hymns in general use among all Christian bodies if they will turn to "The Romance of Psalter and Hymnal," which has just been published by Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton. The work is divided into three parts. The first two are from the pen of the Rev. R. E. Welsh, M.A., one being devoted to the story of the Psalter, so far as possible telling, in a few words in each case, all that is known or can be ascertained as to the circumstances under which the Psalms were written; while the second part deals in a similar manner with the hymns best known and in most general use, and affords much deeply interesting and attractive reading. The third part of the work consists of biographies of eight of the best known of modern composers of hymn-tunes by Mr. F. G. Edwards. The work as a whole should prove very popular among all who take an interest in the "service of praise."—From the same publishers (Hodder and Stoughton) we have also received a new and popular edition of Mr. Thayer's readable biography of General Grant, under the title "From Tan Yard to White House," a book that all boys and teachers of boys ought to read.—The boys again will be glad to welcome a new story—the last, alas!—by their old friend Mr. W. H. G. Kingston, issued by the same publishers, under the title of "Roger Willoughby: a Story of the Times of Benbow," full of adventurous interest, and copiously illustrated.—Two other stories for young people from Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton are also on our table at the present moment. The first is one of Mrs. G. S. Reaney's telling stories under the title of "Dorothy Belle." All who know Mrs. Reaney's work know what an influence it may have on the young, and we need only say that this last work follows worthily in the line of its predecessors. The other story is "The Thrales of Redlynch," by Nehemiah Curnock, a quaintly worked-out story, to which some of the chapter-headings give an added interest. Both these books are admirably suited for the Sunday-school library shelves.—In quite another vein is "The Atheist Shoemaker" (same publishers), in which Mr. Hugh Price Hughes tells for the benefit of older readers a touching story of his work in the West London Mission, a story in which Mr. Hughes has infused his own fervour and dramatic power.—It is a good sign in many ways that so many new books of family devotion are issuing from the press on all hands. We trust that this movement is but the indication of a deepening interest in the family altar. The latest addition to the series is "The People's Prayer Book," by the Rev. Joseph Parker, D.D., published by Messrs. Hazell, Watson, and Viney. In this Prayer Book will be found a series of prayers, together with suggestions for their modification to meet special circumstances, and short services for those who cannot attend the public worship of the Lord, together with some features ordinarily associated only with the Family Bible. To all who are in need of the help such a work as this can give we commend it most heartily.

A CHEER BY THE WAY

As a little in-break of brightness amidst the sad tidings still almost daily arriving from the famine-stricken regions of China, comes the intelligence that several of the missionaries who have been doing such noble work as relief distributors in Shantung were, on leaving the scene of their labours, presented with red umbrellas (a very great honour in native estimation) and other testimonials. One lady of the mission band was carried through the city in a sedan-chair, followed by a great procession of literati with their red buttons (an honour greater still). Here are pleasing proofs that gratitude is not, as some suppose, an unknown virtue among the Chinese; and also that the great wall of Chinese prejudice against the foreigner is tottering to its fall.

MORAVIAN MISSION TO LEPERS.

During the discussion of a case of need, a gentleman cried out: "I feel five hundred pounds for this case; what do you feel?" The heroism of one who gave up his life for lepers has recently evoked the most tender sympathy on behalf of the poor leper, the special object of our Lord's compassion, and the devoted missions to lepers ought to receive a grand impetus from the self-sacrifice of him who became a martyr for Christ and for his brethren. Not to detract from the glorious memory of other workers, but to record the self-denying ministry of Moravian missionaries for seventy years, the London Association in Aid of Moravian Missions (29, Ely Place, E.C.) has republished the account of the work carried on among lepers in South Africa and Jerusalem. In 1818 the Moravian pastors began to preach the Gospel to those in the hospital of Hemel-en-Aarde, and in 1822 a missionary was sent to manage the enlarged asylum, and to instruct the inmates in the truths of Christianity. The chapel of stakes and unburnt bricks was built by the patients, and here worship was carried on, till four years later a church was given by Government. Mr. Leitner, the devoted missionary, who had constructed an aqueduct, and cultivated the ground with the help of his charges, was taken home to his reward while in the act of baptising a convert. During six years he baptised ninety-nine adults, most of whom passed before him into that land where there is no more pain. The institution was afterwards removed to Robben Island, whither the lepers were accompanied by their pastor and his wife; one after another poor sufferer was led to seek and find comfort in the Redeemer, and this field of labour met with rich and fruitful blessing. When in 1867 the Colonial Government appointed a chaplain of the Church of England to this district, the Moravian missionaries prayerfully gave up the work to their successors, and about this time another field of usefulness was opened up in connection with the lepers of Jerusalem. Here devoted men and women have carried on a tender work of compassion and mercy, awakening hope in place of despair, and doing everything possible for the comfort of body and soul. The patients have shown also unselfish heroism among themselves; of one Lativé, herself a sufferer, we read that she insisted on sharing the room of a poor woman extremely ill, on whom she waited devotedly. The dying words of this woman must have been her reward, "Oh, let me alone now—I am no longer here—I am in a place where everything is beautiful, so beautiful." One of the patients has written to the workers on behalf of the rest, "Our kind reception into your hospital has shown us we are not forsaken by God, the Highest." It is a matter of great thankfulness that the Moravian missionaries and nurses can show a perfectly healthy record as regards infection.

THE LEPER HOME AT JERUSALEM.

SILENT FORCES.

Hurry has been said to be the work of the flesh, —Quiet, that of the Spirit. How we weaken our spiritual life and harm our power for good by our restless, feverish, dissatisfied mind! How little we esteem that prayerful quietude which would be far more receptive of the gracious influence of God's Spirit, and which would more truly promote our heavenward growth! The Lord seeth not as man seeth; it may be that the busy, bustling life admired and praised by all, is making less real progress Christward than the still, unnoticed one, laid aside to fulfil the ministry of patience and of prayer. "Study to be great" is the motto with too many of us, instead of "Study to be quiet." Who can tell the might of nature's silent forces working on even when we speak of everything as dead, and so little activity is apparent in the world of vegetation! We must not judge only by outward, visible signs; a scientist records that "forces almost unknown to us are active in the silent life of vegetation." Gloom and inactivity are manifest to us, but the Lord of all is working quietly, mightily, and the days to come will show what He has wrought even through these wintry days. Winter's text is not earthly decay but God's eternity—Love working through mystery—the Kingdom of Good even amid seeming ill. May our hearts, with throbs of thankfulness, recognise "not the weariness of mortality, but the strength of divinity," and may we take home the comfort that when God strikes a silence through our busy work, and bids us be quiet and still awhile, we may yet be growing surely, sweetly, blessedly, by reason of that power which is outside ourselves, and which no change can weaken, no touch of death destroy.

IN THE TRACK OF THE FAMINE.

"Famine fever is raging here," writes a missionary at Moukden. "Last week I heard of about fifty families, refugees from Shantung, who had taken shelter in an unused inn, and amongst whom this malady was spreading, several deaths having already occurred. Dr. C—— accompanied me thither. We took six bags of American flour and some fever remedies. The inn-yard was crowded with people, many sick, all without food. We did what we could for them. Returning after two days, we found six had died meanwhile, but the appearance of the rest was improved. General Tso-pao-kwei, who during the famine has had charge of the soup-kitchen here, has now, at our instance, provided a large compound for a fever refuge, appointing soldiers to keep guard and report all death cases to him. Our only responsibility will be the nursing of the sick." No light duty this, following on the arduous relief labours of the devoted missionary distributors, one of whom has himself lately been brought to death's door by this most infectious famine fever.

PRIZES AND PRESENTS.

This is pre-eminently the season for the making of presents and the giving of prizes. From parents to children, and from children to parents, the pleasant interchange of seasonable gifts goes on, but each year the difficulty arises anew of how to select a gift that shall be alike novel and suitable. No gift can be more suitable in the case of a young teacher than one of Messrs. Eyre and Spottiswoode's "Teachers' Bibles," which contain, particularly in the Variorum Bibles, a veritable library of useful information for teachers, bound up with the text of the Scriptures, so as to be always accessible for ready reference. These Bibles are made up in so many different sizes and forms that all tastes and all sights may be easily accommodated. One special edition is prepared for the use of members of Bible Unions, and is admirably adapted to meet their wants. In the provision of seasonable gifts this firm does not forget the little ones, for they have issued a series of charmingly illustrated little booklets, in which are told the Bible stories of Ruth, of Joseph, and of the Prodigal Son, in each case with a preface by the Bishop of Ripon. A more ambitious work is a daintily bound and tastefully executed little volume of "Children's Prayers," than which any prettier present for a child could not be imagined. Older readers may perhaps find relaxation and amusement for their leisure moments in Mr. Ernest M. Jessop's quaint illustrations of the ever-popular "Jackdaw of Rheims," which form a valuable chef-d'œuvre in the way of artistic printing.—For a present to a boy, either Mr. R. M. Ballantyne's brightly written adventure story, entitled "Blown to Bits; or, The Lonely Man of Rakata" (Nisbet and Co.), or his less ambitious work, "The Crew of the Water-Wagtail," ought to win general approval; while for girls the same publishers have issued another of Miss Agnes Giberne's pretty stories, under the title of "Number Three, Winifred Place."—Of "Laurel Crowns" (same publishers) it is almost enough to say that it is from the pen of Emma Marshall. But the work aims at doing something more than merely telling a pretty story for boys and girls, since it seeks to enlist their sympathies on behalf of those who are working among the toiling fishermen. In such a form the work ought undoubtedly to do much good.—Two more stories from the same publishers are "The Yarl's Yacht," by Jessie M. E. Saxby, a stirring story of life on and by the great waters, and "Geoffrey Hallam," a quaint story, in his own well-known style, by the Rev. J. Jackson Wray.—All children love fairy tales, and they, and those who love children too, will be pleased to welcome "The Blue Fairy Book" (Longmans and Co.), in which Mr. Andrew Lang has collected all the dear old stories that have charmed successive occupants of so many nurseries in the years gone by. To say that Mr. Andrew Lang is responsible for the work is to say it is well done, and when lessons and work are done, or in the holiday-time, there could not be a pleasanter companion than this tasteful little volume.

A FEEDER OF THE CHURCHES.

Such is the Open-air Mission, which during last year brought the Gospel within the hearing of about three millions of people, and which from time to time has added very many to the ranks of professed believers. One congregation is mentioned, with a membership of nine hundred and seventy-one, as owing no less than six hundred to the work of open-air preaching. The Bishop of Sherborne, in the seventh century, could not get a congregation, so he went out as a minstrel, and quickly secured an audience. They listened as he played and descanted of heroic deeds, and then he told them of the Saviour's love. A simple and successful plan is this—when the people will not come to the preacher, for the preacher to go out into their midst; thus our churches will be better filled by-and-bye, and our congregations will not only be increased, but stirred up to take part in definite evangelistic work. The vicar of Old Ford remarks that there is a growing need for open-air ministry, after the manner of our Lord; for the enemies of the Gospel resort to open-air gatherings to spread their opinions, and the followers of the Saviour must be bold to avow Him publicly. In the report of the Open-air Mission many striking instances of good accomplished are set forth. We read of a tram-car man brought into light and peace by a wayside hymn, of a gambler for whom a mother had offered prayer, apparently in vain, but who tore up his betting-book, when convinced of sin, in sight of all the people; and of an open-air service in bitter weather, amid the wintry snow, heard by listeners from the windows of their homes, and blessed to eternal issues. At a seaside resort a lady sitting behind her curtains heard the preacher on the sands talking of repentance and salvation; and though he went home from that service saddened because of persecution, some years after he met his unseen hearer, who gladdened his heart by her testimony that his preaching had led to the awakening and conversion of her soul.

"Busy together in ministries of love."

FOR DARK AND RAINY EVENINGS.

There is perhaps a danger lest the multiplicity of outside engagements during the winter break up the home circle evening after evening, and cause those near akin to know less of each other's needs than of the claims of strangers. Prayer and love and wisdom must guide us as to the time we can give outside the home without wronging those within. A few short years, and circumstances will of necessity alter the home-circle concerning which the Master has made us now responsible; let us lay it to heart that the young folks carry with them through life memories of the old home fireside, endeared by helpful readings, inspiring converse, ever-ready sympathy. "Do the work that is nearest," might be whispered with advantage to many of us at times; let us not give all our care and energies to outside vineyards, while our own vineyards are neglected and unkept. No fairer picture can exist in these dark, long evenings, than children and parents busy together in ministries of love, preparing that Christmas-tree which is to delight the poor, mending old toys for the orphaned babes, arranging bright pictures for sick children, tidying old story-books to delight another generation, knitting warm garments for the chill bodies of the aged and infirm. In such a home-circle surely He is present, who loved the family at Bethany, and His blessing will never depart from those boys and girls who delight themselves in remembering the poor. We heard lately of a new branch of benevolence which might well be multiplied by the good-will of our young people—a toy-lending society, which passes on from one poor home to another the charms of novelty as concerns puzzles, donkeys, dolls, and the like. Of course, careful precautions must be taken against the spread of infection, but, all being well in this respect, such a society seems to open up to the children of the poor quite a vista of cheer and enchantment.

AT WORK AND AT HOME.

We have spoken, and with commendation, of the previous volumes of "The Biblical Illustrator," issued by Messrs. Nisbet and Co. Mr. Exell's volume on St. Luke, in this series, is now before us. It follows the line of its predecessors, and is no unworthy successor of them.—Our contributor the Rev. George Everard has prepared a series of evening meditations, which is also issued by Messrs. Nisbet, under the title of "In the Evening," which ought to help and stimulate not a few readers.—Dr. Sparrow Simpson, the Sub-Dean of St. Paul's, has written a very valuable series of "Gleanings from Old St. Paul's," that Mr. Elliot Stock has published. To all lovers of Church history, and especially the history of our metropolitan cathedral, this interesting volume should prove acceptable.—From the same publisher we have received "The God of the Children," in which Mr. Bedford Pollard has given a number of suggestive little chapters for the use of mothers in the religious instruction of their children. The aim of the chapters is to show how the Creator works through all His creatures, and the lessons are clearly pointed and well chosen.—Each year as it comes seems to mark an improvement in the production of Christmas cards and other seasonable gifts, though possibly the number of designs does not increase materially. We are glad to see that Messrs. Raphael Tuck and Sons have provided among their cards for this season a number which are specially designed to illustrate passages of Scripture appropriate to the season. Two such series of cards are entitled "Christ the King" and "The Light is Come," and in each case the designs are by Fanny Bowers, and the verses by Jetty Vogel. All the coloured cards and booklets issued by this firm are remarkable for the beauty of the workmanship and the taste displayed in their designing, qualities which are perhaps nowhere more marked than in the wonderfully perfect reproductions of celebrated pictures by great masters, for which this firm is famous.—In "Israel My Glory" (Mildmay Printing House) the Rev. John Wilkinson, who has been for so many years connected with Christian work among the Jews, has set forth with admirable clearness both the mission of the Lord's ancient people, and the necessity for, and aims of, Christian missions to them. The subject is an important one, and in Mr. Wilkinson's hands it is adequately dealt with.

THE "SANTA CLAUS" SOCIETY.

Few, perhaps, of our readers are aware that "Santa Claus" has a society of his own, concerning which we hear that a welcome would be given to more dolls, toys, balls, scrap-books, rattles, furry animals, and the like, for the little ones, and shawls, work, books and other suitable gifts for adults. "Santa Claus" carries on a diversity of cheery agencies through the medium of Miss J. F. Charles, Hillside, Southwood Lane, Highgate. The objects in view are to provide dolls and toys for hospital children at that glad season which "comes but once a year," and to send poor children and adults for a country change in the summer. Last summer several convalescents were thus assisted, and it is to be hoped that this branch of the work will be yet further developed. Doll-dressing competitions are held amongst the friends of the society; some of the productions are quite works of art, and they are exhibited and sold for the benefit of the agencies, those remaining unsold forming part of the gifts to the hospitals. Those who undertake the work of distribution give gladdening accounts of comfort and cheer brought to many in trial and sickness, of little faces sharing in Christmas sunshine even though in homes of sickness, and of poor women delighted with gifts of wool and work prepared for their employment. One little boy who discovered that his soft wool lamb "talked" when its head was pulled down, became quite pink with excitement; a little mite of three and a half insisted on "somefin in a box," and was made happy by a pretty cardboard box containing muffetees, which he much preferred to trumpet, squeaking cat, or furry animal. A little blind girl sat feeling her doll all over, and treasuring her rattle with musical bells. Miss Charles will send the rules of the "Santa Claus" Society to anyone desiring particulars and enclosing two stamps.

IN SORROW AND IN JOY.

True as it is that "the heart knoweth its own bitterness," consolation in time of bereavement or loss of any kind may come, and often does come, from outside, so it is probable that many will find in the "Treasure Book of Consolation" (Fisher Unwin), compiled and edited by Benjamin Orme, M.A., clearer ideas and fresh notifications of the One Source from which, in our times of trouble and anxiety, all our solace must come.—In "Alone with the Word" (Hodder and Stoughton), the Rev. G. Stringer Rowe gives a series of notes to accompany daily Bible-readings in the Gospels. Sometimes the notes consist largely of quotations from other parts of the Scriptures, but whatever their source their object is the same—the elucidation of God's teaching—and their value is always great.—Space will not permit us to do more than refer temperance readers to Mr. E. R. Barrett's able prize essay on "The Truth about Intoxicating Drinks," which has just been issued from the National Temperance Publication Dépôt, a work admirably classified and arranged.—"East Coast Days and Memories" (Longmans and Co.) is the latest work of "A. K. H. B.," in which not the least interesting chapters—if only in contrast with the rest of the work—are those on the two diverse lives of Principal Tulloch and Lord Chancellor Westbury. The rest of the work consists of essays in the writer's well-known style.—All readers, young and old alike, will find among the coloured books issued by Messrs. Hildesheimer and Faulkner some gift acceptable not only for the well-chosen verses, but especially for the beauty of their exquisitely finished illustrations. Where all are so good it is difficult to select one or two for special praise, but perhaps the palm ought to be given to "Cradle Songs," illustrated by Joseph Clark and Mary Bousfield, or to Ernest Wilson's pretty drawings accompanying S. Rogers's "A Wish"—but these are only specimens of the whole series. In the matter of seasonable cards, Messrs. Hildesheimer are issuing some very quaint designs—birds, boxes, and fans all being used to carry the Yuletide greetings. And among folding cards we do not remember any prettier than some designed for this firm by Mr. C. G. Noakes, and displaying across the opening a spray of ivy, that only serves to cover a most beautifully rendered landscape within.—"More Echoes from a Village Church" (J. F. Shaw and Co.) is the title which the Rev. Frederick Harper gives to a series of very earnest and evidently heartfelt sermons originally delivered, as the title shows, in a Berkshire church. We trust that now they are addressed to a wider audience they may prove equally acceptable and useful.—"The Christian Portrait Gallery" (Morgan and Scott) is a useful collection of portraits of eminent Christian workers, accompanied by short biographical sketches.

A PATIENT HEART.

A CHAPTER FOR THE SICK AND INFIRM.

ALL of us want to give something to God. You hear of others giving time, money, service, and it is a grief to you that you have nothing to render to the great and tender Physician for whom others are so busy. Once you could take your place in His vineyard and feel yourself of some little use to God and man, but now something whispers to your heart that you are a cumberer of the ground, and can render nothing to the Lord for all His benefits toward you. Those wise men must have rejoiced: they could bring the new-born Saviour gold, frankincense, and myrrh; but a little Sunday-scholar said to me once, "The shepherds did better still—they gave Christ themselves."

It is in your power to-day to bring to the Master a very precious offering, whatever your circumstances may be, and however weak you may feel. If He needed you just now in the vineyard, you would be there; if He required money from your purse, He would have first put it therein; if He required the service that health and strength can render, His loving Hand would not have weakened your strength in the way. This little verse will show you what you can render to the Lord:—

> "My full day's work is done,
> And this is all my part—
> I give a patient God
> My patient heart."

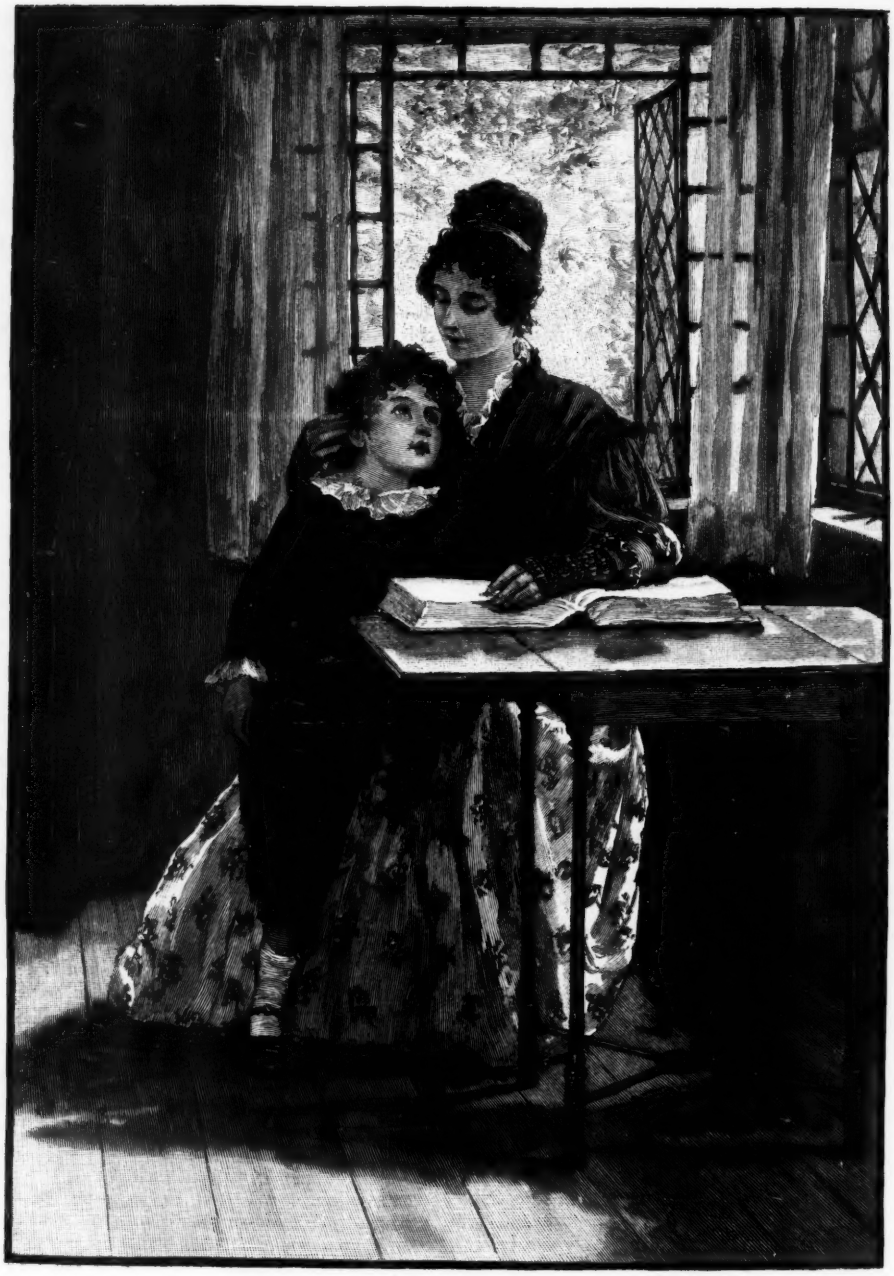
Or is it an impatient one you offer to Him just now? Perhaps you feel inclined to say, "Did you know all, you would not wonder at my fretfulness. There is this worry and that worry and the other, and infirmities have laid hold upon me, and nothing goes on as it would do were I well enough to see to things. Nobody cares about a poor creature like me, and I am all alone." But even if it were possible that not one of your fellow-creatures cared about you, which I think in your heart you know they do, still you would be the object of untold love, unbounded compassion, everlasting remembrance. You are the object of such love; at this moment, amid all the pain and anxieties and weakness, it is as true that God loves as that God lives; and as to your being all alone, do not forget that the great, wise, merciful Lord has said, "Certainly I will be with thee."



Friend, if your Master loves you so truly, and is with you now, can you not bring forth the fruit of patience? True, the way seems long and mysterious, and past your finding out, but what He is doing He will explain to you hereafter; just now what He asks of you is patient faith. "I sometimes envy the flowers by my bedside their freedom from pain, and wonder why I should suffer so, and they should look so fair and calm and untroubled," said a Christian whom God chose for the furnace of affliction: the beautiful roses could not respond to His teachings of pain, but her immortal soul could and did, and he was shaping her into His own glorious image while she was acquainted with grief.

Ah! those words remind us of a wonderful cure for impatience. Since the dear Lord has Himself been a Man of Sorrows, since Jesus wept, shall the disciple murmur to tread in His footsteps and learn what it is to watch and wait in Gethsemane? Ask the Redeemer to teach you the prayer He lifted there; breathing those words in sincerity, the fever of fretful unrest will leave you, and you will show to others how, even in tribulation, God can give to His children a calm and patient heart.

It will help you likewise to be patient when you remember that the roughest, hardest post is given to those whom the commander most trusts and honours. The hardest lesson is given to the scholar who will do the teacher most credit. It is not because you have failed, but because you have glorified God in the sunshine, that now He gives you the highest training of all—to be made perfect through the things you suffer. All things work together for good to them that love God, and when you take the assurance of God's Holy Word that even this pain, this weakness, this trouble is working out for you blessing and joy and sunlight unspeakable, will you not put by the fretting, and, lifting holy hands of prayer, humbly, trustfully, adoringly bring to-day to your patient God a patient heart? "Oh, impatient ones," cried a good minister now in the Land where there is no unrest, "do the leaves say nothing to you?" He pointed out that their glory is not the creation of an hour: every leaf-stem has a cradle in which is an infant germ, and rocking winds and rain as well as sunshine will cause its beauty by-and-bye to unfold. And thus is God working for you: accept His winds and His rain, believe in His present love and in His unshadowed Hereafter, and deny not to Him who is mindful of His own a patient heart.

WITH THE CREW OF THE "SHAFTESBURY."

THE Shaftesbury training-ship lies in the Thames, a few miles above Gravesend, on the Essex side, off what was until lately the pretty and quiet village of Grays Thurrock. Grays, as it is now called, has lost part of its name and much of its beauty, having been built about with a suburb of hideous little houses during the making of the new docks at Tilbury. But there remains still the quiet beauty of the wide river sprinkled with shipping, and the wide sky bending down to the green Essex country; and when, looking at these on a warm summer's day, one thinks of the sultry London streets, one has no wish to quarrel with the surroundings.

The Raw Material

It is out of those London streets that the three or four hundred boys on board the Shaftesbury have come; and the condition in which they sometimes arrive would not encourage a modern Whittington to a search for the pavement of gold. Dirty and ragged, ill-fed and ill-grown, they have been but poorly prepared for the battle of life so far as their bodies are concerned; while their very committal to the Shaftesbury, which serves as an industrial school to the London School Board, implies that their moral preparation has in many cases been slighter still. Not one of these boys, indeed, has been in the technical sense "convicted" of crime; but many, if not all, have been rescued from the path which surely leads to conviction, though many, perhaps most, might plead that this path was not entirely of their own choosing. It is sometimes, but not always, a boy's fault that he wanders the streets by day, and sleeps on benches or in closets by nights; that after sharing the fortunes of young thieves and juvenile beggars he comes in time to beg, and probably to steal, himself. It may sometimes be from his own inordinate propensity to vice. But it may also be because his father is a drunkard, and his father's wife a stepmother; and there are cases in which a child seems scarcely to have known a home until he has been sent to school.

For the physical failings of the recruits it is comparatively easy to provide a remedy. Good air, abundant food, healthy exercise, wholesome occupation, are, as the Indians might have said, "great medicine," and the acquisition of a clean body, with a clean and handsome sailor's dress upon it, must make as great a difference to the acquirer, as it certainly does to those who meet him.

The ordeal of washing is indeed said to be at first far from agreeable to the little Londoner, who is not accustomed to it. But he must soon become accustomed, for on the Shaftesbury there is a great deal of it. Every morning the whole crew, after a preliminary dabbling in soap and water, are sent in swift succession through a huge bath on the lower deck: in at one side and out at the other, a process which must be amusing to the spectators, and, since the bath is warmed in winter, still more amusing, one would think, to the principal actors. Still, most people have forgotten what was their candid opinion of their first wash. The Shaftesbury boys have certainly a very cheerful and healthy appearance, though they perhaps strike a visitor as looking on the whole smaller than boys ranging from twelve to sixteen might be expected to look. Their usual age at admission is twelve to fourteen, and their usual length of stay not more than three years, which may do much, but cannot be expected to do everything for them, that in their earlier years was left undone. Only the very best of them are, in the opinion of the Captain-Superintendent, Captain Scriven, physically equal at the end of their time to good country-bred lads of the same age.

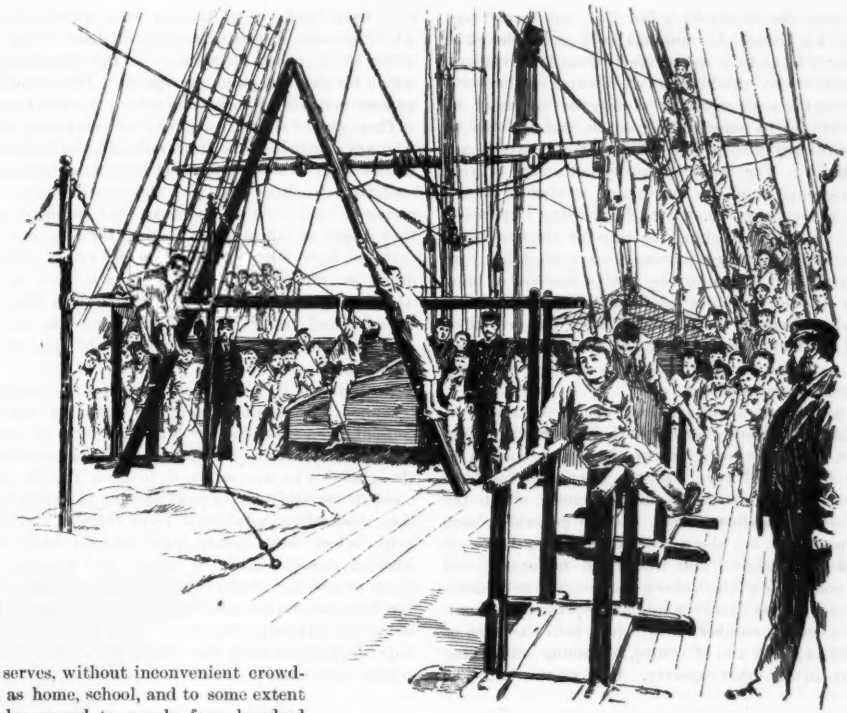
Of their moral improvement it is of course more difficult to judge, as also indeed of their moral condition at the time of their arrival. The good boy is the variety of the species perhaps least likely to present himself; but bad boys are not necessarily very hardened sinners, and Captain Scriven seems to take the cheering view that those poor little children of misfortune who, if vice be hereditary, should be vicious, are rather mischievous than anything worse. He notices among them a strange restlessness, caused, perhaps, by the uncertainty of subsistence in the unhappy hunting-grounds of the streets, as the ferocity of carnivorous animals is supposed to arise from a continual fear of starvation in the want of regular meals. He thinks also that they are inclined to treat each other with cruelty; but public-schoolmen, at any rate of an older generation, are not entitled to say much on this head, except that it is difficult to see how cruelty, or indeed any form of serious vice, can have much chance for development on board the Shaftesbury. For whether by day on the upper deck, or at night in the dormitory, an officer is always on the watch, and if a boy leaves his own rest for the dear delight of cutting down his neighbour's hammock, he does so at the imminent risk, almost amounting to certainty, of detection.

The most indulgent of schools must have "bounds;" and an industrial school especially must be to some extent, and runs the risk of being regarded to a greater extent, as a prison. But this risk is much lessened in the case of a school which is on board a ship and has bounds prescribed, as it were, by nature; the flowing water being at once a more effective and a pleasanter gaoler than brick walls. Care is always taken to remove, as far as possible, from a new-comer the impression that he has been sent to prison; and certainly the life of a Shaftesbury boy, whether on land or on water, does not resemble the life of a prisoner.



A great deal of liberty is allowed to those who deserve it; they go sometimes ashore in parties picking flowers or gathering blackberries; they receive visits from their friends on board, and pay visits to their friends on shore. These privileges of course are only allowed to those who deserve them, but it does not seem that practically they are refused to many, while it does appear that they are seldom abused, attempts at desertion from the Shaftesbury being very rare indeed.

There is a system of promotion by merit which seems to work well in all ways, self-respect being thus implanted in boys who have had little encouragement hitherto to respect anyone or anything.

The Shaftesbury, of course, provides the education given in the Board schools of London, one division of the boys being engaged on their lessons, while another is employed in the nautical and other tasks peculiar to the place. Only a very keen educationist derives actual pleasure from the sight, encouraging as no doubt it is, of a number of boys engaged in spelling or arithmetic; and the spectacle on board the Shaftesbury does not greatly differ from the spectacle anywhere else, though one notices with pleasure that the air seems to be present in just as many cubic feet between two decks as in many school-rooms built expressly for its reception. But the upper deck of the Shaftesbury, where the boys were spending the interval after dinner in a kind of extemporised cricket, with sunshine and air and a pleasant view of the fields and river, was decidedly a more cheerful place than the brick-bounded playgrounds in which they would have had to take their pleasure had they remained in a London school. Even the two or three little culprits who had misbehaved themselves at dinner, a meal at which great decorum is expected and maintained, and who were, as a punishment, made to stand at attention apart from the games of their innocent fellows, did not seem altogether to be pitied while they had this pleasant view to look at. Whether they looked is perhaps another question.

The Shaftesbury is an old Peninsular and Oriental ship, which, in the days of her wanderings to and fro, was known to the inhabitants of several climes as the Nubia. Now she has retired from active service; and her adventures are presumably at an end, though in the famous snowstorm of January, 1881, she broke from her then moorings and was nearly driven on shore. An additional deck has been given her, and she serves, without inconvenient crowding, as home, school, and to some extent as playground to nearly four hundred boys.

Recreation Time.

There is also a playing-field on shore, where cricket can be practised on a grander scale than the upper deck allows, and some cottages near the bank in the village of Grays are used as a hospital.

A much more ornamental, if not more useful, appendage to the ship is her tender, the schooner Themis, in which those boys who have made satisfactory progress in seamanship can enjoy the pleasures, and perhaps learn some of the hardships, of an actual cruise, going down the river to the open sea, and sometimes as far as the Channel. A party went even to Spithead for the naval review in the Jubilee year. The aspect of this little vessel is attractive, and her crew on their return from a cruise wear an appearance of heal and contentment. Indeed, it is difficult to imagine a prospect more inviting to the youthful mind than that of a voyage in a ship for the most part manned, if one may use the expression, by boys. One might, no doubt, wish, at any rate on starting, that the voyage could be to the Pacific Islands rather than merely to the mouth of the Thames; but very possibly the desire might soon be modified by experience. Not all sailor-boys are lucky enough to make their first acquaintance with seafaring life in friendly company, and neither at tedious length nor in time of tempest.

There is a small number of Shaftesbury boys who, from the first, display incapacity for a nautical life, and there is a considerable number of boys who, for other reasons, never arrive at one; but the life on board is, of course, designed as a preparation for the sea. It is therefore not the plan of the Shaftesbury to teach special trades to the pupils, except so far as this object can be attained indirectly by making them sailors; for it is generally understood that the British sailor can do anything, and, if a Jack-of-all-trades, is usually, to all appearance, master of a good many. The boys, of course, do not all attain to the same level of seamanship, but when it is mentioned that "grummets and cringles" are among the mysteries tackled by those who have got only so far as the third stage of instruction, it will be readily gathered that those who reach the fourth must have entered a region where few landsmen can hope to follow them. Indeed, to be able to swim, to row, steer, and sail, to knot and splice, to cook and to sew—for all boys acquire the art of using a needle, and all sails and awnings used in the Shaftesbury or her tender are made on board—is to possess an amount of ability that any member of the human family might envy, particularly the born Londoner, that most helpless of mortals, who, according to a recent critic, grows up as a rule fit for nothing but to sell newspapers.

It must be remembered, too, that, while learning all these arts, the Shaftesbury boy has not been "neglecting his education," but has spelt and ciphered as diligently as, and not less regularly than, if he had been living on shore. And instead of listening at the street corner to the soulless clatter of the grinding organ, he may have learnt something of music, and whether he has learnt anything or not, will certainly have heard a good deal. For the Shaftesbury maintains a large and vigorous band, the inspiriting strains of which make a somewhat unexpectedly pleasing impression on the visitor approaching the ship for the first time. The small sailor-boys beating time with their bare feet while they puff into the festive bassoon or blow blasts on some big brass instrument with a mouth big enough to take in the musician, afford pleasure alike to the eye and, what is a point of greater importance, to the ear; for the time and spirit of these youthful performers are excellent.

It seems that about one-half of the boys trained on board the Shaftesbury end their course by going to sea. Of these, very few are fortunate enough to enter the Royal Navy. For the navy requires from its recruits not merely a good character, which the Shaftesbury candidates can, and do generally, earn for themselves, but also a satisfactory account of their friends and origin; and this, from reasons beyond their control, few Shaftesbury boys are able to produce. The army is less exacting in this respect, and accordingly a certain number of boys pass into the army as band-boys; they are, of course, too young on leaving to join in any other capacity. Half of the half who turn their backs upon the sea, or a quarter of the whole number, are satisfactorily disposed of in the army or in other situations, in the procuring of which for them no pains are spared. The remaining quarter consists of those who return to their friends.

There are, of course, no means of preventing a boy who has served his time from returning to his friends if they wish to have him; and it seems at first sight creditable to them that they should wish it, as it is certainly creditable to the boys that in many cases they retain an affectionate feeling for relations who too often have done but little to deserve it. Still it must be remembered that a boy is sent to the Shaftesbury often as a way of saving him from his friends; and results show plainly that his need of protection is not much lessened at the time of his discharge.

No boy can be sent to sea, or enter the army as band-boy, without the consent of his parents; and this consent, even when the boy himself desires it, cannot always be obtained. Of the number—one-quarter of the whole—who are returned to their friends, about one-half are said to return at varying intervals to the ship, demanding help for a fresh start in life. This help, when three years have elapsed from their leaving, cannot legally be given; but whether it is given or not, the second start is evidently made under far less favourable conditions than the first. It is not at all surprising that four or five per cent. of the boys discharged from the Shaftesbury are found to relapse into crime.

Of those who leave with happier prospects there is no reason to doubt that most continue with credit in the paths marked out for them, though it is only a few that have both gratitude and energy enough to keep up communication with those friends on board to whom they owe their position. Some, perhaps, are glad to conceal and forget what was in its origin not a creditable connection; and it must be remembered that the Shaftesbury boys travel far out into the world, and that, however well they may have attended to their lessons, they do not belong to the letter-writing classes. But it may be hoped that many feel the gratitude which a few express for the honourable and useful life made possible to them, whose original bringing-up gave much chance of dishonour and little or none of usefulness. WORTHY TO BE LOVED.

CHAPTER IX.

IN HONOUR BOUND.

"But where ye feel your honour grip,
Let that aye be your border."—Burns.

Lancelot Vereker went out from his cousin's presence stunned and dazed. He was like a man who goes suddenly from the brilliant light of a summer noon to the chill obscurity of a charnel-house. Was it an hour ago, he asked himself, pushing the damp hair from his brow, or was it years, centuries, ages—that he was dreaming of Avice Meredith, and dreaming of her for himself? And now he had heard that his cousin loved her too, that Sir Raymond's feeling was not the boyish fancy he had believed it to be, but a love deep and earnest as his own. In the light of that revelation his dreams stood confessed for the empty folly they were, if indeed they were not something worse. He ought to have known that a day would come when Raymond would love with a man's love, not a boy's; and surely he ought to have known that if any woman could inspire the stronger and more enduring affection, it would be Avice Meredith. He ought to have known, he ought to have understood, and he had not done either. He had let his own hopes blind him to the facts before his eyes, his own wishes father the thoughts he had hugged to his breast.

But if he had sinned, he told himself passionately that he had not sinned consciously. It was true that he had not understood, that he had disbelieved his cousin's protestations; and Sir Raymond's own conduct was abundant justification of his unbelief. And for the other count in the indictment his conscience brought against him, was not Avice herself the best and surest vindication of his love? Who could see her and not love her? thought Lancelot, with a sigh that was almost a sob. Had he not as good a right as Raymond to feel the magic of her beauty, to own her power, and lay his heart at her feet? There was no treachery to his cousin when he had not known that Raymond loved her, or, at least, when he had not understood all that the words had meant. And now that he knew, what could he do? He could not tear her beautiful image from his heart, he could not cease to love her, because his cousin loved her also. It was for Avice to decide between them, as even Raymond must admit.

If he had known, if he had only known that his cousin was in earnest, there would have been no harm done. The knowledge in itself would have been as a panoply of steel; or if Avice's eyes had pierced even that, he would have fled from her presence before it became too dear. But now, Avice must decide. Sir Raymond could not ask more than a fair field in which to win her favour, Lancelot told himself, for he must know that the advantage was all on his side. Raymond had been first in the field; he was the handsomer of the two, as Lancelot freely admitted, cleverer in every way, and gifted besides with the dower of song, which must of itself open up such a wide field of sympathy and mutual delight. And beside all these natural advantages, there were the adventitious ones with which Fortune still further weighed down the scale. If other things had been equal, there remained to his cousin the superiority of rank and wealth.

And yet—and yet——!

Lancelot owned that every advantage was on Sir Raymond's side, and yet in his heart he refused to despair. He did not think that Avice loved his cousin yet. If she had done so, surely she could not have spoken of him just as she always did. He did not think that any girl could have kept up that tone of quiet friendliness—a friendliness that was only another name for indifference, Lancelot thought scornfully—unless she had really felt it. If Mr. Vereker did not add, even to his own heart, that no girl who loved his cousin would have tones or looks for himself quite like those on which he had lived for the last three weeks, it was because coxcombry in any shape was alien to his nature, and his love was humble in exact proportion to its strength. He did not tell himself that he believed his love was returned—how could he, when he had not yet declared it?—but under all the struggle and conflict and pain, something beat and throbbed, and sounded a faint clear pipe of irrepressible hope, as a robin sings under bare November boughs.

But even as the robin's note seems to emphasise the surrounding silence, that quick upleaping of hope seemed only to point the hopelessness of Lancelot's dreams. Suppose it were true—suppose that, half unwittingly, he had won the love that Raymond sought—could he put out his hand to take it? The hand that sought Avice Meredith's should at least be pure and stainless, and what would his be if he were capable of this? He knew well enough what other men would say of the confidant who undermined his principal; nay, he knew what he would say himself were the case another man's. He had known of his cousin's love, and he had treated it as if he had not known. Raymond had confided in him from the first, and the very frankness of his cousin's confidence had made him indifferent and sceptical. There was a distinct shadow of dishonour upon it all that made all the blood of all the Verekers surge into his face. He sat staring blankly before him in a maze of doubt and pain, that lasted far into the sweet summer night. Not the robin's note only, but summer's full chorus of thrush and blackbird, of lark and linnet and finch, was waking and swelling in the early dawn before Lancelot's vigil came to an end. He got up stiff and weary, and even cold, and threw himself on the bed without undressing, and counted the hours till the house was astir, and it was possible to go down-stairs without provoking comment or question. Then he went out into the freshness and beauty of the early morning, and plunged into the clear, cool Avon, and felt new life and courage dart into his veins.

Whatever the cost, whatever the pain, he must be true—not only to Sir Raymond, but to himself. The thought of treachery to his cousin was only less intolerable than the thought of dishonour to himself. He could not, and he would not, wrong the confiding boy, who had been as a brother to him, whom he loved as a brother still. If there had been no other thought to save him from such foul dishonour, how could he ever look in Lady Vereker's kind face again? He had prated of gratitude and devotion, and was he to ride roughshod over the ruins of Raymond's happiness to his own?

Happily, it was only his own that was involved; whatever hopes had been kindled by Avice's looks and tones, by the tremor in her voice, or the welcome in the sweet shy eyes, he had not the monstrous conceit to imagine that they betrayed anything but the merest possibility of future regard. He was glad, he was thankful, to remember that there would be no suffering for her. If her feelings had been involved, how perplexing and difficult of solution would the question of his own duty have been! and now it was so clear and plain.

The sophistries with which he had bewildered himself last night would not bear the light of day. The question was not if he had been sincere in doubting Sir Raymond's love: it was, what he was prepared to do now that doubt was no longer possible. It seemed to Lancelot Vereker that only one answer was possible to that.

He must give up Avice—or rather, he must give up the attempt to win her. That was all he had the power to renounce, the only form in which it was possible to think of renunciation. If she had been his——! But he had no right to call her that, no right to think of his hopes as anything but the faintest sweetest dreams that ever stirred the soul of man. It was so little to renounce, he told himself bitterly—but the struggle to renounce that little was the hardest fight that Lancelot Vereker had ever fought.

The bathing-place was some distance from the house, and when he came back there were already people stirring in the grounds. Mr. Hopkinson's satellites were busy sweeping up whatever leaves had fallen in the night, or rooting up whatever weeds had ventured on a futile struggle for existence; men in white linen caps were moving about the refreshment tent; and under Sir Raymond's window, a troop of children were being marshalled by the village schoolmistress, and were evidently about to wake the echoes in his honour. Lancelot stood and listened. He was in the pause of thought that succeeds a mental strain and found a factitious interest in every trivial incident. He remembered always afterwards the wonderful faces one small boy made, and how one of the girls had a hole in her pinafore, which she was evidently anxious to conceal from her schoolmistress's eyes. The children sang lustily, but the voices were coarse and rough, with a pronounced Warwickshire twang, and the effect could not be called good. However, Sir Raymond's window opened, and the singers pressed forward with a chorus of "'appy returns!" and possibly with some expectation of largesse.

But unluckily this matutinal serenade was not in the programme, and was indeed a private enterprise of Miss Pearson's, who plumed herself not a little on the brilliant idea. Sir Raymond knew nothing about it, and he knew very distinctly that he had just been awakened from his sleep by sounds whose dissonance offended his sensitive ear. It was not a shower of money that proceeded from the window he threw up, but a fusillade of boots and shoes, accompanied by the uncouth cries with which disturbed sleepers endeavour to disperse the nocturnal assemblies of "the harmless, necessary cat."

Schoolmistress and scholars fled in dismay, and Lancelot, unmirthful as his mood was, could hardly speak for laughing. When he could, he did his best to excuse his cousin. "Sir Raymond did not know, he had not been told—he would be quite distressed when he discovered what he had done," Mr. Vereker assured the discomfited singers. And then he turned out his pockets for the children's benefit, and walked down the drive with poor Miss Pearson, who had escaped any contact with the flying missiles, but whose wounded feelings seemed quite unable to recover from the fact that she and her patiently trained scholars had had their performance mistaken for feline caterwaulings. Even Lancelot's ingenuity could not put the circumstance in a complimentary light. He could only aver that his cousin would be as sorry as he was himself, and then he opened the gate for Miss Pearson with a bow lower than he would have accorded to a duchess.

He stood leaning on the gate, and looking after the quaint little procession with the same artificial interest with which he had regarded Ben Pittaway's grimaces, and the hole in Jenny Dawes' pinafore, till mistress and scholars disappeared in the direction of the straggling rows of whitewashed cottages that constituted the hamlet of Verecroft. There was no church in the village, as it was generally called, nor indeed nearer than Buddington, but Lady Vereker had built a school-house at her own private cost, and it was one of the dreams that she and Lancelot had dreamt for their boy that the school-house should have a church beside it when Sir Raymond came to his own. Lancelot found himself thinking of this now, and wondering if it would ever come to pass. It seemed difficult to believe that anything could go on just the same, that any of their old plans and projects should survive the moral cataclysm that had fallen on his life.

He looked at the children clattering after the little schoolmistress across the rustic bridge, at the familiar turret of the little school-house peeping through the trees, with a curious sense of strangeness and unreality. Was it only last Sunday—only two days ago—that he had been reading a sermon of Jeremy Taylor's to the old people who could not get as far as Buddington? Lancelot was in the habit of holding a little service in the school-house for the old and infirm on Sunday evenings, and sometimes the vicar came over and preached, and sometimes Lancelot read a sermon to them. He remembered quite well the one he had read last Sunday, and parts of it came curiously home to him now :—

"Now God hath bound thy trouble upon thee, by His special Providence, and with a design to try thee, and with purposes to reward and to crown thee. These cords thou canst not break; and therefore lie thou down quietly, and suffer the Hand of God to do what He please."

The young man, reading this counsel to the old people, who knew so much more of trouble and trial than he did, had thought the sermon much more applicable to them than to himself. He had admired its eloquent simplicity, as one might admire the sonorous rhythm of a Greek ode, even while ignorant of the meaning of "its solemn ois and ais," but now it seemed as if the words he recalled so vividly had been a preparation for the trial that had come upon him. If he could only take it in such a spirit as this! If he could——! Renunciation ought to have been so easy, he thought, with a miserable sense of ingratitude, and behold! it was so hard, so utterly beyond his strength. Had he not boasted, only last night, that there was nothing he would not do for Raymond? But then he had not known it would be this!

He heard a step on the gravel behind him, and turning round, saw Lady Vereker, astir like himself, though the happy smile that curved her lip showed that her wakefulness had quite another cause.

"Up already, Lance?" she cried gaily. "Surely there is nothing that needs seeing to now? I thought all your preparations were complete?"

"Oh yes—but it was too hot to sleep."

"My dear boy, you look as if you had found it so indeed," said Lady Vereker, looking at the pale face and haggard eyes with sudden concern and sympathy. "You are not going to be ill, are you, Lance?—to-day, of all days in the year!"

Lancelot lightly disavowed any such untoward intention; and then he told of the discomfiture of the schoolmistress and her poor little scholars, and so drew Lady Vereker's attention from himself and his looks.

"Really, it was very excusable, wasn't it?" she said, as she heard of Sir Raymond's unfortunate mistake.

A cynical listener might have wondered within himself what Ray had ever done, or left undone, which his mother had not thought "very excusable": but Lady Vereker's listener was not cynical, and assented with an accent of conviction that was pleasant to her ear.

"They did make a fearful noise," he said, with another laugh at the remembrance, "and it was impossible for Ray to see them, for the cedar shuts out his view of that walk."

"I am sorry they woke him," said Lady Vereker. "He was up so late last night."

"Late? It was only just eleven when I left him."

"I went to him after that, and we had the sweetest talk! I never knew what my boy was before, Lance—I never did him justice, indeed. How we have laughed at his fancies, until, I think, we almost persuaded ourselves he would never know anything deeper than a fancy all his life. But now that he has—that he does—how it seems to ennoble and dignify his whole nature! I am not jealous—oh, no! how could I be?" as she wiped away some suspicious tears. "I am not jealous, Lance, indeed! I am only happy, and proud, and thankful to be the mother of a son who can love like that."

"He has told you, then?" Lancelot found voice to say, after a little pause.

"Oh yes, he has told me! And it is as we thought—I will not say, as we feared—for a girl who could win a love like that must be more worthy of it than either of us knew. My mother is vexed, but we must stand by him, Lance—you and I. After all, a Vereker may surely please himself; and if it were not so, what would wealth or rank matter so long as Raymond was happy?"

"No," said Lancelot slowly, with a curious far-away look, "nothing would matter, would it?—if we could only be sure of that."

He bent down and kissed the kind face raised to his. Lady Vereker knew that the kiss had something strangely sweet and grave about it, but she did not know that it was the sealing of a vow of solemn renunciation, that would alter the current of all their lives.

CHAPTER X.

IN SILK ATTIRE.

"There she sees a damsel bright,
Dressed in a silken robe of white."—COLERIDGE.

"WHICH shall I wear?" said Avice Meredith in a tone of deep perplexity, in which a moralist might have found a fine example of the irony of circumstance.

Two men at Verecroft were awaiting her coming with tragic intensity of passionate expectation, and her own anxieties seemed limited to the colour of her gown!

Fortunately for the solution of this distinctly feminine question, Miss Meredith's wardrobe did not admit of much variety of choice. A white muslin that had seen better days, a cream cashmere that had been the round of various tennis-parties, a pink "zephyr," made by her own hands, and, though neat and well-fitting, lacking just the artistic touches that lift a cotton gown from homely usefulness to the ne plus ultra of the dressmaker's art, were all that offered themselves to Avice's anxious eyes.

Daisy, whose cashmere had seen so much less service than her sister's as to be quite fresh and presentable still, looked on with sympathetic distress.

"If they had only washed that muslin better!" she said sorrowfully; but the sound of pity roused Avice's spirit.

"It does not matter," she said cheerfully, taking up the despised garment, and endeavouring not to see the traces of the laundress's unskilful iron and too evident starch and "blue." "It only makes one feel how detestable it is to be poor—to have to waste so much thought on what one wears, and—and to mind so much about it," ended Avice, in a tone of humiliation.

"I thought you never did mind," said Daisy. "You never did before."

"I know—and that is why I hate myself now." A wave of colour swept over the proud, beautiful face, and Daisy kissed it tenderly.

"I know, dear, I know," she whispered tenderly. "But it will be all right, Avice. He will not care what you wear. He will think—as I do—that whatever you wear will look just the very best and rightest thing that anyone could put on. It always is so, Avice, indeed. You always look better dressed than anyone else, however shabby your frock seemed before you put it on."

Avice laughed, but it was impossible not to be a little consoled by the tender flattery. "It would be nice to think so, when this is what one has to put on," she said, shaking out the stiff inelegant folds.

"It is so!" protested Daisy stoutly; "and you know Sir Raymond will think so too."

"Sir Raymond? Oh, perhaps—but it does not follow that everyone is as silly as Sir Raymond."

"Ah!" said Daisy, "it is all very well for you to call him silly—but I wonder what you would say if I agreed?"

Avice did not answer, and in the little silence there was a rap at the door, and Emma, the small parlour-maid, entered, carrying a parcel almost as large as herself.

"Lady Rosalie's love, miss, and would you please wear it to-day? She 's awfully sorry it were so late in coming, being promised faithful last night, and disappointed her till now. And she hopes it isn't too late to put it on, and if it is, she 'll keep the kerridge waiting," ended Emma breathlessly, depositing her burden at Avice's feet, and beginning to unpin the huge white wrapper.

Unpinned, it disclosed a dress of softest, purest white, at the sight of which Daisy uttered a scream of delight, while Avice gazed with eyes of wide surprise.

"How good of her! How beautiful! Avice, do try it on!" Daisy cried impatiently; but Avice did not answer till the maid had gone. Proud as she was, she had not the fierce, ungracious pride which refuses to receive a favour from a friend, but there was something that almost seemed to savour of humiliation in a gift like this.

"I don't like to have my clothes given me," she said at last; but Daisy would not listen.

"That is nonsense," she said decidedly, "when it is Lady Rosalie. No one else would do it, and Lady Rosalie wouldn't, only she wants you to look nice at Verecroft to-day."

A relenting smile crept about Avice's mouth, that Daisy was quick to see.

"Put it on, Avice," she cried. "What are you waiting for? Isn't it sweet of Lady Rosalie? This is what she wanted that old black dress of yours for, I am sure. She said it was for a widow with five children, but I don't believe in the widow, or the children either. Oh!" cried Daisy, dancing round her sister, as the soft folds fell into their places, "it couldn't have fitted better if you 'd tried it on a dozen times. And see! it is Madame Pontet's work: here 's her name on the band. Isn't it good of Lady Rosalie? I will never say she is not nice again, will you?"

"She is very kind, but that we always knew. And certainly she has done this both nicely and kindly," said Avice. "See what she says in her note."

Daisy took it and read:—

"My Dear Avice,—I have your mother's permission to ask your acceptance of the dress I send with this. Please let me have the pleasure of helping you to look your best to-day, and wear my little gift for the sake of your old friend, Rosalie."

Daisy read it aloud, and Avice felt that it was impossible to refuse a gift so delicately offered, whatever her own private feelings might be.

It was consoling to find that her mother was entirely of that opinion, and certainly it was comfortable to feel so suitably attired for the Verecroft fête, at which the poor washed muslin would have seemed so woefully out of place. Nevertheless, Avice would have liked it better if Lady Rosalie had been less effusively delighted with the success of her present, and less prodigal of her assurances of Sir Raymond's admiration.

"Do you think I want his admiration?" Avice asked proudly.

"I can't say, my dear," said Lady Rosalie drily, "but I think you are uncommonly likely to get it. The way you and your frock set each other off is too delightful. I told Madame Pontet it would be the best advertisement she ever had, and she ought to make it for nothing!"

Avice laughed, but she leant back in her corner of Lady Rosalie's comfortable carriage with a very happy face, while Lady Rosalie congratulated herself on the success of her good-natured forethought, and pleased herself with imagining the sensation Avice's beauty could not fail to create at Verecroft.

And indeed, a general thrill of curiosity and admiration stirred the distinguished guests assembled on Lady Vereker's lawn, as Avice followed Lady Rosalie across it.

Miss Jackson and Daisy were just behind, but every eye was fixed on the tall graceful figure, draped in shining folds of white, and crowned with a coronet of soft fair hair.

"Who is she?" whispered a great lady, who thought herself above good manners, in a loud aside to Mrs. Selwyn, the vicar's wife. "Meredith? Not one of the Compton Merediths, I'm sure? They all look like dairy-maids or cooks, but this is quite a beauty!"

"This is a Miss Meredith of Leamington, I believe," said Mrs. Selwyn, with a nervous glance round to see if any of the Compton Merediths were near enough to have heard Lady Marcelby's unflattering remarks.

"What! the girl young Vereker wants to marry?" asked the old lady sharply.

"H'sh! they 'll hear us, I'm afraid," pleaded poor Mrs. Selwyn; but the dowager only stared disdainfully, and observed that she had never given Sir Raymond credit for such good taste.

And meanwhile, Lady Vereker was welcoming Lady Rosalie and her party with pronounced cordiality, and Sir Raymond, with all his heart in his eyes, was bending over the beloved hand, and Avice was glancing shyly round, and looking a little—what was it?—a little disappointed, Lady Rosalie thought; or was it only that she was startled and shy?

But whatever the shade on the beautiful face might mean, it was gone directly, and Miss Meredith was only just a thought more dignified and stately than before. A murmur of admiration was heard on every side, and Lady Rosalie's satisfaction knew no bounds.

"And where is my young friend Lance?" she asked a little later, when Sir Raymond, who hovered between his post of duty by his mother's side and the seat where Lady Rosalie and her little party had established themselves, had taken advantage of a lull in the arrivals to follow his eyes in their direction. "I haven't seen him since we came."

"Haven't you? Oh—I know! He went off to see to the cricket just as you came in. You see, I can't be in two places at once, and the village boys are all so fond of Lance, he really does quite as well."

"Not really?" said Miss Meredith, with a laugh that sounded a little sarcastic.

"Really! And is twice as good a cricketer. Oh, I know what you meant—and it did sound horribly conceited. But you see, just for to-day, I can't help the force of circumstances. Lance is twice as good a fellow as I am, but he doesn't come of age to-day, and that's what makes the difference."

"Of course—I quite understand," said Avice, smiling very kindly on the young man's eager excuses.

"What a fine fellow he is!" said Lady Rosalie, when Sir Raymond had gone back to his post. "I believe he really does think his cousin a sort of walking perfection, though to my mind there's no comparison between them, is there, Avice my dear?"

"None at all," said Avice demurely.

"Ah, we all know what you think!" laughed Lady Rosalie. "You stand fire very well, but you can't keep your blushes in order.—Isn't it an improvement to her, Hilda? As good as a touch of rouge."

Miss Jackson disdained to understand the allusion, but there was no doubt as to the picturesque effect of Avice's mantling cheeks.

"Handsomest girl I've seen in Warwickshire," said a fine keen-featured old man to a group of officers, who were regarding Miss Meredith with evident approval. "Is that your Leamington beauty, Phil?"

"That is Miss Meredith," said Captain Hallam. "She's very beautiful, no doubt, but a little too statuesque for my taste."

"Not a bit of it!" cried the old beau, who was none other than Lord Blackstone, the "law lord." "She reminds me of a classic heroine."

"Just so," said Philip Hallam. "You couldn't fancy her sitting the other side of the fire, or darning your socks—or—or—being domesticated in any way."

"I wasn't regarding her from the matrimonial point of view," laughed the old man; "though even then there's something to be said in favour of so handsome a vis-à-vis for your dinner-table, Phil."

"Ah, very likely," said Phil indifferently; "but any way, Miss Meredith's bespoke—or so, at least, people say. Vereker's awfully gone on her, you know."

"Which Vereker? Not the baronet?"

"That's the story, but I don't know how far it's true. Any way, that's the sort of thing that would suit her style, I should say. One could fancy her sweeping across 'lordly halls,' and all the rest of it, but something on a smaller scale would suit a man better who has to follow the drum."

The old lord laughed.

"And pray, Master Phil, have you found this duodecimo edition of all the domestic virtues?" he inquired.

But though the father and son had walked on together, Captain Hallam only shook his head inscrutably.

"I'll tell you if ever I do," he said, and Lord Blackstone pressed him no further. He only made a mental note that a captain in Her Majesty's service could blush like a girl, and he looked with unusual interest at every woman his son approached, especially if she was below the average height.

"For if a man can see a girl like that"—with another admiring glance in Avice's direction—"and not fancy himself in love with her, he is probably in love with someone else," the astute old man reflected. "Pretty creature! I believe I'm in love with her myself! I'll go and get someone to introduce me."

Which he did, and Avice, who was standing by, retracted her opinion of law lords on the spot, and even felt more kindly disposed to Captain Hallam for being the son of so charming and courtly a father.

"I do like Lord Blackstone," she said to Sir Raymond, when at last that young man was able to make his escape from guests who must be welcomed and congratulations that must be acknowledged, and devote himself to the guest whose presence was to him the sum and crown of all.

He had constituted himself cicerone to Lady Rosalie's party, as they wandered enchanted amongst the beautiful grounds that were almost as unknown to Lady Rosalie and Miss Jackson as they were to Avice and Daisy themselves. Verecroft was an ideal place for a garden-party, and the day was an ideal day. The weather was perfect, the sky a brilliant blue, with masses of fleecy white clouds sailing slowly across it; the trees were in fullest verdure; the Avon wound its silvery way through lawns of deepest, vividest green, and trees that laved their drooping branches in the slow-gliding stream; there was just breeze enough to stir the leaves and make the river sparkle in the sun. A few enthusiastic tennis-players had brought their shoes, and were sending the white balls flying in the full glare of the afternoon sun, but most people preferred to sit under the elms on the lawns, or follow the shady paths that sloped down to the river-side.

It was down one of the shadiest and least frequented of these that Sir Raymond and Avice were making their way. "We must not lose Lady Rosalie," Avice had said, once or twice; but Sir Raymond had not found it difficult to lose a chaperon who was perhaps not unwilling to be lost.

"We shall meet her by the river," he said confidently. "Everybody meets down there." And with this apocryphal information Avice had to be content.

Almost unconsciously she quickened her steps. A tête-à-tête with Sir Raymond Vereker was the last thing she desired, and she could not help a suspicion that she was being entrapped into one now.

"I do like Lord Blackstone," she said, with a feeling of avoiding dangerous subjects. Even Sir Raymond could hardly get sentimental on this. He looked a little puzzled at her enthusiastic tone.

"Yes," he agreed. "Awfully jolly old boy, isn't he? Looks as if butter wouldn't melt in his mouth now, but I believe he used to be called the 'hanging judge' when he was on the bench."

"He looks as if he could be severe, but I think there is something very fine about him."

"Yes, I dare say," said Sir Raymond indifferently. He could not be jealous of the old law lord, but he did not want to waste his time in talking about him. It was so long since he had seen Avice, and now that Lady Rosalie had been good enough to leave them together, it was too exasperating that she would do nothing but talk about that stupid old man.

"Do you know that it is three months—three whole months since I saw you?" he said, with a thrill in his voice.

"Is it? It does not seem so long," said Miss Meredith unkindly.

"Perhaps not, to you," said Sir Raymond, with a reproachful look. "It has seemed a great deal more to me."

Avice would have laughed at the tragic tone, but for its evident sincerity. She knew well enough how to parry a compliment or snub an over-bold admirer, but she never quite knew how to answer Sir Raymond Vereker. He was not like any of the other men she knew, this ardent, impetuous boy, with his dark pleading eyes, and eager fluent tongue, and air of being so desperately in earnest.

She liked him very much when he was not silly, but something about him now made her think that he might be going to be very silly indeed. This, at least, was how Avice put it to herself. She did not tell herself, as so many girls in her position would have done, that it only rested with herself whether she should be Lady Vereker or not; she only looked at the young baronet's speaking face and glowing eyes, and felt that he was quite capable of the folly of asking her to be so.

"I wonder where Lady Rosalie is?" she said nervously. "I begin to think she must have lost her way."

"It does not matter; she will easily find it again."

"Oh——? But I am sure we ought to go back."

"That would be the way to lose her in earnest. And besides, there is something I wanted to say."

For a moment Avice's step quickened; and then she stopped abruptly. There was something so undignified in running away.

"What do you want to say?" she asked, with disconcerting directness.

What did he want to say! He wanted to tell her how he had dreamed of her by night, and thought of her by day, ever since they met; he wanted to tell her how beautiful and peerless he thought her, how truly and deeply he loved her; he wanted to ask her for her love in return, to implore her to be his wife. But he could tell her none of these things while she stood and looked at him like this.

The slim girlish figure, in its robes of shining white, seemed something so far from him, so far above him, the young man thought. The fair sweet face, with its starry eyes and ripples of shining hair, was more like an angel's than anything of earthly mould. He could not tell her what he wanted, but he would have fallen down before her, have knelt at her feet, and kissed the hem of her garment, if the starry eyes had been less coldly questioning, and the curve of the beautiful lips less stately and severe.

"Why do you look like that?" he cried appealingly. "Have you forgotten Easter, and all I told you then?"

"I thought you would have forgotten all that nonsense now!"

"Forgotten? Do you think you are the sort of woman a man forgets so easily? I could not forget you if I tried, any more than I can help loving you, as I have done from the very first day we met. You know—you know how I love you! And you stand there so cold and white and silent, you might be an Ice-maiden, or an Undine out of the river, a creature who had never as much as heard of love."

"Why should we talk of love?" said Avice, with an impatient look up and down the little path for the chaperon who seemed to have deserted her. "Surely there are plenty of other things——"

"There is nothing else that concerns me when you are by," he interrupted. "You would not hear me at Easter; you called me a boy then, but I am not a boy now. I am not a boy to-day—I am a man, and the first act of my manhood is to ask you to crown it with your love, Avice—my darling!"

The dark handsome face was almost on a level with her own as she stood a little above him, where the great tree rose upward from the path. She leant back against it, and put out her hand with a gesture that forbade him to approach.

"Hush!" she said, in a tone of decision that sent a chill to his heart. "You must not call me that! I cannot and I will not listen to you. I would not have come to-day if I had thought you would be so foolish. It is worse than foolish—it is humiliating both to yourself and me. You remind me of Easter; and did I not tell you then that I would not accept any man's love against the wishes of his family? What do you think Lady Vereker would say if she could hear you now?"

"But she knows! my mother knows!" he cried eagerly. "Avice, dearest Avice, if this is what comes between us, dismiss the thought, now and for ever, from your mind. My mother knows and approves; surely her welcome to-day was proof enough of that? If this is all——"

He was springing forward, flushed with joy and hope, but the small white hand checked him again.

"Sir Raymond—indeed—you do not understand."

"But what is there to understand?" he asked, with a puzzled, crestfallen look. "If my mother approves, what more can you ask?"

"Nothing—if it were that. But it is not."

"Not that? Then what is it?"

She did not answer, but the silence was, or seemed, significant. Sir Raymond staggered back as if he had received a blow.

"Do you mean that there is someone else?" he asked in a voice that was choked with pain.

Avice grew red from throat to brow.

"No—oh, no!" she panted passionately. "You—you have no right to say such things!"

She was moved as he had never seen her before. There was outraged pride and quick resentment in her tone, and an ineffable expression of offended maidenliness in every line of face and figure. She turned away, as an affronted princess might have turned, and began to descend the path without vouchsafing him another word or look.

Sir Raymond followed, eager to make his peace, and not a little consoled by the indignation he had excited. If there was no one else, he need not despair, and hope leapt the higher for the momentary ebb. He would not risk refusal by persistence now, but in this resolve there was all the difference between a strategic retreat and a hopeless flight. Another time, another day, he would speak again, and would not be put off. He could afford to wait now he knew there was no one else!

Impetuous as was Miss Meredith's descent, he caught her up before she reached the river-path, where Lady Rosalie's parasol flashed red amongst the trees.

"Will you forgive me?" he asked, with a humility that touched her.

He was the hero of the day, the king who had come to his own, the master of the great house behind them, of wood and meadow and stream, far as the eye could reach—and he stood bare-headed before her, pleading for her pardon as if it were his only hope in life. Avice looked at him with eyes still wet with the tears that had almost blinded her in her precipitate descent, but the anger died out of them as she met his pleading gaze.

"I was wrong too," she said frankly. "You did not mean to vex me, I know, and I ought not to have been so angry."

"Then we forgive each other?" he said, with the sudden gleaming smile that most women found so irresistible.

"Yes, I suppose so. Only, if you please, you must not think—that!"

The words were so vague that he might not have understood them, but for the blush that flamed over cheek and neck and brow. He laughed a happy little laugh.

"I will not think you care for anyone else unless you tell me so," he promised. "Do you think I want to think—that?"

And then the scarlet parasol advanced towards them, and they could only hope that Lady Rosalie was too much occupied with her own voluble apologies to notice the disturbed looks of which they were so uncomfortably conscious themselves.

CHAPTER XI.

MRS. KENYON'S SECRET.

"Silence, more dreadful than severest sounds!
Would she but speak, though death, eternal exile, Hung on her lips!"—LEE.

"MY dear people, I can't think how I lost you," Lady Rosalie protested, with a laugh in her eyes that rather belied her words. "It wasn't my fault, I assure you, for really one path is so like another."

"Just so," said Sir Raymond; "no one blames you, I am sure."

And then he muttered something about not being his own master to-day, and disappeared up the woodland path with a celerity that allowed him to hope there had been no time for Lady Rosalie to take note of his confusion.

"How like a man!" commented that too acute person. "Runs away himself, and leaves it all to you. But I won't ask you anything, my dear. I'm afraid I spoilt an interesting tête-à-tête, but you shall only tell me as much or as little as you like."

"There is nothing to tell," said Avice, calling all her pride to her aid, and looking as superbly indifferent as the consciousness of her too-bright cheeks would allow. "It was a pity you missed your way, Lady Rosalie. And where are the others? Have you lost them too?"

"Oh, my dear, don't ask me!" cried this easiest of chaperons. "Captain Hallam took Daisy away to see the cricket in the park—they say Mr. Vereker's bowling is quite equal to a professional's. And as for Hilda, I really don't know where she is. She was so jealous that Captain Hallam took Daisy instead of her, and so cross with me—though really I'd nothing to do with it—that she would hardly speak to me, or hear a word I had to say. She vowed she'd kill the captain, or Daisy, or herself—I wasn't clear which—and when I suggested that the river was handy, and would hold them all, she looked as if she'd like to add me to the list."

It was impossible to help laughing, though Avice wished that Captain Hallam had been true to his allegiance to Miss Jackson. Her sweet innocent Daisy was altogether too fresh, and pure, and good to be exposed to the blandishments of a man whom Avice regarded as a professional flirt; but Lady Rosalie had evidently no regrets in the matter.

"It was the prettiest comedy you ever saw," she told the anxious sister. "Daisy trotted off as pleased as Punch, and I believe Hilda would have torn her hair, if it could only have been warranted fast! She consoled herself at last with the new sub, and I came down here to wait for you. Well, where shall we go? I can't have it on my conscience that I kept the Queen of the Revels talking to an old woman like me."

"I quite agree with you, when the old woman talks such nonsense as that!"

"Come along, then. I believe there's quite a miraculous luncheon set out in the big tent—if you can call it a luncheon at four o'clock in the afternoon. Any way, I hear the viands are A 1, and I do adore an aspic of ortolans, when I can get it. What do you say?"

"I—I think we ought to find Daisy first."

"Daisy 's all right, and won't thank us for interfering—unless you 've any other reason for wanting to go in the park?"

But this Avice indignantly disclaimed. She made no further protest, but followed Lady Rosalie to the tent, and as half a dozen eager cavaliers had joined them on the way, they had no difficulty in finding a snug little table, where Lady Rosalie was made happy by ortolans, and Avice ate the savoury little birds with small appreciation of their merits. Some late strawberries and a sparkling tumbler of iced water were much more to her taste, and as she ate the refreshing fruit, she began to realise that she was hot and tired, and was glad, both physically and mentally, of the quiet and the rest.

Sir Raymond was safe at the other end of the tent, and by his side she could see his mother's fair sweet face, glowing with love and pride. Mrs. Kenyon was not there. The excitement of the night before had been too much for her, and she had kept her room all day. Lady Rosalie was full of sympathy and concern; but Avice, who had heard a good deal of Sir Raymond's eccentric grandmother, suspected that her absence was not entirely to be deplored. And, indeed, both Sir Raymond and Lancelot were conscious of a distinct sensation of relief, while Lady Vereker was content to be perfectly happy without analysing too minutely the cause of her unalloyed felicity. Never was a more proud and joyful mother seen. Her eyes followed her son with utter and abounding satisfaction and delight. When his health was drunk, she looked with artless gratitude at everyone who acknowledged the toast; when he stood up to thank his friends, his mother's eyes rested on him as if for the first time the world had been given assurance of a man; when he spoke, she listened to him as if for the first time she knew what eloquence meant.

And, apart from the question of a mother's partiality, there was no doubt that Sir Raymond was eloquent. He had the gift, uncommon to men of his race and age, of fluent and picturesque speech, and he had none of the false shame which would have prevented most English lads from using it. There was poetry and pathos, fire and grace, in the little speech, and Avice could not resist a thrill of pride to think that a man like this had laid his heart at her feet. He was a suitor for any girl to be proud of, this handsome young baronet, with his courtly manner, his eloquent tongue, his grace of bearing, his handsome face. His Murillo-like beauty seemed all the more remarkable amongst the fair or ruddy faces round. There was nothing in these Warwickshire squires and their sons like the pale clear olive of Sir Raymond's cheeks. There was nothing like the kindling glance of his great black eyes, or the intensity of tone in the black moustache and hair, in the men who stood about, and cheered the young heir's speech in voices so much less liquid and melodious than his. These bronzed and sunburnt men, with frank grey eyes and stalwart limbs, these blue-eyed, downy-lipped boys, with skins that were still almost as pink and white as their sisters', were all of a different type from Sir Raymond Vereker. They were a good-looking, well-favoured set of men, with the clear and wholesome complexions peculiar to Englishmen; but if some of them were of a distinctly higher type than the handsome young baronet, most of them were his inferiors both in outline of features and grace of manner.

"Did you ever see such a handsome fellow?" Lady Rosalie whispered to Avice. "My dear, you ought to think yourself a lucky girl."

Avice raised her eyes for a moment, and then cast them down again, and smiled a strange sweet smile, that exasperated her friend. Lady Rosalie was always exasperated by anything she could not understand, and she felt that she could not understand Avice's smile any more than she could understand the sudden colour in her cheeks, or the soft wistful look in the beautiful eyes.

"Is there—what is there?" she asked impatiently, craning her neck round to see if any explanation presented itself.

But there was nothing at all. Only Lancelot Vereker and two or three other men standing in the doorway of the tent, and cheering Sir Raymond vociferously, like everyone else. Lancelot had come back from the cricket just in time to hear his cousin's speech, and add his voice to the cheers that greeted it. He had not meant to come near Avice—how could he trust himself to do so till he had given himself a little time in which to forget?—but the tent was crowded, and she and Lady Rosalie were so near the door that he could have spoken to them without raising his voice. He did not speak; he only lifted his hat and walked away, fighting down the pain in his heart, and wondering when he would find strength and courage to meet her as Sir Raymond's bride.

Avice looked after him in hurt surprise. What had she done? the girl thought passionately—what had she done that he should behave to her like this? It might have been only a coincidence that he should have gone away into the park just as Lady Rosalie arrived, but now, what was she to think? Just for a moment he had looked so glad; there had been in his eyes the look she knew so well, the look she had never seen till she saw Lancelot Vereker coming into Lady Rosalie's little drawing-room, and looking at her as she sang. And then it had gone quite suddenly. The gladness had died out of his face, and the light out of his eyes, and he had gone away, as if, somehow, it hurt him to look at her.

The smile faded from her own lips, and the colour from her cheeks. Lady Rosalie, who had been absorbed in a vain endeavour to decide which flavour she preferred in her striped Neapolitan ice, cried out in startled anxiety—

"My dear girl, what is the matter? That 's the worst of tents—they 're always so stuffy! But come, I 've quite done now, and I do really think I like the pineapple best—though certainly the coffee-ice in the middle is too delicious. But let us get outside—you 've no more colour than your dress, I declare."

Outside the tent a pleasant breeze was blowing; a military band was playing; people were promenading up and down the lawn. Avice's cheeks regained their natural colour, and Lady Rosalie commended herself for leaving the stifling tent, while Avice was glad to ascribe her momentary pallor to that satisfactory cause. She was too angry with herself, too ashamed, too humiliated, to admit even to herself the possibility of any other. Of course, if Mr. Vereker chose to give himself airs, it was nothing to her. He would see that she could be quite as indifferent as himself!

"'Will you forgive me?' he asked, with a humility that touched her.'—p. 174.

"You're sure you're all right now?" asked Lady Rosalie anxiously.

"Right? there really was nothing wrong."

"If we hadn't come out, you'd have been in a dead faint in another minute," said Lady Rosalie. "Tents are horrible things; but I don't see how they could have done without one to-day. Big as the house is, it wouldn't have held a quarter of the people that are here. I wish we could go over the house; I should so like you to see it. If I could only get hold of Lancelot, I'd ask him to take us round."

"Pray—pray don't think of such a thing!" exclaimed Avice, in real alarm. "I don't care about seeing the house at all."

"I suppose you think you can afford to wait," laughed Lady Rosalie.

"I don't care to see it to-day, certainly. I would rather see where Daisy is."

"Didn't you see her in the tent? Oh yes, in the corner to our right. I saw her, and Captain Hallam too. Hilda will be furious, but she may as well make up her mind to it, for unless I am much mistaken, her chance is over in that direction. There! they are coming out now, and Lord Blackstone with them.

Pretty little thing! If she wasn't your sister, Avice, she'd be called a beauty herself."

The two men between whom Daisy was walking would entirely have agreed. Beautiful as her sister she certainly was not, as each would freely have admitted, but Philip Hallam found a charm in the younger sister's face that he did not in the elder's, beautiful as it was; and Lord Blackstone had already taken occasion to whisper to his son that he was glad to find the "pocket cookery-book was so daintily bound."

"The pocket cookery-book?" said the puzzled captain.

"Yes, the duodecimo edition of the domestic virtues, you know!" said Lord Blackstone, in the same mysterious whisper. And then he astonished Daisy, and covered his son with confusion, by inquiring if she could make pies and darn stockings.

"And—and what was the other thing, Phil?" said this incorrigible old man.

But Captain Hallam would say no more, and favoured his father with a look which reduced the peer to silence.

"But I tell you what it is, Phil," the old man said, when Daisy was at last restored to her chaperon: "she's as nice a little girl as I've seen for many a long day. She'll do, Phil—she'll do, sir, and I wish you joy."

"Isn't it a trifle premature?" said Philip. "You see, I don't know what she would say about it—and I don't even know if I'm going to ask her."

"Then the sooner you make up your mind, the better," retorted Lord Blackstone, "and if you don't ask her, Phil, I shall."

And the father and son went off together, looking hugely delighted with each other, and laughing at their own small jokes, as only very happy people can.

"Isn't Lord Blackstone a dear?" Daisy said, enthusiastically. "He has been so kind to me, Avice, and I do like him so much! And I do think you're mistaken about Captain Hallam—I really do. He doesn't flirt and talk nonsense, or pay stupid compliments. He is only sensible and kind, and when we couldn't find Lady Rosalie, he asked his father to come into the tent with us, because I told him I knew you wouldn't like us to go in alone."

"What an innocent darling you are, Daisy!" the elder sister said. "I think it would have to be a very bad man indeed who would try to flirt with you."

The two girls were standing by themselves, for Lady Rosalie had suddenly darted across the lawn. She had caught sight of Lancelot Vereker, and had flown after him to ask him to show them the house. It was in vain for Avice to protest. When Lady Rosalie once took an idea in her head, she was like an Exmoor pony with the bit between its teeth.

"Nonsense, my dear! you must see the drawing-rooms, at all events, and Lady Vereker's boudoir. It was furnished for her by her husband—blue satin and medallions of Sèvres—old-fashioned now, of course, but in the most exquisite taste, and she won't have anything touched. I wonder which way Lance went? —Oh! there he is, talking to Lady Faulconer, and, luckily, I know her."

She was off before Avice could stop her, and brought Lancelot back with her, as blind to his unwillingness as she had been to Avice's.

His determination to shun Miss Meredith's society was not proof against Lady Rosalie's attack, and though there was a constraint in his manner which Avice was quick to feel, Lady Rosalie saw nothing, and was radiant at the success of her mission.

But it was not to be. As they approached the house Mrs. Kenyon's maid ran out from a side entrance, and rushed up to Lancelot. She was a grave elderly person, of staid demeanour, but just now breathless with distress and fright.

"Oh, Mr. Vereker!" she panted, "would you please to come at once? Mrs. Kenyon is taken ill, and wants to see you. We can't make out what she says, only your name, sir; but she keeps calling for you all the time, so I thought I'd best come and find you."

"Quite right," said Lancelot; "I will come at once. You had better come back with me, Stevens—we must not alarm Lady Vereker or Sir Raymond, unless there is real occasion."

He left Avice with Lady Rosalie, and went rapidly into the house, and they did not see him again.

"I wonder if she is really ill?" said Lady Rosalie. "I believe she takes all sorts of fancies."

But they were not left long in doubt. Lady Vereker and Sir Raymond were summoned in haste, and a doctor who happened to be amongst the guests. It was evident, everyone agreed, that something very serious had occurred, and carriages were ordered round, and coachmen and grooms driven wild with a dozen orders at once.

And meanwhile Mrs. Kenyon lay in a darkened room, calling at intervals for Lancelot in thick, unnatural tones, and seeming conscious of no presence but his. It was an attack of paralysis, the doctor said, and already the vocal chords were so affected it was all but impossible to understand what she said. That she was anxious to be understood was painfully evident—as evident as it was that it was Lancelot to whom she wished to speak.

"Not Ray—Lance!" she said again and again.

Sir Raymond bent down and kissed her, and went away with a hurt look in his soft dark eyes. His presence only excited his grandmother, Dr. Gray said, and it was better he should go, but he felt acutely that the partiality she had always shown for Lancelot should be shown at a time like this. He went away, but Mrs. Kenyon did not look satisfied.

"Not Ray—Lance!" she repeated, with increasing indistinctness.

She looked wildly round the room, as if in search of Lancelot, who was standing close by her pillow.

"I am here," the young man said. "Dear Mrs. Kenyon, what is it? Is it anything I can do?"

She shook her head feebly.

"Is it something you want to say?"

There was an eager sound of inarticulate assent, but though Lancelot bent his ear to her mouth, he could make out nothing but a few incoherent words, in which his own name and Sir Raymond's and Lady Vereker's could be distinguished, and very little else.

"For her sake," Mrs. Kenyon said, in her thick, indistinct voice. "For Evelyn—secret—but now—tell Lance—not Ray—Lance!"

She looked at Lancelot with a piteous beseeching glance. Perhaps it was Lancelot's remembrance of the curious scene of the night before that made him distinguish the last words she spoke.

"Lance—forgive!" she said, and Lancelot knelt down, and took the helpless hand in his.

"As I hope to be forgiven," he said earnestly.

And even as he spoke, the laboured breathing ceased. Mrs. Kenyon died with her secret still untold, but with a smile of peace upon her lips.

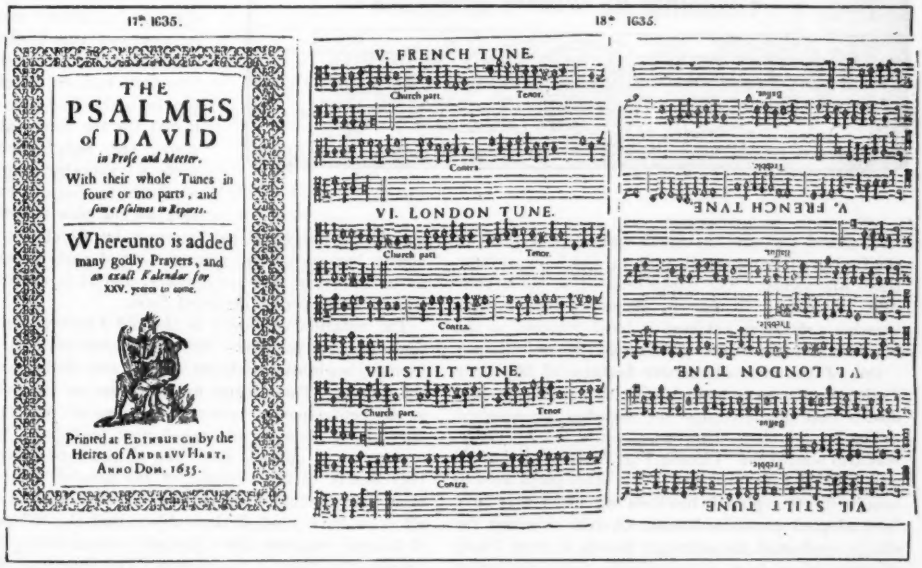
THE MUSICAL MATERIALS OF THE EARLY PSALTERS.

THE history of the literary materials of the authorised English metrical Psalters having been already told in these pages, it is our purpose now to deal with the musical materials which accompanied these works. At the Reformation the two external elements in the ordinance of praise—the words and the music—were both provided under the direction of the Church. As a rule these elements were combined in one volume, which proves that the music was regarded as a proper subject of public interest. It will be remembered that the version of Sternhold and Hopkins was completed for the English Protestants in 1562, and that an edition was published in that year by John Daye. This was the first English Psalter with notes. It was provided with sixty-three tunes, forty-five of which were set to the Psalms and the remainder to hymns. The melodies of the tunes only were printed at this time, but in 1563 a collection appeared which gave the harmonies in four parts, each part being issued in a separate volume.

In 1579 William Damon, one of the musicians to Queen Elizabeth, harmonised for the use of a friend the Psalm-tunes then "in common use," to the number of about forty. Another edition of this work was published in 1591; and in the following year came the Psalter of Este, under the title of "The Whole Book of Psalms, with their Wonted Tunes in Four Parts." The harmonies in this latter collection were by ten of the most eminent musicians of the day, including George Kirbye and John Dowland. A folio Psalter was issued by Allison in 1599, and in 1621 appeared the important edition of Ravenscroft. With the publication of Playford's complete Psalter in 1677 the musical materials connected with the Sternhold version may be said to end. It should be noted, however, that some of the collections we have named cannot properly be classed among the Psalters. The works of 1563, 1579, and 1599 all contain only specimen verses set to the tunes, and there is therefore a marked difference between them and the editions prepared for ordinary church use. The Psalters of Este and Ravenscroft embody the whole Psalms; but they were evidently private undertakings, intended chiefly for choirs and musical proficients.

The first complete edition of the Scottish Psalter, mainly that of Sternhold and Hopkins, was published in 1564. This edition altogether outstrips the English work of 1562 in the number of its tunes. Of these it has no less than 105; so that the instances of one tune being assigned to two or more Psalms were far fewer than in the English edition. Various issues of the Psalter were printed in Edinburgh after this. One—that of Andrew Hart, 1615—is notable for the first introduction of a distinct class of tunes, entitled "Common," to which we shall refer again. Up to this time there does not appear to have been any edition of the Psalter issued except from the capital; but in 1622 a printer named Edward Raban set up his press in Aberdeen, and there several editions were subsequently published. The best-known and most important of the Raban Psalters is that of 1633. A special feature of this edition is the appearance of harmony for the first time, though this extends only to the fifteen "Common" tunes which the book contains in addition to the "Proper" tunes. These are the earliest printed specimens of harmony that appear in the history of the Scottish Psalter, but of course it has to be remembered that Raban's work was nothing more than a private venture.



Each of the Western Protestant Churches seems to have considered it quite sufficient at first to provide the people with the melodies only of the tunes. The earliest editions of the French Psalter of Marot and Beza had no parts, and until the year 1635 there had been no official harmonised edition of the Scottish Psalter published. So far as can be ascertained, there was no edition of the English Psalter corresponding to the Scottish of 1635—that is, having the ordinary "Proper" tunes and no more, but accompanied with parts. Yet it is quite plain that "harmony was practised in England from the first formation of the Protestant Church, and was probably considered so much a matter of course as to require no express sanction or regulation." It seems, in short, to have been left pretty much to the care of the professional musicians. In Scotland the case must have been to some extent the same, for we know that copies of the parts were multiplied by the pen in the very earliest stages of the Psalter's history. There is in existence a beautiful set of harmonies "noted and wretin" in 1566 by Thomas Wood, who styles himself Vicar of St. Andrews. Wood himself records that the task occupied him four years; and it seems to have been a laborious employment, as our readers may judge from the illustration which we give of a single page of the manuscript.

We have said that the first edition of the Scottish Psalter with harmonies was issued in 1635. It was "printed at Edinburgh by the heires of Andrew Hart," and is notable among harmonised Psalters for its upside-down position of the parts, as seen in our illustration. This arrangement was evidently made to allow of four persons singing from one book—each his part—seated two and two on opposite sides of the old-fashioned square pews. It had been adopted several years before—1599—in the English Psalter of Allison; but it is sufficiently curious to have caused many people to suppose that it arose through some defect in the printing-press! This edition of 1635, we may add, has been made available to students in a splendid folio reprint published at Glasgow, under the care of the Rev. Neil Livingston, in 1864.

In the early Psalters most of the Psalms had their own particular tune, to which alone they were sung; and this tune was distinguished solely by the number of the Psalm with which it was connected, as the 1st, the 100th, etc. Such tunes were technically known as "Proper" tunes. By-and-bye there came another class of tune. The "Proper" system, requiring so many distinct melodies, was found to be unsuitable for the great mass of the people, who could not be expected to learn more than a comparatively small number of tunes. Hence arose the "Common" tune—a tune which was limited only by its agreement with the spirit or character of such Psalms as it would metrically fit. It is only in the Scottish Psalter, and there not till 1615, as we have already noted, that "Common" tunes are ranked in a separate class and printed by themselves. In the English Psalter all tunes are alike attached to individual Psalms. Yet in several editions we see not a few tunes assigned to two or more Psalms, and these must be regarded as "Common," though the term is not applied to them. There is, besides, evidence to show that "Common" tunes, though unofficially recognised, were yet used by the people. In the dedication to Este's Psalter, 1592, the following passage occurs:—"In this book the Church-tunes are carefully corrected, and other short tunes added which are sung in London and other places in this realme;" and the title to Allison's Psalter, 1599, mentions "tenne short tunnes in the end, to which for the most part all the Psalmes may be usually sung, for the use of such as are of mean skill, and whose leysure least serveth to practise."

We have said that the "Proper" tunes were known by the number of the Psalm to which they were attached. Obviously no such expedient could be applied in the case of the "Common" tunes, and thus the attaching of names to the latter became a matter of necessity. In Este's Psalter, already referred to, we first meet with these names, three tunes in that work being designated respectively "Chesshire," "Kentish," and "Glenburnie." In the Scottish Psalter the practice appeared first in the edition of 1615, the twelve "Common" tunes of which are named chiefly, though not exclusively, after places.

In England the same expedient was adopted fully in the Psalter of Ravenscroft, 1621, in which above forty tunes are named. The names selected, so far as they refer to places, it may be supposed, were not altogether arbitrary, but bore a local relation to the composers of the tunes themselves.

One of the most distinctive features of the early Psalter music, as compared with that of the present day, is that in the former the melodies are assigned to the tenor voice. This part, while led by males, was also termed the "Church Part," implying that all who could not perform any of the other parts were to join in it. The plan, it has been suggested, may have been adopted from the Roman Church, in which the clergy conducted the singing; but it is more likely to have arisen from the conviction "that the larger half of the people would sing the melody only, while the harmony was intended to afford scope for the attainments of the skilful few, and thus became merely a graceful appendage." What was then called the treble part was probably sung chiefly by boys, though it would of course be suitable also for females. There must, however, always have been a considerable number of women who were unable to perform any of the harmonic parts, and these would undoubtedly join in the tenor, although that part was professedly for male singers. The custom of giving the melody to the tenor voice survived to a much later period than is generally supposed. We find it as late as 1791, in Harrison's "Sacred Harmony;" and in the third edition of Webbe's "Collection of Psalm Tunes," first published in 1808, the author speaks of having been apprehensive that the circulation of the book "would be considerably impeded by deviating from the common but absurd usage in works of this kind of converting the melody into the tenor, and of employing only the treble or G clef for the three parts above the bass." Some modern writers have urged a return to the old custom, on the plea that the melody in the tenor can be sung by all classes of voice; but our present arrangement of parts appears to be in every way satisfactory, and it is unlikely that it will ever be departed from.

The notation employed in the old Psalters was in some respects peculiar. The notes used were six in number, beginning with the "long" and ending with the quaver. Their forms are the same as are found in all contemporary music. The absolute value or duration of these notes cannot now be defined, but experts are of opinion that "the minim corresponded very nearly to the crotchet of the present day, the other notes being in proportion." It is admitted by all who have studied the subject that the old rate of singing was not slow; probably a second was the average duration of the minim. The sharp and flat were made use of as at present, but the natural was unknown, a flat being used to restore a note which had been sharpened. There are no bar-lines till the time of Playford's Psalter, 1671, but the semibreve rest is used to mark the ends of lines. The slur is never found; but as the tunes were mostly syllabic, its absence could not have been greatly felt. Leger-lines occur in only a few instances. The number of keys was very limited, those mostly used being C, F, and B flat. Probably this was intentional, for the difficulty of reading the music would be lessened considerably by the limiting of the keys. No doubt the singers would adopt whatever pitch suited their voices, quite independently of the notation. On this point Mr. Havergal remarks: "As to the pitch at which tunes were sung, some of the Introductions to Singing published in the last century leave us in no doubt. They disclose the fact that the keys, or scales in which the tunes were set, were no criterion as to the pitch in which they were sung. They were mostly set in only two or three keys, to suit the convenience of the printer as to leger-lines and accidental sharps or flats; but they were sung at any pitch which best suited the singers." The typographical inaccuracy of some of the early Psalters is very great. "The press, in some instances," says the writer just quoted, "can hardly be said to have been corrected. Most of the errors arise from a mere inversion of the metallic block in which the note was fixed; so that by turning the page upside down the true reading will appear. One common error is the dropping or elevating the note exactly a third out of place. Hence in most cases of deviation from the true reading, it is easy to discern what was intended; for the printed note is so inconsistent with the melodic progression, and so disconnected with either the note before or the note after, that the error well-nigh corrects itself."

The style of the old Psalter tune was entirely different from that of its modern representative. The latter partakes but too frequently of the character of the part-song, and thus requires for its performance the aid of singers who have been specially trained. The Psalter tune, on the other hand, was nothing if not plain and easy. Those who set the first metrical Psalms to music evidently kept in view the principle that the whole body of the people should take part in the service of song; they regulated the style of tune to the capacity of the general population. The syllabic partition of the music was probably preferred just because of its simplicity, though it may have been adopted also in order to produce greater distinctness in the utterance of the words. The same principles regulated the addition of harmony. Plain chords, as distinguished from the fugal style which had hitherto prevailed, are the leading characteristics of all the early Psalter harmonies. A few modest ingenuities were, indeed, occasionally introduced, but as a rule anything difficult of execution was expressly stated to be for those who were possessed of some skill in music. We have advanced greatly since the times of which we write, but on the whole our churches have not received anything better fitted to be the medium of hearty singing than the old Psalter tunes. Our modern hymn melodies are frequently beautiful; they are also as frequently beyond the reach of the great mass of the people.

THE FAMILY BIBLE.

THIS volume, when my life was young,
And speech first faltered on my tongue,
A tender mother read to me,
Whose tones come back in memory!
A child once more, beside her chair,
I feel her hand caress my hair,
And, glancing from the sacred Book,
I meet her fond and gentle look,
In those sweet hours I used to know
Of faithful counsel long ago!

I turn a time-worn yellow page;
Here, legible though faint with age,
I see the marriage entry stand—
My father's bold, decided hand,
My mother's graceful characters!
And something in my bosom stirs
Of love and grief, to find a name,
The record when my sister came,
The first-born to her parents given,
Who followed in their steps to heaven!

Thy children, Lord, abide in Thee,
In earth and heaven, one family!
This Book had the unceasing trust
Of hearts that long have turned to dust.
Yet from the grave they seem to say,
"We triumph in eternal day!"
For still the Father's love prevails,
Though darkness falls, and death assails—
While faith discerns, beyond the strife,
The promise of the Word of Life!

THE LIGHT OF CHRISTIAN EXAMPLE.

BY THE REV. A. A. CAMPBELL, MINISTER OF CRATHIE, AND DOMESTIC CHAPLAIN TO HER MAJESTY IN SCOTLAND.

"Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven."—ST. MATT. v. 16.

THESE words were first addressed to our Lord's disciples, who, at the time this charge was given, were almost the sole members of the Kingdom which He had come to establish upon earth. But while in their primary application many of the great Teacher's utterances were local and partial, they yet involve such deep and world-wide principles that we cannot confine them to the occasions which called them forth. They are not meant for one place and one time alone, but for all places and all times. It is so with these Divine words. Though first addressed to the early disciples, they yet speak with equal distinctness and decision to the whole Christian world as at this present moment it exists. To all who have the light of Heaven enkindled in the soul, do they bear a message. They seem to come to them across the intervening years, reminding them that the light that is in them is not to be used for any purely private or exclusive purposes, but that the whole world is to benefit by their shining. By precept and example, by the power of a holy living and pure conversation, they are to shine as lights in the world, in company with, though in subordination to, Him of whose light their own is but the reflection—who Himself is "the Light of the world."

Between the Christian world and the world at large there is, we may observe, a much closer connection than many might be disposed at first sight to admit. There is a certain class of Christians of a very exclusive temperament, who would draw a line of complete demarcation between the two; who delight to call themselves the chosen few; and who would leave the rest of the world standing out in the dark and in the cold. Now doubtless between the Christian world, and the world at large, there is a separation, yet it is not the separation of total isolation; it is not the separation which entitles any Christian to keep within himself, or within his own circle, the flame of spiritual light, while the rest of the world is left to grope and stumble in the dark.

We shall better understand this apparent contradiction—the thorough separateness of Christians from the world, and yet their close connection with it—if we have regard to the comparison which our Lord here uses to indicate the relation between the two: "Ye are," He says, "the light of the world."

There is a singular beauty in this comparison, for, if we but think of it, there is nothing in the world that is yet so little of it—so thoroughly free from its defilements—as is the light. It retains its purity amidst all the impurities with which the world abounds. This it does, not by avoiding all contact with them. The beauty of it is that it can come into closest contact with them and yet remain uncontaminated by them. It is a beautiful emblem of what Christian light is, or ought to be, in the world. Retaining its own separateness and purity, it ought to diffuse itself, with the penetrating and all-pervading power of light, through a sin-darkened world; shining out upon the surrounding gloom; chasing from their lurking-places the sins and impurities that love the darkness, and forcing them for very shame to flee its presence. Christian testimony and Christian example are mighty powers in the world, and there is a heavy responsibility implied in our Lord's words when, addressing Himself to all Christians, He says, "Ye are the light of the world."

Looking simply and practically at our subject, we may consider:—

1. The manner in which the Christian's light ought to shine, and

2. The end for which it ought to shine.

1. The manner. If the flame of spiritual light has truly been kindled in the soul, it will in some way reveal itself. A living fire within, it will become a shining light without; manifesting itself to all men and helping to guide them in the true path. "I have not hid Thy righteousness within my heart," says the Psalmist, "I have declared Thy faithfulness and Thy salvation; I have not concealed Thy loving-kindness and Thy truth from the great congregation." What he himself held in happy possession he desired that all should share.

But whilst every Christian must manifest to the world, in some way, the fruits of the power that is at work within him, he is by no means confined to any particular way of doing so. Just as the Holy Spirit, who at first kindled the spark of spiritual light, has different ways of bringing His influence to bear upon the darkness of the soul, so the enlightened soul may, in its turn, bring its influence to bear, in different ways, upon the darkness of the world around it. Take, for example, St. John and St. Paul. Each was a burning and a shining light, yet in what different ways did they let their light shine before men! St. John's power as a light in the world lay in the saintliness of his life. By his holy living and pure conversation men were arrested and attracted. There was not so much of the missionary spirit in him as in the other Apostle. It seemed rather to be his calling to stand like the lighthouse upon the rock, not running after men so much as bringing to bear upon them the light of a holy life when they came within range of his influence. The beacon light serves its purpose better by burning steadily on the spot where it has been kindled than were it to move about to the rescue of individual ships by lighting them on their dark and perilous way. And so it is with some Christians. They serve God better, and benefit their fellow-men more, by living pure and godly lives in the sphere which Providence has assigned them, than were they to set forth with the intention of enlightening and converting the world.

Others, again, by following a different principle, may let their light shine with best effect. St. Paul, as we have said, let his light shine before the world in a different way from St. John. St. Paul's was eminently a missionary life. There was a zeal, an energy, almost a vehemence about him which could find vent in no other way than in a life of incessant work in the cause of his Master. While St. John's life was a contemplative one, St. Paul's was an active one. He could not wait till men came within range of his influence. His calling was to go forth, torch in hand, to the highways and hedges, and compel them to come in. By being instant in season and out of season, by reproof, rebuke, admonition, he roused men from their indifference, and drew them or drove them from their sins.

In very different ways, then, did these two Apostles let their lights shine, yet who can say in which case with most effect? Let not then the Christian of St. John's stamp accuse the Christian of St. Paul's stamp of being a busybody and interfering because he is instant in season and out of season, ever ready to reprove, rebuke, and admonish. Nor let the Christian of St. Paul's stamp accuse him of St. John's stamp of want of zeal in the cause of his Master because he may mingle less freely in the din and thick of the battle of life. Let every Christian rather, with care and consistency, trim his own lamp, replenishing it with the oil of daily grace drawn from Christ Himself, the great source of supply, and so let him let his light shine before men in the way most suited to the circumstances in which God has placed him and the dispositions and abilities which He has given him. Noble is he who speaks out for Christ! whose lips, having been touched with a live coal from the Altar of God, will not be restrained from declaring in face of the world what great things God has done for him. But no less noble is he who, unable to give lip testimony for Christ, gives life testimony for Him—doing much, or bearing much, if saying little—and thus holding up a lamp whose light shall serve as a guide to all who are seeking the way to God.

But while, in a sense, there may thus be a difference in the manner in which Christians manifest their light, there are yet certain characteristics which must mark the shining of all alike. Their light should shine, for example, as far as possible with steadiness. We say "as far as possible," for perfect steadiness can never in this life be reached. Just as the light that is placed in the draught will blink and flicker in spite of its best efforts to burn with a steady flame, so the best Christian, placed as he is in the open world, exposed to its draughts and counter-draughts, will often exhibit a fitfulness in his shining which cannot but detract from his usefulness as a light in the world. Again, as a neglect to renew the supply of oil in the lamp causes a feebleness in the flame, so a neglect on the part of the Christian to have his lamp replenished with the oil of daily grace will have a like evil effect on his burning. And further, as the drop of water falling upon the light will bring it down to a very glimmer, so the love of the world, and the cares of it, have a damping and dimming effect on the light of the best Christian; and when men look, expecting to see a being all aglow with love to God and zeal for His cause, they are met with the spectacle of much worldliness and coldness and deadness of heart. From all these causes is the light of the Christian apt to suffer, to say nothing of the graver sins which at times would almost seem to threaten it with total extinction.

But while all this is true, it is just as true that, under the enlightening and regulating power of God's Spirit, the Christian's light may at least approach to steadiness; and the more it does so, the better it serves as a guide. The lightning-flash may startle and dazzle, but it does not guide; it rather bewilders. And so in higher things. To manifest an unusual measure of goodness at times will not make up for fitfulness. Not by periodic displays of devotion and zeal for the cause of truth is Christ's Kingdom advanced, but by a well-sustained, though it may be humble, witness for it. And there is no surer way, we may be certain, of adding strength and brightness to the light that is in us than by letting it shine before men. To hide it is to put it in danger of extinction. The free open air may cause the lamp-light to blink and flicker, yet, at the same time, is it not the very life of it? And so while in the world's draughts there may be that which tries the Christian's light, there is also that which gives it vigour. There is no place so well suited as the open field of duty and love—ay, of trial and disappointment—for freeing his light from feebleness and sickliness in its burning. Growing, brightening, strengthening under every influence, it develops at last into a flame which no blast can extinguish, which the hurricane of adversity itself can only fan into a brighter glow.

2. We consider, further, the end for which the Christian's light ought to shine: "That men may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven." In these words we have it most unmistakably intimated that it lies in the Christian's power to promote the glory of God and His cause in the world. Through his influence and example men may be constrained to admit the power and beauty of a Christian life, and so be led to glorify their Father which is in heaven. In all this there is implied a heavy responsibility on the part of the Christian, for in his hands, so to speak, is placed the credit of religion; and that credit is maintained just in so far as he is able to make his practice and profession correspond. The world will form its estimate of religion from him who professes it. In this the world may be acting unjustly, for nothing can be more unjust than to lay at the door of religion the faults and failings of the Christian. If these exist, it is not because of religion, but in spite of it; hence the injustice of making religion answer for them. Still there is ever a tendency to identify a cause with him who supports it, and through his shortcomings the cause must suffer. When, from some high profession of religion, a man returns to the world, only to give way to bitterness and wrath and clamour and evil-speaking, only to manifest feelings of selfishness and uncharitableness—to say nothing of the many other and perhaps more flagrant sins, which the Christian may sometimes have to mourn—is he not giving a handle to the world which it well knows how to use in opposition to God and to truth? In presence of all this, how solemn does the Divine charge appear —"Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven!"

And let no one imagine that it detracts in any way from the glorious Sun of Righteousness that his own feebler light should shine with all possible brilliance. There are some who would altogether shade their own light as being unworthy to shine in company with His who Himself is the "Light of the World." But is it not the case that there is far more self-consciousness in a false humility than in a frank appreciation and acknowledgment of whatever virtue or power for good we may be possessed of? In the Apostle Paul we find nothing of that sickly self-depreciation which is anything but true humility. If he had light in him, he was willing that it should shine, and that the world should benefit by it. "Brethren," he says, "be followers together with me, and mark them which walk so as ye have us for an ensample." Yet no one would dream of accusing of vanity the Apostle who could at the same time say, "Brethren, I count not myself to have apprehended." It does not detract from the glory of the sun that the moon should shine with all possible brilliance; so far from this, does she not add to it in a sense? for, reflecting as she does the greater light, she is a standing witness to a glory brighter than her own. And so with the Christian. Bright as his light may shine, he too is but bearing testimony to a yet more glorious Light; and the brighter his own light shines, the nobler is his witness. Never was a higher place assigned to disciples, nor their true calling more clearly set forth, than by the Master Himself when He said: "Ye are the light of the world." And what saith the Apostle? "Ye are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, an holy nation, a peculiar people: that ye should show forth the praises of Him who hath called you out of darkness into His marvellous light."

STUMPY: A CHRISTMAS STORY.

IN THREE CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER I.—CHRISTMAS EVE.

"H, I say! I must get out of this somehow!" cried Teddy breathlessly, and forthwith darted headlong under an archway, and took refuge beneath a sort of deep portico belonging to a set of big warehouses.

This was a blinding storm of sleet and snow and hail, that lashed his face pitilessly, threatening to drench his thin garments, if he chanced to be exposed to its fury for any length of time.

It was Christmas Eve, so the warehouses had long been closed, and the court in which they stood was quiet and deserted. Not a creature was to be seen moving along the narrow strip of pavement on either side of the roadway, and the roar of traffic from the great thoroughfares all round reached the boy's ears in a continuous murmur, whilst in his immediate neighbourhood absolute silence reigned.

It was growing dark; lamps were being lighted all down the busy streets. Shops were gay with their festive Christmas bravery, and there were crowds of people passing in and out, making final purchases for the coming day.

Teddy thought of all this as he sat on the top step under the friendly shelter of the porch, nursing his knee, whilst his sharp thin face and bright brown eyes were turned towards the one dull lamp that glimmered overhead.

"Ah, it must be a very fine thing to be rich!" he said half aloud, and there was none of the street-boy twang in his speech; indeed, his whole appearance, poverty-stricken as it was, betokened a certain amount of quiet refinement. "Don't I wish I may be rich some day! And won't I have good times if I can, and give other folks good times too! I'd like to dress Tiny in velvet and fur, and Daddy should have a coat lined with sealskin, and as many books as he liked to read; and I'd have some skates, and a big knife with half a dozen blades, and a new bat, and——" But there Teddy paused and heaved a long sigh, for these pictured glories were a terribly long way off yet.

"It takes such a time to grow up, and I can't do anything till I'm a man; and things are worse with us than ever they've been, and if Dad can't get any regular work I don't know what will become of us. Folks do say that when things are worst they begin to mend, and I'm sure I hope they will with us. But it's not much of a Christmas we shall have. I'll make my sixpence go as far as it will with things for Tiny; but sixpence isn't much. Hallo! What's that?"

This exclamation was evoked from Teddy by the feel of a damp, cold touch upon his hand, and hastily stretching it out to ascertain the cause, it came in contact with a mass of wet matted hair, and the boy became aware that his retreat was shared by a dripping and disconsolate Skye terrier, apparently in the last stages of misery and starvation.

"Hallo!" cried Teddy again; "you are a poor wretched beast! Come, cheer up, old chap—never say die! What, you want to get on my knee? All right; there you are. Poor old fellow! Have you been used to better days too? You look like it, somehow; and have you been lost or stolen, or something, or run away from home? Yes, you're a nice doggie; and if you were dry and clean, I dare say you would be handsome too. Oh, so you can wag your tail, can you? Good dog!—what a wet stump of a tail it is! But, Stumpy my dear, I must go home as soon as the rain stops, and what am I to do with you? Oh, please don't look at me so beseechingly, because, Stumpy dear, we really can't afford to keep a dog—we can hardly keep ourselves. It isn't that I don't love you, but——"

But the more the boy talked, the more the stumpy-tailed dog seemed to confide in him, nestling up against his shoulder, and finally lifting a wet nose to lick his down-bent face. And that dumb caress seemed to finish the business, for Teddy started suddenly to his feet, clasping the damp dog closely in his arms.

"A warm bath was quickly prepared."—p. 186.

"Oh, bother it all, Stumpy! How you do get round a fellow! I expect you've been used to children, somehow. Anyway, I can't resist you. Now just listen a moment, old fellow, and I'll explain the situation to you. I can't keep you—I really can't. Why, on the first of January there would be seven-and-six to pay for a licence for you—just think of that! But I'll take you home to-night, and we'll keep you over Christmas at least; and I'll spend my sixpence on food for you, and Tiny will have to do without her present. I know she won't mind—she would rather you should be fed, you poor starved dog. You shall have a happy Christmas, at least. And then we'll wash and comb you, and make you look your best, and try and find a good home for you, with people who will be kind to you. And that's the best I can do for you, Stumpy dear, and if I was rich you should live with me always; but anyhow you shall have a nice Christmas visit."

All the while he was talking, Teddy was trudging along with his damp burden in his arms; and the poor dog cowered close against him, as if only dreading to be set down. At length the little lad turned into a dim side street in the heart of the great city, and entered a bright little shop, where milk and bread and eggs were sold, and where he seemed well known to the buxom proprietor of the place.

"Good evening, Mrs. Mason," he said, in his bright fearless way. "I've had an adventure, and I've found this poor starving dog, and as it's Christmas-time I've promised to keep him just for a few days; and I've got a sixpence of my own"—here the coin was produced and laid upon the counter—"and I want to know if you'll be so very kind as to take and keep it, and let me have a little stale bread and a drink of skim-milk for Stumpy whilst he stays with us. I don't want him to be a burden on my father, and I can't leave him to starve in the streets on Christmas Eve. Oh, thank you, thank you—oh, isn't he hungry, poor fellow!"

For the kind-faced woman, after one glance at the dog, had begun feeding him with scraps of bun and bread and biscuit, and the famished way in which the poor fellow consumed these dainties plainly showed how ravenous he was.

"Poor doggie, poor doggie! There my man, there. Yes, he shall have a good supper, that he shall, and a bone by-and-bye as well. Nay, Master Teddy my dear, you shall keep your sixpence; but I'll find a bite and a sup and welcome for the poor dog whilst he stays with you. It would be hard to grudge him that at Christmas-time, and me so fond of dumb animals, too."

"Oh, how kind you are! Isn't it nice to see him eat? Why, he looks quite perky already. Oh, that milk! Doesn't he like it? See how he wags his stumpy tail! There! why, he really seems to have had enough. Now I must take him up to Tiny. He's a kind of Christmas present for her. She will like him!"

So Teddy picked up his new pet, and walked off up the narrow staircase to the top floor of the little house, which his father rented of kind Mrs. Mason.

The little parlour was quite dark, save for the flickering of a small fire; and upon the thin rug lay a little pale girl, propped up with old cushions and a pillow. For though Tiny was not exactly ill, she had been very weak and ailing all through the cold weather, and could not run about and play, nor get out of doors at all.

"Why, Teddy, how late you are! Did the snow keep you? And what is that bundle you have in your arms?"

"It's your Christmas present, Tiny!"

"Oh, Teddy! A present! For me! Oh, what can it be?"

The little girl sat up in her excitement, and the next moment something warm and damp and heavy was deposited in her lap.

"Oh, Teddy, it's alive! It's a cat—no—a dog! A dear little darling doggie! Oh, Teddy, tell me, where did you get him? Is he really yours?"

So then Teddy told his tale, to which Tiny listened entranced, hugging the dog the whole time, and breathing words of tender endearment into his ears.

The children's delight over their new treasure was pretty to see. A warm bath was quickly prepared, and all the mud and dirt washed from the thick coat, which soon showed how silky its natural texture was.

Stumpy had evidently been used to ablutions, and quite luxuriated in feeling himself clean and combed again. As he lay basking before the bright little fire his coat grew fluffy and silvery at the ends, and his tail, so far from being stumpy, was quickly transformed into quite a feathery appendage.

"He oughtn't to be called Stumpy any more," cried Tiny, who had not thought the name good enough all along; but somehow it clung to him, as names will, and Stumpy he remained with them to the end of the chapter.

About eight o'clock, up came Mrs. Mason with two plates in her hands. One contained bones and odds and ends of fat and grease for the dog, and the other a nice little pudding for the children's supper—a gift from the kind motherly landlady.

"Bless me! Whatever have you done to the dog? Why, he looks another creature! Oh, yes, my pretty, you shall have some supper; but there's too much here for one meal; I'll put half by till to-morrow, and you shall have the rest now. There, you impatient little fellow! Well, you are a beauty, and no mistake! Now eat up your pudding, dearies; you want supper as well as Stumpy. And where is your father all this time?"

"Helping Crook and Co. with their books. They took him on for a week, because he is such a good accountant, and they are extra-busy just now. But he finishes to-night. He will bring money to pay up the rent, Mrs. Mason, and we shall have something for Christmas too. But I do wish he could get some regular work again."

"So do I, and so he ought, such a clever man as he is, with his foreign languages and all, and a real gentleman to boot. Well, well! we live in hard times, but we must all help one another.—Yes, little man, you agree with that sentiment, don't you? You look a very different creature since somebody helped you."

These last words were addressed to Stumpy, who, after demolishing his excellent supper in double-quick time, had expressed his gratitude by jumping upon her knee.

"Well, young man, it is plain you have come from a good home, you take so kindly to petting. I very much suspect, sir, that you have been stolen. Ah, yes; now I am sure of it! You have been stolen, and have had the sense or spirit to escape from your captors, though you could not find your way home, poor little chap!"

"How do you know? How can you tell?" cried Teddy, coming up greatly interested.

"Why, look here at his poor little head; his ears have been hurt—almost torn—that's because he's had a collar forced over them to get it off. I suspect he wore one of those pretty plated collars that fasten with lock and key, and the cruel folks who stole him pulled it off by main force, as they couldn't unfasten it. Some men have no heart at all. But this little fellow has had a good home somewhere. He 's been a regular lady's pet—it doesn't take two eyes to see that plain enough."

"He is a darling!" said Tiny softly. "How I wish we could keep him always!"

But she and Teddy and kind Mrs. Mason all knew that this was impossible. The little visitor must not stay on as a permanence. It would be out of the question to take out a licence for him; and the landlady could not keep him, on account of her two precious cats.

"But look here!" cried Teddy, with sudden animation: "if we can't keep him ourselves, we might try to find his real home to send him back to! Why, I'd tramp London all over, asking people if they 'd lost a dog. I 'd——"

"Stop a bit, Master Teddy my dear; there's a better way than that. If he 's had a good home, and has belonged to gentlefolk, ten to one they will have advertised for him in the Times. Most likely he was stolen so as to get a reward when it was offered; but the little chap has cheated the rascals out of that. Serve them right too; but there's not a bit of reason why you shouldn't find out what you want—and get the reward too. That's a good idea. It really is."

"I don't want any reward—only to find Stumpy's real home, and take him back. But oh, Mrs. Mason, how can we find out?"

"Why, by hunting up back numbers of the Times, to be sure. Your father can do that after the holidays are over, at one of them Institute places, where they keeps all the papers. Bless you, we 'll make it all out, never fear. Maybe this bit of a creature—or your kind heart, Master Teddy—will bring you a bit of good luck one of these days!"

CHAPTER II.—CHRISTMAS DAY.

Tears on Christmas morning! Whoever heard of such a thing! And from a little girl, too, standing in front of a table literally heaped with pretty presents.

The snowy breakfast-cloth was on the table, the silver urn hissing and spluttering its homely greeting, and the kind faces of papa and mamma were bent anxiously upon their darling, as, after exchanging the morning greetings, she went forward to her own place, to look at the pile of tempting boxes and parcels that were attractively arranged around it.

But the strange thing was that there was no look of glad eagerness on the child's face, no animation in her movements, or pleasurable excitement in her blue eyes. She stood at the table, not putting out her hand to touch one of the pretty things displayed there, her face quivering and her eyes filling, till at last a bitter little sob escaped her, and, laying her head down upon the table-cloth, she fairly cried and wept.

"Oh, papa—mamma—I don't w—want to be naughty, but I can't care for anything now poor T—Towzey's lost!"

The parents exchanged troubled glances. These bursts of overwhelming grief had occurred three or four times a day for the past ten days, and were really undermining the child's health. Little May, from being an only child, had been brought up surrounded by every luxury and indulgence, and hardly knew what an ungratified wish was. This petting and consideration had not spoilt her in the ordinary sense of the word, for her disposition was naturally very sweet; but it had not braced her character, nor taught her how to bear troubles, and so when the first real sorrow of her childhood had come to her, in the loss of her favourite dog, she broke down utterly and uncontrollably, and, without intending to be selfish, caused great trouble and anxiety to her fond parents, who were sadly distressed by her wild bursts of grief and inconsolable sorrow.

"I would give his weight in gold to have the dog back!" said Mr. Travers, looking across at his wife, and speaking almost impatiently in his anxious regret. "The child will fret herself downright ill if this goes on much longer. I'm sure it can't be for want of offering a high enough reward. Ten pounds would buy the creature three times over. But I'd give twenty for him sooner than see the child go on like this."

May sobbed on with unabated bitterness, and Mrs. Travers looked helpless and distressed. Her gentle, soothing words fell on unheeding ears. May had no thought to spare for the fact that she was spoiling her kind parents' Christmas morning. She could only think of her lost Towzey, and weep tears of sorrow for him.

There was little eaten at the breakfast-table that day. Mr. Travers did his best to make a good meal; but May could hardly be coaxed to touch her food, and the mother was too anxious about her darling to have any appetite herself. She tried, by opening the many parcels, and displaying the tempting contents before the child's eyes, to win back smiles to the tear-stained face. But May only gave languid attention to the show of pretty presents. She was too much used to receiving costly gifts to feel any great excitement about these. She had everything she could possibly want, and her whole suite of nurseries was so crowded out with her possessions already, that it was almost impossible to find space for the new acquisitions always pouring in. Poor little May was cloyed with luxury before she was ten years old, and the healthy joy of an ordinary child over a new toy was a sensation she could hardly remember.

"It's very pretty—it's very kind," she repeated mechanically, as presents and loving greetings were unfolded before her; but there was no lighting of the mournful face or tear-dimmed eyes. Nothing could please the child now Towzey was lost.

Indeed, Towzey had been the most healthy element in this child's hot-house existence. The little Skye terrier, despite his warm affection for his little mistress, had a decided will of his own, and one which he was not always prepared to yield to hers without a struggle. Towzey brought an element of healthy friction and "give-and-take" into her life which it otherwise lacked; and then the dog depended upon her for everything, and was a companion in her walks and play-hours. He slept at the foot of her bed at nights, and was like a sort of shadow.

It was no wonder, therefore, that the little girl missed him, and grieved for him sadly. It could not have been otherwise. Only, had she been taught a greater consideration for others, she might have made a little more effort to struggle against her grief, and preserve an outward semblance of cheerfulness. But it had never occurred to May that there was any need for her to consider grown-up people. She had been used to be the great object of consideration to them, and it would have seemed a subversion of the existing order of the world if she had begun to think for them, or put any pressure on her feelings on their account. Unconscious as the selfishness was, it still was selfishness, though the child's parents were as little aware of it as she herself.

But it seemed a melancholy thing that Christmas Day was to be spoilt; and yet this appeared inevitable. It was evident that May was quite unfit to go to church, for the tears had brought the headache that always followed these outbursts of ungoverned weeping. So the child was tucked up on the dining-room sofa beside a blazing fire, with all her presents round her, whilst her parents went off to morning service, hoping that she would sleep, and awake to restored cheerfulness later on.

But May was not disposed for sleep; she lay looking out of the sunny window, and still thinking of her lost pet, and the tears were on the point of coming back again, when a knock at the street door, and the sound of a familiar step in the hall, made her start up with a little exclamation of pleasure.

"It's Uncle Walter! He's come to go to church with us! Perhaps he'll stay at home with me now. I should like that! He gave me Towzey. He understands my feelings."

Walter Travers was one of those nice young lively uncles that are so popular with the young people who are lucky enough to be their nieces and nephews. May was exceedingly fond of her Uncle Walter, and this fondness was reciprocated by the young man.

"Hallo, Mayflower! Laid up on Christmas Day? Why, whatever is the matter?—sprained an ankle, eh?"

"Oh, no; I've only got a little headache. I suppose it was crying for Towzey brought it. Please, Uncle Walter, you haven't heard anything of him, have you?"

"No, indeed I haven't. I went to the Home for Lost Dogs again yesterday, but he'd not turned up there. I'm awfully afraid you'll have to learn to be happy again without him. I'll give you the nicest dog I can get presently, when we have quite given up hope; and you must try and be a brave little woman."

"Thank you, Uncle Walter," said May, in accents of calm conviction; "but I don't want another dog, and I never shall be happy any more again."

And as Uncle Walter gave vent to his feelings in a long, low whistle, May broke down once more into passionate weeping, and out came the burden of her sorrow.

"If he had died, I could have borne it better; but he ran away or was stolen, and he may be starved, or beaten, or ill-treated, or anything—and I can't bear it! I can't bear it!"

Uncle Walter lifted her on his lap, and let her sob out her troubles on his shoulder. Plainly, there would be no going to church that Christmas morning for him; but here was work for him to do, and he meant to try and do it.

But he began by giving very real sympathy to May in her trouble, not trying to make light of it, or argue it away, but entering into it fully; only showing her that there was an almost equal chance that the lost dog had got into good hands as into bad ones; and that if any professional dog-stealer had taken the animal, he would have been restored by now. It was quite possible he might have been run over or killed—quite possible, too, that if lost, he might have found a good home somewhere.

And as Uncle Walter talked, May grew gradually calm; and then the young man took a new line, and the little girl listened at first with great surprise, and by-and-bye with a sense of shame and contrition she hardly understood.

Uncle Walter was learning to be a doctor, and his work took him into all kinds of places, where he saw want and misery, disease and trouble of almost every kind; and he told his little niece of some of the sights he saw day by day, of the poor little children—ill, and suffering, and hungry—and the troubles and privations that were a part of their daily lot. He drew his pictures so vividly that May felt as if she had been with him into some of those miserable places; and as nobody else had ever told her of anything painful before, she wondered why Uncle Walter did so now. But she was soon to learn.

"And after seeing and hearing all these things," he continued gravely, "I come to a beautiful home in a big airy square, and find a little girl, richly dressed, surrounded by lovely presents—a little girl with everything she needs—kind friends, loving parents, faithful servants, everything in the world to make her happy; yet she is not happy, but miserable, and she makes the whole house anxious and miserable too; and the trouble is, that she has lost a dog! Now, of course, it is a very sad thing to lose a favourite dog. I'm the last person in the world to deny it. But, then, there is reasonable sorrow as well as unreasonable; and this little girl is unreasonable, because she ignores and forgets all the many, many causes she has for thankfulness and happiness, and hugs her trouble, and thinks of nothing else. If some of my poor, hungry, ill-clad, miserable little friends could look into this room now, they would say that the little lady who could not be happy here, was the most curious little lady in all the world, and I think they would be right!"

"Oh! Uncle Walter!"

"Yes, little Mayflower, I do indeed. It is not right of you to give way so, when God has given you so much, so very much to be thankful for."

"Oh, Uncle Walter, I never thought of it like that. I don't want to be naughty. Tell me what I can do."

"You can try and put on a cheerful face, and keep your thoughts from always brooding over the trouble; but the best medicine of all will be to lose your own trouble by helping other people out of theirs."

"Oh, Uncle Walter! could I?"

"I think you could make a beginning."

"Oh, I should like that—I should indeed, Uncle Walter! Will you help me?"

XUM

"I will indeed, little niece, for I should like better than anything to see you begin to take an interest in anything outside your own little luxurious life."

"And can I begin soon?"

"As soon as ever you like—the sooner the better."

So Christmas Day in that big house passed more cheerfully than it promised to do. The smiles came back to May's cheeks, and no more tears were shed; for though poor Towzey's fate was still wrapped in gloom, the child had begun to realise that there were worse troubles afloat in the world, and to feel that there might still be some satisfaction in life if she could help those whose need was greater than her own.

CHAPTER III.—BOXING-DAY.

"PLEASE, sir, there's a little boy wants to see you. He says he's come about the lost dog."

Walter Travers looked up from his dinner, and said—

"Well, show him up, Martha; though I don't suppose for a moment it's our dog."

The young man was in his own rooms in the city, near to the hospital in connection with which he worked. It was to his address that the finder of the lost Towzey had been referred by the advertisement, as Mr. Travers felt certain that dozens of wrong dogs would be brought up to claim the reward, and was anxious that his little daughter should be spared the perpetual disappointments that were almost certain to be inflicted during the course of inquiries.

And, indeed, Walter had had so many dogs brought for inspection, that he had small hopes of any result of this application, though he looked up with a pleasant smile as a bright-faced little lad stepped into the room, pulling off his cap as he did so.

"Well, my boy, and where is the dog?"

"Please sir, he's just round the corner, in the street behind this. I thought maybe you'd come and look at him. I was afraid I might lose him in the crowd, he's so frisky and full of play since he got fed up, and we've only had him since Christmas Eve, and Tiny's that fond of him already, I don't know how she'll bear to lose him. But when father saw the notice in the paper at a friend's house yesterday, he thought we ought to come about it to-day. For he is a Skye terrier, and he has got a little mole under his chin, and one tooth with its point knocked off, and he does answer to the name of Towzey, though we call him Stumpy, and he answers to that too. So would you please come and look at him, sir? and then we shall know."

All this sounded so promising that Walter rose at once and donned his overcoat, whilst his bright little companion launched out into an animated recital of the finding of the starving and miserable "Stumpy"; and, indeed, before the two had reached their destination the young man had learned the main facts of the boy's family history—how mother was dead, how father had lost his situation as clerk through the failure of some great city house, and how Tiny's health was suffering through privation, and the wolf was hardly kept from the door.

Not that Teddy had any idea of telling a pitiful story. He merely answered the gentleman's questions in a frank, cheery way, despite the fact that what he had to relate was by no means of a cheerful nature.

In five minutes' time they reached Mrs. Mason's little shop, and passing through this, they ascended the staircase to the top of the house, and entered a small, bare room, spotlessly clean and neat, despite its air of poverty.

A careworn man, with a refined and gentle face, was sitting reading at a window, and by the fire lay a little pale child, clasping a fluffy Skye terrier closely in her arms.

But the moment the new-comer entered the room, the dog uttered a little cry of joyous recognition, leaped frantically upon him, barking and jumping and testifying his delight by every means in his power.

There was no need to claim Stumpy. Stumpy had claimed him, and the little girl, watching the meeting with a smile of eager interest, could not restrain the tears that stole quietly down her face; for of course now Stumpy must go, and she loved him so dearly already that the parting, inevitable as it was, seemed hard.

And Walter saw the tears, and, taking the child upon his knee, soon found out the cause; for he had a kind, bright way with children that always won their hearts.

"So Stumpy is a pet and a favourite already, is he? Well, then, I will not take him off at once; but you shall keep him till his little mistress comes for him, and we must see if we cannot find you a comrade and a playfellow in his place. And as for you, Teddy, you have not claimed the reward yet. Do you know that there are ten gold sovereigns due to you for finding Stumpy, as you call him?"

But Teddy flushed, and put his hands behind him, and said—

"Oh please, sir, I couldn't take any money for that. It is Mrs. Mason who has fed him, and we have loved him so. I am only so pleased to give him back to the little lady who has cried for him—though Tiny will miss him, and so shall I."

So Walter smiled, and left the children caressing Stumpy vehemently, whilst he talked for ten minutes in low tones with the father by the window. Then he took himself off, saying that he should be back before very long with the little mistress of the foundling.

May was rather surprised to see Uncle Walter dash up to the door in a hansom cab on boxing-day, because he had said he should not be coming; and in a moment she rushed out into the hall to meet him, for it had occurred to her that he might bring her news of the lost Towzey.

"Well, May, I thought we'd begin the new work to-day. I've found a little girl who wants cheering up, and would be mightily pleased with that tabby kitten you want a kind mistress for. So run along and put your things on, and get the kitten and anything else you think you can spare for a poor little sick child, who has had no nice Christmas presents to cheer her up. I'll go and talk to papa and mamma, and then we'll start off together."

For a moment the light died out of May's face, as no mention was made of Towzey; but, recovering herself by an effort not lost upon her uncle, she answered him by a bright smile, and ran off eagerly upon the first labour of love that had ever entered into her young life.

Walter went straight to the parents and told his tale, which evoked almost as much pleasure from them as he would have done from the child herself, had he thought fit to tell her all.

"But," said the young man, "I want the little one to see what life is like in other homes. She wants a wider range of interest, and these people are most respectable. I found out that much from their landlady. It will do May good to be interested in lives less shielded than her own, and the dog will be the best link between her and the little sick child."

The parents agreed more heartily to this than they would have done a fortnight ago. Their darling's abandonment of grief over her lost pet had awakened in them a vague feeling that there must have been some defect in her training, and that something should be done to overcome it. Also their own interest in the poor family was aroused, for Mr. and Mrs. Travers were kind-hearted people.

"I'll take the man into my own counting-house. I can do with another clerk now trade is looking up again. One feels glad and thankful to do anything for those who have been the means of bringing back the child's favourite, besides the pleasure of helping a deserving case. I'll come with you, Walter. I should like to see the meeting between Towzey and his mistress, and I'll see the man's credentials, and have a talk with him, and he can start work on Monday. And we'll find quarters for them nearer his work and this house, and May shall take her first lesson in the realities of life in befriending these lonely children. Perhaps we have kept her too much shielded, too much self-centred. Certainly a healthy interest outside her own life may do the child good."

So when May descended with a sweet blue-eyed kitten in a basket, and quite a load of pretty gifts carried by the nursemaid in her wake, it was to find that the carriage was at the door, and that papa was coming with them.

Although there was no thought of Towzey in the child's mind, her face was bright, and she talked eagerly to Uncle Walter all the time of the poor little girl, who had had no Christmas presents, even though she was ill, and told of the things that she had packed up for her. She had not shown so much pleasure or interest in anything since the sad days of Towzey's loss, and the good father felt that his brother had been right in the method he had taken for rousing the little girl from her too great sorrow.

Arrived at the little shop, Uncle Walter took May by the hand, and nodding to the smiling woman behind the counter, led her up the staircase, the father following with the heavy basket of presents.

"Now, May," said the young man, throwing open a door on the top landing, "are you prepared for a great surprise? There! What do you think of that?"

"Towzey! Towzey! My own Towzey! Oh! oh! oh!" shrieked May. "Oh, Towzey, my darling—my love! can it really be you? Oh, papa! Oh, Uncle Walter! Did you really know? Oh, Towzey! I don't know what to say." And May sank down on the floor, and gathered her lost pet in her arms, whilst his shrieks and barks of joy drowned all other sounds.

And then what a hubbub of childish voices arose! for in the confusion the blue-eyed kitten escaped from the basket, and fled precipitately into Tiny's arms, in mortal fear of the terrible barking dog. And Tiny gathered the little thing into a warm embrace, and covered it with kisses, and when she heard it was really to be her very, very own, her delight knew no bounds, and she was amply consoled for the loss of Stumpy.

"Because, you know, we couldn't have kept him, really; but we can keep a kitten—there's no tax for them; and oh, he's such a darling, with such lovely blue eyes;" and Tiny stopped short to kiss and fondle her new treasure, for Teddy was pouring the story of Stumpy into May's eager ears, and in the tumult of voices the little invalid's was quite lost.

"But he isn't Stumpy, he's Towzey!" cried May, clasping her darling in her arms, whilst he licked her face all over unrebuked, as he had seldom been able to do before, as his mistress was rather a particular little lady.

"Then, I'll tell you what—puss shall be called Stumpy now, in remembrance of to-day, Tiny. And so if you take Towzey away, we shall still keep Stumpy!"

And in the gladness of their hearts the children all laughed merrily at this compromise, and grew so intimate in the eager pleasure of the giving and receiving of the pretty presents May had brought, that they soon felt like old friends; and such a happy red-letter day had never perhaps been marked in the short calendar of any of their young lives before.

So that was the beginning, but by no means the ending, of a childish friendship, that was the source of much pleasure to all those concerned for many years to come, and from which the rich child gained quite as much as the children of the poor man.

Mr. Travers took the father into his office, where he soon became a trusted and valued servant; and May spent a whole delightful week in furbishing up and adorning the new rooms into which the family shortly moved.

She and kind Mrs. Mason are regular visitors to that now comfortable and prosperous little home. Tiny's cheeks are no longer wan and white, and she can run to and from school in all but the worst of weathers.

Teddy is top of his class, and almost ready to leave school; and there is a place in Mr. Travers' office waiting for him, from which it is to be hoped he will rise in time to a clerkship.

May and Tiny meet regularly every Saturday afternoon, and enjoy a happy hour together; and Towzey and Stumpy are almost as fast friends as their respective little mistresses, to whom they are so devotedly attached; and May has learnt to be thankful for the happy lines in which her life is cast, and to forget her little cares and crosses in ministering to the sorer needs of others.

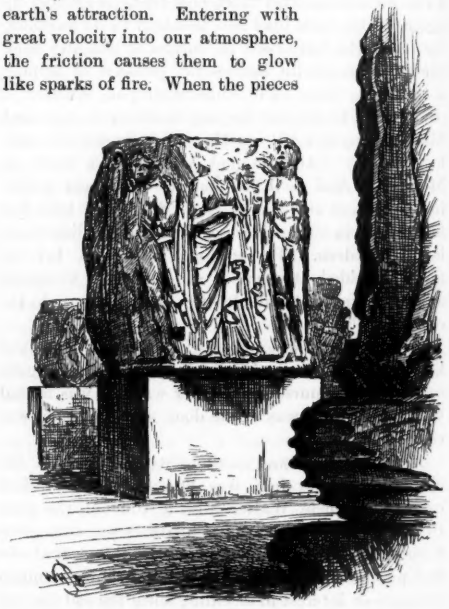
THE IMAGE WHICH FELL DOWN FROM JUPITER.

(ACTS xix. 35.)



BY THE REV. HUGH MACMILLAN, D.D., LL.D., F.R.S.E.

DIANA OF EPHESUS.

IF you visit the British Museum, you will find in one of its rooms, among a number of noble statues and other works of ancient sculpture, several enormous masses of white marble. Though much broken and discoloured by the ravages of time, these marble fragments still retain much of their old beauty and grace. You look at them with great astonishment before you know anything about them, for they are like the ruins of buildings that have been erected by giants. But your interest is much deepened when you are told that these pieces of marble once formed part of the pillars of the great temple of Diana at Ephesus, and were excavated and brought to this country a quarter of a century ago by Mr. Wood, who wrote an admirable book upon the subject. In the days of the Apostle Paul the temple of Diana was the glory of the city of Ephesus, and one of the seven wonders of the world. It was raised in honour of Artemis, or Diana—not the famous goddess of hunting of the Greeks, but the Asiatic mother of all animal life, under whose protection the city of Ephesus was placed. When the temple stood in all its magnificence, if you visited it and passed into the inmost chamber, you would find there an image of the goddess; and you would have been greatly disappointed. You would see an ugly little figure of black stone, with the rude indistinct outlines of a woman's shape, and a marble crown upon its head; altogether monstrous and deformed. This idol, grotesque as it looked, was regarded as an object of peculiar sacredness, for it was believed to have fallen down from heaven from the hand of Jupiter himself, and pilgrims from all parts of the world came to worship at its shrine.

What was this image which fell down from Jupiter? If you go to another part of the British Museum, you will get an explanation. In a room devoted to minerals you will see a collection of dark stones of different shapes and sizes lying about, weighing from a few pounds to several hundredweights. There is one enormous mass that weighs three and a half tons. These stones are what are called meteoric stones. You have seen shooting stars on clear winter nights. If you go out about the middle of November before going to bed, and look up at the sky, you will see countless fiery sparks, with long streamers of light, falling in every direction like a brilliant display of rockets. These are pieces of solid matter, supposed to be bits of a comet or a broken planet, coming within the influence of our earth's attraction. Entering with great velocity into our atmosphere, the friction causes them to glow like sparks of fire. When the pieces are small they are completely dissipated ; but large fragments occasionally reach the earth in a solid form. There are more than two hundred specimens in the British Museum, which fell from the sky in different parts of the world at different times ; and other museums are largely supplied with characteristic examples.

THE WORSHIP OF METEORIC STONES.

THE image that was worshipped in the splendid temple of Diana at Ephesus was doubtless a meteoric stone of this kind. It probably fell from the sky in the very place where the temple was afterwards built ; for being originally a marsh, we can hardly suppose that such a site would have been voluntarily chosen without such an association ; and some rude likeness which it presented to a woman's figure, especially when subsequently improved by carving, suggested that it was the image of Diana, made in heaven itself by the hands of the great ruler of the gods. The old Ephesians were not the only people who worshipped a meteoric stone. The inhabitants of Pessinus in Galatia gave to an embassy, sent from Rome for the purpose, a celebrated sacred stone which had fallen from heaven, and was worshipped by them under the name of Cybele, the great mother of all things. The possession of it was supposed to be necessary to the safety of the Roman Republic during the Carthaginian war. It was taken by ship to Ostia, the harbour of Rome, and from thence was carried to the city by a solemn procession of Roman matrons. The day of its arrival, the 4th of April, was ever afterwards kept as a festival, at which games were celebrated. When I was in Rome I happened to be walking on the 4th of April on the Appian Way—outside the walls of the city—where a small stream, which has been identified as the classic Almo, flowed near the road, and I saw some people washing a stucco figure of the Saviour in its waters, and it immediately flashed across my mind that this curious ceremony was no other than a survival of the annual washing in this very stream of the famous image of Cybele, by the priests of the goddess, more than two thousand years ago. This image of Cybele looked like a huge piece of deep brown lava, ending in a sharp point. It had several irregularities on its surface, which resembled the sun scattering its rays around it. It was set in a silver statue of the goddess, in place of the head, in the great temple built in her honour. Heliogabalus, the infamous Roman Emperor, it is said, stole this relic from its temple, and placed it in his own chapel, under the name of the Sun Heliogabalus. More than a hundred years ago it was accidentally turned up in excavating the ruins of the Palaces of the Cæsars ; but, ignorant of its true nature, the labourers tossed it aside among the rubbish as a common stone, and it disappeared.

At Delphi, in Greece, the shrine of the celebrated oracle—where the oldest worship of the land was performed—there was a stone which Saturn was said to have swallowed and rejected. It was anointed with oil, and carried with pride on solemn festival days. In the temple of Juggernaut, in India, there is a black stone of pyramidal shape, which has libations of perfumed oil poured upon it every day. Besides these famous stones, there is one that has acquired even greater fame, and is better known to us in these days. This is the Kaaba, which is built into the wall of the holy place of the temple at Mecca, and is said to have been brought from heaven by the angel Gabriel. Thousands of pilgrims from all parts of the Mahometan world flock every year to kiss this stone, as the Roman Catholics kiss the toe of the statue of St. Peter, in the great church of St. Peter's in Rome. The stone at Mecca has, in consequence, been worn into hollows by the lips of the "faithful." Closely examined, this stone has been discovered to be nothing else than a meteoric stone, that fell from the sky thousands of years ago, and was worshipped by the prehistoric people who lived in this part of Arabia. When Mahomet came, he engrafted the worship of the holy stone into his own religion; and the people raised a great temple in its honour. There are thus no less than five different religions which have made an idol of a meteoric stone that had fallen from the sky: the Phœnician religion, that worshipped the image of Diana at Ephesus; the Greek religion, that worshipped the stone of Saturn at Delphi; the Roman religion, that worshipped the image of Cybele at Rome; the Indian religion, that worships the black stone in the temple of Juggernaut, in India; and the Mahometan religion, that worships the black stone of the Kaaba at Mecca. These examples show to us how widely spread were these ancient objects of worship.

IDOLATRY A SEEKING AFTER GOD.

OW we are apt to think that religions which made stones like these sacred, must have been exceptionally degraded religions; that persons who were addicted to this form of worship must have been especially wicked and foolish. And yet the Apostle Paul, who saw all the foul lust and cruelty of idolatry at Ephesus, understood at the same time the spiritual longing connected with it. He knew that in that corrupt worship it was not man departing wilfully from God, and desiring not the knowledge of His ways that was indicated, but man seeking blindly after God, groping after Him with outstretched hands in the darkness of Nature if haply he might find Him. He had a deep heartfelt compassion for the ignorance and blindness which could thus, in default of anything better, worship stones believed to have been the images of the gods sent down from heaven. He did not go about condemning the poor idolaters, any more than he would have condemned a blind man who stumbled because of some obstacle in his way. They could not help their blindness; they knew no better. All the time that he was at Ephesus—and he was there two whole years—he did not say anything against the prevailing worship of the place, although he could not but have seen day after day sights and scenes which must have greatly vexed his righteous soul. He contented himself with preaching the Gospel, assured that if he could get the people to believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, they would at once abandon their own false religion. He could not expect them to give up what they already possessed until they had found something that was superior. And therefore his style of preaching was always constructive, not destructive—intended not to pull down the false, but to build up the true. He built upon the same ground which he had in common with the basest idolater—the instinct for God which exists in every human heart, and he said, "Whom ye ignorantly worship, Him declare I unto you."

It is natural for all human beings to worship something that belongs or is supposed to belong to a higher region than this earth of ours. The ancient Ephesians were accustomed to look up to the sky as the home of their gods. It was from thence that the rain, the dew, the sunshine, and all the beneficent influences that ripened their harvests and enriched their lives, came. It was from thence also that all the dreadful things that blighted their fields and destroyed their possessions—the storms and the pestilences—also came. So that while they were encouraged to pray for a continuance of the blessings, they were also tempted to offer sacrifices that the evils might be averted. With such ideas it was the most natural thing in the world for them to regard with peculiar sacredness a strange stone which they had seen with their own eyes falling down with a loud explosion from the sky; especially when that stone had some rude resemblance to a human figure. What else, in their utter ignorance of science, could they imagine it to be than a divine thing sent to them directly from the hand of the mighty Thunderer? They saw that the stone was perfectly different from all the other stones they had ever seen before. They saw that it was burning hot, glowing like a fallen star when it fell upon the earth; that it hissed as it crashed into the marshy waste; and when it cooled they saw that it was black and heavy as iron, while yet it was not iron. They regarded it as a part of the great unknown world beyond the stars, where they believed the King of heaven and all the gods lived. Hitherto they had seen nothing coming down from heaven but rain and snow and dew, the common things of Nature, which had no mystery about them, and were altogether uninteresting because they were so familiar. And they might have had the longing which we all have to know something of the mysterious region beyond the clouds; to be brought into some communication with these far-away outer portions of space. They might have had the same feelings of wonder regarding the celestial orbs which come out night after night in the serene sky of the East, and look larger, brighter, and nearer, than they do in our Northern skies, to which expression has been given in the child's poem—

> "Twinkle, twinkle, little star:
> How I wonder what you are."

They had heard of the visits of gods and goddesses to the earth in human form, and of the strange adventures which they met with, and of the mighty works which they did. But these were vague dim things that were said to have happened long ago; and they were not sure but they might after all be only the dreams that men had dreamed—poetical ideas instead of realities. They had heard of the wars of the giants against the gods; how giants had piled mountain upon mountain in order to climb up to where the gods were, and so fight against them in their own place. And they were told how vain were these efforts; how the giants and their mountains were hurled down to the earth after every attempt, and the heavens remained as far off and as inaccessible as before. And they wondered if ever some means of communication with heaven might be possible for man. We can therefore easily imagine the wonder and joy which the sight of the stone that fell down from the sky must have caused to these poor heathens, who did not know any science and scarcely any religion. That stone was a real and true thing, about which there could be no mistake. They could see it with their own eyes and handle it with their own hands. And being ignorant of its true nature, it was inevitable that they should look upon it as a special gift from their gods, as a direct message from heaven to earth, and should worship it.

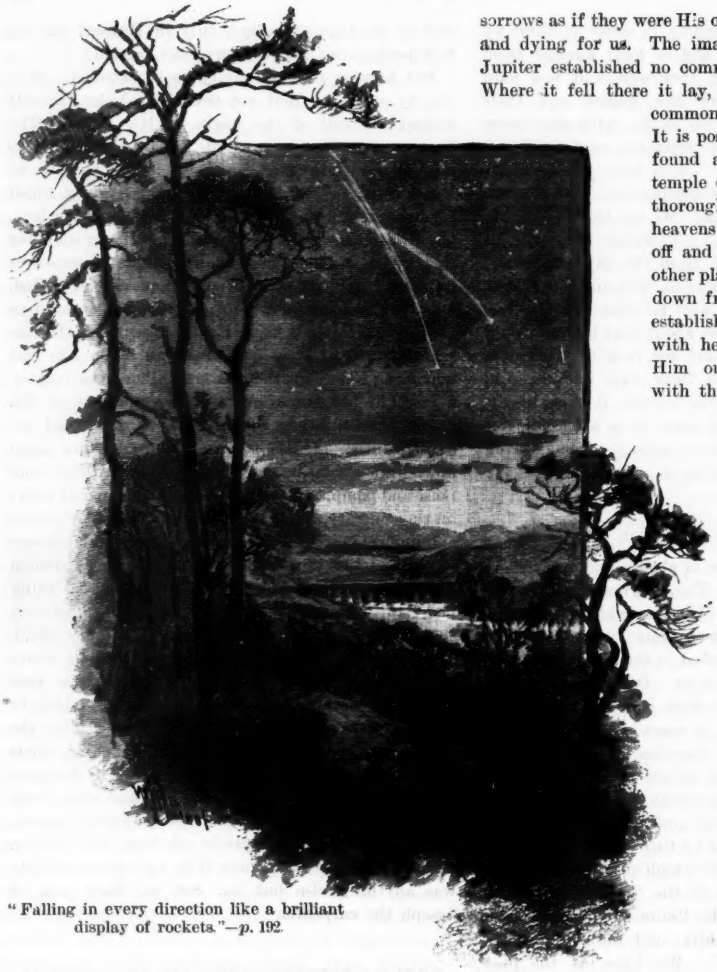
THE HUMAN LONGING FOR GOD.

HUMAN nature is always and everywhere the same. The longing that was in these poor idolaters, which the image that fell down from Jupiter appealed to and satisfied, is the very same longing that is in us. Our flesh and heart cry out for God as their flesh and heart cried out. There is a craving in us, a want which God Himself has made, and which therefore nothing but God Himself can fill. We look up into the starry sky and think of the vast distances which separate these suns and systems from each other and from the system in which our own earth is but a tiny speck, and we are oppressed by the greatness which our minds cannot grasp. We lose ourselves in the thought of the infinite, and we ask, like the Psalmist, "What is man, that thou art mindful of him; and the son of man that thou visitest him?" We have, as the poet says—



> "The desire of the moth for the star;
> Of the day for the morrow;
> The worship of something afar
> From the sphere of our sorrow."

If we know not God, we must seek to satisfy this mysterious longing of our souls by the worship of idols like the Ephesians of old. The ambition that God has given to us that we might seek the highest things, we waste in the pursuit of the poor distinctions of the world. The covetousness that God has given to us that we might covet earnestly the best gifts, we degrade by laying up for ourselves treasures on earth which the rust and the moth corrupt and the thief can steal. But we soon find that all the material things of the world are beneath the dignity of our high-born nature, and can only yield a brief and fitful joy. The vague longing for God still remains unsatisfied. God has made us for Himself, and, as St. Augustine says, only in Himself can we find perfect rest and complete satisfaction.

But how is such a longing to be satisfied? Who can by searching find out God? He hides Himself behind the veil of the works of His hands. The heavens, beyond whose clouds is His throne, are so high above us that we cannot reach to where He is. But blessed be His name, He who has given bread for hunger, and water for thirst, and friends for love, has Himself provided for the longing of our souls for God. What we could not have found out for ourselves has been revealed to us. We could not ascend to God, but God has come down to us. He has given to us the most certain token of His interest in us. He has sent down to us from heaven not an image like that which the Ephesians thought had fallen from Jupiter, a mere lifeless stone, but His own Son out of His bosom, the brightness of the Father's glory and the express image of His person. Jesus did not come down like a blazing meteor from the sky with loud noise and pomp, to attract the awe and wonder of men; on the contrary, like a beam of light He came gently and quietly, without observation. He stole into our world and into our human nature in such a common natural way that few knew what a wonderful thing had happened; that few could distinguish between the Babe of Bethlehem and any ordinary child. There was indeed a wonderful star shining above His cradle, but only the wise men from the East saw it; there was a lighting up of the midnight heavens and a sound of celestial voices heralding the event, but only humble shepherds watching their flocks heard and saw the portent. And as He came into our world, so He continued in it and went away from it—so quiet, so natural, so perfectly human, that it required much insight of faith and love on the part of those who knew Him to believe that He was anything else but the Son of Mary and of Joseph the carpenter.

CONTRAST BETWEEN CHRIST AND THE EPHESIAN IDOL.

CONTRASTING the image which fell down from Jupiter with the Image of the Invisible God in Christ Jesus, we can not only put old familiar truths into a fresh mould, and thus make them more impressive; but we can also bring out more vividly against the dark background of idolatry the preciousness and suitableness of the Christian salvation. The Ephesian meteorite had no message to bring from Jupiter. To a scientific man of the present day it could tell much regarding the nature of stellar substances, much about the chemical composition of those comet-fragments that are circling through space, but it could tell him nothing regarding Him who formed it, give no information concerning the spiritual inhabitants or the spiritual laws of the heavenly world. It would give him the same kind of physical information which he obtains regarding the common matter of the world around him. And if the rocks beneath his feet can tell him nothing about God, neither can the stone which has fallen from the sky. But Jesus has made known to us what kind of a God we have to deal with, and what kind of a heaven we have to look forward to. He has revealed to us the very heart of God, and assured us of God's willingness, nay, eagerness, to pardon and bless the greatest sinners of mankind. He did not come down from the bosom of the Father as the gods of old were fabled to have come down from Olympus to our earth in search of selfish pleasures, leaving the world to sin and suffer on as it might, without lifting a finger to help it. He came, on the contrary, to seek and to save that which was lost, touched with a fellow-feeling of our infirmities, afflicted in all our afflictions, bearing our sins and sorrows as if they were His own, living and suffering and dying for us. The image that fell down from Jupiter established no communication with heaven. Where it fell there it lay, and it became part of the common materials of the earth. It is possible that it may yet be found among the ruins of the temple of Diana when they are thoroughly excavated. The heavens above it seemed as far off and as inaccessible as in any other place. But Jesus, who came down from heaven, by so doing established the closest relations with heaven. By taking upon Him our nature He linked it with the Divine nature; in becoming the Son of Man, He has enabled us to become the sons of God. What Jacob saw in a dream of the night is fulfilled in reality. We see the heavens opened over Jesus, and the angels of God ascending and descending upon Him; and by the new and living way which He opened up, we have access to God and to the glorious place where He dwells. And having finished His work on earth He has gone to heaven to prepare a place for us, and to prepare us for the place, and He has promised that He will come again and receive us unto Himself, that where He is there we may be also. The idol of the Ephesians had no more virtue than a common stone. However long the worshippers gazed upon it, no real moral change was produced upon them. Its worship, so far from purifying and ennobling them, only degraded them; for they humbled their own high nature to pay homage to what was infinitely beneath it. But the worshippers of Jesus become like Him. By appearing in our image He restores by His Spirit in us the image of God in which we were created, and which we lost by our sin. Beholding His glory as in a glass, we are changed into the same image; we become pure as He is pure, and perfect as our Father in heaven is perfect.

GOSPEL BLESSINGS COMPARED WITH THOSE OF IDOLATRY.

WE are told that where the image that fell down from Jupiter stood in the temple of Ephesus, there was the right of sanctuary. The shadow of the idol extended its shield over the fugitive from human justice. It also protected the city from all evil; and on one occasion, when besieged by Crœsus, the inhabitants connected with the temple by means of a rope the parts of the wall which the enemy was battering, in order the more effectually to concentrate on the spot of danger the influence of the deity. But this protection did not arise from any real intrinsic power which the image itself possessed. It was merely a vested right or privilege that was given to it by human authority and custom. And what man had given, man could take away. Whenever it was discovered that the idol was a mere senseless stone, its power and sacredness would be gone, and it could not protect itself, much less those who trusted in it. The city of Ephesus has for ages been a waste and dreary ruin, showing how futile was the protection of the goddess. But Jesus possesses in Himself the Divine power of protection; and all who put their trust in Him are safe against all the forces of the world. They can challenge the whole universe. "Who shall lay anything to the charge of God's elect? It is God that justifieth; who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died, yea, rather that is risen again, Who is even at the right hand of God, Who also maketh intercession for us."

The temple of Diana was the bank of Ephesus. The sacred image kept the treasury of the city safe from the thief and the spoiler. But this security was false; it was a mere delusion. Those who venerated the sacred image might themselves be too superstitious to touch money that was under the safeguard of the goddess; but if a strange warrior came and conquered the place, he would not scruple to take for his own use the money stored in the temple, in spite of Diana. He would not attach the least value to her guardianship. Dionysius, the tyrant of Syracuse, stripped the statue of Jupiter of its golden mantle, and substituted a woollen one, saying that the god would be warmer with that! We have treasures more precious far than silver and gold—the interests of our immortal souls; and if we place them under the protection of the Image of God that came down from heaven, they shall be inviolate in life and death. He will truly guard them, so that nothing shall be lost. No man is able to pluck us out of our Father's hand. We know Whom we have believed, and are persuaded that He will keep that which we have committed to Him against that day.

How highly did the poor idolaters of Ephesus esteem the image that fell down from Jupiter! It was a dark and ugly stone, but their imaginations glorified it, and invested it with the most sacred powers and associations. They raised in its honour the grandest and costliest building in all the world. They placed it in the very heart of their glorious temple, and they worshipped it with all that was best and most precious in their daily services and offerings. What are we doing to show our appreciation of Him who came down from God to save and bless us? He is the chiefest among ten thousand, and altogether lovely. He loved us, and gave Himself for us. We can raise in His honour a temple far grander and more costly than the temple of Ephesus. Writing to the Corinthians, while his own eyes were resting upon the Wonder of the world, and writing to the Ephesians, to whose eyes its splendours were daily revealed, the apostle Paul borrowed from it an architectural allegory. He reminded his converts that they were built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, upon Jesus Christ the chief corner-stone, in whom all the building fitly framed together groweth unto an holy temple in the Lord; obviously alluding to the immense substructures on which the temple of Diana was raised, in consequence of the swampy nature of the ground. The human heart is God's proper dwelling-place; and we ought to show at what a rate we value God's unspeakable Gift, by making ourselves His temple, by placing Him in the inmost shrine of our heart, and devoting all our powers to His service. We should seek to make ourselves by God's grace a worthy casket for such an inestimable jewel, a worthy temple for such a Shechinah.

The strangers who came to worship at the temple of Diana carried away with them little models in silver of the shrine and image of the goddess, so that when far away they might recall the grand memories of the place, and carry on its worship wherever they were. And so Christ has gone away from the world, and we cannot see Him with our bodily eyes. But He has left us His Word, which contains such a beautiful and complete picture of Him, that we can vividly see Him before us, and hear His very voice whenever we read it. Let us seek to make a continual study of that Word, so that we may know more about Jesus, and become more like Him. The little models of Diana spread abroad her reputation, made people to know her glory in distant lands who never saw her statue at Ephesus. And so each of us may be a model, with the image and superscription of Jesus so beautifully engraved upon us, in our gentle and holy, in our loving and useful life, that all who behold us may admire Him, and be drawn to love and serve Him. We may be living epistles of Christ, known and read of all men; and thus we may be ourselves—each of us—the image of God that came down from heaven, and that by-and-bye will go back to heaven.

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

INTERNATIONAL SERIES.

JANUARY 19.—THE SONG OF ZACHARIAS.

To read—St. Luke i. 67—79. Golden Text, verse 76.

NTRODUCTION. Teacher must briefly question on the circumstances. Lesson two Sundays back told of angels announcing to Zacharias the birth, name, office, and character of his son. Also that he himself should be dumb till the child's birth, because of his unbelief. Nearly a year had passed; Elisabeth had received a visit from her cousin, the Virgin Mary, and heard of her expected child—the promised Saviour. Now at last Elisabeth's babe is born. Eight days pass. Time for the boy to be circumcised. Picture the scene:—

(c) Elisabeth insists on his being called John.

(g) At once his tongue is loosed—he speaks, and praises God.

I. THANKSGIVING FOR EXPECTED COMING OF CHRIST. (68—75.)

Who is to be praised? The God of Israel, His chosen people. Why is He to be praised? Because—

(a) He has visited or "come to see" His people. How?

By an angel to Zacharias and the Virgin Mary;

By His prophet John—just born;

By His Son Jesus—soon expected.

(b) He has redeemed His people—i.e., saved them from their enemies (verse 71). Seen with the prophet's eye as if already done.

(c) He has raised up a horn of salvation—i.e., a Saviour ready to give blessings as it were from a horn full of wine and oil.

All this has been done as was promised to the fathers of old—nay, more, confirmed with an oath.

The result of it will be to serve God fully in two ways:—

II. PROPHECY OF ST. JOHN'S MISSION. (76, 77.) Zacharias addresses his own son.

What is he to be? A prophet with a sacred mission.

He is to "go before" Christ, as heralds announce a king.

He is to prepare the way for Christ—by preaching repentance.

Sin confessed and forsaken prepares for Saviour's forgiveness.

Then Zacharias passes on to speak of Christ.

III. PROPHECY OF CHRIST'S MISSION. (78, 79.) Christ is like a day-star. How?

(c) He came to guide to peace and holiness.

LESSONS. From Zacharias—1. To use speech for the praise of God.

2. To obey God's will implicitly.

From his hymn of prophecy—1. The blessings of salvation.

2. The honour of telling the tidings of a Saviour.

Can we do nothing?

JANUARY 26.—JOY OVER THE CHILD JESUS.

To read—St. Luke ii. 8—20. Golden Text—ver. 14.

INTRODUCTION. Zacharias' prophecy has come true—Christ is born. Now the news must be told. Who shall hear it first?

I. THE SHEPHERDS HEAR. (8—14.) Shepherds in the fields near Bethlehem. What are they doing? Perhaps—

(c) Guarding their flocks against wolves, etc.

What do they see?—(a) An angel's form.

No wonder they felt afraid.

What do they hear? Notice the message—

(c) A sign by which to know the child.

(e) Glory to God, peace on earth.

II. THE SHEPHERDS SEE. (15, 16.) They talk it over. They will start for Bethlehem at once—they will see for themselves. What do they see when they arrive?

(c) The babe lying in a manger.

Yet they, taught by the angels, see more than that. They see in this helpless babe the Saviour of the world, God's Son come down to earth. They have been told it means pardon for man's sin—peace between God and man. Doubtless they fall down and worship.

III. THE SHEPHERDS TELL. (17—20.) They must not keep the good news to themselves—it was for all mankind. So they hasten to make it known. Notice the different ways in which the news was received :—

(c) The shepherds praised God.

Lessons. What does the birth of Christ teach us ?—

1. Joy for the good news. Christ born a Prince and Saviour to us.

2. Praise to God who has thus "visited and redeemed His people."

3. Missions. The news must be told. Men, money, books, prayer all needed in missionary work. What are we doing ?

February 2.—Jesus brought into the Temple.

To read—St. Luke ii. 25—35. Golden Text—ver. 32.

Introduction. Christ is now forty days old. He has been circumcised when eight days old, and received the name Jesus, or Saviour (ver. 21). Now two things take place according to the Jewish law : viz.—

(b) The child is presented to the Lord in the Temple. (See Lev. xii. 2—6.) It is in connection with this that to-day's story occurs.

I. Simeon's Desire. (25, 26.) Know very little indeed about Simeon. Still we can gather some interesting facts.

(b) He was devout—i.e., attended to his religious duties. This would include daily attendance at the Temple.

(c) He was just—i.e., doing his duty to men.

(d) He was well read in the Scriptures, for he knew all about the consolation promised to Israel. (Is. xl. 1.)

(f) He longed to see Jesus — the promised Saviour.

II. Simeon's Prayer. (27—32.) What had the Spirit told him ? And to-day the Spirit bids him go to the Temple, for his desire shall be granted. Can picture him advancing to meet the little group—the humble peasant mother with two turtle-doves ; also the babe and Joseph. He takes the child gently in his arms, and praises God that he has lived to see this day. What does the coming of Christ mean ?

(c) To the Gentiles in darkness of heathenism—light.

(d) To Israel long looking for Messiah—glory.

III. Simeon's Prophecy after first giving his blessing.

Fulfilled by destruction of Jerusalem thirty years after His crucifixion.

Fulfilled when preaching of salvation caused three thousand to be converted in one day. (Acts ii. 41.)

(c) Christ shall be spoken against.

Fulfilled when Apostles forbidden to teach in His name. (Acts v. 28.)

Fulfilled when she witnessed the Crucifixion. (St. John xix. 25.)

Lessons. Notice about Simeon—

1. His faith—was rewarded by sight.

2. His prayer—was heard and answered.

3. His prophecy—was fulfilled.

So shall it be with all—in God's good time.

February 9.—The Childhood and Youth of Jesus.

To read—St. Luke ii. 40—52. Golden Text—ver. 32.

Introduction. Very few things told of infancy of Christ. What are they?—

His birth in cave at Bethlehem.

His circumcision at eight days old.

His presentation in the Temple.

His persecution by King Herod.

His receiving visit of the wise men.

Nothing more told till He was twelve years old.

Probably lived quietly at Nazareth with Joseph and Mary.

Probably, also, had companionship of John the Baptist, his cousin, after the death of his aged parents.

To-day's lesson tells of the only recorded event of His boyhood.

I. The Visit to Jerusalem. (40—45.) Notice these incidents—

(a) The occasion—to keep feast of Passover. (Exod. xii.)

(c) The cause—Christ, though so young, being strong and tall in body; mind remarkably developed; soul full of God's grace.

(g) The search—His parents not missed Him at first; then looked amongst friends; then returned to Jerusalem.

II. The Finding in the Temple. (46—50.) Seem to have searched all other places first. How little, after twelve years, they knew Him! At last, found Him in the Temple, probably in one of the Scribes' rooms, sitting in the midst of the learned Rabbis. What was He doing?

No wonder all were astonished at His intelligence.

What did His mother say?—"Thy father and I have sought Thee."

But Joseph was only His adopted father. So Christ tells them that He must be occupied about His own Father's concerns. But they knew not what He meant.

III. THE HOME AT NAZARETH. (51, 52.) Christ now returned home to Nazareth; nothing more told of Him for eighteen years. But these verses give a little insight into that peaceful home—

Joseph the carpenter working at his trade.

Mary musing daily over the wonderful prophecies about her son.

Jesus growing daily stronger in body, wisdom, and grace.

LESSONS. 1. Love for God's house—Christ was glad to go. (Ps. cxxii. 1.)

2. Love for God's Word—Christ anxious to learn.

3. Submission to parents—Christ stayed at home, working for Joseph, obeying parents till thirty years old.

A DIVIDED DUTY.

A STORY IN ONE CHAPTER, BY THE AUTHOR OF "PAIN AND GAIN," "THE CHRIST-CHILD'S GIFT," ETC. ETC.

SHE was walking through the dull suburban streets which led to her home, with such an intensely bright and happy face that the few people she passed smiled involuntarily as they looked at her, and then went on their way feeling somewhat the richer for that momentary glimpse of such a piece of embodied sunshine.

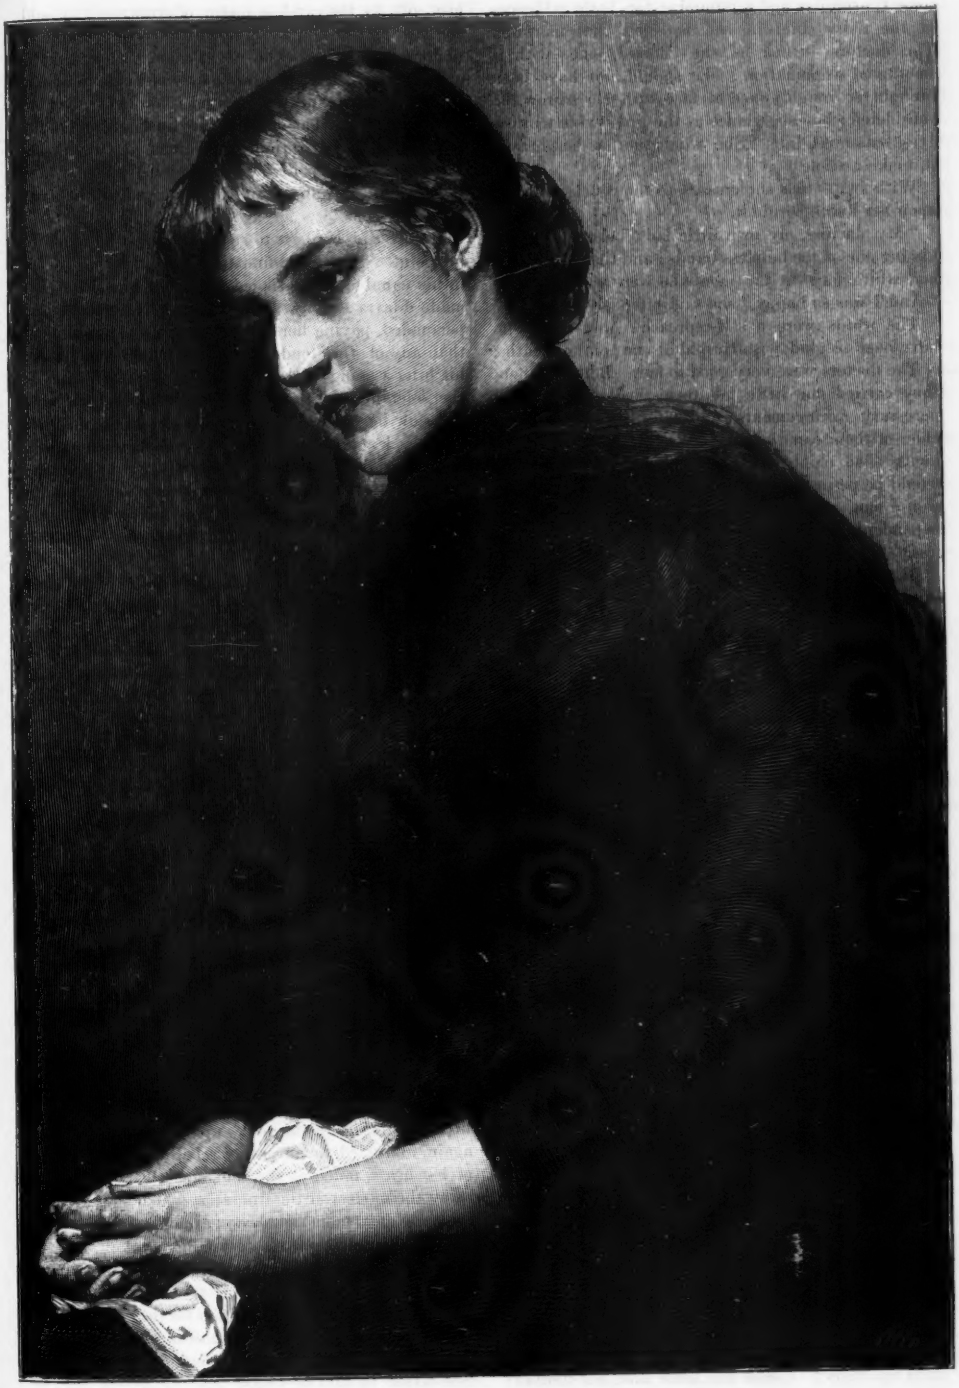
There was no special beauty about her. She was just an ordinary fair-haired girl, with rounded rosy cheeks and grey eyes, which even the laughter lying in them at present could not wholly rob of their usual gentle steadfastness; but her great happiness was transforming her this summer evening, and more critical eyes than those of the neighbouring children, who knew so well the figure of the little grey-clad governess as she passed to and from her daily work, glanced after her with amused approval.

And had she not every right to feel happy? she was asking herself; for this day week would see her wedding-day with Horace Greeley; and was not Horace the dearest, and best, and—— The whole gamut of love phrases having danced through the girl's brain, Flavia began thinking more seriously of all that had led up to the present position, and recalled one by one the different events. First, there had been her father's death, two years before, which had flung upon her young eighteen-year-old shoulders the necessity of providing not merely for herself, but for her little brother, who was ten years her junior; for they were doubly orphaned now, their mother having died at Harold's birth. It had been a hard struggle at first, though everyone told her she had been exceptionally lucky in obtaining pupils as rapidly as she did; but time had eased her burden, and she was actually able to lay by a little money against the inevitable time when Harold must go to school.

Then she had met Horace, who was the brother of one of her employers. He was a débonnaire impulsive young soldier, and as ardent in his wooing as in everything else, so his engagement to Flavia Strong followed very soon upon their first meeting. Then a hitch threatened, for his sister declared they would both be reckless unless they waited for his captaincy; but as matters turned out—"Fortune has been in my favour ever since I was born," said Horace Greeley, with his gay irresistible laugh—he gained his step almost immediately, and preparations for the marriage were hurried on. These were still in progress when the 116th received marching orders for Malta, and Flavia's heart sank within her; but her impetuous young lover laughed at her doubts. Harold must go off to boarding-school directly, he decided. The boy would be more contented there with other lads of his age than he had ever been moping in London lodgings with his sister, and Flavia must marry him at once, and come out to Malta too. And so it had all been arranged, and to-day the little governess had given her last lesson, and now was going homeward with a thankful heart and a radiant face.

As she neared her own door, she was amazed to see her landlady standing on the steps in a great state of distress, and with the tears flowing copiously down her kindly face.

"Oh, my dear young lady!" she sobbed. "They told me to break it to you. Oh, poor Master Harold! He's hurt, miss—he's hurt."



Flavia's own face blanched.

"He—he is dead?" she asked in a hoarse whisper; leaping to the worst conclusion, as women are apt to do.

"No, no," cried the landlady, "my dear, not that; but he was climbing in the garden, and fell and hurt his back. The doctors are with him now. He——"

But Flavia did not wait to hear more. She brushed hastily by her, and entered the little sitting-room.

Lying on the horsehair couch under the window, with his thin drawn face flung up towards the light, and with a couple of strangers bending over him, lay Harold, mercifully insensible. On the table were some tin soldiers and a humming-top, little evidences of the noisy child-life she had left that morning. The doctors turned as she entered, one with a smothered exclamation: she should not have been brought so roughly face to face with her sorrow, he considered; but one glance at the girl's wide tearless eyes reassured him. She would not, as he phrased it, make a scene.

"Leaning her head wearily back against the dull blank wall."—p. 204

With swift steps she crossed to the couch, and fell upon her knees beside it.

"My darling, my own little lad!" she whispered, kissing one of the helpless hands; and then she raised her white face to the men who were watching her. "And I was so happy," she said piteously.

The words were a self-reproach: how could she have been so glad, with Harold at the point of death?

The doctors were very good to her. Between them they carried the little lad to his bed, and made all necessary arrangements, and later in the day the elder of them came back and sat with the girl for an hour. The child would not die, he said, but he would be permanently crippled. Of absolute pain he would not suffer much, probably; but he would be dependent all his life, for his lower limbs were helpless.

As to the probable length of his life, no one could say that: it depended, of course, upon his constitution.

It was a pitiful enough meeting between the lovers upon the morrow, but the sadness of it was infinitely deeper for Flavia four days later, for it was then that Horace spoke again of their marriage.

"It must be on Monday, as was decided. I will not have it delayed," he said firmly; and then more tenderly, "I must have the right to look after my poor little girl."

Flavia glanced up at him in bewilderment. Sleepless nights were telling upon her, and she did not grasp his meaning.

"How can we," she asked wonderingly, "with Harold like this?"

"Listen, dear," returned the young man gravely: "we have had special surgeons besides the doctors you first called in, and we know all about the dear little fellow, and how it will be with him, don't we? We must marry as we fixed, and then I will leave you here until you have nursed him as well again as he will ever be, and then you must place him in some home, or under my sister's care more probably, and come out to join me."

"Horace!" The girl was startled. "Desert him? I couldn't."

"It is not desertion." The young man took her in his arms, and kissed her quivering lips. "He will be happy enough. But I must have my wife, Flavia. You have told me an engagement is not a light thing in your eyes: that it is a solemn betrothal; and I claim your promise now. Do you not love me?"

Did she not love him? Her whole heart went out in that whispered yes; but what of the crippled child up-stairs? Could she leave him, her mother's last gift, to the careless mercy of strangers? Could she bear to think of the weak little cripple crying at night for the sister who never came, or picture the childish heart-break should he ever be made to understand his helplessness was found a burden? But, on the other hand, what of her future husband, and of the promises he had a right to claim? It was a sore sorrow at best, this divided duty, and the tears which until now had refused to come burst forth in great labouring sobs.

Horace did his best to soothe her, but he stuck to his point. It was the first time he had been crossed in his equable self-satisfied life, and opposition but made Flavia doubly dear to him. He coaxed and persuaded, paying her perhaps a higher compliment than any of the tender speeches which had graced his brief wooing by harping upon the one string of the solemnity of their betrothal, which he declared he knew her to be too good a woman to break. He came back again that evening to repeat and emphasise his words, but Flavia had passed the intervening hours by Harold's side, and the memory of the faint pressure of the boy's tiny fingers was more potent than the strong actual touch of her lover's pleading hand.

She won her own way at last. She would stay with her brother, and pray for better times, and Horace must sail with the regiment.

"I would exchange and stay at home, but I have run it too close. I can't beg off now," he said to her, when all this had been arranged, and the last good-byes were being spoken; and then he added, with a half-smile, "I am fonder of you than I ever was before."

"And I prouder of you," Flavia whispered back. "It is good of you to have forgiven me, and not be hurt or angry at my decision."

"Who could be?" was the loving answer. "You are a good woman, you brave little Flavia: far too good for me. But our feelings won't change, dear, and when I am home again we 'll marry then, and be as happy as the summer's long, and the boy shall live with us."

So they parted.

The weeks dragged wearily by, and everything fell back into much of its old grooves. The patient tap of the slow-moving crutches had taken the place of the noisy jumping of stairs which had hitherto heralded Harold's approach, but otherwise there was little change. Flavia took up her daily teaching again, and tried to put away rebellious longings out of her heart, much as she had smoothed and folded away the modest little trousseau which should have replaced her more sombre garments. She failed sometimes, for Horace's sister had taken up the notion that her brother had been badly used about the matter, and so ignored the little household altogether, which made it harder for the girl. But on the whole she kept brave, and comforted herself, as she had told Horace, by praying for better times. She wrote to him regularly, and he to her, but he was always a bad correspondent, and at the end of six months Flavia had gathered little more of his doings than that he considered Malta a shocking hole; that there was generally a good deal of gaiety to be had; but that of course neither one fact nor the other could affect him, while his hours were spent in wanting Flavia.

At the end of that time the letters grew even shorter and more unsatisfactory, but Flavia did not notice the change, for her little brother had caught a chill, and the doctor had begun to look very grave. Since that accident, he explained, the child had not the strength with which in the old days he would have flung it off, and if Flavia were not careful he would fall into chronic invalidism now that the winter was fully upon them.

The doctor's words proved sadly prophetic, for very soon the crutches were laid on one side, and Harold was lifted from bed to couch, and back again to bed. It is no use dwelling upon that weary winter-time. Everyone has shared some such sorrow as was Flavia's now; everyone has watched the faint tinge of pink in white cheeks, and tried to cheat themselves into the belief it was a promise of returning health, when in their innermost heart they have known it was only the flush of fatigue or excitement.

It was merciful, doubtless, for her fast ebbing strength, and for the feeble money resources of the little household, that the patient vigil was not very protracted, but when his favourite flowers—the first spring daffodils—instead of gladdening the boy's eyes, served only as a wreath for the tiny coffin, his sister for the first time fully realised her own desolation. Life seemed over for her with Harold's death, and she was so benumbed that she let the mails go in and out unnoticed, and neither wrote to Horace nor noticed the lack of his letters to her. The kindly old doctor concerned himself in her affairs, and sent her away for change of air and scene, and so it was that when she again began taking an interest in the life and work around her, it was in a hospital near Colchester, where the black-robed nurses found her tasks for which she was equal, and talked cheerily of a brighter future in store for her when she should fully have regained her strength, and become one of themselves.

"You are so good to me," she said gratefully one day, "that I feel I am taking advantage of your kindness in staying here so long."

It was to the matron she spoke, and the good woman answered her briskly.

"Nonsense, child!" she said. "You are well worth your board, or we couldn't afford to keep you. You know we are hoping you will stay altogether, and make it your home. Unless, indeed," she added, with a quick glance at the girl's blushing face, "there is someone with a prior claim upon you."

"Yes, there is," said Flavia simply; and then, emboldened by the kind look in her new friend's eyes, she told her little love-story.

"The 116th, do you say?" the other repeated in amazement. "Why, the regiment is home again! It is stationed at Colchester."

"He is home again!" echoed Flavia blankly, and with the pretty blush dying out of her cheeks; and then she gave a little gasp as though she had lost her breath, and broke into a happy laugh. "Why, how you frightened me—just for the moment, you know! The doctor forbade me to write to Horace about my little brother, for he said the effort might throw me back again, and so perhaps he does not know where I am."

"H'm!" The matron sat silent, turning the matter over in her mind. "It was very foolish to come away without leaving him an address," she said at last.

"Oh, but I did," returned Flavia. "I sent it to his sister, but evidently she has not given it to him. She cannot, or he would have come here as soon as he landed. You don't know Horace."

Well, they talked it over, these two, and then Flavia was counselled not to go into Colchester, as she had at first intended, but to write to Captain Greeley.

"You had better explain everything, my dear, and ask him to come to you at the hospital," advised her friend; but when the letter was written, it contained but a very few lines:—

"I am here, dear Horace, with friends. Will you not come to me? I am longing for you.

"Flavia."

The next morning—she had had no time to hear from Horace, but she knew he would come that very next morning—she busied herself in making the bare little sitting-room, into which he would be shown, bright with spring flowers. Horace liked the room to look pretty; and besides, it had been spring-time when they were first engaged, and hid in every blossom, as the girl arranged them with loving eager hands, there seemed to be lurking some year-old memory. The violet clusters, the starry primroses, the wedding jonquils—their fragrance was very eloquent to her; and when she took a sprig of snowy narcissus and fastened it at the throat of her sombre gown, it was with a remembrance of what had been his earliest gift. She had gone herself to make these little purchases, and though she had taken off her hat and smoothed her fair hair, she was still in outdoor dress and lingering over her flowers, when a tap came at the room door. With a beating heart Flavia went to open it, the narcissus at her throat falling unheeded to the floor as she did so; but instead of it being Horace, as she had half expected, there stood a little maid with a letter, which had just been brought up, she said, by hand. With a muttered word of thanks, Flavia caught it from her, and carried it back into the room. It was from Horace.

It was a long letter, and, standing by the window, she snatched the meaning of the long, laboured sentences rather than read them.

He had been amazed to hear from her; he had never expected to hear from her again. When she had cared so little for him as to prefer Harold to him, after she had gone away without consulting him—surely that pointed to an utter lack of affection. And now, when he had conquered his own feelings so far as to be attached to someone else—his colonel's daughter, to wit—now she wrote to him! It would not be fair to his future wife to see her, Flavia, again, but so far from reproaching her, as another man might do, he begged her to believe he had every wish for her happiness. And so he remained, etc., etc.

This, shorn of its wordy clothing, was the gist of the letter, and Flavia moved away from the window mechanically, and as if the sunlight hurt her, and let herself drop into a chair, leaning her head wearily against the dull blank wall. So this was what had come to her instead of the gay brilliant presence on which she had counted so surely! She looked round at her flowers, and the thought crossed her mind that they looked faded somewhat since she had last touched them, and much as the golden daffodils had looked lying upon her brother's grave. Her eyes grew misty once or twice, but she wiped the tears quietly away, and still sat on, thinking—thinking. And it was thus the matron found her, and straightway took her in her motherly arms, as if she had been a little child.

"Cry, my dear, cry. It will do you good," she said, petting and fondling her, and giving her ready sympathy without any questioning of how the matter stood, as only a good woman can; and then, as the girl still kept her unnatural composure, she tried more cheery comfort. "You must stay here, and be my right hand. You can be with us now."

And then at last the girl found her voice.

"I used to think it hard because I saw a divided duty before me," she said pathetically; "but it seems almost harder now there is not."

So she stayed, and the time passed on, and though she fancied at first—being still so young—that life would never be the same, in due time the laughter came back to her lips and to her eyes. The blessedness of her bygone prayers came to her now, for she learned that if one prays very hard for a thing (as she had prayed about her future with Horace), even though one loses it, all the sting is taken away from the loss, and so, in some strange unexpected way the grace, if not the wish, of the prayer, is granted after all. She grew fond of her work, and found her life's happiness in it, until those so-called poets who are fond of moaning of eternal misery, and the like, would have picked a quarrel with her bright contented face. But the poor sufferers in the hospital beds were not likely to complain upon that score. Her cheeriness was better than any medicine, they said, and the even and unruffled happiness which must surely have been her portion—for what outside worry could have touched this soft-voiced nurse?—did not prevent her being very sympathetic to any of their whispered hopes and fears. For though she was always sunny, she was always gentle too.

THE LADY-HELP: FROM A NEW POINT OF VIEW.

THE question as to the advisability of ladies going out into the world as lady-helps has been discussed over and over again. Many who are unfitted by lack of education to take a post of governess, and who have no marked capability for any special line of work, are thus able to try and earn money by honest labour. Whether, practically, the plan fails or succeeds lies with the individual or her employer, as the case may be, and it is not with this that the present paper has anything to do.

I wish here to offer a few suggestions as to the necessity that exists for ladies, in many cases, being lady-helps, and that in their own homes. The need of them is very obvious. In many families where the staff of servants is small, and the class of servants employed is by no means the highest, the whole household suffers by gradually acting on the principle of "letting things go."

To over-work servants is decidedly wrong. They have their rights as well as their employers, and their need of rest, recreation, fresh air, and sufficient time in which to take their meals, read, write, or do needlework for themselves, and obtain a proper quantum of sleep, should always be considered in a well-arranged household. But to do this necessitates one or other of the following results: either, as I have just said, things are allowed to be "let go," or else the ladies of the house must do some of the work themselves; it being a sheer impossibility that the servant or servants can accomplish all that is needful in the way of keeping the home in order.

In a house where the hugger-mugger arrangement reigns, the hall is usually untidy, and if there are children in the family their existence is betrayed in the way of toys, books, and various things belonging to them, lying about. In the drawing-room there is a general aspect of disorder, and you note that though the furniture itself is pretty, no care is taken of it, and the chair-backs, table-covers, curtains, etc., need renewing, mending, or being sent to the laundry. The pictures and various knick-knacks on walls and tables are not very clean, and the old china would be all the better for careful washing. The handsome brass fender and fire-irons are very dull, and the tiled hearth is blurred and dim.

The books in the shelves are badly arranged, and what the French call jardinage du salon is evidently neglected, for though individually there are many pretty things, their effect is lost by bad arrangement, or no arrangement at all. The flowers, too, are not as fresh as they might be, and sometimes the bouquet, owing to having stood for some time in the same water, is anything but fragrant.

The dining-room has the same ill-kept cachet upon it, and the meals are in keeping. Nice things are liked and ordered, but there is not time to cook them properly even if the servant has the necessary knowledge. The plate is innocent of having made recent acquaintance with chamois leather and plate powder, and the glass and cutlery are not in the state of brilliancy desirable. Careless folding of the cloth shows needless creases, and the illumination of the whole is more than fashionably dim, because of the dusty glasses round the gas-burners, or untrimmed lamps with smeared chimneys and globes.

In the bed-rooms the same want of care is noticeable, for the quilts want mending and the pillow-slips are one or two buttons short, and you feel sure, could you turn down the beds, that unmended linen would repay your curiosity.

HELPING IN THE KITCHEN.

And so on through the house.

Now, if the ladies of the house were to do some of the work, all of this would be obviated. When I use the word "lady," I do not mean necessarily a grown-up person, as sometimes quite young children can be trained to employ spare hours in making themselves useful.

But whatever the age may be, there is the work if you choose to do it; only, as I write, the various excuses likely to be made come before me.

It seems strange that it should be so, but many are under the impression that idleness is ladylike, and the converse, work—or rather, manual labour—is unladylike. These people would far rather have their houses as I have briefly described than do any work in them themselves: to do crewel-work, paint, draw, play the piano, being very much more agreeable occupations than dusting, making beds, or mixing a pudding. Granted the agreeability, but query—which is more in accordance with the refinement and beauty that is associated with the surroundings of a lady: the hugger-mugger house, or the house that is pretty and cleanly in all its details, because all who can, lend a hand in thus keeping it?

Another curious excuse is often practically made by the fact that many a girl who will do nothing at home to help her mother or the servants, will be only too charmed to do the roughest work if she may wear a peculiar garb while employed about it. For a "Sister" or a "Deaconess" or an "Associate" to scrub floors, clean brasses, wash tiles, and do menial work generally has to many a charm of its own—provided it is not done at home. A girl who is sighing to be allowed to go as probationer to a hospital, where she knows hard and coarse work would be her daily task—particularly if she cannot afford to go as lady pupil—thinks it a hardship if expected to make her bed, or keep her own room in order as far even as only dusting goes.

But the beautiful charity which should never end in one's immediate surroundings should begin at home. En passant, too, I would remark that a girl who at home is accustomed to turn her hand to useful occupations, who knows how to do house-work, can cook fairly well, can darn—not botch—the house-linen, who loves order and does her share of seeing its reign asserted in the home, will make a far more useful nurse or worker in whatever special sphere future circumstances may find her, as well as a more capable head of a house, should that be her lot. Even should she marry a rich man, to know how things ought to be done by her many servants will strengthen her power over them.

Judging of the matter fairly, it is reasonable to admit with truth that "union is strength," and that many of the rough experiences of a nurse or worker are considerably smoothed by the fact that she is one of many, and others round her are all doing the same thing.

Cannot this strength also be brought into home life? Would it not be possible to make unpleasant duties agreeable, to go cheerily to work at commonplace and menial tasks, if all in the house tried to take a share?

It may be easier too—granted that it is—to rise at the sound of a bell that is ringing up many a fellow-worker than for a girl to get up early so as to secure time to do some little things about the house. But if she brings her will to bear upon it she can do it perfectly.

With reference to what can be done in the house, I do not pretend to give an exhaustive list of items. No hard and fast line can be drawn.

But as mere outlines I would enumerate the following:—

Cooking. — A couple of hours spent in the kitchen every morning would be of immense help to a servant, provided that the help was a bonâ fide one. For a girl to expect the servant to be at her beck and call, to beat up the eggs for her, to dredge the board, and to wash up everything she has used, is often adding to trouble. Unless it is scullery work, try as far as possible to wash up all that you use in your cooking, and leave the servant free to go to other things. Cooking can be self-taught, and if you use your wits and the many excellent recipes to be easily obtained, you will be able to make many a little delicacy for your table. Some people cannot cook, or dust, or do anything without making themselves untidy, which is quite needless. A large apron with a bib tied round you, and cotton sleeves to draw over your own, if the latter will not roll up, will keep your dress from being soiled; and for dusting, you can tie a handkerchief over your head.

Great assistance can be given in a house if one member undertakes to wash up after one or two meals. This is not by any means such unpleasant work as it sounds.

Have plenty of water, and wash all clean things first, greasy last; the latter in hotter water than is necessary for the former. Have a second large bowl full of clean cold water to pass them into before wiping dry. For glasses, put a little blue in the water.

Cleaning the plate on one or two days in the week is another suggestion.

A MORNING TASK.

Making the beds is good exercise for young people, and if the beds are large two can make them better. If only one person does them, a long walking-stick to smooth the sheets makes the work easier. Even to make the beds with a servant helps her and saves time.

The dusting of any room is light occupation and easily done. Cleaning of lamps is not so agreeable, but most work that soils the hands very much can be done in gloves. Hands, however, can be washed, and the process does not detract from their beauty, unless any very constant and rough work has preceded it.

The flowers of a house should be cared for, not by servants, and the water renewed; and even if your servant does the general cleaning and dusting, the arrangement of the drawing-room can be done by the home lady-help generally more efficiently.

The very idea that a lady is less a gentlewoman because she works in her own home is so ludicrous, that it seems needless to combat it. No one with any sense nowadays thinks it beneath the dignity of a lady to become a nurse, or identify herself with the work of some community. Why then, as I have said before, should she shrink from doing at home duties often less hard than those which would be her delight were she to be working in the above-named ways? And, even if her ambition does not soar to any definite post in the world's work, can she not look at home, and see if there is not duty waiting for her there?

One word I would in concluding say. That is, whatever you do elect to do in the house, do it regularly and punctually. Fervour has been described by a great saint as being "punctuality, regularity, and exactness."

The old poet tells us—

> "Who sweeps a room as for Thy laws, > Makes that and the action fine."

And one who wrote many ages before he did, tells us that all can be done "to the glory of God." So that fervour can rightly be expressive of the spirit in which many a humble duty can be accomplished by the lady-help at home.

THE BONDWOMAN AND HER SON.

BY THE REV. CANON MONEY, M.A.

(Genesis xxi. 10.)

BOTH the Word of God and the works of God are calculated to humble man. The contemplation of His creative skill and energy must, in a prepared and enlightened mind, lead to a deeper consciousness of man's ignorance and weakness. The higher the genius of the philosopher enables him to soar, the more profound will be his acknowledgment that he knows comparatively little; and the deeper the student dives into the mysteries of creation in its minutest forms, the more ready will he be to confess that he is but on the threshold of more wonderful mysteries still. In the relationship of the Creator's Word and work there will be difficulties arising necessarily out of the marvellous character of each. To trace this relation and unfold this connection must ever be one of the highest and dearest aims of the Christian philosopher. In our day attempts are constantly made to exhibit a divergence between the two. I have no belief in the success of these attempts. One element of successful study is entirely wanting, and that is the guidance which God Himself has declared to be necessary in order that we may comprehend His Word.

It must be obvious to the candid inquirer that there is much in the doctrines, histories, and characters placed before us in the Bible which is perplexing and humbling; much that is intended to humble; much that should lead the earnest student to say, "I need both a guide and a light." Not only are we taught the corruption of everyone of Adam's seed by distinct assertion, but we are shown it also in the acts of living men. We are shown it, moreover, not merely in the lives of wicked men who brought a flood of water upon the earth, and a stream of fire upon Sodom, but we are shown it in the lives of men of God, who are esteemed by Him as friends and reckoned as righteous. Now this is, I know, a great stumbling-block to many, to all who think that human nature can recover itself, that circumstances form the man and mould the character, that a man turning from evil is just a man coming to himself. To all such the characters of Abraham, Jacob, and David, and the language of St. Paul, are mysterious and perplexing. On the other hand, the more we receive instruction as a little child, the nearer we draw to God, the more shall we feel the plague of our own hearts, acknowledge the unworthiness of our best services, and thank God who hath not only revealed to us the sinfulness of every creature, but has also manifested His tender compassion and long-suffering in reclaiming the back-slider, and carrying on by instruction and discipline the healing process in man's soul.

We are told that Abraham sinned and was reproved. We believe, also, that he repented sincerely, deeply. We are assured that he received a pardon, which he could not have deserved, for a sin which he could not have extenuated. "Godly sorrow worketh repentance not to be repented of."

The time has now come for the fulfilling of God's promise—a promise of the deepest importance and significance to each one of us. Upon no event—not even the Fall and the Incarnation—did the salvation of man more remarkably turn than upon the birth of Isaac. To Abraham himself it was a most wonderful and joyous event. Upon the day that Isaac was weaned, Abraham made a great feast. If Isaac was three years old, Ishmael must have been about seventeen. The birth of Isaac was a death-blow to Ishmael's fondest expectations, and the effect is described:—"And Sarah saw the son of Hagar the Egyptian, which she had borne unto Abraham, mocking. Wherefore she said unto Abraham, Cast out this bondwoman and her son: for the son of this bondwoman shall not be heir with my son, even with Isaac." At first sight the conduct of Sarah appears vindictive and hasty, but when we consider the whole transaction, and the light which Scripture throws upon it, we must believe that if the feelings of a mother had been aroused, there were also other and higher motives influencing her, as she realised the full meaning of God's promise, and that he "who was of the bondwoman was born after the flesh, but he of the free woman was by promise."

From this we learn that Ishmael's mocking was a type of the opposition and hatred which shall always be manifested by the worldly towards the godly.

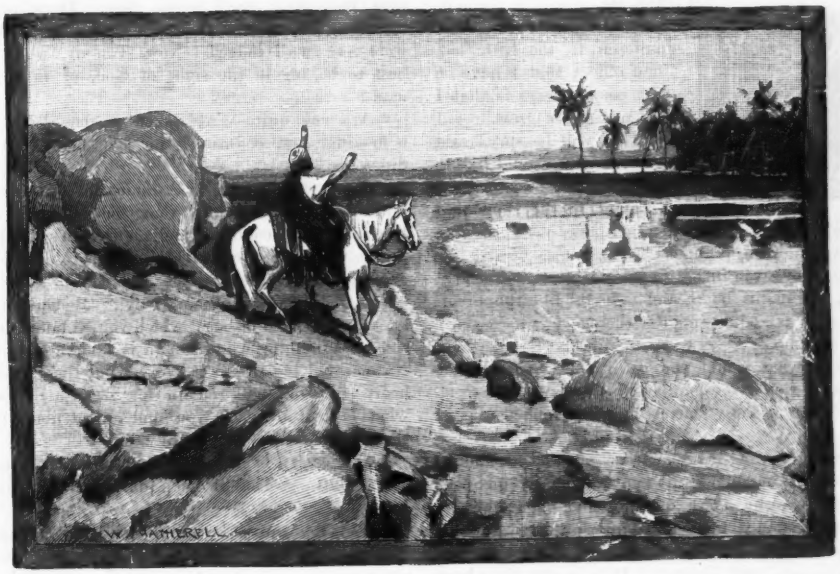
With regard to Sarah, we gather that she was really taking her stand with God in this controversy. She believed God—believed that Isaac was to inherit the promise; and if she saw any hesitation in Abraham, this would make her the more decided. We know what Abraham's desires had been, and if, as has been suggested, he wished to keep Ishmael in reserve, we can understand the unwonted strength of Sarah's remonstrance when she said, "Cast out this bondwoman and her son."

With regard to the act itself, we must remember that it was not unusual to make a separation between the heir and the other members of the family (chap. xxv. 5, 6). But Hagar and Ishmael should have waited on the borders of the place where Abraham was himself dwelling. The wilderness of Beersheba was close at hand. God Himself directs Abraham to send them forth in compliance with Sarah's wish, and at the same time renews His promise in regard to Ishmael—"And also of the son of the bondwoman will I make a nation; he is thy seed."

We have now a most touching account of the wandering mother and her fainting son. The provision with which Abraham supplied them, the bread and water, is soon gone, and the prospect darkens. Painters have transferred to their canvas this scene, but nothing can exceed the pathos of the simple narrative in this book. How Hagar came to lose her way; whether she was so full of the past and the home she had just quitted that she forgot Abraham's directions to remain within reach, or whether, stung by disappointment, she recklessly wandered she knew not whither, we cannot tell. But we can imagine the mother's agony, and her unwillingness to see her boy die, and how, placing him under a shrub—probably for shade—she withdrew, so that she might neither hear his groans nor see his death. "She sat over against him," where she could command a view of the spot without witnessing more than she could bear. All is now still. The hour of death draws near. Memory recalls the past—the little infant on her lap, the little boy standing at her knee, the beloved son growing in stature and intelligence. "Oh, I cannot part," cries the mother's heart, "from my child! He is all I have in the world. I have no home, no friend; and he who should have been my protector has cast me out. What shall I do if my child, my Ishmael dies?"

Who can describe the grief of an agonised soul? Poets may sing, and painters represent, but what can come up to the reality? Now, as three thousand years ago, the heart alone knows its own bitterness.

It appears that Ishmael also cried, and God had compassion upon him. An angel appears to Hagar and comforts her. She now sees a well of water, which in her trouble she had not perceived, and lifting up her fainting son, according to the direction of the angel, she holds the bottle to his mouth, and he drinks and revives.



In referring to these transactions, the Apostle Paul (Gal. iv. 24) calls them an allegory. The allegory begins with the birth of Isaac, and continues till the expulsion of Ishmael. The history was written—nay, the facts themselves occurred—to set forth certain truths. We have here (Gal. iv. 24—31) the interpretation. Ishmael and Isaac, Mount Sinai and Mount Zion, Jerusalem which now is and Jerusalem as it is above, are all contrasted. Two covenants and the parties to them are here represented. These covenants are the Law and the Gospel—the covenant of nature and the covenant of grace. With these, men are connected by birth, in the one case natural, and in the other spiritual. In the one case man is bound to render perfect obedience as the condition of his abiding in the house. If he fails in anything he is liable to be cast out at any moment. He is a servant, and bound to his master by the strict letter of the law. In the other case man is in the house by promise as a son, as Isaac was. He does not obtain his position or maintain it through his own works, but through the obedience of another, even Christ. This obedience is perfect, and there is no uncertainty about it. The believer in Jesus is in the house, not as bound, but as free. His service is perfect freedom. He thinks and speaks and acts as a son from hope, and without doubt or fear. He may fail in some duty, he may grieve through some fault his heavenly Father, he may sin, but never shall he be cast out from the home of his heart and the presence of his God.

My readers, I ask you what position you occupy, and in what relation do you stand to God? If you are not one with Christ by faith; if you are not taking up your cross and following Him with all your heart, preferring Him to all; if you are not born of the Spirit, and walking under His guidance, then are you not His sons, but servants, children of the bondwoman; thus are you under the Law, and bound to fulfil it or die. This obligation fetters your mind and enslaves your soul. The impossibility of keeping the whole Law in all its spiritual meaning and strict requirements must discourage and disable. The more a man tries the more will he fail; the more will he learn that by the deeds of the Law shall no flesh be justified. But if the Son has made you free, if the Spirit has introduced you into the Church of the first-born, whose names are written in Heaven, then need you have no fear that you will ever be cast out or cast away. Oh, how precious is this Sonship, how glorious is this liberty! "Behold, what manner of love the Father hath bestowed on us, that we should be called the sons of God." You may wander, but a Father's voice will call you back; you may fall, but a Father's arm will lift you up; you may forget that God is your Father, but He will not forget that you are His son. Oh, what a high and holy privilege is this! Brethren of Jesus, sons of God, heirs of glory, live in all the liberty and security of this relationship! Satan may desire to cast you out, but He who keepeth you and sanctifieth you is the God of Abraham and the God of Isaac, the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever.

A VISION OF PALMS.

BY META E. B. THORNE.

(Vide Prov. xiii. 12.)

"LOST! lost in the desert dreary!
Dying of thirst on its lonely sands!"
Crieth the traveller, wayworn, weary,
Lost on his way to fairer lands.
"Oh, for a glimpse of some brimming river!
Oh, for a draught from a cooling spring,
Only to quench this thirst and fever!
Then, methinks, I could rise and sing.

"Naught but rocks and sands all burning
Do I behold or east or west;
If north or south I gaze with yearning,
Still in vain is my eager quest.
Oft has a vision of snow-clad mountains,
Of silver rivers, and waving palms,
Of sunlit, shimmering, sparkling fountains
Lured me on with deceitful charms.

"Now, all spent, in the desert dying,
Thou and I, my faithful steed—
Hist! methought soft zephyrs, sighing
O'er purling streamlet and perfumed mead,
Brought to my ear the music pealing
From leaping waters and groves of palm—
Brought to me spicy odours, stealing
From flower-starred meadow and trees of balm.

"Hope lends me strength and clearer vision;
Now on the far horizon's rim,
Welcome as glimpse of realms Elysian,
Behold a palm-tree outlined dim.
Fainting steed, take heart, and bear me
Over a few more leagues of sand,
Where soft verdure again may cheer me,
And limpid waters, and breezes bland."

* * * * * *

"Stately palm, in your beauty standing,
Gazing afar o'er the desert drear,
Guiding the lost one, and commanding
Strength and hope for doubt and fear—
Guiding the pilgrim, fainting, dying,
Where sweet cool fountains refreshing spring—
In thy shadow the parching heat defying,
Thy praises with joy now my heart shall sing."

* * * * * *

Pilgrim across earth's desert dreary,
Panting, athirst 'mid its arid sand,
Fainting often, and sad and weary—
Lo, Hope cheers thee with beckoning hand!
Yonder she points to a shining river,
Laving Life's trees of fruitage fair.
Arise, faint heart! Thou mayst dwell for ever
In the Land immortal that 'waits thee there.

THE HEART OF THOMAS TITT; OR, THE BIG MAN AND THE BIGGER.

BY THE REV. P. B. POWER, M.A., AUTHOR OF "THE OILED FEATHER," ETC.

CHAPTER III.

"NOW then, Tommy," said Mrs. Jamieson to the little lad, "one object that I have in your coming here is that I may make you grow."

"That will be spry," said Tom Titt; "I should like to be as big—well, as big as the giant in the show that comes round every year at fair time."

"And how big is that?"

"Six feet seven inches in his stockings, and nearly seven feet in his boots, and I should like this hump to drop off; I don't suppose there ever was a giant with a hump."

"And what would you do if you were a giant, Tommy—would you go about in a caravan?"

"I'd marry Polly Dacres," quickly replied Master Tom.

Mrs. Jamieson was somewhat startled at finding her protégé so prematurely matrimonially inclined, especially as she had a horror of long engagements; so she questioned the boy as to what he wanted to marry Polly for.

"You see," said Tommy, "Polly is the girl whose brother was buried six months ago, and I was so sorry to see her crying at the funeral, and the other people crying too, that I cried as well; and, ever since then, Polly and I have been friends; she's always comforted me in my troubles, and I try to comfort her in hers Polly's full of comforts, and of being able to be comforted; so if I were a giant I'd make Polly giantess in two minutes."

"So, Tommy, 't is quite plain you'd like to be a very big man."

"As big as a house," Tommy replied quickly; for you see, good reader, the unbalanced human mind is given to rushing to extremes; and as Tom Titt was now abnormally small, so, if he had his own way, would he have immediately made himself abnormally big. Yes! he would then and there have shot upwards, and, if it were possible, downwards, and out at either side; so as to make the fortune of any caravan to which he might be attached.

"Now, Tommy, I want to tell you something that will surprise you. The really biggest men in the world are not always very tall, nor are they always very stout. Indeed, some of the greatest men the world has ever seen have been very small, but what made them great was that they had great minds; and people judged them by their minds, and not by their bodies. But some of these men's doings, though we call them very great and very wonderful, were very bad; so, though they were counted great amongst men, they were small before God. These people, according to the way in which He counts goodness, were very small indeed. Now, Tommy, which is it best to be, big in the sight of God, or in that of man?"

"Are you quite sure," asked the boy, "that God is looking, and counting? for that makes all the difference."

"Quite sure," said Mrs. Jamieson, "and you'll remember, please, Tommy, that God will go by-and-bye on His own counting, and not on man's; and that people will be big or small hereafter, according to His counting. Well, now, which would you rather be, big in God's way or in man's way? Remember that all man's bigness of body which you so much desire, comes to nothing when a man is laid in the grave. No one will see even the bones; but the bigness of heart and soul will remain for ever; and that is what I want to make you understand about; and that is how I want you to grow big."

"And can't I ever do anything with this hump?" asked Titt. "That'll keep me back always, I know."

"No, Titt, it won't keep you back. Strange to say, it may help you forward; but now, you think of it; and when you come here to-morrow, you say whether you'd like to be a big man in God's way, or whether you'll keep going on as you are."

That night that familiar of our youth called "Billy Winky" was long in visiting the eyelids of Thomas Titt; for Tommy's mind was working, and he had no intention of being put to bed at all. All the humiliations of his daily life came before him. They fell thickly upon him. They multiplied themselves in number and in size, until they were ogres in dreadfulness, and legion in multitude. The boy had never felt so "dished," and "diddled," and "done for," before; he had never felt so keenly the prospect of being "diddled" and "dished" and "done for" up to the very end of his days. Never did the gulf seem so wide and impassable between Polly and himself as now; if he could get out of all this in any way, that was the thing to do; and though he couldn't understand it all, still Mrs. Jamieson had been very good to him, and could only wish him well, so he would put himself unreservedly into her hands, and see what would come of it in the end.

When that aforementioned friend Billy Winky (Ah! we know now that he is a friend, though we then so often tried to fight him off, and thought of him as an enemy) at last shut up Tom Titt's eyes, the boy dreamt that Mrs. Jamieson planted him in a little china flower-pot; and that she watered him every day; and that the sun shone upon him; and that at last he grew into a flower. He did not grow tall, nor spread out very far, nor had he any light colours; moreover, he had a lot of green leaves that half hid some of the blossom; but this flower had a marvellous scent, and perfumed the whole garden in which it was. To look at the size of the little flower, and the distance at which its perfume could be perceived, one would have scarce believed that it could have penetrated so far. But what made this dream so noteworthy was, that people who came to see the flower and to smell it, all said that it was the Tomas Titticus Aromaticus—what the last word meant he didn't know, but the first two words sounded like his own name—not quite like, but like enough to make him think he and that flower must have some connection—more especially as he had seen Mrs. Jamieson plant him in that very pot. Now, as it turned out, this dream proved very helpful to Mrs. Jamieson in the task she had undertaken, and to Tom Titt himself in what he had been undertaken for. Fortunately he determined to tell it to his benefactress; and she, when she heard it, turned it, like a wise woman, to the best account.

"I dreamed," said Tommy, "that you planted me, and that I growed, and that I smelled beautiful, ever such a long way off, and that I had a big name; and that folk sniffed about and said, 'Oh how sweet!' and the bees sucked a lot of honey out of me; and the nosegay people put some of me in their bunches—and folk said I could be smelled lovely a mile off; and I dreamed, the best part of all, that Polly, she came, and picked a sprig off of me, and pins it in her dress, and then puts it in a book to keep, and she says, 'Oh, you be Mrs. Jamieson's flower; I'll ask her for you;' and you gives me to her, and she brings pot and all into her house; and everything in the place gets full of scent from me ever after for ever and ever——"

Mrs. Jamieson did not require any time for the interpretation of this remarkable vision. In it she saw her little protégé made the most of, far extending in moral influence, though not shooting up bodily towards the stars. She saw Tommy Titt a far-reaching influence for good—the hinder part of Tommy's dream she looked upon as just the bit when he was most coming to his waking senses, and therefore very likely to be coloured allegorically by his human wishes; so, while she laid the first part of his dream to heart, the second she quietly laid aside, as one in which she had not any particular concern.

"Yes, Tommy, I know the meaning of the dream, I'm sure I do—it means that if you mind all I tell you, and become what, with God's blessing, one like yourself can be made, you'll get as valuable to many as that flower, and your influence will reach as far. The real meaning of that flower is not the little pot, or its stem and leaves, but the distance off it could be smelt; and the real measure and size of you, Tom Titt, will not be your little body, and the little house in which you live—but the distance all round in which you can do good by example, or life, or deed—and who knows how far those may reach?"

Thus it came to pass that both teacher and pupil became inspired for their work; for Tommy took wonderfully to this idea as soon as his mind fairly grasped it; and when there is an inspiration in teacher and pupil, the lesson is sure to go on well.

By degrees, our friend Tommy learnt to correct his ideas of measurement, and to give up the thought of feet and inches; by degrees his attention began to fix itself upon what had to be measured—the inner, and not the outer man. There had been a time when Tommy thought that if only he had great big clothes, he would look as big as other people; and that opinion he stuck to for some time; though, trying to walk in his father's boots, he fell, and nearly broke his nose, and he half suffocated himself by getting into his father's coat; but now all this was gone; he had learnt the first great preliminary lesson—to start from where he was—to accept the position in which he was placed, and from it to try to rise to what is within its reach, to do the best with himself as he was and as he must be to the end.

The man who won't do and be as he ought as a labouring man, would not do or be what he ought one whit the more as a nobleman; he who won't as a curate would not as an archbishop. The Tom Titt who would not be what he might with a hump on his back, would not have done or been much if he had been as big as Goliath of Gath.

So, then, it was clearly understood between Mrs. Jamieson and her pupil, if we might call him such, that he was to learn how to be a "big man;" and that he should believe he could be a good man, even humpy as he was. And with that understanding Tommy's teacher made him see that he had a heart within him, and that that heart could grow big in love; and that he had a mind, and that that mind could plan and think big things, ever so far outside the little narrow circle of himself; and Tommy Titt passed away from measuring people by the yard, or foot, or inch, and from weighing them by the stone and pound, and thought of the power of influence, and how a man can be big, and very big, in that.

And as time wore on, he learnt to embody these ideas in himself. What good are ideas unless they are embodied? Bacon says that "the end of all knowledge is fruit," and that end Tommy Titt determined should be come to in himself.

Accordingly, Titt plucked up considerably. He no longer walked with his head slouched, making himself a greater object than he had been before; he no longer shuffled along, as though he had nowhere particular to go to, and were going there. When the mind gets into the body it is wonderful what it will do for it: and Titt's mind seemed to have got into his. There used to be a fishy hue about his eye, which now departed; and as time wore on, the people were astonished at the big notions with which he seemed possessed.

The great ideas implanted in the mind of Thomas were that "God's measure and man's were altogether different," and that "God's was the one to be aspired to;" that it was quite possible for people, very poor and ungifted in man's eyes, to become big and great in the true sense of the words big and great; that the means of doing so lay round about everyone in his own daily life; and that it was his own fault if he did not make use of them, and his own loss too. Moreover, the matter of influence was one on which Mrs. Jamieson indoctrinated Thomas with her own ideas; for she taught him how a man's words, or deeds, or character, may reach far away beyond himself, and the walls of his own house, and the place where he happens to live; so that, even though he knows it not now, he may really be living in Europe, Asia, Africa and America, and a few odd islands, such as Australasia and New Guinea, thrown in here and there (not generally counted in when the globe is cut up into quarters, but which are there nevertheless); "for," said Mr. Jamieson, "a man coming into this world, is like a stone thrown into the water, which makes ring after ring round it, each ring larger than the other, so that no one can tell exactly where they end."

All this fired the imagination of Mr. Thomas Titt, who hoped he himself might do or be something yet in the world; and, as time went on, he looked less and less over his shoulder at his hump, less and less thought of himself as a boy with a hump, and less and less felt inclined to shrink into a corner, and hide himself from everyone's eyes except, indeed, those of the little girl at the funeral of whose little brother he had cried; for having done which he narrowly escaped being tied up in his own pocket-handkerchief by that bad boy and being thrown into the river—just as women from the Sultan's seraglio are said to have been sewn up in bags, and thrown into the Bosphorus and drowned.

As time went on, and Mrs. Jamieson recovered the use of her injured limb, she saw that Tom got proper instruction at school, keeping him also in hand herself. For it was this good woman's habit not to drop people when she had once taken them up. Accordingly, Tom had got a capital education, such a one as would fit him to earn his bread without much mere bodily exertion; and when he had attained to all such school learning as was needed, he was bound apprentice to a chronometer-maker.

"'Hullo, one foot nothing! is that you?'"—p. 215.

"She told him . . . how she was in the world alone."—p. 214.

True, there was not a prospect of a great fortune in this business; but there was that of a fair competence; and with industry and economy he might make a capital, and set up for himself.

To carry out this scheme, our friend Thomas had to go to London, and so part from his good friend. This parting was of less consequence than the youth thought at the time; had he remained where he was, he could not have been much longer with his good friend, for very soon after he left she died; and one of her last acts was writing Tom a letter telling him that, now she had the other world in prospect, and now that she could price all earthly things with the light of eternity upon them, she felt more and more that every word she had said to him was true, and she hoped those words would live in him, and work in him when she had gone; and that he was to aim at being "big" and "great" in the true sense of those words; and not content himself with being miserable and small. This letter Tom Titt carried about with him always, in a pocket-book specially dedicated to it; his Bible was the first thing in the way of reading, and Mrs. Jamieson's letter was the next.

Tommy Titt passed well through his apprenticeship to chronometer-making. Accurate and steady workmen are required for this work; men who are dependable, and accurate, and steady; and dependable was Tom. Tom felt the responsibility of the work; and it was a pleasure to him that in some degree he was able in that particular line of business to carry out the ideas of his dear departed friend.

"You see," said Tom Titt to himself, "you have the lives and fortunes of many in your hands. Unless your chronometers are dependable, there is no knowing what wreckage they will lead to. You are no doubt at work here to-day, but to-morrow or next day, you—that is, your accuracy, and your care, and your skill—will be sailing over the wild waste of waters; you will be in Europe, Asia, Africa, and America; it may depend upon you, Thomas Titt, whether one of Her Majesty's ironclads goes to the bottom, or whether she still carries the flag that for a thousand years has braved the battle and the breeze. The ironclad's chronometer might be only Tom Titt in wheels, and spring, and case." And many a time the little man—for man he was now—used to stop and think, "I am not confined to this bench, I am all over the world;" and thus far professionally he used to feel himself somebody—that he had grown out, so to speak, all over the world; and, though no one thought of it, yet that really, even on board the Admiral's flag-ship, one of the most important people in command was Mr. Thomas Titt; for by his chronometer as well as by the sun itself they must go. And to carry the idea a little bit farther, might he not be said to be in some sense a partner even with that great luminary itself? for it was by what it and the chronometer said together, that compass and everything else went. Even the Admiral himself was under Tom Titt's command; and so, for the matter of that, were all the admirals and captains and men-of-war in Her Majesty's service.

Now and again our friend got a rub which, under other circumstances, might have made him sour. Some people, measuring him by inches, made but little of him; but Mr. Titt carried his own foot-rule about him in the person of Mrs. Jamieson's last letter, and so he would never take merely the world's opinion, and he would never allow himself to become soured. Mr. Titt wanted no one's clothes but his own; and those made to fit him exactly too; he did not want to shuffle about in anyone else's boots or shoes, or to sit down by the fireside in their slippers; the mind and the heart were the measure of the man, and he felt his enlarging, and his influence increasing, and his usefulness too; and all this was enough for him.

But talking of slippers before the fire would naturally lead our readers to think that all Mr. Titt's life was of the pleasantest character; and that, at any rate, a very appreciable part of it was spent in enjoying himself; but that was not the case—during the whole of his apprenticeship our little friend fared hard, and worked hard too.

Work, of course, he must have done, or he would not have been kept as apprentice at all—but hard fare—at least, as hard fare as he had, need not have been his lot.

It was his by choice, and on it he lived, and grew, and became big, after the fashion, according to his dead friend's teaching, of true bigness. The soul has its food as well as the body; and the lad's soul was fed; and like Daniel, and Shadrach, and Meshach, and Abednego, on the pulse and water, it looked fairer and clearer, and was fatter than that of many who had eaten of the king's meat.

Death had been abroad in Tom Titt's village, and amongst those it took away were Polly Dacres' father and mother, and Polly was left alone in the world. At least, Polly thought she was; which for the time, at any rate, had the same dismal effect. She had no one belonging to her; she did not belong to anyone—at least, so she thought; and that, as I have said, is for the time being almost, so far as misery goes, the same thing.

And that was all the more pitiful because, unless she had some friend to help her, her little prospects in life, which had seemed tolerably fair, must be blighted. Polly was the village schoolmistress's favourite pupil; and she herself aimed at being a schoolmistress some day. But now, there was not anyone to pay for her schooling or to support her; and there remained nothing but that she must go out to be a farm-servant, as so many others round her had done.

The schoolmistress would have willingly taken Polly Dacres into her own house, but she had her own aged father and mother to do something for; and so, with great grief of heart, she had to make up her mind to let Polly go.—"But I can keep you for a month," said Miss Docens; "who knows what may turn up in that time? Anyhow, you can be no worse off than you were before."

The news of Mr. and Mrs. Dacres' death was not very long before it reached Tom Titt. It came to him from two sources—from his own home, and from Polly herself.

Poor Polly had heart-hunger and heart-thirst; and now, in this season of death, these longed for their meat and drink. Miss Docens was excellent in her way. Educationally she was tip-top; but the verb "to weep" is one that shrinks from being conjugated, and the noun "tear" is one that somehow does not seem as if it had much to do with the English grammar, and as if it did not like to be declined.

The truth is, Polly wanted someone whose tears would mingle with her tears—"tear-feelings" if not "tear-drops"—tear-feelings which the eye could look, if not tear-facts which the eye could drop.

There was one who had wept with Polly in times gone by, and his tears still glistened cool and bright on her spirit, just as they had done the first day they were shed; and they never seemed to shine brighter than they did now.

These were the tears which little Tom Titt had shed by her young brother's grave, and which had passed into the secret chambers of her young heart. There they had lived ever since. They had never dried: they had something in them which made them keep ever fresh, and ever grow green in the herbage round them; and now that a mourning-time had come again, the girl felt that the one who had shed them was the one who would be best able to comfort her.

So she wrote a letter, and told him in it how her father and mother had departed, and how she was in the world alone; and how sure she was that he would feel for her as he had felt for her when her brother had died in years gone by.

The answer to that letter was Mr. Thomas Titt himself. He had asked for no holidays since he had been at the chronometer-maker's; on the contrary, he had worked on holidays when there was a press of business, and others were amusing themselves away; and now the master was glad to let him have the day or two he asked for.

What took Mr. Titt to the old village? It was not human love, as we too often speak of love, for he had no thought that Polly Dacres could ever wed the like of him. He must go through the world alone—at least, so far as matrimony was concerned, though no one less alone, as far as human-kind, and human sympathy, and human love were concerned. There was a big thought in Tom Titt's mind—big, but symmetrical—shaped by a love that had, and could have, no hopes for "self." He felt that he could comfort Polly; he felt that perhaps he might help her too, if she were indeed dependent; he—dwarf though he was, might take upon himself the burden of her young life, at any rate until she could do all that she needed for herself.

Hard pressed was Thomas Titt as these thoughts rose in his mind. Now did he want to shoot up into the giant as of yore; now did he want to tear off that encumbering hump; now to be this, and that—none of which he could ever be.

Ah, Tommy! these were growing pains; now you were shooting up; now you were being rounded off in symmetry; now was one of the epochs in your life; now was the tide in your affairs, which, taken at the flood, would lead you on to more than even you dreamed of yourself. And you came well through the time—you did, my little man; may many another do the same.

Instead of howling over his being so heavily handicapped for doing good, my little friend Tom girt up his loins, and prepared to be equal to the occasion. First of all, he would go down and see how the land lay with Mary Dacres; he would comfort her; he would, if need be, and as far as ever he could, help her; so down to Donnithorp he went.

Various were the receptions he got in his native village. Some rather rudely remarked to his face that they thought he had grown, his own people taking up the old howl that he never could expect to do much, and the wretched boy who had threatened to tie him up in his own pocket-handkerchief and throw the bundle into the river, leering at him from the door of a public-house, and saying, "Hallo, one foot nothing! is that you?"

But the main point is, what reception did he get from Mary Dacres? She had now grown well on to being a young woman in outer appearance; but Mr. Titt soon found that she had just the same heart as she had that day at the funeral, as a little girl.

Years must change faces, but years need not change hearts; and that tender heart was tender still.

And Mary was right in thinking that Tom was unchanged; he was bigger—he was, small as he was, more of a man—but the eyes were the same, only more earnest, more full of love; and something had come of extra sweetness in the smile; and he seemed very real, and purpose-full, and withal seemed even more full of sympathy than he had been on that memorable day when the little boy was laid, earth to earth, and ashes to ashes, in that sure and certain hope.

Tom Titt's big heart took the orphan girl into it, with all her troubles and sorrow, and all the perplexity of her affairs; and he offered her all he then had to offer her—his sympathy; but this was all she wanted. She asked neither silver nor gold, nor help of any kind; the world she would have to face, and she would face it; but she wanted to be fortified for it; she wanted to go out into it, not in weakness but in strength.

Tommy, you were a funny source to seek strength from. If I had not known so much about you as I do, I should never have gone to you; but you see, that would have been because I didn't know how big you were—how much you had in you; and, by consequence, how much could come out of you.

Well! you strengthened Mary Dacres. The way to strengthen people is to tell them whence true strength comes; and then to put yourself into the case—and who knows what will flow from a higher level through you? A very poor earthly frame may be a conduit-pipe of heaven.

Mary Dacres had much of Mr. Titt's time during the short time he was at home, but not all; he was closeted secretly with Miss Docens for fully an hour, without Mary's even knowing anything about it.

"Supposing," said Mr. Titt to that erudite lady, "I could find the means of paying for Mary Dacres' board with you until it is finished, and she could be put in the way of earning her own bread, at any rate, as a junior mistress—would you keep her with you, and look after her as though she belonged to you?"

"It is just the question of a little money, and nothing else," said the schoolmistress; "I am fond of her, and she is useful to me, and she might perhaps get a situation in this very school. I would take her for the bare cost of her food; if at the end of the month that is provided for, then I will be only too happy to keep her."

This interview took place on the last day of Mr. Titt's visit; and in the evening he left for London and for work again; not, however, before he had strengthened up a poor failing heart. Yes! he, the poor little fellow who had nearly come to an end in his own pocket-handkerchief, had taken a poor fainting heart and lifted it up. Heavy hearts are heavy weights. They are ill lifting. It would be easier to raise many a mountain than many a human heart; but Tom Titt did it—he was big, a big man for work like this, and though a shovelful of earth would have been a hard burden to him, he took that up which, when heavy, is heavier than a mountain, and lifted it, as the giants were fabled to have lifted the mountains of old. Mark you, it was not a matter of silver and gold—it is said by one of old, "Silver and gold have I none, but such as I have give I unto thee." Little silver and gold had Tom Titt; but such as he had, that he gave.

And what had this mite of a man? He had the sustaining power of sympathy. He had that which lifts up poor fainting hearts, and binds up poor wounded ones, and makes whole poor crushed ones, and puts strength into poor feeble ones to fight the battle of life, to journey along its weary road, to bear its burdens, and fulfil its mission, however little may be its sunlight by the way.

Yes, Titt—little Titt—Tom Titt, already, my little mite, were you bigger than big Mr. Augustus Roundabut Swellingford ever had been—ever will be; you were stronger—you were, as it were, lifting up and bearing in your arms a helpless fellow-creature over one of the hard passes of life; you were making possibilities for her; you were revolving in that little breast, hard by that hump, great thoughts; bigger, Augustus—ever so much bigger, Augustus—than the biggest that ever swelled in your puffed-out breast.

But why am I saying such big things about my little man Titt? Why, but because he had made an arrangement with Miss Docens, under the most solemn promises of secrecy on her part, that, should he be able to provide sufficiently for Mary Dacres' board and clothes, she would take her in until her school-days were ended, and she could get something better than mere farm work; or perhaps he could get it for her.

That settled, Mr. Titt returned to London with a mind somewhat lightened in one respect, but somewhat burdened in another. For the weight which Mr. Titt had taken off Mary Dacres' life he had added on to his own: if he were going to provide for her, the provision must come from somewhere. It had, so to speak, to come from his very flesh and blood.

A NEW YEAR'S PARABLE

FOR OLD AND YOUNG

EVERY year a busy stranger steps into the world. He is very young when the bells ring out their merry peal of welcome to greet his coming, but, like the rest of us, he grows older every day. Father Christmas is never half so busy as this new-comer. His shoulders bend beneath the weight of thousands of parcels which he brings for all his friends. As he pushes his way briskly through the eager crowd of boys and girls gathered to give him welcome, he leaves in the hands of each a book with nearly four hundred pages, and a pencil that makes very black marks.

One year I watched the scene with wondering interest, and lingered in the crowd of children whilst they opened the mysterious parcels which had been put into their hands. Each parcel contained the oddest book you ever saw: every page was a spotless white. The little owners did not learn this at once, for only one page would open at a time. But as they never found a single mark when they opened the book in the morning, they soon gathered that every leaf was like the first.

Almost the moment the books were opened, thousands of little fingers seemed as by some strange instinct to pull out the pencils and begin to write. Then indeed the scribes opened their eyes, and wondered if it was a dream. Beside the words, wonderful pictures appeared. No one knew where they came from. Some invisible artist was busily at work. His pictures were only miniatures, but so clear, so true to life that every child knew the faces there at a glance. They seemed like photographs, but they were splendidly coloured. Every boy's jacket, every girl's dress, was painted with wonderful skill. You might see tears running down some faces; others were lighted up with smiles. No touch that could add reality and vividness to their pictures seemed to have been forgotten. Everybody was compelled to say, "I never saw such a true portrait of myself before."

I looked over the shoulder of one little fellow. There stood the ugly words: "I got very angry this morning." The pencil almost wrote the words against the boy's will. They were very firm, very black, very forbidding. Then came the first picture. A child was spinning a top: a happier face no one need wish to see. "Hum, hum, hum!" went the top. The little spinner clapped his hands with glee. Suddenly the door opened. An elder brother ran into the room. "That 's mine!" he shouted, and cuffed the child smartly on the ear. Everything changed in a moment. The happy face was clouded with tears. The elder brother had such an ugly frown that he tried hard to rub out the unflattering portrait from his book. He washed it, but the colours would not run; he tried his father's india-rubber, but still the frowning face looked reproachfully upon him. At last he began to cry with vexation and regret. Then a voice whispered in his ear, "See what it is to be angry."

To deepen the impression on his mind, the invisible friend promised to show him other pictures like his own. A few moments later a pile of books exactly the same size and shape as his lay at his side. The words, "I got angry this morning," were written there also. But the pictures were so lifelike that he almost forgot the words. In one appeared a boy just in the act of throwing a big stone; his face wore a scowl which frightened you. The stone hit an old playfellow such a blow that he dropped with a cry of pain on the ground.

"You can turn over these pages," said the voice. As the boy did so, he recognised the lad who had been struck by the stone; he sat in a chair, propped up with pillows. His face was pale and a big bandage was round his head. "How it smarts," he kept saying, with a weary moan. For at least a dozen pages in succession there was the same picture. Below was a little drawing of a house door, where the playfellow who threw the stone stood asking how his friend was to-day. "I 'll never do such a wicked thing again," he said; "I have suffered more than Tom. Do you think he will ever forgive me?"

"Look at another book," said the voice. He lifted the first of the pile that stood at his side. This showed how a little girl had pushed her brother against the bars of the grate. A deep red scar was left, which it would take many a week to efface. In another book he watched two boys fighting. They were friends who had often played together. They belonged to the same Sunday-school, and were in the same little cricket club. Faces began to quiver and bleed; but neither of them would give way, because evil passions had crept into their hearts and would not be driven out.

"You may shut up the books," said the invisible Mentor. "Little people who yield to anger become passionate men and women; they lose character, friends—sometimes even life itself—because they did not learn to put bit and bridle on evil tempers when they were young."

Some of the books told of idle days, when opportunities were wasted. Retribution came by-and-bye. The girl who had never loved her music sat moping in company, while her friends were at the piano. She robbed many an evening of its charm through her carelessness in other days. One boy had never learned to write neatly or spell even simple words. Right dearly did he pay for his carelessness. Many a post was closed against him. No master durst trust his books in the hands of the idle boy.

The little journals, you remember, only opened a page at a time. Each night when the clocks were striking twelve, and the little scribes were fast asleep, the page covered with marks turned quickly over. A new leaf was ready when the children woke. It was interesting to watch the eagerness of some to look for a moment at yesterday's page. Boys who were ashamed of themselves got out their knives and worked hard to raise the leaf; but it was of no avail: it would not stir. "Don't try any more," said the voice which often spoke to the little writers; "no one can open the book." Then it asked what they would like to blot out. Many a tale of regret was poured into the ear of the unseen friend. Disobedience had left its sting of remorse, bad companions had prompted to foolish deeds. Prayer had been forgotten, duties left undone. To all who poured out their sorrows, words of courage and hope were spoken. God could pardon; God could strengthen. That very morning those young pilgrims were made ready for their day's march. They put themselves under the wings of the Almighty Friend.

That night, when the little folks were fast asleep, I saw the story of the day written in their books. Such pleasant pictures one never hoped to see. A praying lad knelt by his tiny bed. I knew him at once. He was one who had not prayed at all the day before. It was easy to tell that he would never forget again. A ladder stood at his side: it went far beyond my sight up into the blue sky. A shining angel came swiftly down it to walk that day beside the boy that prayed. When his playmates sorely tried the boy's temper, the angel spoke some word of love which stayed the angry blow. He never lost his temper, never spoke an unkind word. His lessons were learned well, his errands were done quickly. He was the happiest boy I saw that day, for "God was with him." Even whilst he slept, though still unseen, the Guardian Angel hovered near; for it is written, "He that keepeth thee shall not slumber." Life for him was fenced about by day and by night.

The book was filled with such pictures from beginning to end. The angel never left him. The boy became the joy of his home, the pride of all his friends. I watched him long, but at last lost sight of my little friend. Years passed. One day all the books he had written since the angel joined him were placed by my side. They formed the most wonderful biography I ever saw. Every step of the boy's life was painted on those pages. The good boy had become the earnest Christian man. On Sundays his happy home seemed to grow happier than on any day of the week. His children sat by his side in church, and went with him to their dearly loved Sabbath-school. They learned to tread in their father's steps. His grace was theirs; for they, too, loved to pray. All the week that good man went about like a benediction. Many who were growing weary in life's fight took heart again. The poor found in him a loving friend, the lost were sought and rescued. He had the joy of leading many to his Saviour.

On not a few of the pages which I turned that morning I saw him with a circle of eager listeners around, to whom he told how he first began to pray with all his heart. He was allowed to open the page in the well-worn old book that had the story of his boyhood. There everyone could see how the angel began to walk by his side. The happiness of his life dated from that hour when he found himself at the gate of heaven, and asked, as Jacob asked at Bethel, that God might be with him in the way he was to go.

Many a boy and girl who looked over my friend's shoulder began to live a new life from that very day. There is the same help, they said, for me. Years passed quickly away. One day I found a pile of books beside me, all of which opened at the hour when the good man had told his story. The angel's face was shining out of every page. Some of the little folk had become honoured servants of Christ. Others filled a smaller place in human eyes; but whether high or lowly, all were good. There were mothers there who taught their children the secret of their peace; fathers who toiled and prayed for the little ones. I caught a glimpse of one who had become a missionary in a village school of India; of another who spent her life carrying the story of Jesus to the women in the Zenanas, who, but for her labours, would never have heard of their blessed Saviour. Some were toiling hard from morning till night, but the smile on their faces showed that > "Some softening beams of love and prayer

> Had dawned on every cross and care."

You have long since found out the meaning of this child's parable. The stranger who stepped into the world was the New Year. The books he brought had a page for every day. You have one, and all you do is written there. Our little pencils make marks which no one can erase. Keep your book free from everything at which you would be ashamed to look by-and-bye. That is a hard task. It will keep you busy as long as you live; but if God help you, it can be done. The Arabs say that every morning when a man rises, the Spirit of God sits upon his right shoulder, the Spirit of Evil on his left. So soon as his eyes open he repeats a little sentence: "I seek refuge in God from Satan, accursed with stones." If it be possible, he sprinkles himself at the same time with water. If he failed to repeat his little formula he believes that the good Spirit would fly away and leave the evil one to put his stamp on that day of life. This is a superstitious fancy, but it may remind you of the Psalm: "My voice shalt Thou hear in the morning, O Lord; in the morning will I direct my prayer unto Thee, and will look up." That is the secret of victory: God's grace for every day's battle.

If there are already pages you cannot think of without pain, never rest till God blots their story out of His book in heaven, then those pages of your book will be sealed up, to trouble or condemn you no more for ever.

J. TELFORD, B.A.

THE CHILDREN'S NEW-YEAR HYMN.

WITH joyful hearts, this New Year's Day,
We come, with one accord,
And, bending at Thy footstool, pray
For Thy protection, Lord.

Thy gracious Presence, ever near,
Upon our path has shone,
And step by step, from year to year,
Has gently led us on.

Lord, that our lives may shine for Thee,
Enlightened from above,
In patience and humility,
In words and deeds of love!

Thus blessing others, we would try
This year to live anew
For Thee, and on Thy help rely
In all we speak or do.

WINGS OF THE MORNING.

BY C. DESPARD, AUTHOR OF "INTO A LARGER ROOM," "BY THE WATERS OF BABYLON," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER VIII.—A RUINED LIFE.

OUTSIDE the concert-room, in the dimly lighted space in front of the companion, Thekla and Lady Lucy were met by Grierson.

"What is it?" said Thekla, in an awed voice.

He took her hand, and drew it within his arm. "Don't be frightened," he said very gently; "poor Murchison is ill, and he has asked to see you for a moment. The doctor thinks that if his wish is gratified he may sleep, and sleep is just the one thing that may save him. Will you come?"

"Oh yes, yes! if you will go with me," said Thekla; but she trembled. Would he say any of the strange things he had said that morning; and if so, what would the others think?

There was no time to hesitate, however. Michael drew her on, and in another few moments she was standing by the long chair on the hurricane-deck, where Murchison had been laid. He was lying very still; his eyes closed, his lips slightly parted, his face wearing the spent expression of one who has suffered cruelly and long. He had been very ill that day. The fatigue and excitement of the athletic contest, far too great for him in his enfeebled state of health, and his passionate wrath when he saw or suspected that the man through whose perfidy he had been ruined, and one dear to him betrayed, was being forced upon his little friend Thekla, were together too much for him. The heart trouble which had ended his father's life seized upon him, and all day long he had been passing from one paroxysm of pain to another.

Thekla thought he was asleep; but when the rustle of her dress fell upon his ears, he opened his eyes, and, with a wan smile, held out his hand to her. "Thank you so much for coming up here to speak to me," he said. "It was selfish to ask you, I am afraid. You will miss some of the gaiety down below."

"I was very glad to come," said Thekla simply. "Does the music disturb you?"

"Oh no: now that the pain has gone nothing disturbs me. You can't think what bliss it is to be free from pain when it has been tearing at one for hours upon hours."

"The pain has gone. You will be better to-morrow," said Thekla.

"I may be; but I think not. That is why I sent for you. I wanted to see you once more, to thank you for all your goodness to me."

"Oh! but you mustn't," cried Thekla piteously. "I always liked to talk to you; and you will talk to us again—little Queen Mab and me—to-morrow, when you are better."

A smile flitted across the pallid lips, and the sad, sad eyes—oh! so haggard and worn, with a look in them that made Thekla tremble—rested lovingly upon her fair young face. "Ah!" he said, "there is nothing in the world that could give me greater pleasure now. You 'll look after poor old Prince, won't you? He will miss me. And—I was going to say something else—what was it?"

"You have said enough," Thekla murmured through her sobs. "To-morrow I will see you again."

He seemed scarcely to hear her words. He had turned from her, and was looking at Michael. "Yes," he said; "I remember. If you want a friend—I don't know that you will, but strange things happen—if you do, ask him to help you. Say you will"—for the rush of tears and a curious overmastering excitement prevented her from speaking.

"He is my friend," she managed to say at last, and looked up at Michael timidly. Her hand was still upon his arm; but it was so natural to her to depend upon him, that she had not, until this moment, been fully conscious of his support; and now, when his grave kind eyes met hers, her heart went out to him, with a confidence such as she had never felt before, even in her own father.

"Say no more," said Michael gently. "She understands you."

"Thank you," he whispered. "That does me good. I think I shall sleep now."

The sad eyes fell; but he lifted them once more to say, "You are sure it is true? I may look for Him in the great darkness?"

"I am sure," said Michael. "No one ever sought the Father of Spirits in vain—for His sake, the Son of the Father, the Brother of our humanity——"

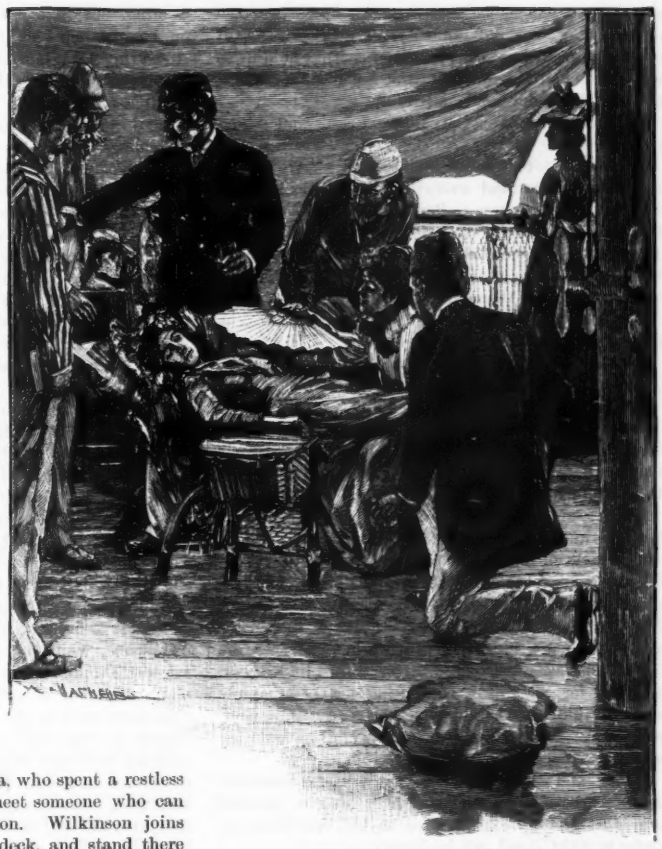
"Yes: you told me. I think I have known it a long time; but we forget. Ah! how strange everything is; the world—His world—separating us from Him!"

"Try not to think any more to-night," said Michael. "Sleep is what you want. I will take Miss Ellerslie down to Lady Lucy, and then the doctor and I will help you to your cabin."

"Thank you," said Murchison. He held out his thin hand to Thekla. "Good-night, and good-bye."

"Good-night; but not good-bye," she managed to say, through thronging tears. "We shall meet again to-morrow."

For poor Murchison, alas! there was no to-morrow on this side of the grave. Early—very early—at the mysterious hour between night and morning, when life is said to run low in the veins of earth's children, the tragedy of his sad life ended.



The doctor and Michael Grierson were with him. He had passed through another of those terrible paroxysms of pain. The exhaustion was great, and they thought he was asleep, and were talking together in low whispers, when, all at once, they saw a change pass over his face. His eyes opened widely, and there was in them a piteous, imploring expression, like that of a child who craves for a boon.

Grierson stooped over him to ask if he wanted anything. No answer came; but in less than a moment the plaintive look had gone.

"It's all right," he whispered, with a smile; "I've said I'm sorry, and——"

They could catch no more. Over the sad eyes the eyelids dropped: the smile faded from the voiceless lips. With the peace of the forgiven at his heart, he had fallen asleep.

"'She is coming to.'"—p. 224.

Morning has come, and once more the good ship is astir with her living freight, few of whom know as yet that in the night-season one of their number has gone out into the everlasting silence. Thekla, who spent a restless night, is up early, hoping to meet someone who can give her news about Murchison. Wilkinson joins her, and they go to the poop-deck, and stand there looking out.

A great change since yesterday! Then there were low banks, and level sands, and wide horizons. Now there are hills behind the desert—hills that are wrapped to-day in lovely rose-lilac mists; and between the hills and the desert there is a long dark green oasis, which, Thekla hears, is the town of Suez. This on one side of the ship, while on the other, freshened with white foam-bells, and gay with boats carried briskly along by their large lateen sails, stretch the blue waters of the gulf—an ever-widening highway, to be merged presently in the Red Sea, and to wash the coasts of fertile Egypt and the green and rocky wildernesses of the Sinaitic peninsula.

It is an exciting as well as a lovely scene; and if Thekla could only for a moment forget Murchison's pinched face and wild eyes, she would enjoy it keenly.

Wilkinson notices her depression, and tries to reason her out of it. He is talking and she is listening, or trying to listen, when they hear the following words: "Yes, very sad, and rather uncomfortable for us. The doctor says it was heart disease."

It was the captain's voice—high, clear, and rather pompous—and he was speaking to Sir Richard Ellerslie. They resumed their walk without seeing the young people, who looked one at the other silently. "What does it mean?" gasped Thekla, at last. Her large grey eyes were distended with horror, and her cheeks were as white as marble.

"Don't look so," pleaded Wilkinson.

"But can't you tell me? Can't anyone?"

"I'm afraid it was a death. That poor fellow Murchison was very ill last night. Dear Miss Ellerslie, don't take it so. Why, you'd never do for a soldier. If we thought so much of death, we should be in a constant state of panic."

"It's not that I'm afraid," said Thekla slowly. "It's—but I don't think I can explain. He had been so miserable; I wanted him to have just a little happiness before he went away. I should like him to have seen this beautiful morning—to have been standing here with us. Poor fellow! Poor fellow!" Her voice broke and her eyes filled with tears. She had been thinking of him half the night; forming little girlish plans to nurse him and make him cheerful—she and Mr. Grierson together; and now—she gave a little sob, as she gazed out dreamily over the dancing sea. The inevitableness of death—its awful severance of all the dear, homely ties that hold us to our earth, had for the first time touched her heart, and she felt cold—cold and numb.

"It is very strange," she said. "I can't understand it."

"Don't try to!" said Wilkinson. "We aren't meant to understand everything. And look here: we may be mistaken. Perhaps it's someone else. Let's go back to the main-deck and ask about it." They had not gone far before they met the doctor, who was swinging along in his usual rapid way, and looking grimmer than ever. When he caught sight of Thekla's pallid face and large troubled eyes, he pulled up.

"I am afraid you have heard," he said. "Mr. Grierson wished to be the first to tell you."

"It is true, then?" said Thekla.

"Yes; the poor lad has gone. He went away very quietly. I thought he might have lasted a little longer; but he was bound to go—and to go suddenly. It is best as it is."

Thekla staggered on. A mist was gathering before her eyes, and her tongue seemed chained to the roof of her mouth. It was so pitiful. The young life—the life that might have been and done so much—snatched away from the warm earth for ever. A few words of regret—cold like those of the doctor and captain; a sea-burial; and then silence—the eternal silence of the dead. Her tears blinded her, and but for Wilkinson, who, being nearly as simple and childlike as Thekla herself, was the best companion she could have had, she would have fallen more than once over the ropes or chains.

Gently and silently he guided her to the companion-way. There she took her hand from his arm, thanked him sweetly for being so kind to her, and then ran away to fight it all out by herself.

For the rest of the day Thekla was not much seen. Now and then Wilkinson would catch a glimpse of her little sad face; but he had no opportunity of speaking to her.

Late that afternoon the Amazon took the Brindisi passengers on board, and steamed out immediately into the bay. Then, in the gathering dusk, a little party of passengers and officers assembled on the poop-deck, and the captain read the beautiful solemn words of the Burial Service; and the body of the poor fellow whose earthly life had been a failure was dropped down into the silent sea.

CHAPTER IX.—TROUBLES INCREASE.

NIGHT has come. The Amazon, with sails set, is moving quietly through the sea that washes the coasts of Arabia and Egypt. Land, looking ghost-like in this dim light of moon and stars—mountains, and low shores of white coral and sand—can be seen on both sides of the ship. The sea is perfectly still, the sky cloudless, and all the wind that there is being with the vessel, there seems to be scarcely a breath of air stirring.

An entertainment had been planned for this evening, but it is put off on account of the death on board; and the ship's company, meanwhile, are recovering their normal spirits.

On the main-deck there is plenty of laughter and talking. The London passengers are trying to make friends with the Brindisi passengers, who show an amiable readiness to be cultivated. Lady Lucy Leveridge is particularly popular. Marion, too, has a little court about her, and a very lively one it is. She indeed does little more besides smile and look pretty; but the new-comers find it pleasant to be near her; and the lady sitting beside Marion, and frequently her companion now—a certain Mrs. Cockburn, young and of lively temperament—laughs and talks enough for them both. Thekla, meanwhile, is walking up and down the hurricane-deck with her friend Michael Grierson. Isaacson is, at this very moment, complaining to Sir Richard that Grierson is gaining an influence over her. That is true; but it is neither his fault nor hers. He had what she wanted—knowledge, faith, and a tenderness which sometimes, to this little girl, seems infinite, like that of Heaven; and instinctively as willows seek water, and flowers of the sun the light, she turned to him. Never, in all her life, has she been so perfectly happy as in this beautiful and divine friendship that surely, she thinks, is God's gift to her.

And Michael, although he has not yet ventured to confess it to himself, feels a delight in this little girl's confidence, which is new to him, and bewilderingly sweet. Circumstances have made of him a lonely man. He is of no race or nation, and prejudice has come between him and his acquaintances. Friendship, indeed, he has won, and even admiration. A man with his force and beauty of character is bound to be recognised by some. But in every case there had been something to overcome before he could stand face to face with the soul of his friend. Here there was no struggle. With swift comprehension and radiant sympathy, this fair child had turned to him; and sometimes now it seems to him as if, through all these long years, he had been waiting for her sympathy to complete his life.

To-night she is telling him of her puzzles—the dark, dark mysteries of life and death and suffering. She has never spoken of them before, and even the talking seems to lighten her heart, while every word from Michael helps her. Then from time to time they will stop and look away over the land of rock and wilderness where the Israelites of old, in their living humanity, acted out the great parable which, with its priceless freight of wisdom, has come down to us through the ages: and after that they will talk again, and Thekla says to herself that she has not been so happy since the last of her dear dream-days in the garden at home.

Presently she sees two figures approaching them, her father and Mr. Isaacson.

Her hand is on Michael's arm. Unconsciously she clutches at it, and for an instant he feels the swift vibration of her heart against his side. In the next instant she is walking on alone to meet her father.

"Where have you been all this time, Thekla?" There is a sharp irritated ring in the voice.

"I have been walking with Mr. Grierson," she says. "Do you want me, father?"

"Yes: I have been looking for you. Your sister wishes to speak to you."

"Where is she?"

"On the main-deck"—a pause, and then—"What are you waiting for?"

"You are coming, father?"

"No; I wish to have a little talk with Mr. Grierson. Isaacson will take you to your sister."

"Father——?"

"Do as I tell you, at once, Thekla!" The terrible words are spoken very low. Sir Richard is much too fine a gentleman to make an exhibition of himself or any member of his family before strangers, but he will have this silly child know that he is her master.

Without another word Thekla turns away; and Sir Richard resumes the suave manner which is one of his distinguishing characteristics. He speaks to Grierson with perfect courtesy, but unmistakable decision. "I am told," he said, "that there has been some absurd gossip about my little daughter. These stupid people, who have nothing else to do but to gossip, have been coupling her name with yours. Pray don't protest, my dear sir! I don't blame you, nor do I blame her. She is young for her age. Her sister and I have been accustomed to look upon her as a mere child, and so, I suppose, we have allowed her more liberty than is quite consistent with her age and position. I am speaking with great frankness to you, Mr. Grierson."

Michael bowed. He could not speak.

"And having gone so far," said Sir Richard blandly, "I may as well go a little further, and let you into a family secret. My younger daughter inherits largely from her mother's family. For obvious reasons I have kept this quiet, and I only tell you because it will help you to understand my peculiar anxiety. These sorts of things leak out, do what we will. I am sure" (with exaggerated courtesy) "you are not one of those who could take an unfair advantage; but everybody is not so far-seeing as you and I are, and things have been said on board about you which I had rather not repeat."

"I scarcely understand," said Michael, controlling himself with an effort.

"My dear sir, I really couldn't explain any further. It goes against the grain with me to say unpleasant things, even" (smiling) "when they are coined by someone else. The long and the short of it is, that we must be more careful. That 's enough on a rather painful subject. And now—if you are not too angry with me—I want you to give me a little information about the East."

What could Michael do but be complaisant?

Sir Richard asked questions, and he answered them; but he felt all the time as if a sword were piercing his heart.

Quietly the ship went forward on her way. Every day, the mighty sails—Thekla's "wings of the morning"—were spread, and the throbbing of the great engines, that are like the heart of some living thing, never ceased.

The heat in the Red Sea was intense, and the spirits of the ship's company flagged.

Marion kept up wonderfully well. "A new batch of admirers," Mrs. Cockburn said sardonically; and, in fact, the Brindisi passengers, several of whom were persons of distinction, had flocked to the standard of the beauty of the Amazon, who was bound, of course, to be cheerful.

Thekla's gaiety was gone. She would sit for hours gazing out at the sea; her face pale, and her large grey eyes full of gloom. They thought it was the heat; and her friends petted and encouraged her. They would sit and chat to her, and they would bring her tempting things to eat, and they would move her chair from place to place, as the sun and wind shifted. The General did her the greatest service of them all, for he would sit by her side for long spells, and since Isaacson, for all his self-possession, could not stand the glitter of the General's steel-blue eyes, while they were on watch Thekla had nothing to fear from his unwelcome attentions.

Michael alone, of all her friends, never came near her. Why was it?—she would ask herself, with a pain that she could neither understand nor control. Had her father said anything unkind? But he could not! There was surely no harm in one so good, and true, and noble, speaking, for a few moments, to a little girl like her. If there was, then she knew nothing. The world had turned upside down, and she with it.

Her principal friend now was Ronald Hinton, whose kind and simple manners, instinct with the chivalry of a nature which was no less tender than strong, had a soothing effect upon her mind. "I wish you were my brother really," she would say to him sometimes; and Ronald would answer cheerfully, "I may be your brother some day, little Thekla—who knows?"

A fresh bond of sympathy had arisen between them lately, for Ronald had become intimate with Grierson, whose goodness—a quality which is more attractive than some of us imagine—had won his sympathy and affection.

"You have found out what a wonderful man Mr. Grierson is," said Thekla one morning, with a smile of triumph, when, after a walk with Michael, Ronald joined her on the main-deck.

"Yes," he said, "I have. He is an extraordinary man, especially when you consider his antecedents. But remember, he is an exception."

"What do you mean?"

"It is rather difficult to explain; but I will try."

Just at this moment, they were interrupted by Wilkinson, who came up all in a flutter of excitement. "There 's a fellow on board with a photograph-machine, he said, "and he 's going to take us—all the people of the entertainments, don't you know? Will you come?"

"Certainly," said Thekla. "And Mr. Hinton must come too."

"Of course he must. He was manager."

They went over to the other side, and found a group being formed, and the photographer making wild efforts to reduce them to order and silence.

It was done at last; and the second group, which was to include Thekla and Marion, Hinton, Wilkinson, and Mrs. Cockburn, were requested to fall into place, when Thekla observed that Mr. Grierson was not present, and asked if he might not be called. There were one or two dissentient voices; but the greater number were of opinion that the group would not be complete without the reciter, so Lady Lucy undertook to find him. She was some time away, and meantime one or two of the ladies, and notably Mrs. Cockburn, grew tired and cross with waiting.

Michael was found at last, however, and the group was speedily arranged. Marion and Thekla were seated. Hinton stood close behind them, and Michael was made to sit down on the deck, near Mrs. Cockburn, who had taken up her position gracefully at Marion Ellerslie's feet.

The moment the impression had been taken, Mrs. Cockburn, who was red with suppressed anger, sprang to her feet, and said, in an audible whisper, to a lady standing by: "The idea of putting me beside that black fellow! It was really too bad."

The cruel words fell on Thekla's ear. Michael was close beside her, so he must have heard them too. She dared not look at him. If a lash had been drawn across her face in the presence of all these people she could not have been more hurt and wounded. To insult him so—gentle and true and chivalrous as he was! How could she? How could anyone?

Pity is strong; but when pity is touched and ennobled with reverence, when, with awed hearts, we confess that to pity is to dare, and that yet the strong passion of our souls must find a vent, then, in the whole compass of human feeling, there is nothing to compare with it in force.

This was poor Thekla's case, and for a few moments, her whole being seemed to be swamped and lost in an overflowing agony, that brought the stinging tears to her eyes, and made her heart like to swoon with its heavy throbs of pain.

"My dear little Thekla" (that was Lady Lucy's voice), "you must have grown deaf all of a sudden. This is the third time of asking. Are you coming to the other side, or do you wish for a sunstroke? Here the heat is simply killing."

"Is it?" said Thekla, springing to her feet, and looking round wildly. "Where are they all?"

"The group, do you mean? They have dispersed. You are ill, child!"

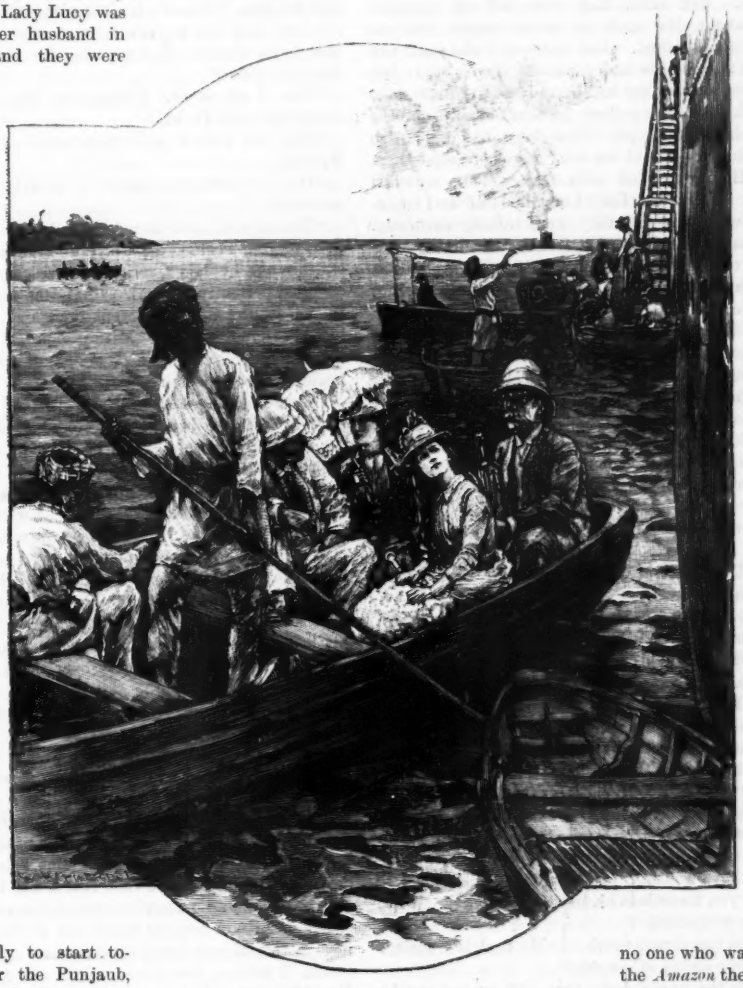
Michael Grierson was standing close by. Lady Lucy made a sign to him. "Take this child to my easy-chair on the other side," she said. "I'm afraid it's a touch of the sun. I will be with you directly."

"Oh! thank you," murmured Thekla. And then, all at once, it seemed to her that she was standing under a cataract, and that the sound of its many waters was roaring about her ears. For a few moments she struggled, but it was too much. Her hold upon life was lost. That the arms of her friend were about her, that those eyes which were to her the most beautiful upon earth were looking down upon her, that, followed by a little crowd of the compassionate and curious, she was being carried through the hot air, she never knew.

The painful sense of struggle passed, and she fell into a dream—a dream of kind faces and gentle looks and whispering voices. Some familiar words were on her lips. Like the refrain of an old song, they followed one another through her mind. She was saying them to herself softly: "Peace—peace—peace that the world cannot give"—when, suddenly, for no reason as it seemed to herself—for she would have liked to dream on—she opened her eyes, and lo! she was lying in a nest of cushions on deck, and Michael, with such a strange, strange look on his face, was on his knees beside her, and behind him she could see dimly a host of faces and figures. While she was trying to understand what it all meant, she heard an authoritative voice: "It's only a faint," it said, "and she is coming to. Stand back and give the poor child room to breathe."

Feeling troubled and perplexed, she once more closed her eyes, and then all in a moment her full consciousness returned. "Why, it must have been I that fainted," she said to herself. "What a lot of trouble I am giving to everybody!" She tried to spring up; but she felt strangely weak, and was obliged to content herself with looking up and smiling. The smile ended in a sigh; for her friend Michael, whom she wanted to thank, was gone, and Ronald Hinton was in his place.

CHAPTER X.—MICHAEL GRIERSON'S PLAN.



AFTER that there was little or no change. Day after day there were the same deep-blue seas, the same tranquil skies, the same blaze of sunlight; and night after night the starlit heavens overspread the waters, and the moon came rising up out of the sea. Amongst the passengers, too, and their relations one towards the other, there was nothing new. Marion amused herself, and her father looked on with a benignant smile, being sure that his favourite child would be prudent and consider the future. Thekla, since her curious fainting fit—a touch of the sun, the doctor called it—had not been very well, and, while Marion spoke plaintively about the difficulty of keeping that wild child quiet, Lady Lucy took her in hand, and forbade, for a few days, any sort of excitement, which was well for the young girl, upon whose sensitive nature the incidents of the voyage had made a powerful impression. Now, as they neared their goal, she was beginning to look upon it all as a dream which had come into her life strangely, and which would vanish as strangely, leaving nothing but a memory behind.

In a few days the languor which followed her nervous attack passed away, and she refused to be treated as an invalid. "I am quite well," she said to Lady Lucy, and once more she laughed and talked and played with the children, and haunted the hurricane-deck and gazed at the sea. But it was with a difference; she was not so light-hearted as she had been.

So the time wore on. They touched at Aden, but they did not land, as they put in late at night and started with daylight on the following morning. It came at last to the day before their expected arrival in Bombay. It was a long day; everyone was excited, and little was talked of but arrangements for arrival. Our little society that had been so much together were to be widely dispersed. Lady Lucy was to meet her husband in Bombay, and they were immediately to start together for the Punjaub, where he held a high official post. The Ellerslies were to remain in Bombay, where a pretty furnished bungalow, the property of a gentleman ordered home suddenly on account of his health, had been taken for them. Ronald Hinton, who was an assistant-magistrate, had to hurry up to his station in the North-West Provinces. Wilkinson's regiment was at Lucknow, and he was ordered to join them there at once. Isaacson and his friend talked of a shooting expedition, when they should have spent a few days in Bombay. About Michael Grierson's movements no one seemed to know anything definite. Since Murchison's death he had been more silent than before. His messmates said he had a taste for mystery.

The long hot day declined into an evening which no one who was on board the Amazon then will ever forget. The sun went down slowly, leaving a glowing western sky; there were tracts of pale yellow, toning down into orange and crimson, and between the belts of colour stretching long cool fingers into the crimson and golden haze were zones of the ethereal and lovely green of the sky. This to the west, while overhead the zenith was transfused with a soft lilac veil, through which the stars shone tremulously. It was so beautiful, and the little world of the Amazon were so strongly excited, that many of them found it impossible to keep still. Backwards and forwards they paced; as they walked one way, they were dark—it was scarcely possible to recognise them; but, facing west, each face took a rosy glow and shone in the glory of colour.

Thekla sat aside in a nook near the companion watching them. A little time ago she had longed to arrive. Her mind had been full of romantic visions about the land, on whose shores she was about to set her foot. And now—ah! she could not tell what it was—she had romantic visions still; but she did not long, as she had once done, to run to meet them. She had come to love the dear old ship, and the people—the kind people whose faces had become so familiar to her—would she ever anywhere meet them again? Her eyes filled with tears as she watched them all. There was Lady Lucy, and Michael Grierson was with her, and they were talking earnestly. How beautiful their faces looked in the lovely illumination of the western skies! Little Thekla longed to be with them, and to hear what they were saying. And there was Wilkinson. He was another of her friends. She liked him very much indeed now, and it gave her a little pang to think that they might perhaps never meet again. One of the officers had Wilkinson in tow. Thekla wondered what wonderful stories that comical-faced man was pouring out, and how much of them Wilkinson would believe. Marion was among the promenaders; she was walking with a handsome middle-aged man, who had been paying her many attentions of late. Thekla did not even know his name, and she declined to take an interest in him. She was Ronald Hinton's champion, and she would not tolerate the people who were trying to supplant him.

I think she must have been a little amused with herself for her own vehemence. She was thinking, perhaps, of what Lady Lucy had said to her a few hours ago. "You are cut out for a champion, Thekla. You can't see more than one side of a question at a time." For, at this point, she smiled, and the radiance of the smile was still lingering about her eyes and lips, when the big young fellow, with the honest brown eyes, about whom she had been thinking so pitifully, came up to her.

"I congratulate you on your pleasant thoughts," he said. "I wonder what they were?"

"Were they pleasant?" said Thekla.

"Well! you know best about that, of course. What do you say to a stroll?"

"I should like it very much, but the deck is crowded. It's the same on the other side."

"Come to the upper deck, then. There is scarcely anyone there."

It was, as he had said, quiet enough on the hurricane-deck; so they went up, and took two or three turns in silence. Presently they saw a wonderful sight, for the splendour of the western heavens had quickened till the colours were so vivid and glowing, that one might have imagined a universe in flames behind the rim of the silent sea; while in the east, a golden ball, soft and wonderful, sailed slowly up the skies. "The moon!" said Thekla, catching back her breath with rapture. "I have never seen it look so beautiful before!"

"Yes; this is almost the best evening we have had," said Ronald.

There was another silence, and then he said, "I wonder if you remember our walk here the first evening of the voyage?"

"Very, very well! I was just thinking of it then," said Thekla. "Doesn't it seem a long time ago?"

"Yes, and yet it isn't long, really—only a little over three weeks. And now the last day has come. Are you glad?"

"No: I am sorry. I hate last days and saying good-bye," said Thekla.

"But you and I will meet again, I hope," said Ronald.

"Oh! we must: we must! I should be so sorry if we didn't!"

"Thank you," said Ronald simply. "That is very good of you, Thekla." He had fallen into the habit of calling her by her Christian name, and to her it sounded perfectly natural. "But you have been good to me all the time," he went on, "and I'm afraid," looking down upon her with a smile, "I have been rather troublesome—talked a lot of nonsense, and made you feel miserable."

"Please, please don't talk like that!" said Thekla brokenly. "It is you who have been good to me."

"We needn't dispute about precedence," said Ronald. "Shall we say that we have been good friends, and that we mean to be good friends still, although we can't be brother and sister? There!" with another of those smiles—smiles from the lips only, not from the eyes, which were all the time very grave and sad—"it is out now! I was bound to tell you; but I didn't know how. Thekla, dear child!"—he checked himself, for her trouble moved him, and it had been in his heart to say something much more tender—"you mustn't take it so. We live over these things, you know."

"Oh! but it makes you so unhappy; and are you quite certain?" said Thekla.

"Quite, quite certain. I have asked, and I have been refused. We don't like that sort of thing just at first. It hurts our pride. Besides, I suppose one begins to build castles in the air, and when they come down all at once it's a pretty big downfall. You see, I am a little sorry for myself. But I know I don't deserve sympathy. I've been like a big baby crying for the moon, and naturally enough the moon doesn't see the beauty of coming down out of its sphere for me. A mortal was loved by the moon once, and the result, I believe, was disastrous to the mortal," said Ronald, talking lightly to console Thekla, who was miserable over the destruction of her first little romance, and could not keep the tears out of her eyes. "Why, if you feel it so, I shall be sorry I told you."

"Oh, no! It was much better," said Thekla; and she fought down her sobs, and tried to smile, and made a few halting remarks about the beauty of the night, and then slipped away, leaving Ronald with a strangely shaken heart, and an image that would haunt him for many a long day.

For a short space he stood musing; a new idea, and a very strange one, was forcing its way into his mind. He tried to repel it. He told himself he was vain, stupid, morbid, ridiculous. But the idea was too strong for his strong epithets. Again and again it returned, and would not be chased away. The dinner-bell rang, and he went down to the saloon. He sat at the opposite side of the table from the Ellerslies, and some distance away from them, but he could see their faces well. He looked across, and saw that Thekla had not come in. Dinner was half over before she appeared. Her face was much paler than usual, and the droop of her heavily fringed eyelids over her eyes gave her a curiously pathetic expression.

Ronald could not sit the dinner out. That tyrannous idea was possessing him, and he felt that he must be alone with it. He went to the hurricane-deck again, threw himself into a long chair, and lay gazing up at the soft moonlit sky. What a fool he was! and yet, it might be; such things had been. She was not really the child they all imagined her. Her image rose before him—the sweet pure face, the lovely eyes; ah! they were the eyes of a woman: no mere child could look as he had seen her look—the sensitive tremulous mouth, the wide brow that was troubled now sometimes, as if perplexing thoughts were warring behind it. Could it be that she also was learning the great secret that transfigures human life?

He was pondering over this, his heart not quite so sad as it had been, when he saw not far from him the figure of the man whom he had learnt to look upon as a friend. He also was alone, and he also was interrogating sky and sea. Hinton got up and joined him. Michael had been busy with troublesome problems of his own, but he was at once at his friend's service, and, for a few moments, they talked together in a desultory way.

The talk fell on mental problems. Michael was a deep student of the as yet imperfect science that goes by the name of psychology. Hinton scarcely knew there was such a science, but his own mind was so much of a puzzle to him that he felt glad to discuss mental phenomena with so keen an observer as Michael. "Look here!" he said presently; "mind is such a complex arrangement, according to you. Do you think any man clearly understands the workings of his own mind?"

"I think men make enormous mistakes about themselves, as well as about other people," said Michael, smiling.

"That is not exactly an answer to my question, is it?"

"Your question, my dear fellow, was uncommonly wide."

"Well, I'll narrow it. Take an individual case—mine. You know me pretty well by this time. Do you think I know anything about myself?"

"I think, as a general rule, you would judge your own powers pretty accurately. Whether you are as wise about your sentiments is another question."

Ronald laughed. "I believe you are a wizard," he said. "But never mind; I think I understand what you mean."

"I am right?" said Michael, looking at him keenly.

"My dear fellow, how can I tell? If we don't know ourselves—by-the-bye, doesn't that make things a little puzzling?"

"I think, on the whole, things were meant to be puzzling. But there is a clue to the labyrinth."

"Have you found it?"

"I believe I have, and it is simple enough, after all. Putting self out of the question—that is the true secret of life, and it is wonderful how it simplifies everything."

"But," said Ronald, "we must think of ourselves."

"We think we must, but we are strangely mistaken. The real truth is that we are living unnaturally—fighting against our true instincts—and that is the cause of all the misery. Let us once recognise the Divine, the Giver, the Father of Lights—and our difficulties will vanish. We shall know the truth, and the truth will make us free."

"That is a fine thought," said Ronald, impressed, as he had been before, by Michael's earnestness and passionate conviction. "But," with one of his old smiles, "I am afraid we shall have to wait until the millennium for its fulfilment."

"Perhaps; but, meanwhile, we at least can begin to live truly."

So the talk drifted on. Presently they found themselves talking about the voyage which was so near its end, and Ronald, who was transparent as a child in Michael's hands, told of his love, his disappointment, his strong interest in Thekla, and the curiously divided feeling that perplexed him that night. Then, for the first time, Michael spoke plainly. Entreating the pardon of his friend if he had misjudged him, he openly declared his conviction that the love which he believed essential to his life was a sentiment which would quickly vanish. "You have been loving an ideal being," he said. "You saw a lovely woman, and you clothed her with the grace of mind and heart of which, in spite of a thousand proofs to the contrary, we believe beauty to be the outward and visible sign. You have found out your mistake, and you will soon be cured. Are you angry with me?"

"Yesterday I should have been—desperately. This evening—I can't make it out—I must be dreadfully fickle—yet I don't think I am."

"No; you are not fickle. You are candid. You can be honest with yourself."

Hinton was silent for a few moments. He had not said all he meant to say, and Michael knew it. At last he said faltering, "And how about my interest in—in—the other?"

"That will last. It has less of self in it. Cherish it! It may be the joy of your life and the safeguard of hers."

"Thank you," said Hinton, in a voice hoarse with emotion. "I shall remember what you have said."

After that they bade one another good-night and good-bye; Hinton stayed out on deck for hour after hour watching the stars and dreaming, and Michael went down to his cabin to fight down the pain which this interview had cost him.

CHAPTER XI.—GOOD-BYE TO THE AMAZON.

They were in. The white wings were furled; the engines had ceased from their constant revolutions, and the wide seas which they had been traversing had narrowed to a beautiful bay, surrounded with low hills and sapphire islands, and bearing on its bosom the towered buildings and rich tropical foliage of one of the loveliest of Eastern cities. Seen in the light of a beautiful Indian winter morning, nothing could have been more delightful or enchanting. But there was a sting in the heart of the enjoyment, for the dear Amazon, the tranquil home for so many days of this little company of travellers, had changed her character.

When Thekla, who had dressed with swift, trembling fingers—she could scarcely do anything for that little pang at her heart, that "never, never, never," that was haunting her—ran up, leaving the cabin in the hands of Marion and Janet, she found the deck heaped high with luggage, and Indian servants, impassible as to face and figure and looking extraordinarily picturesque in their white clothes, crimson sashes, and voluminous turbans, were standing about; dark-limbed coolies were, or appeared to be, fighting over the luggage, and Englishmen, with sunburnt faces, in white clothes and sun-helmets, were threading their way through the confused labyrinth. Here and there she saw a familiar face; but in every case it looked harassed and anxious; and, thinking with a sigh what a changed world it was, she stood aside in a quiet nook to watch for her friends.

Ah! there was Lady Lucy, beautifully dressed, looking handsome and radiant, and leaning on the arm of a tall and soldierly man—her husband, of course. Thekla watched her timidly, but did not venture to speak.

She herself was being watched. It was by a tall Indian, with a grave and patient face, who had just addressed a question to one of the quartermasters. When Thekla looked at him inquiringly, he approached her, made a profound salaam, and drew a letter out of his girdle.

"Is it for me?" said Thekla. He bowed still lower, and placed it in her hands, and Thekla saw that it was addressed to her father. "Thank you," she said with a friendly smile. "This is for my father. I will take it to him."

She went back to the companion, and found Sir Richard, accompanied by Isaacson, and followed by his English servant, coming up the ladder. Thekla gave him the letter, and pointed out the man who had brought it on board.

"The Khansama of our new establishment," said Sir Richard, glancing over the note. "Speaks English, my agent says." He beckoned to the man, who bowed, advanced a few steps, bowed again, and stood at attention, his glittering eyes fixed on Sir Richard's.

"Then you are my servant?" said Sir Richard.

In a moment the man's flexible body fell into an attitude of profound humility. How it was done, no one born in the West could explain, but every limb, every feature, every line in the sinuous figure seemed to express satisfaction in the honour that had been conferred upon him by entering this distinguished service, with an intimate conviction of his own unworthiness adequately to sustain it.

"What a queer fish he is! Are they all like him, I wonder?" said Isaacson to Thekla. "That's the sort of fellow, don't you know, one would like to tickle up with a whip, not to hurt him, but just to see him jump."

"Hush! hush! I beg of you," said Thekla, her face turning crimson. "He understands English."

But if the servant understood, he made no sign. Dignified but submissive, he stood before his master.

"You will see after my things with my English servant," said Sir Richard, "and have them taken on shore at once. We will follow when we have breakfasted. Have everything ready." Then he turned to Isaacson, and asked what he was going to do, and if his servants could be of any assistance to him.

"Oh, thanks! I leave all arrangements to my travelling companion," said the rich young man. "He sent on early, I believe, for rooms. I'll have breakfast, and then go on shore with you."

Thekla, in the meantime, had been taken possession of by Lady Lucy. "I have been looking for you ever so long, little one," she cried. "We are going on shore at once, and then right on—no one knows where, and I wanted to say good-bye. Here is my husband, the General. He would like to shake hands with you.—General, this is my little friend Thekla Ellerslie, one of the dearest girls in the world.—Good-bye, sweet little friend! How much I should like to take you away with me! You will think of me sometimes, won't you?"

"Oh! shall I never see you again?" cried Thekla piteously.

"See me again! Of course you will. Now where are the rest?"

"I'm here," said a comically mournful voice behind them.

"Ah! Mr. Wilkinson.—Another of my friends, General, and one of the best boys going.—Good-bye, good-bye. Meet again! Why, of course we shall. The General and I never lose sight of promising young soldiers."

"Won't you say good-bye to me, Lady Lucy?"

"My friend Ronald! Of course I will, though I'd much rather not," said Lady Lucy, with a twinkle in the corners of her bright brown eyes. "If I were not so ridiculously happy to-day, it would make me wretched. Has anyone seen my friend Michael?"

"He has gone on shore," said Ronald.

"Gone!"

"Yes. I don't think he much liked saying good-bye, and he had some unexpected news this morning."

"Not bad news, I hope."

"No. I fancy most people would call it good. He said something about an increase of responsibilities. I was to say good-bye to you from him. You would forgive him, he hoped, for not seeing you. He says you know his ways."

"Yes, I do; but I think it is specially disagreeable of him to-day. The General wished particularly to see him, and now, for anything anyone knows to the contrary, we may never see him again. That man has a trick of vanishing. Well! I must go. Farewell once more, my sweet little Thekla. Why, child," as she kissed her, "how white you look! Ah! when you are as well accustomed as I to saying good-bye, you will take it more easily. But," in a whisper, "you are a darling, all the same, to feel it. I shall hear from you——"

"Oh! yes, yes!" said Thekla fervently. Her cheeks were pale, and her lips were quivering; but it was not only with the pain of saying good-bye. Some of Lady Lucy's lightly spoken words were ringing in her ears, and filling her soul with such sorrow as it had never known before. "He has a trick of vanishing. We may never see him again." Vanishing, going away into the great invisible—could it be of her friend this had been said? Gone! and he had not so much as said good-bye to her. This beautiful friendship, which she had fancied once would be the treasure of all her life, was to pass away like a dream. How foolish she had been—how very, very foolish, to imagine, for one moment, that it could last! He belonged to the great ones, and his place was in the great world, and it was only in the little life—the little, lovely life of the sea—that he could have had time to listen to the talk of a young girl like her.

While these sad thoughts were passing through her mind, she heard herself called. "Thekla! Don't be so dreamy, child! Come down and have some breakfast before we go on shore."

It was Marion's voice. Charmingly dressed in pale grey and rose-colour, the flush on her delicate cheek, and the light of excitement in her eyes, making her look even prettier than usual, she stood in the door of the companion, looking up and down the decks.

"What confusion!" she exclaimed. "Now confess, Mr. Larkin"—to the first officer, who had come up to bid her good-morning—"you will be enchanted to get rid of us all."

"I can't confess to what is not true, Miss Ellerslie," said the chief gallantly. "You, at least, will leave a blank on this ship which can never be filled up. Henceforward, I shall live on the sweets of memory."

"Oh! I hope not. After a little of that unsubstantial diet, we should not recognise you," said Marion, laughing. "And you know," softly, "we mean to go back to England in the dear old Amazon. It has been the most delightful voyage. I shall never forget it—and all of you have been so nice to us."

"We couldn't very well have helped that," said the chief. "When fair ladies such as Miss Ellerslie, if I may be permitted to say so——"

"You are not permitted to pay any more compliments. I suppose," said Marion, turning to another officer who had joined them, "this is Mr. Larkin's usual form when a voyage is over?" Then, as more came up, "I really won't say good-bye to anyone until after breakfast," she protested. "It's too exhausting. Come along, Thekla!"

Mechanically Thekla followed her sister, and mechanically she swallowed her breakfast, hoping against hope that he had not really gone—that presently she would see his kind grave face once more, and meet the morning smile, to which she had come to look forward as the best and dearest part of her life.

That morning she hoped in vain. And then—too soon for her—breakfast was over, and she was hurried up the companion-ladder, and everything was confusion—shaking of hands, and compliments and good-byes, and cries of "The boat is ready. We are wasting the day."

But still there were a few last words to be said, and still she lingered. Perhaps he had gone on shore to make arrangements, and would come back for his luggage. He could not possibly have taken everything away with him so early. Every moment's delay was of some value to her. If they would only talk a little longer! But Isaacson was hurrying them off, and Sir Richard was becoming impatient, and Marion was saying plaintively that she was really very sorry; if it rested with her she would never leave the dear old Amazon at all; but they saw how it was with her. Escorted by a little crowd she began to move towards the gangway. Thekla followed with a sinking heart. It was all over, then. He had gone. She would never, never see him again. Ah! what was that? Hurried steps behind her! With a child's expectant rapture in her face she turned round, and in the next instant she was trying hard to repress the bitter tears of disappointment.

"So you were really going away without saying good-bye to me?" It was Ronald Hinton who looked down upon her.

"Ah!" faltered poor Thekla. "I didn't mean to. Everything is so confused and strange to-day."

"Well! never mind!" he said, her agitation, which she did not attempt to conceal, moving him strangely.

"Father is calling me. I must go. Good-bye."

"Good-bye, Thekla—dear little Thekla. Promise not to forget me!" whispered the big young fellow, with such a strange look in his brown eyes.

She knew it was all for Marion, but it touched her to the heart, and, do what she would, she could not keep the tears from her eyes.

"Of course I could not forget you," she said, sobbingly. "Or—or—the dear old Amazon. Good-bye."

"Thekla—are you coming?" from Sir Richard.

"Thank you, darling," fervently from Ronald.

And now—she is in the boat, and the boat is moving, and, through a mist of tears, she sees the dark hull of the Amazon towering above her, and she realises for the first time that the voyage is over. To a new life in a new world her "Wings of the Morning" have brought her! Resolutely she turns her face to the shore, and gallantly she fights down the sobs that are choking her. She has no right to be miserable: she ought rather to be thankful. She will try to live as he lives—grandly and nobly, and then, perhaps, some day——

But see! the boat is touching the wharf, the fair Eastern city is before her, and Marion's voice is arousing her from her dreams.

"Now then, Thekla—do you mean to sit in the boat all day?"

The voice has a sharp ring in it. Thekla, as, helped by Isaacson, she steps on shore, wonders what she can have done to vex Marion.

THE HYMNS OF HEAVEN.

BY THE REV. WILLIAM MURDOCH JOHNSTON, M.A., VICAR OF EAST TWICKENHAM.

I. THE SONG OF CREATION AND THE CHURCH.

(Rev. iv. 8, 11.)

OURS is a theme worthy of those pens which gave to the Church the immortal poems of the "Te Deum" and the "Gloria in Excelsis"; or of those which in later and not less earnest times have awakened for us the stirring echoes of the hymns of the Apocalypse. For Eastern Church and Western both delight to dwell upon the halls of Zion, the golden streets, the absence of pain and death, and the amaranthine crown. But it is remarkable that most of the hymns which we have taken directly from St. John are adapted from the one song of the numberless host of the redeemed who had been rescued out of the great tribulation. The reason seems to be that it possesses an intensely human interest. The Church, like ourselves, is fain to dwell upon its days of suffering. The "Acts of the Martyrs" will always retain its popularity. Queen Mary, I suppose, did more for Protestantism than any ruler of England, because the fires which she lit in Smithfield have thrown their glare down all the ages since, and England is still keenly mindful of their cause and their consequence. Thus English congregations have linked the cause of English martyrs with the deathless cause of the primitive victims. Of both it may well be sung—

> "Lo, these are they from sufferings great
> That came to realms of light,
> And in the blood of Christ have washed
> Those robes which shine so bright."

Nor this alone; but in all times of persecution Christians have clad themselves in the mantle of song, and St. Paul and St. Silas made the prison at Philippi ring with their praise—strains, no doubt, from the psaltery of Israel; and Scotchmen, whether they be Covenanters yet, or members of the more ancient Church, feel a thrill of honest pride when they tell how in the days of Claverhouse their fathers stood within gorge and cave of the mountains, and sang—

> "God is our refuge and our strength,
> In straits a present aid;
> Therefore, although the earth remove,
> We will not be afraid."

But there is no fierceness, no alarm, no intensity of mortal fear or present anguish in the songs which they sing in heaven. The singers look not upon visions of musket, rack, or stake, but upon Him that sitteth on the throne, upon the Lamb whose agony was past, and upon the hosts of angels that, calm and resolute, guard the citadel of life. They remember, indeed, the sorrow—

> "The path they came by, thorn and flower,
> Was shadowed by the growing hour,
> Lest life should fail in looking back.
> So be it; there no shade can last
> In that deep dawn behind the tomb,
> But clear from marge to marge doth bloom
> The eternal landscape of the past."

It was peculiarly fit that the vision of these heavenly singers should have been granted to St. John. Visions come to everyone who is fit to receive them. The seer does not create his vision: he has only eyes to see, and he sees it. So Moses saw the burning bush; for the bush of life was always burning, and was not consumed, though he had not perceived that truth before. St. Paul saw the triumphs of Christ in the third heaven, for they are always there; and St. John looked into the heaven when the door was opened, and saw and heard changeless and eternal things. But while the panorama spread before him, and while the Church and the angels were singing, the forces of darkness were being marshalled on earth to obliterate the very name of Christ. The whole creation was groaning. The Church was partly exiled, and all alarmed. The nations of the world and the world's work and strength were passing into new conditions whose issues were beyond foresight or conjecture. And above them all, calm as the evening star, God dwelt, and surveyed and ruled the destinies of men.

Let us look at the vision.

He beheld God first: God in His unrivalled majesty and grandeur, outstripping the power of description so far that he could tell us what He was like only by resemblances. His glory, undefined and indefinable, passes before us; but we are hid within the narrow compass of a rock's cleft, and can see only the shadow of His hinder parts, the mantling as it were of His stupendous life. As with the fiery chariot of Ezekiel, so with this; the mind is bewildered and dazed if it attempts to grasp and shape it into a concrete form.

And round about the throne was the Church, represented by the four-and-twenty elders. Each had his own place and seat, prepared in fulfilment of the promise of our Lord.* They are not suffering now, but crowned. The elect are complete. None are wanting, none unworthy. The crucibles of temptation, and trial, and sorrow have long tested each of them. The kingdom they told of, whose interests were committed to their charge, and whose magnificence they saw through the glory of the Ascension, has not only come, but is triumphant. No wonder is it, then, that their songs were songs of glory.

And the glory is heightened by the unity of the elders. The thrice-uttered prayer of their Master is at length fulfilled, and they are one. As they came near to Him, they came close to one another. They found they were agreeing all the time more than they had suspected. They had fought sorely enough over words and many a worthless thing, as if the stability of the Throne itself depended upon the issue. They had thought it better to separate from one another, and sometimes to hate one another, rather than surrender their own feverish opinion or village prejudice. It had come to pass, even, that they did not wish to be one, and thought it was better the prayer of Gethsemane should not be answered. Now, thank God, all that was past. It was better, they found, to ascertain how much they loved God, and how fully they could serve Him. It was better to look upon the Throne than upon erring men, better to see the pledge of the Covenant than the broken vows of the saints. They are brethren in heaven.

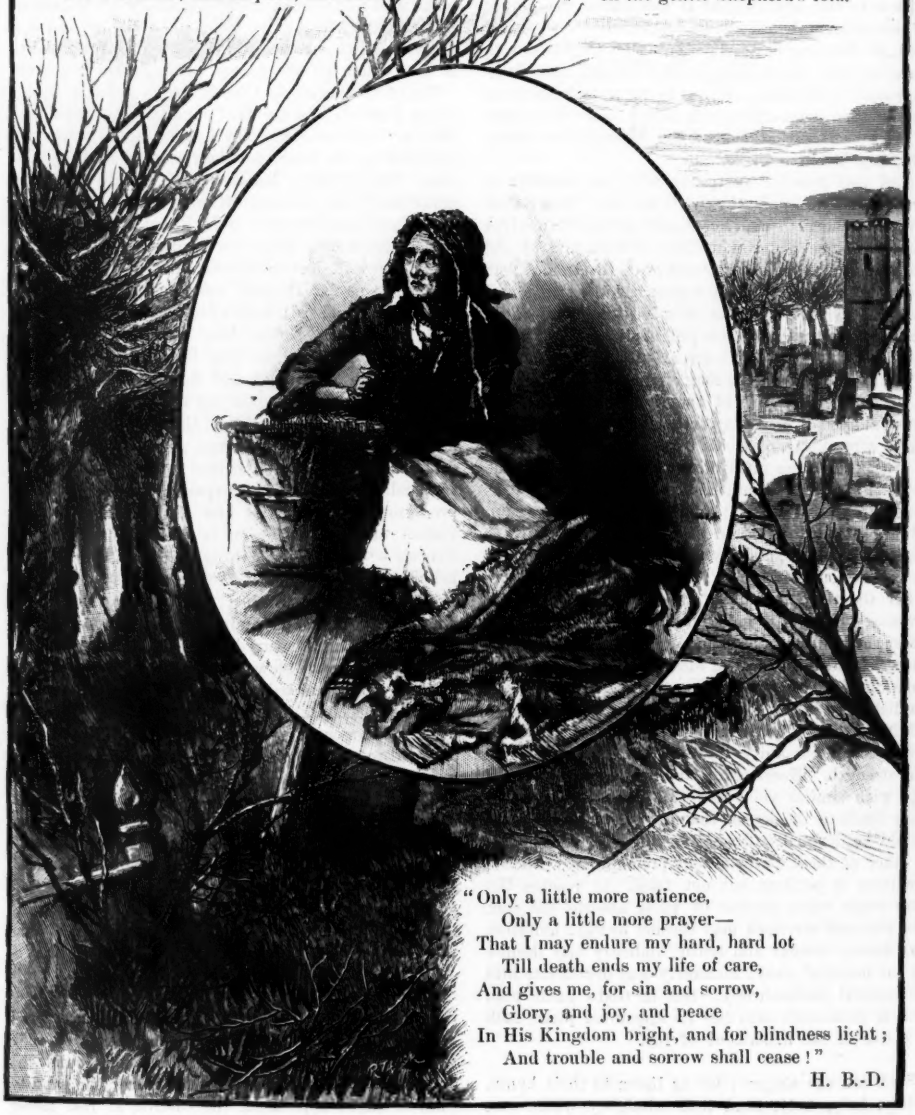
And this peculiar sympathy with one another is broadened into sympathy with all life. Individual Christians have in many centuries shown themselves careless of the material welfare of men, and of the progress of secular learning and of civilisation. Their plea was that celestial affairs absorbed their time and their energy; and this was, by a hasty generalisation, passed on as the deliberate judgment and custom of the Christian Church. It was an unhappy conception of theirs. In heaven the song of the Church is always in harmony with that of the living creation. The material good of men is a portion of God's design—we might almost say, of God's covenant. Advancement in true knowledge must advance religion. The true happiness of the community may be described as the happiness of Christ; and so in St. John's vision all are blended together in one beautiful unity—angels, and elders, and living things paying homage and adoration before the Throne.

For the third portion of the vision is equally impressive. Here is a fourfold representation of Life, under the figure or semblance of a lion, an ox (or calf), an eagle, and a man. The idea seems to be the combination of all that makes up universal life: for our English translation of "beasts" ought to be simply "living creatures," and the picture is one of life under the aspect of humanity, industry, ambition, and physical strength. Here, again, union is emphasised: all join with similar voice and full heart in the song. They teach us the lesson that all belong to God, and should be devoted to Him. In different persons one or other of these qualities may predominate. Such a condition is perilous, but not fatal. It reaches the fatal stage when anyone of them absorbs the rest. The physical strength may become brutal; ambition may destroy honour and truth; industry may despise all but material good; humanity may degenerate into sentimental philanthropy. But in God's great plan each is consistent, each has its appointed place, each is a star in the firmament of life.

Such are the singers: let us listen to their hymn. "Holy, holy, holy, Lord God Almighty, which was, and is, and is to come." So says Creation, standing apart as it were, and not venturing to address God directly, but speaking as yet in the third person. It is a song of contemplation, then; and the ideas of God which arrest the attention of His creatures are His holiness, His eternity, and His omnipotence. These are the world-wide thoughts of the highest minds in all ages and lands about God. They formed the theme of the seraphim in Isaiah's vision. Out of them came the appeal for human co-operation with God.* They constitute to-day the ideal, the hope, and the confidence of the saints. They are, indeed, the facts that are fitted for all time: and would that, in years when men and women are busiest, and work is hardest, and anxiety keenest, we too could draw aside for a space, and lift our eyes to these grand characteristics of Him whom we better know as our Father in heaven.

The Church addresses God directly. It comes boldly to the Throne: and the "is" of creation is turned into the "art" of the elders. Yet the very fact of creation is assigned as the reason for their ascription of worthiness. Why is this? Because by His creation God has manifested and revealed Himself. It is thus He is known and apprehended: and without this no thought could contemplate Him, nor worship approach Him. And closer still does the Church draw to Him. "Thou hast made us for Thyself," said Augustine of Hippo. "Thou hast made all things for Thine own pleasure," said the Elders before him. There is something exquisitely beautiful in this idea of God's works; His pleasure in energy and action: in conceiving worlds that dazzle alike the eye and the imagination; mountains that claim high thought and purity; flowers that whisper innocence; rolling oceans that demand courage and enterprise; men, with all their tremendous destinies, their expanding hopes, and their prodigious powers. And now that all is done, the verdict of the Revelation is the same as that of Genesis—"God saw everything that He had made, and behold it was very good." The process still goes on. Creation is never finished; God is ever at work. Night after night dissolving stars shed their dust upon our earth. Century by century it grows bulkier, and its pace grows slower. Changes are continually at work. The life begot in millions of tiny animals becomes the chalk beds of future Englands in their death. The mountains are giving their wealth of rock and soil to the valleys that rear their fields of wheat and orchards of apple-trees. Not a shower falls that does not, to some degree, alter the condition of things, and in all this change and growth God takes pleasure. Is it not the symbol and pledge of the absolute and eternal worth to man of all that happens in his lot? Does it not, when taken in connection with the fact of His mercy and love, cast a gentle spring light upon such terrible facts as suffering and death? Was not Cowper universally correct when he said that—

> "Behind a frowning providence
> He hides a smiling face?"



It is the first of Heaven's hymns; and we shall see afterwards with what strong bright faith they were sung, while the clouds thickened around the Jerusalem on earth; and how, whatever the earthly Church might apprehend, the Church at rest never for a moment lost its confidence in the final triumph of Christ.

* Isaiah vi. 8.

WAITING.

"ONLY a little longer
To wait, and hope, and fear;
Only a little longer,
And the darkness will be clear.
Only a little longer
To suffer hunger and cold,
Hard words and blows from friends and foes,
For I'm blind, and helpless, and old!

"But night will be day some morning,
And darkness be light for me;
I have heard a whispered warning
That soon I shall be free!
Only a little longer,
And hardness, hunger, and cold
Will all be past, and I'll rest at last
In the gentle Shepherd's fold.

"Only a little more patience,
Only a little more prayer—
That I may endure my hard, hard lot
Till death ends my life of care,
And gives me, for sin and sorrow,
Glory, and joy, and peace
In His Kingdom bright, and for blindness light;
And trouble and sorrow shall cease!"

SHORT ARROWS.

NOTES OF CHRISTIAN LIFE AND WORK IN ALL FIELDS.

A SUNSHINY FUTURE.

IT is told of an old man living in a cottage on a lonely moor, that when asked if he knew no fear, he answered, "Never, for Faith closes my door at night, and Mercy opens it in the morning." May Faith close for us the Old Year as surely as Mercy will open the New! Darkness and mystery may sometimes seem to approach us as the midnight bells tell of the changing years; we feel blind and ignorant and helpless as the unknown year becomes a reality, with its unvisioned thorns or flowers. But when we remember our Father in heaven—

"The steps of faith
Fall on the seeming void, and find
The rock beneath."

"He that feeds His ravens will never starve His saints," He whose power controls the tempest and paints the insect's wing is able to steer us safely and wisely through all the changes of the hidden way. Somewhere "under God's heaven or in it" His children will be through the varying course of the dawning year; we shall not drift beyond the Master's care, we cannot be out of reach of the love of our Lord. His loving-kindness even in chilling days will wrap us in summer warmth and glow, His promises will be to us as the gladdening sunlight overhead. It may be that 1890 contains the answer to long-lifted prayers, the blessing that has seemed to us to tarry; let prayer and work be deepened, for who can tell what God has in store for us, and what showers of grace may be gathering for the patient, thanksgiving heart? It would ill become the children of the King to approach the threshold of the New Year with trembling doubt; every event has been chosen and appointed by Him who is the Good, and who cannot make mistakes. A legend of the Talmud relates that a Rabbi was travelling on with three possessions—an ass, a rooster, and a lamp. He could get no shelter at night, but he said trustfully, "All that God does is well," and journeyed towards the forest, where the wind put out his lamp. "All that God does is well," he said, and repeated the words even when his ass and his rooster were lost. Next day he found that a troop of an enemy's soldiers had passed through the woods in the night, and he reflected that if they had seen the lamp, or the ass or rooster had proclaimed his vicinity, he would have lost his life. "All that God does is done well," he cried adoringly; and we, in whose lives the lesson of the homely legend has been repeated again and again, confide ourselves anew with unclouded faith to His keeping whose love is brighter than the morn, unchangeable and true.

'Even in the chilling days.'

RECORDS OF PROGRESS.

The common-metre hymn once given out by a negro is an inspiring New-Year composition:—

"Go on, go on, go on, go on,
Go on, go on, go on,
Go on, go on, go on, go on,
Go on, go on, go on."

We are glad to find, from interesting accounts received of their progress, how many good works to which we have drawn attention in THE QUIVER are acting in the spirit of the poet of progress, and going forward actively, earnestly, successfully. Some time since we noticed the Sailors' Rest, Amlwch, Anglesea. Mr. R. Morgan, a zealous worker therein, reports that Christian efforts continue to be put forth in the ragged-school and sailors' reading-room, and a number of letters have been received from abroad, testifying to benefit resulting from the practical sympathy extended to the men. Mr. R. Morgan visits the vessels with helpful and interesting literature, in addition to gifts of tracts. Sergeant Pullinger continues to labour on behalf of soldiers at the Home, 58, Hugh Street, Pimlico. "He was a boy in my Sunday-school class thirty years ago," writes a lady correspondent, who has seen the fruitage of her early work indeed, for many have been converted through the instrumentality of her former scholar. Like all Christian workers, Sergeant Pullinger is a little perplexed now and then about ways and means; but his is a most helpful and hopeful endeavour, and doubtless his hands will be yet further strengthened for the uplifting of our gallant soldiers. No standstill report is that of the Plumstead Mission for Artisans. Miss Russell, 1, Thames View Terrace, Plumstead, has had it laid upon her heart to interest herself and others in evangelical efforts amid a poor, struggling neighbourhood—efforts carried on by means of tent, mission-hall, and faithful Gospel appeals. Fruit "after many days" has often appeared from this work, which has so extended that it is necessary to provide greatly increased accommodation. "Excelsior" is the watchword also of the Working Girls' Club, St. George's, Norwich (the Rev. R. Hobson, Secretary). We have more than once alluded to this earnest effort to brighten the leisure of factory-girls by useful, enjoyable classes, and the institution goes encouragingly forward. The Precentor of Norwich Cathedral testifies: "It is a noble work you are doing at St. George's Home, and the happy faces of hard-working girls must be an ample reward." "Forward, forward, let us range!" cries the Laureate: may the good works of 1889 be but the foretaste of widening influences that shall garland 1890 and all succeeding years!

FOR ALL READERS.

While the question of prizes and presents is still to the fore, our readers will be glad to hear of five new stories just issued by Messrs. Nisbet and Co., which are all very suitable for such uses. First comes "One Little Vein of Dross," a clever story by Mrs. Ruth Lamb, turning upon the not very original pivot of lost jewels, but worked out in so interesting a manner as to make it a very attractive volume for girls. "Mr. Orde's Grandchildren" by C. S. Lowndes, is intended for much younger girls, and would make a good prize for a scholar in one of the lower classes of the school; while "Miss Brown's Basket," a slighter story by Mrs. Henry Charles, carries with it a lesson that would be better appreciated by one nearer the top of the school. "Where the Dew Falls in London," which is by our old friend Miss Sarah Doudney, is also another story particularly suited for elder girls, who can enter into the strong drawing of Miss Doudney's characters. "Golden Silence," the last of the five, is from the prolific pen of Emma Marshall, and though it cannot fail to interest all readers, would yet, we fancy, appeal, like the two stories we have just mentioned, most directly to elder girls. Sunday-school librarians should look out for these stories.—From the same publishers we have received an admirable little volume of "Bible History for Children," by Lady Kennett-Barrington, which should serve as a trustworthy introduction for little readers to the study of the Word of God. —"Stories Jolly, Stories New, Stories Strange, and Stories True" is the taking title of a volume issued by Messrs. Skeffington, containing a series of stories intended for the reading of boys and girls from six to fourteen years old. When we say that Mrs. Molesworth, Mrs. Macquoid, Mr. R. M. Ballantyne, and Mr. George Manville Fenn are among the contributors, we have said enough to show that this is a work of peculiar promise, and we may add that the promise is amply borne out by the perusal.—From the same publishers we have received a complete story for young children by Mrs. Macquoid, and illustrated by her husband. It is entitled "Pepin, the Dancing Bear," and would make a very pretty present for a child. The Christmas volume of Little Folks (Cassell and Co.) would be certain of a warm welcome if only for its illustrations; but the stories and verses are so good, and the coloured frontispieces so attractive, that the magazine is sure to retain its hold on the affection of its readers.—Children who take an interest in Band of Hope work ought to read the "Temperance Mirror" (National Temperance Publication Depôt), where they will find some very suitable pieces for recitation.

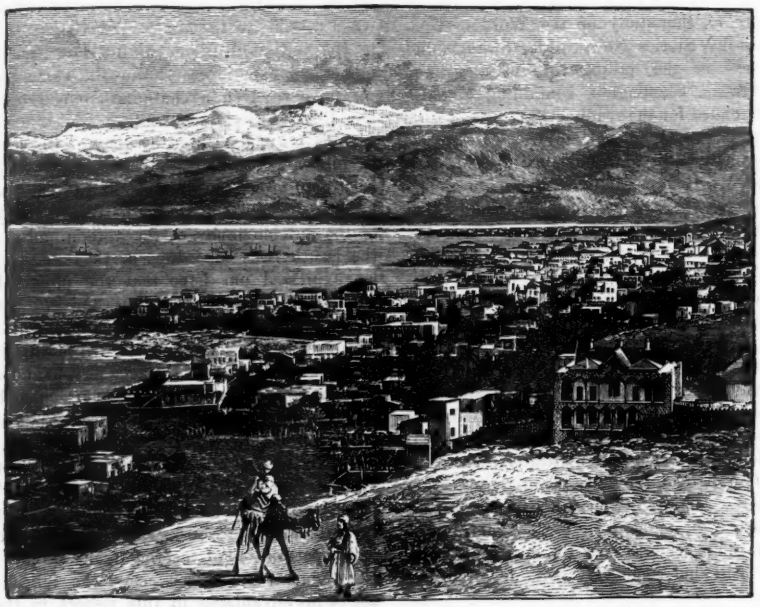
THE PRAYER IN THE GRANARY.

We heard recently of an incident which reminded us how little our human vision perceives below the surface, and what blossoms of faith and love may exist where to us stolidity alone is apparent. A country farmer, rising at four o'clock one bright morning, set off for a stroll around his place, and was startled to find the door leading to the granary unfastened, and yet his trusted mastiff stretched beside it in evident ease of mind. "Somebody is robbing me," decided the master, "and it must be one of my own men, for the dog would never have let a stranger go by." He silenced the welcoming dog by a gesture, and crept quietly nearer the granary to detect the thief. But soon his heart was stirred to its depths, for he heard his groom pleading with God in prayer, and he realised that the man was accustomed to choose that early hour and that quiet, lonely place to pour out his prayer before God. The farmer was himself an earnest Christian, but he had no notion that his example and the spirit of his household had been blest to lead this man to discipleship; and great was his joy in the salvation of one who had seemed to him most unlikely.



OLD FRIENDS AND NEW.

Mr. Spurgeon's first book! What changes have not come over the world since this was originally published! And yet "The Saint and his Saviour," which has been re-issued in a new and very handsome form by Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton, is as applicable to the spiritual needs of to-day as it was when first it saw the light. We wish it God-speed, in the increased power of its honoured author's name and experience.—From the same publishers we have received a charming Memoir of the late Dr. Charles Stanford, another well-known South London preacher, edited by his wife. Accompanied by Manesse's equisitely etched portrait, the volume is sure to prove doubly attractive to the many who knew and loved Dr. Stanford.—When the first part of the autobiography of the veteran missionary to the South Seas—the Rev. J. G. Paton—appeared, we expressed our hope that the promised second part might speedily be forthcoming. And now Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton have more than satisfied our expectation in the interesting volume before us. There is in it the keen fervour and steadfast consecration of the true missionary-spirit breathed on every page of a record that would put to shame many a romance of adventure.—From the strange life of a foreign missionary to the "Personal and Family Glimpses of Remarkable People" (same publishers) of Archdeacon Whately is a long step. As the son of the well-known archbishop, the writer had opportunities of meeting many people, more or less eminent, and he has made the fullest possible use of his advantages in this respect in the chatty volume that is before us.—"Imago Christi" (Hodder and Stoughton) is the title the Rev. James Stalker, of Glasgow, gives to a valuable series of chapters on the example of our Divine Lord in the various aspects of our earthly life—the home, the State, the Church, and so on. Professedly the teaching of this work is drawn from the Gospel narratives, and there is not a little in it to cheer, to instruct, and to encourage.—As a seasonable gift, many will be glad to welcome a new edition—the first that has been complete in a single volume—of "The Poetical Works of Frances Ridley Havergal" (Nisbet). The volume is at once tasteful and handy, while the printing is all that could be desired.—It is impossible to read the interesting story told in "Cardinal Lavigerie and Slavery in Africa" (Longmans) without a feeling of deep regret that the man who is capable of such noble and self-sacrificing efforts on behalf of the poor slaves of the Dark Continent should himself be enslaved in the spiritual bondage of the Roman system. As a record of the actual state of the slaves at the present time, and the forces at work for their liberation, the volume is of great value to all English labourers in the same field. It is too early yet to estimate the effect of the recent edict of the Sultan of Zanzibar, doing away with the servitude of the children of the slaves in his dominions; but it may safely be taken as indicative of the progress of the grand, truly Christ-like movement which has for its end the utter abolition of this accursed system of slavery.—Mr. Elliot Stock has just published, in book form, under the title "Idylls of the Field," a series of nature-articles, most of which have appeared in the columns of one of our morning contemporaries. The author is Mr. F. A. Knight, and the freshness and breeziness of his style render it peculiarly suitable for dealing with such topics as he takes up. Whether "Meadows of Asphodel" or "A Robber Stronghold" be the most interesting of all the papers in the volume, we should find it difficult to say, but both are delightful, and only a little more so than the rest of the chapters in this charming little book, which is most tastefully illustrated also.—To their useful series on "Men of the Bible," Messrs. Nisbet have now added "Joshua: His Life and Times," by the Rev. W. J. Deane, who has contributed one or two previous volumes to the rapidly growing series. His is a thoughtful work, likely to prove of great assistance to teachers.—"One and All" is the motto which Mr. Richard Tangye, of Birmingham, has made the title of his autobiography, issued by Messrs. S. W. Partridge and Co. There is much to interest all readers in this story of the growth of a large industry, and the methods by which its success was achieved.

CHRISTIAN WORK IN SYRIA.

A work much owned by God is that carried on in connection with the British Syrian Mission, founded in 1860 by Mrs. Bowen Thompson. The secretary of this effort is Miss Poulton, 18, Homefield Road, Wimbledon. The Harem visitors and Bible-women are encouraged to find their labours increased, and a good work is going on among the soldiers of the Lebanon army. The medical mission battles hard against ignorance and disease. The Syrian women know little of nursing, but the rising generation in the Christian schools will have better advantages; and meanwhile the workers patiently do their best, comforting the sick body and speaking words of healing to the soul. Girls of all denominations are educated at the institution in Beyrout. Several have arranged to teach when their own education is finished. They learn useful domestic work, and in every school the Bible is the foundation of instruction. Help and training are also extended to the blind, who learn from raised letters and maps, and are much cheered by the bright singing and sympathetic care around them. The teachings of Christianity are bearing practical fruit amid the daughters of Syria. A little ministering child, hearing that a blind woman was neglected by her children, comforted the mother, read to her and prayed with her, and told her family the teachings of Scripture concerning duty towards parents, till a great change was wrought in that house. A mere child told a woman who had been in trouble how the Lord had tried the faith of Abraham, and went on to speak of the Saviour of whom Isaac was a type. This is a mission that works on behalf of many races and religions, and endeavours to lead Moslems, Druses, Jews, and others, simply to trust in the Lord Jesus Christ Speaking of a garden near Beyrout, to which the scholars are invited, a worker says, "It is full of fir, magnolia, acacia, and eucalyptus trees, with roses, heliotrope, and flowering shrubs. All around one has glimpses of Lebanon, and, with the river murmuring near, one feels in an earthly Paradise." Amid such scenes may heaven be begun below in many and many a heart, by being led to rest on the finished work of Christ alone!

THE MISSION TO ITALIAN SOLDIERS.

With increasing blessing the unvarnished Gospel is again set forth in these latter days to those who dwell in Rome, and a most interesting movement is connected with the preaching of Luigi Capellini, once a student in a priest-ruled college, afterwards the commander of a military detachment, and now the leader of earnest Evangelical work, which is wholly undenominational, and which has spread the Scriptures not only among the troops, but among numbers of scattered peasantry. Some New Testament pages lying in the street led to Capellini's conversion, and he at once used his influence among the soldiers to proclaim the Gospel and to evangelise his comrades. To the little church thus formed Admiral Fishbourne presented a communion-service, of which the flagon bears the inscription, "From soldiers of England to the Evangelical soldiers of Italy." Many a convert has been tried by ridicule and persecution, influential endeavours having been put forth to repress the work. But persecution has failed. Not a few who attended the services to spy and report have become valiant witnesses for the faith they once opposed. Among those named as Capellini's helpers and co-workers are a former infidel, a sergeant who was once a leader of dissipation, another whose own village condemns him as a heretic, and a converted monk of great culture and ability. A "Martin Luther Association" exists to combine spiritual work with educative and recreative pursuits. We may add that help from English friends towards this mission may be sent to Miss Stoddart, 36, Donnington Park, West Hampstead.

HELPING HANDS.

"I can never see you," said a well-known Christian worker to an aged believer, "without longing for a word from you, and wanting to shake hands with you. You know what a debt I owe you, do you not?" He had made his way through a crowd to the side of the old gentleman, who shook his head, having come in contact with so many during the course of his long life that circumstances could not always stand out clearly in his memory. He knew the speaker now as an energetic Gospel standard-bearer, but more than this he could not recall. "Years ago," said the other, "I came up to London to seek a place in a business house, bearing a letter of introduction to you. I was friendless, timid, strange; you were very busy when I entered the warehouse, but you read the letter, and spoke to me a few words as to the worth of a good character. You said you would do your best for me, and promised to see me again. Then you asked me whom I knew in London, and I told you 'only yourself!' 'In that case' you said, 'you must spend to-morrow with me; your first Sunday in London must not be a lonely one.' You welcomed me home on the morrow; you took me to worship, and to the Sunday-school with you; that Sunday decided me for the service of "'You know what a debt I owe you, do you not?'" the Master." Who knows what eternal issues may hang on a kind word, a helping hand held out to a young life at a crisis like this?

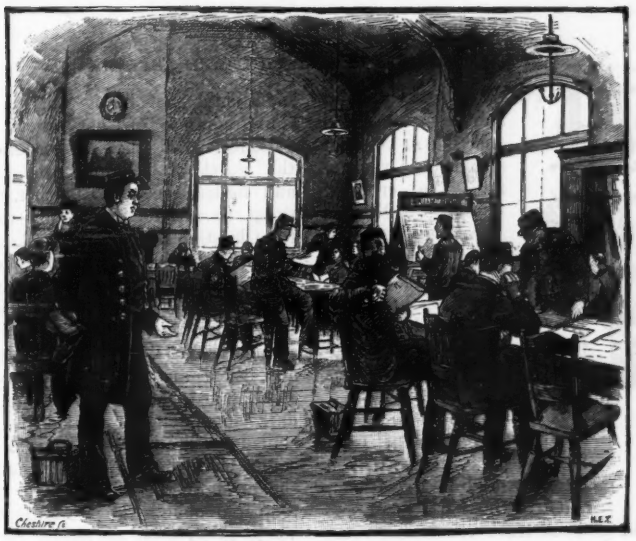
DARKNESS AT NOON.



The sayings of little children may often point a lesson to children of a larger growth, for in face of many a problem of time and eternity, the most learned are but as little ones, dimly understanding, and often mistaken in judgment. One stormy day the atmosphere grew dark and gloomy while some little occupants of the nursery were taking their early dinner, and, after regarding the state of affairs in bewilderment and some impatience, a small boy settled the case by exclaiming, "Mother, we'd better all go to bed. God has made a mistake." A smile went round the table at the child's notion that the Almighty had sent the night before its time; but, after all, have none of us now and then come to as foolish a conclusion respecting the dealings of our Lord? Things have gone all wrong in our opinion, and the arrangements we mentally decided to be best, have been suddenly and sadly frustrated. In the midst of noonday sunshine, storm and darkness have veiled our sky, and our hearts are inclined to murmur, "God has made a mistake." To the child's remark the elders would say decisively, "God never can make mistakes," but let us believe this as well as say it. Let us remember the years gone by, when through the changing days, the hand of our God has led us on by the right way, when His appointments have proved better than our fears, our hopes, our prayers; and let us be very certain that however dark may be the shadows, however bewildering the surrounding circumstances, the Lord is guiding us with His eye upon us in love and remembrance, and the Hereafter will bear glorious witness that even through the darkness He abides "too wise to err, too good to be unkind."

EVENING CLASSES FOR YOUNG WOMEN.

Our friends of the Young Women's Christian Association are anxious at this season to make known that they have made special arrangements to bring within the reach of working girls good educational classes, and it is their hope that facilities for this purpose may be devised throughout the country. We have known young women anxious to improve themselves, yet too shy to plead for increased education; doubtless such classes at various centres will do much to benefit the members, and to swell the ranks of those brought within the influence of the Association. In London the advantages offered are Civil Service classes, ambulance lectures, French, drawing, dress-cutting, cookery, singing, shorthand, musical drill, book-keeping, grammar, and many other useful subjects of instruction, the fees being as small as possible. Mr. H. Kidner or Miss Ely, 17, Old Cavendish Street, W., receives the names of those in business houses who would like to join. Our lady readers may also be interested in an institution to which we have been asked to call attention, the "Mary Allworth Home," Mayfield, Sussex. This Home is open for change and rest to hard-worked ladies in various walks of life. It is managed by a matron, and the visitors pay from ten to twenty shillings weekly according to means; they are free from any harassing restrictions, and a private letter from a visitor tells us "one is quite free, and lives as in a family." The idea of this Home is that it shall not be considered a charity, but an effort to benefit and help those who are helping themselves.

A BUDGET OF STORIES.

While "Dorothy's Vocation" is still fresh in their memories, readers of THE QUIVER need no introduction to Miss Everett Green, the author of "Miriam's Ambition," the first of a budget of new stories for young people which has just reached us from Messrs. Blackie and Son, and which we have taken up with special interest in view of the seasonable cry for new books for boys and girls. The children Miss Everett Green draws are such genuine little ones that her story is sure to please her young readers; while her elder characters, and especially Sister Frank, are very strong.—"Cousin Geoffrey and I," by Caroline Austin, will be more likely to win the favour of girls than boys, we fancy. There is plenty of incident in the story, though, and the evil results of past wrong are clearly marked.—A clever dream-story by Alice Corkran, entitled "Down the Snow Stairs," is the next volume on our list. It is just the work to take the fancy of an impressionable child, and by its clever imagery not only to amuse, but also to really instruct the little reader; especially as the letter-press is accompanied by Mr. Gordon Browne's whimsical illustrations.—The American Civil War of last generation is becoming as great a favourite for the setting of a story as our own struggle of the seventeenth century was a little time ago. "With Lee in Virginia," by the ever-popular Mr. G. A. Henty, is the latest example of this tendency. We are glad to see that though the hero was fighting on the side opposed to the righteous claims of the slaves, he showed a right feeling towards them himself. However, we could have wished him altogether on the nobler side. The story is full of stirring incident, sure to please boy readers on both sides of the Atlantic.—"The Hermit Hunter of the Wilds," the next story in Messrs. Blackie's series, is from the pen of Dr. Gordon Stables, whose wide experience is sure to issue in a story at once exciting and novel.—"Sam Silvan's Sacrifice," by Jesse Coleman, is well described in its sub-title as "the story of two fatherless boys." The final scene, in which Sam dies to save his brother, is very touchingly told, and brings to a fitting close a most interesting story, in which the characters are well brought out.—In "Grettir the Outlaw," the Rev. S. Baring Gould has retold for boys the story of one of the old Icelandic Sagas, full of the stirring life of the Viking days. In his preface the author shows his readers how he told the story in instalments to his pupils thirty years ago. It was then very popular with them, and we are sure it will meet an equally warm reception from its wider circle of acquaintances now. This closes the list of Messrs. Blackie's new story-books, which all teachers and school librarians should see, as well as all who are on the look-out for acceptable gift-books for their young friends.

RAILWAY WORKMEN'S COMFORT.

Close to the railway station at York, there has been erected by the North-Eastern Railway Company, for the comfort of its officials, an institute, new and useful. It aims at bodily comfort, instruction, and recreation for persons employed by that great railway company in one of the chief of its centres; and as it has 1,250 members, it must be considered as in some degree fulfilling its aim. To the railway worker, rest, recreation, and comfort are essential, and the many employed in and travelling to York find the Institute of value. Large and comfortable dining-rooms are there, where food may be warmed and cooked; and there is abundant room for comfortably partaking of food, whether bought or brought. A recreation-room, a billiard-room, two reading-rooms, in every way fitted well, and even luxuriously furnished—class-rooms, and a large library well stocked with current literature. Classes, eleven in number, meet in the winter evenings, for the teaching of book-keeping, drawing, applied mechanics, and allied subjects; and by lectures and entertainments the work of the institute is added to. It is chiefly distinguishable from the ordinary mechanics' institute in the fact that it is provided for and managed by railway men, and that the subscription is lower—from threepence to fivepence per month for the ordinary member. It is one which will be the precursor of others on the great railway system named; and it might be a useful adjunct in other centres of the railway system.

"GOD SEES TO ME."

A CHAPTER FOR THE SICK AND INFIRM.

A POOR infirm man, blind and deaf, was asked once, "Are you not afraid to venture into the crowded streets?"—"No," he answered; "I am taken care of; somebody helps me along. God sees to me." Every kindly hand held out to him, every touch of friendliness and sympathy, this poor man—rich in faith—took thankfully as the token of God's ever-present care. "God sees to me." If you are poor and needy, friend, and trusting in the Lord, these words hold glorious truth concerning yourself. Whatever your trials and sorrows, the record of your daily life is not written in gloomy characters, but in bright and shining letters, if only you are able to acknowledge by faith "God sees to me."

Bring to remembrance His care for you in the past, when He caused you to come out from the ways of carelessness and heedlessness, and love His Name and treasure His Word. Every promise in that Word is your own by right. How many have been fulfilled over and over again, when things seemed darkest, and you scarcely knew where to turn! Bring to remembrance the answered prayers of the past, the times when God helped you and comforted you, and made the rough places plain and straight before you. "God always did see to me," is your thankful cry, as memory goes back to the days of old, and you trace the way the Lord has led you, and "forget not all His benefits." "But what about the present?" perhaps you are inclined to sigh. "I want to do so much, and I can do so little; day after day is wasted, and I just lie here weakened and infirm." Make no mistakes, sorrowful heart—judge not rashly even your own feeble self. Day after day is not wasted, for you are learning the patience of Christ. Is it lost time to be fashioned into His all-glorious image? And how do you know that you are doing little or nothing? If you are praying even for one immortal soul, you are doing holy and deathless work; and little do you guess what may be the influence for all eternity of these days of quiet the Lord has ordained.

"She is a living sermon," was said of one of God's saints, aged, paralysed, helpless as a little child, yet filling all the household with the fragrance of her sweet cheeriness and patience. Let the Master show through you the worth of religion, even though the vine and fig-tree seem to wither. It is a great thing to set forth the joy and sweetness of the Christian life when the skies are blue overhead; it is a greater to shine for Jesus through the darkness, and triumph in Him over pain and bodily ills. I read once a suggestive fable of a boat borne gaily on the sparkling waves of the summer sea. "What if a storm came?" mentally asked an onlooker. By-and-bye the sunshine faded, the wind rose mournfully, and the dark angry tempest roused the waves that had smiled so brightly. But, safe in storm as in calm, the little boat rode triumphantly still on the crest of the waves—"for its cable was of tempered metal, and it was anchored to a rock." There is no need, no reason, for life's storms to overwhelm you; reckon up your troubles as you may, you will find your mercies exceed them, and the troubles seem to grow dim before the sunlight of the assurance: "Even now God sees to me."

Will He look after you? Will He care for you in the time to come? Like many of us, you are, maybe, more frightened of to-morrow than of to-day; but the Master's love is not for the present hour alone. It is a provision for to-morrow: a certainty through that unknown future wherein He will walk with you and hold your hand. "I have loved thee," He says, "with an everlasting love." And His tenderness provides a promise for to-morrow, and every day to come: "Thy shoes shall be iron and brass, and as thy days so shall thy strength be." What to-morrow holds, need not trouble your heart, for God has promised never to leave you nor forsake you, and He will choose for you nothing but the tenderest, highest, best. Live a day at a time; there shall nothing be laid upon you beyond what your faith can gloriously bear. "You have more than you can carry," said a boy to his little brother, whose open arms were receiving parcels from the father. "Father knows how much I can carry," was the trustful reply. Let us, in the spirit of this little child, take rest in the certainty that all our Father appoints we shall be able to carry to His glory with trust and thanksgiving. "God sees to me"—God, who is all love, all power, all sympathy; therefore return unto thy rest, my soul! For even in the shadow-valley of weakness and depression my God is with me, and I will fear no evil.

THROUGH EVIL REPORT.

A STORY IN TWO CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER I.

THE neighbourhood of Clare Market is not quite the place where one would expect to find a born musician and a genius. Yet some twenty years ago, in the most squalid part of that malodorous locality, lived a little lad of ten who was both. He was a veritable street arab, with puckered, grimy face, tattered clothing, and ten small cold toes peeping out from his dilapidated boots.

How he loved music! His opportunities of hearing it were few. Even organ-grinders and German bands avoided Clare Market; though, indeed, their performances hardly merit the name of music. But at the corner of the fearful court in which was his home, stood a public-house, outside which a man and woman nightly took up their station.

The man played a harp, and the woman sang to his accompaniment. Her voice was full and rich, though sorely cracked and harsh in the upper notes, but this was because she sang in all weathers, and very loudly too. She sang all kinds of songs in her loud, strong voice, but one little listener liked the ballads best. He did not care much for the music-hall ditties, or the vocal waltzes, but he listened entranced to "Alice, where art thou?" and "The Banks of Allan Water." He led a wretched life, for his mother was always tipsy, and she beat him dreadfully. His father he had never known. But the other urchins pointed at him with disdainful finger and called out in their shrill treble: "Whose father was hung? Whose father was hung?"

So he only had the music and one other thing to comfort him; and that other was a puny little sister. Such a sickly, sallow baby, on whose pinched tiny face death was written, oh! so plainly, only the little lad could not see it. And day by day he sat on the door-step with her in his arms, or in summer-time he struggled along with his burden to Lincoln's Inn Fields or the river-side, with a vague childish feeling that the soft air and the lovely sunshine coming through the thick green of the trees might do her good, and bring a little colour into her pallid baby cheeks.

Yet, despite his loving, anxious care, she grew paler and thinner; till at last one hot night, when not a breath of air stirred in the court, when the woman sang outside the public-house, in which his mother stood drinking—on that hot, airless night the baby died. One sickly smile playing over the little wasted face, one short convulsive gasp, and he was left alone. And outside, the full strong voice sang, "On the banks of Allan Water, there a corse lay she."

He looked round the dreadful, filthy room; he listened to the oaths of the men and the shrill laughter of the women in the court below. Then, with a passion of sobs, he kissed the dead baby face, and never looking back, passed out of the room, down the rotten stairs, and so into the court. As he went along he passed his mother, who was reeling home singing a drunken snatch of song. She turned aside and tried to strike him, but he slunk away from her and went on down the narrow court. And as he went the boys cried after him: "Whose father was hung? Whose father was hung?"

And so he started to seek his fortune!

* * * * * *

It was fifteen years after, and an August day. In the sleepy old cathedral town of Longchester, everything was very still on that hot summer afternoon. The High Street was almost deserted. The doors of the quaint low shops stood wide open, but the shopkeepers were not visible—they were taking a siesta in the parlours behind. From the cathedral came the grand roll of the organ; though service was long since over, and the worshippers dispersed. And in the organ-loft the organist played on, lost to all else but his glorious art; playing now a stately fugue, now a dreamy nocturne, and sometimes he burst out into joyous little peals of melody, and sometimes into loud-swelling choruses. Below sat one listener—a bright-faced, brown-haired girl, and the sun, streaming through the stained-glass window, fell in great violet and amber splashes on her white muslin dress and sun-bonnet. The organ-blower was the only discontented one of the trio. The musician was happy, and so was the girl—in listening to him. But the blower was of coarser mould. His was hot work, and he thought longingly of the cooling tea awaiting him at home. At last, however, he was free; for the organist stopped, regretfully. The last note reverberated through the church, and he, divested of his surplice and hood, came hat in hand down the aisle. Then he caught sight of the girl, and a slight flush came over his pale earnest face, while she advanced shyly with kind little hand outstretched.

"I waited for you, Mr. Herapath," she said, "to tell you that I shall be leaving Longchester sooner than I expected, so I want to take three lessons a week if you will let me, instead of two. I want to be a clever organist, you know," she said playfully.

He looked down at the dainty figure in muslin draperies, at the flushed girlish face, with its grey-blue eyes, and soft peachy skin. There was a look almost of love in his face as he gazed on her. She could not see this, because the sun-bonnet was so very shady, and his tone was quite an ordinary one as he answered calmly—

"I should be delighted, Miss Wilton. What day will suit you best?"

"Friday, I think, if you can manage that day."

Then they walked out of the dim solemn old building into a bright blaze of sunshine. They went along the picturesque High Street, which stood on a hill, and had on each side old gabled houses, with latticed windows, and, in most cases, elaborate signs hanging out into the road. Presently they turned into a field, through which ran a clear babbling little brook, spanned by a rough wooden bridge. Just over the bridge and through one more field, and they must part, for Sylvia Wilton would be at home.

She was staying with her aunt in the prettiest of rose-covered cottages, while Thorold Herapath, the organist, had rooms at the other end of the town.

"Good-bye," he said, holding the little soft kid-clothed hand a second longer than was necessary. "Good-bye! You will be at the cathedral on Friday?"

"Good-bye," she said. "I will be there." And then looking up, she met the burning gaze of those big black eyes, and blushing hotly, the silly fluttering thing ran quickly into the cottage, up the oak staircase to a fragrant white bedroom, where, with brown head framed by rich yellow roses, she leant from the window, and with palpitating heart, and eyes even brighter than usual, watched the organist go down the road.

Readers of discernment will have divined long since that Thorold Herapath the talented young organist of Longchester Cathedral, and a tattered street arab whose unpoetical name was Edward or "Teddy" Robinson, are one.

Now, from London gutter-child to cathedral organist is a great jump, even allowing for the many and wonderful things which may happen in fifteen years. So, while the musician is walking dreamily along the quiet dusty road, with his heart throbbing quickly and his head full of the sweetest, prettiest girl in Christendom, we will enlighten our discerning reader still more, and explain how the poor neglected denizen of Clare Market is to-day a rapidly rising musical artist. It can be told in a very few words, because, somehow or other, genius will out, and as he was born to be an artist and nothing else, it followed in the natural sequence of events that he became one. For, after many vicissitudes, he got a situation at a piano shop, and, by a marvellous turn of Providence, an organist who bought music at his master's became interested in the little errand-boy with the bright open face and big black eyes, and learning of his passion for music, adopted him, being a widowed and childless man, and gave him the best musical training possible; so that at twenty-one his protégé was assistant organist of a big London church, and at twenty-five organist of Longchester Cathedral. His benefactor was dead now, so he was alone in the world, except, as sometimes he remembered with a shudder, that he might still have a mother—though by this time surely she was dead, too—a drunken, brutal creature, such as he remembered her when he was a wretched little waif of ten. He shuddered when he thought of her, because it was the one morbid dread of his life that she would find him and proclaim to his friends that he was bred in a gutter and was the son of a murderer—for had not the urchins cruelly taunted him and shouted that his father was hanged? He winced when he thought of it, and those jeering cries seemed to ring afresh in his ears.

But his thoughts were pleasant ones as he walked along the dusty high-road on this summer day. For he was thinking of the girl he loved, and who, he felt sure, loved him. It was only two months since Sylvia and her aunt had come to Rose Cottage, and yet he wondered how life could have seemed so full before he met her. Even music, he thought, could not now console him should he lose his mistress. So he went on till he came to the suburbs. For Longchester, dear quaint old town, was disfigured by two miles of ugly yellow-brick suburbs. He turned in presently at one of the smaller houses. It was where he lodged; and as he went up the garden path a blind moved ever so slightly at one of the upper windows next door, and a pair of watchful greenish eyes gleamed out.

They belonged to a dashing young widow, Mrs. Magnus Wood, and, though green in tint, they were really very magnificent eyes—large and brilliant, with long curling fringes of silky black. For the rest, the widow was not good-looking. Her nose was a snub, her mouth too wide, and her complexion, even through her powder, deplorably bad. But her figure was graceful, and she had a certain smart air and a cunning way of arranging her plenteous black tresses, which rendered her not unattractive to a casual observer.

And, though her victim never dreamed of such a thing, she meant to marry Thorold Herapath. She did not love him. She was a cold woman of the world, and a bit of an adventuress. Love had ever played a minor part in her life. Still, she was keen enough to see that the organist was a rising man, and, as his wife, the people of Longchester, hitherto so coy, would smile on her. For, despite her splendid eyes, her wonderful dresses, and her pretty bijou house, Longchester folk looked askance at this recent arrival, and the card-tray in her dainty drawing-room was almost empty. So for the last six weeks she had brought to bear the whole battery of her charms on unconscious Thorold Herapath—in vain. And, though she did not know it, she had not even a ghost of a chance now, for he had fallen a victim to sweet English girlhood and eighteen summers; and certainly ultra-fashionable gowns, and a smiling well-powdered face, had no power to make him swerve from his allegiance.

"He looks unusually bright," she said to herself. "I wonder what has happened?"

On a certain afternoon, some three weeks after, the widow discovered why he looked so happy, for, while taking a long solitary ramble, fate directed her steps to Rose Cottage. She had never been along the road before; she belonged to suburban Longchester, and therefore to a totally distinct "set" from Longchester proper.

So she looked admiringly at the white rose-covered cottage, with its long, untidy garden, surrounded by an old red-brick, lichen-covered wall. A peacock was strutting pompously on the lawn; tall golden sunflowers and pure stately lilies reared their heads above the low wall. The casement windows were wide open, for it was a hot, sleepy afternoon, and their ample draperies of cool blue, or creamy white, were flapping lazily in the gentlest of breezes. A velvety bumble-bee droned unceasingly as he went from flower to flower, and the beautiful peacock called out harshly from time to time, but everything else was very still.

She was a practical, inartistic woman, yet the simple, peaceful beauty of the homestead impressed her, and, shielding her face from the hot sun with her parasol, she walked along the dusty road outside the low brick wall. It was in parts just high enough to prevent anything being seen from the garden but the top of her red silk sunshade, but in some places low enough for her to catch occasional glimpses of the scented flowery old place. And, gently sauntering along, she presently saw something which made her splendid eyes flash dangerously, and a couple of bright red patches burn through her powder. It was a pretty picture—a fair rosy-cheeked girl, in a blue-grey cambric gown which matched her eyes: and by her side stood a tall passionate-looking man, whose face was lit up with love as he gazed admiringly at the pretty figure beside him. The girl was picking currants: her fingers were rosy with their juice, and, as she quickly stripped each ripe bunch, the sunbeams shone and scintillated on a diamond ring which encircled the third finger of her left hand.

The face of the woman outside the wall grew very dark, and she crouched low down and waited. She was quite close to the lovers, and when they spoke, every word would burn itself into her jealous listening ears.

Yet she did not love him, but she had planned to marry him. The name and protection of a good man meant so much to her: all her life she had striven after conventional respectability—had striven, oh! so hard, to get into society of some good kind, and all her life Mrs. Grundy had frowned her down: for was she not an adventuress? So, to be foiled by a baby-faced chit of a girl was maddening, and perhaps the very simplicity and youth of her rival made her hate her the more; for she was a simple-hearted girl herself once—long, long years ago.

XUM

So she crouched by the old wall and waited—till at last a clear voice broke the silence.

"Now you have given me this beautiful ring, Thorold darling, I suppose I must tell Auntie. But I didn't want to, dear, because it is so lovely to have a secret—such a secret! To know that you love me and I love you, more than anything or anyone else in the whole wide world! And for nobody to have a bit of a suspicion about it!"

Presently the girl spoke again.

"'Thorold Herapath!' It is a pretty name, but not like a real one, is it? More like the hero of a novel. . . .

"Why, Thorold, how pale you look! It is your name, surely, dear?"

There was a little pause. Even on the other side of the wall the woman could hear his heavy breathing.

"My darling," he said at last, "it is not my name. Some day, when you are my wife, my sweet, I will tell you the real one, and perhaps why I gave it up. And then, I will beg my Sylvia to forgive my reticence. Can you trust me, dear?"

The girl's voice came sweet and clear. "I will trust you always, darling. I will never believe any evil against you—never—unless you tell me to believe it, and that could never be."

Then, rising painfully from her crouching attitude, the woman peered cautiously over the wall; and there in the sunlight stood the girl, her long summer draperies falling on the bright green grass, her sweet trustful face upturned, and her lover's strong tender arms around her.

So the widow left them, but as she went lonely homeward, she revolved in her scheming brain a diabolical plan with which she meant to ruin, if she could, the happiness of two young lives. That evening she drew from a small tin box a folded paper, and, reading it through carefully, she put it in her pocket-book.

"It is a perfectly safe plan," she said, "for the girl has never seen me. She is almost a stranger here, and lives three miles away. At the worst, should I fail, I can but leave Longchester. All places are alike to me."

CHAPTER II.

Two days later the lovers stood at the garden gate.

"I shall only see you once more before I go," said Sylvia. "I will come for my lesson to-morrow afternoon. We leave for town in the evening."

"Puss!" said her lover fondly. "'T is but waste of a musician's time to give you organ lessons."

"Our lessons have been farcical lately," laughed the girl; "but how can one think of time and expression, and chords and discords, when one is in love—and with one's teacher?"

"And Tuesday—oh! Thorold—will be our last day together."

"Never mind, pet," he said cheerily. "I shall be in London in a month—and then—then we might be married."

"It is too soon, far too soon," she said decidedly, and shook her pretty head. But she smiled all the same.

"Now you must go, dear, or you will be late for the service at the cathedral. See, here is a rose—such a beauty! and a bit of maidenhair for your coat. Now, go."

She watched him out of sight, and shivered a little as she turned away. A cold dark cloud obscured the sun. The leaves on the trees and rose-bushes rustled faintly. A storm was near.

She went down the garden to the orchard, where she had left a book. As she went along by the wall a veiled head looked over, and a black-gloved hand beckoned her near. She went, wonderingly, and found herself close to a tall, graceful-looking woman—young, apparently, though her veil was so thick that nothing could be seen of her face save the restless sparkle of a pair of greenish eyes.

"I wanted to speak to you," she said, in a clear hard voice, "about the organist of Longchester cathedral."

"Do you mean Mr. Herapath?" asked Sylvia quietly, though her heart beat fast. She seemed to have a foreboding of coming evil.

The strange woman gave a cruel little laugh. "You may call him Mr. Herapath," she said; "I call him Edward Robinson. Because, you see"—she looked full in the fair flushing young face—"he is my husband!"

"It is not true!" said Sylvia indignantly. "I will never believe it. What proof have you?"

The tall woman pulled out a pocket-book, from which she brought two pieces of paper.

Sylvia took them eagerly and read them over: a marriage certificate and a newspaper cutting announcing the wedding.

It was between an Edward Robinson and a Letitia Savile, and the date was the 10th of February, 1879.

"Still, I do not know that these have any reference to Mr. Herapath," she said, giving the papers back.

"Nonsense!" replied the woman roughly. "What object do you think I should have in coming to you if I lied? I tell you, he is my husband. You thought he would marry you. He cannot, and would not now if he could. He thought I was dead; but he will soon know better."

She put her hand over the wall and seized the girl's delicate shoulder. "Listen to me!" she said imperiously; for Sylvia was staring at her with wide dry eyes, and her face was very pale.

"Listen to me!" repeated the woman, giving her a little shake. "Go away from this place and forget all about him. Events have treated you very badly," she went on, with a mocking smile. "Indeed, I feel sorry for you. Go away, silly little fluttering moth, and be thankful you have only singed your wings. We—my husband and I—had a little tiff, such as married people will have, you know. Then we parted, and I went abroad, and fell dangerously ill, and was reported as dead. But it was all a mistake, you see. I feel sorry for you ; I do indeed."

The storm was near ; the clouds were sullen and black, while a few heavy raindrops fell on Sylvia's uncovered brown head. The soft splash of the water seemed to bring her to her senses. All the time that the woman had mocked her with cruel, bitter words, Sylvia had stood with white face, and blank vacant eyes ; but now her pale lips moved.

"I will not believe this story till I hear it from Mr. Herapath," she said. Then, with a touch of girlish dignity, she bent her little curly head and went towards the house.

The widow watched her out of sight ; then gave a soft chuckle.

"That marriage certificate of mine did capital duty," she said triumphantly. "In fact, the whole plan works well. As to speaking to Thorold, she won't do anything of the kind. She is a proud, sensitive girl, and I hit her very hard. She leaves Longchester to-morrow, so the coast will be clear. And, with her out of the way, I shall manage him easily. I have done things much more difficult."

But she did not know the power and trustfulness of pure womanly love. For next day Sylvia, heavy-eyed and anxious, climbed up to the organ-loft. And when she saw Thorold at the organ, she gave a wan little smile.

"Now," thought the poor child, "everything will be made right. My darling will tell me the truth, and I shall laugh at my foolish fears." Still, her heart sank as she marked his dejected attitude. In truth, he had almost as much cause for anxiety as she. Since yesterday he, too, had met an unwelcome stranger. And, while his little love hesitates on the narrow stairs, we will go back to yesterday and see what happened then.

When Thorold Herapath left Sylvia at the garden gate, he went happy and light-hearted down the road, looking back from the bend of the path to catch a last glimpse of the little figure he loved so well. The smile which came to his lips at sight of her had scarce faded away, when at the roadside he saw a wretched tramp—a woman, coarse and bloated in feature, filthy and ragged in dress. Such a sorry specimen of womanhood—so low had she fallen! Her dusty, wiry-looking hair came in stiff wisps from under the tawdry battered bonnet. Her gown, of light material and last year's fashion, was covered with patches of grease, and its numerous frillings, furbelows, and draperies hung torn and ragged on the dusty ground. A sorry, sorry specimen of womanhood ; yet some indefinable feeling of pity, of sympathy, made him eye her, not with looks of aversion, but compassion.

As she came up whining for charity, he put his hand in his pocket, and drew forth a silver coin. The tramp took it greedily. Then, with a curious look into his handsome open face, she shuffled along by his side, muttering inarticulate words and calling down the blessings of Heaven on his head.

He was annoyed, at last, by her importunity, and facing her with a stern look, bade her get about her business. And as he did so a strange feeling of horror came over him, for the sodden drunken face seemed familiar. A light of recognition crept, too, into the woman's bleared sunken eyes, and so, each half-conscious of the other's identity, mother and son stood face to face.

"I'm hot and thirsty, kind gentleman," she said, "a poor lone widow, with no one to look after me. I had a son once, but he ran away and left his mother. Fifteen years ago that was, when I lived in Clare Market, and he was a little 'un of ten."

She leered cunningly up into her hearer's face, which was ghastly white and very stiff.

"See here," she said at once: "you're my son Teddy, and you seem by the look of you to have done well ; so now, my lad, look after your poor old mother. I saw you courting that fine lady. Little she'd think of you if she knew all. But I'll tell her, unless you pay me to keep my mouth shut. I'll tell all your fine friends that I'm your mother, and as to your father——"

A look of absolute horror came into the man's set face. He thought of Sylvia, sweet and pure both body and soul, and then looked into the face held close to his—his mother's. The odour of her hot brandy-tainted breath was borne to him—and he moved away.

Blame him not! He had not one fond memory of the woman who called him son, whom he had not seen or heard of for years, and whom he had practically regarded as dead. Nothing but kicks and blows, and coarse terrible words, hurled at him daily for ten years of his life. What wonder that not one natural feeling of love came to his heart—only horror and loathing, and an overpowering desire to be free of her? So, with long rapid strides, he went away down the road. She shuffled after him in her miserable dilapidated shoes, shrieking threats and curses as she went. But she soon lost sight of him, and, nearing a public-house, she clutched the half-crown he had given her in her dirty palm, and entered—there to soak herself with drink till darkness fell and they turned her out into the black still road. And stumbling along in a drunken, helpless way, she came near a pond—a slimy green-covered pool. And, being utterly incapable of securing her safety, she leaned too heavily, in her stupid sleepy way, against the frail railing which surrounded it. A minute after, the green waters closed over a ragged, helpless figure—but still a woman's. Once, too, she must have been a bright, innocent girl ; or, if even then her life was marred, at least a smiling, unconscious infant, straight from God's hand. So her life ended.

She could never harm her son now. But, as he leaned despondingly against the organ, he did not know this. He would never know how that poor wretched life ended. So, as Sylvia came softly up to him, the face he turned towards her was anxious and questioning. He thought he read his doom in her swollen eyes and pale cheeks.

And Sylvia, poor girl, had rehearsed in her mind a dozen times what she would say to him, how she would say it. She would be dignified, cold, trustful, pleading—anything, everything but what she was. For she just put up her hands to her face, and sobbed as though her heart would break.

Her lover gently drew down her hands and looked sorrowfully into her face.

"Has she told you, then?" he faltered, wondering how and when his mother could have met her.

"Oh, Thorold, Thorold," cried the girl, "say it is not true! My darling, I told her, that terrible woman, that I did not believe it; that I never would till you told me so yourself. It cannot be true. Say it is not!" she cried passionately. But he said never a word.

"She told me that your name was Robinson," the girl went on rapidly, "that she was your—— Oh, Thorold," she cried piteously, "it is true!"

For a glance at his agonised face told her he was guilty.

"Forgive me, Sylvia. It is true," he said hoarsely. "Forgive me, darling. I loved you so. I would have told you some day. I thought she was no longer living."

He came forward and tried to take her little hands; but she recoiled from him, crying, "Do not touch me. Your affection is now an insult to me."

"An insult!" he echoed. "Oh, Sylvia!"

"An insult, an insult!" she repeated vehemently. "I will go away," she said, putting out her hand and groping for the stair-rail: she was blind with tears and pain. "I will go away and never see your face again. It was not your fault, perhaps, but you have broken my heart. Good-bye!"

"Stay a moment, one moment!" he cried. "Look in my eyes, Sylvia, and tell me if you really mean that we must part."

She raised her tear-stained face and looked full into his. As she did so, the widow's cruel mocking voice rang in her ears—"I feel sorry for you; I do indeed."

And her voice and face were alike hard and cold as she said, "We must part."

"Let me plead with you once more," he urged.

But she drew back indignantly.

"At least grant me one thing," he said in a dull pained voice. "Let me play you a farewell—there is no shame in that, Sylvia."

"Sylvia took them eagerly, and read them over."—p. 246.

She suffered him to lead her to a seat, and she listened stupidly while the notes of Mendelssohn's beautiful allegretto, from the symphony of the "Hymn of Praise," rolled through the church.

It was the burial of her love—her life's happiness, and Thorold played on with the passion and fervour of his whole soul; till, as the last chord died sobbingly away, he fell face forward on the keys. He had fainted.

His fall roused Sylvia from her stupor. She ran forward, and tenderly lifted his unconscious head. A rush of pity entered her heart as she looked at the dear white face. But she knew she must not stay, so with one half-stifled sob she left him to the care of the organ-blower, who now came forward from his retreat with some simple restoratives.

And that night the poor girl went back to London.

* * * * * *

It is five years after, and a grey November forenoon. In St. James's Park are very few people, for it is a cold cheerless day. But by the water-side walks a young man with a clever handsome face, and a pair of big brilliant black eyes—Thorold Herapath. The five years have brought him fame, for he is known now outside Longchester circles. He is recognised as one of the leading musicians of the day. A cantata of his is to be given in London, so he is in town to conduct the performance.

Yet he walks moodily along on this grey day, for he is not a happy man. He has never forgotten the fair little love that he lost five years ago.

She is close to him now, so close that, looking up, their eyes meet—for she is coming along by the water too.

She has altered sadly in the five years that have gone. Her eyes, once so soft and dreamy, are bluer and more starry now. Perhaps this is because her cheeks are so thin and pale—for the roses have faded. Her simple gown is black; a demure little bonnet is on her brown head, a severe black bow tied under her rounded, dimpled chin. When she sees her former lover, she holds out her little hand, and a faint colour comes into her sad young face.

"Mr. Herapath!"

Her aunt is dead. She is earning her living as a governess—such cheerless drudgery, that for a moment she forgets the gulf which stands between them, and only dwells on the memory of a perfect summer, five years ago. But memory comes back all too soon, leaving her white and ashamed, with downcast face and hanging head.

A great light leaps into Thorold's eyes, and he goes quickly up to the little dreary black figure.

"Sylvia, my dear one!" he said. "Have we met at last?"

She lifted her white face and said painfully, "You must go away."

"Do not, do not send me away," he whispered. "Forgive me, love. Believe me, I have atoned for my deception by suffering. The past—my past, can never be altered. Forget all about it, my darling, and come to me. I love you so!"

She looked up indignantly, with flaming cheeks. "You have no right to love me, to speak to me so," she said angrily. "Your love is another woman's—your wife whom you once thought to have died."

"My wife!" he said, staring at her in bewilderment. "I have no wife. I never had a wife."

"No wife!" she said, and swayed from side to side. "Then who was the woman I saw?"

He took her passive hand and led her to a seat.

"Rest here," he said gently, with a great hope rising in his heart. "You will be better soon, and then we will explain to one another. There has been some terrible misunderstanding."

Then, under the leafless trees in the quiet deserted park, crooked paths were made straight, and as Thorold told the story of his early life to his sweetheart, he read no disdain—only infinite love and pity in her clear eyes.

"It must have been Mrs. Wood you saw," he said presently. "Wretched woman! But you will not be troubled by her again, dear; she left Longchester three years ago."

"There are only two things I cannot understand," said Sylvia. "The certificate she showed me had the name Edward Robinson, and that is really your surname. Then, I cannot understand how it is you never saw your mother again."

"The similarity of surnames must have been simply a curious coincidence," said Thorold. "As to my poor mother, I do not know her fate. But she and Mrs. Wood, Sylvia, belong to a dead and painful past; we will bury it." ALICE L. DUDENEY.

THE MANIFESTATION OF CHRIST TO JOHN THE BAPTIST.

BY THE REV. GORDON CALTHROP, M.A., PREBENDARY OF ST. PAUL'S.

"Then cometh Jesus from Galilee to the Jordan unto John, to be baptised of him."—ST. MATTHEW iii. 13.

IT is far from being impossible that the two lads, Jesus of Nazareth and John of Hebron, met in Jerusalem at the Passover of which St. Luke speaks in the second chapter of his Gospel. They were both of about the same age, and the opportunity which this particular festival afforded them of being introduced into the fulness of their covenant-responsibility would be equally suitable to each. Jesus, we know, was brought up by His parents from Galilee; and John would hardly have been left at home by his father Zacharias, if Zacharias were living (as he might well have been) at the time, and were not too infirm to allow of him coming up from his native town to attend the services in the holy city. Now, Jesus and John were closely related—they were cousins; and they were certainly animated by the same spirit of religious enthusiasm. And we venture therefore to suppose that the two boys did meet in Jerusalem on this memorable occasion, and stand side by side when the sacrifices were being offered, and the prayers and praises of the worshipping assembly were rising up into the ears of the Lord God of Hosts.

But, if so, what a remarkable diversity displayed itself in their subsequent careers! One of them, Jesus, goes back into Galilee to lead an ordinary human life. He dwells in the cottage of His reputed father, Joseph; He works at the trade of a common village artisan; He mingles with the peasantry of the neighbourhood, meeting them in the market-place, and attending the services of the synagogue; He eats and drinks and dresses like other people—there is nothing exceptional about Him, beyond His singular purity and goodness. Whilst the other, John, disgusted with the hollowness of the religious society at Jerusalem, and feeling himself incapable of amending it, retires to the wild and rugged wilderness of Judæa, and in a cavern scooped out of the side of one of the many ravines in that locality, spends his days in lonely meditation and communion with God. Holding himself entirely aloof from all association with his fellow-men, he gives himself up to asceticism. His food is locusts and wild honey; his drink the water of the mountain torrent that rushes through the ravine in which he dwells; his dress a rough covering of camel's hair, with a girdle of skins about his loins; and where he is, there he remains until the conviction forces itself in upon him, and grows stronger and more irresistible every day—that the Christ is at hand: and that he (John) has been set apart and called by God to be the herald of His approach.

With such singular divergence of method, and in these widely separated localities, the two cousins whom God intended ultimately to bring together were being prepared for their meeting. I think I may say "unconsciously" prepared; at least, as far as John was concerned. Jesus—as we have already seen—when in the Temple, awoke to the understanding of His mysterious relation to the Father, and knew that He had a work to do. Yet even in His case there must have been a growing perception, an increasing knowledge; and the years, as they rolled over His head, must have brought with them a clearer view and a firmer grasp of the truth which had been revealed to Him on the occasion of His first visit to Jerusalem. With John, the process was probably a slower one. When he first left Hebron and took up his abode in the wilderness of Judæa, we suppose him to have had no idea whatever of the future that was in store for him. He merely meant to seek God in solitude, for he found that he could not seek Him in the midst of a corrupt and hypocritical generation. He had no intention of becoming a great and conspicuous man. Probably such a thought never entered his mind. But as he meditated and prayed and pored over the pages of the prophets—especially of the prophet Isaiah—the vision of the Christ rose upon him in all its glory. Then came the conviction that the Christ was near at hand; and then—the Divine impulse which drove him out from his cavern to proclaim to mankind the approach of the Kingdom of Heaven.

It was shortly after this event occurred that the two relatives met. The voice of John had pealed in thunder throughout the land, and the whole nation had started up at the call. "The Kingdom of God!"—it was what everyone was looking for. Few, indeed, understood its real nature. To the apprehension of most the proclamation spoke of temporal blessings; of peace and plenty for the people; of assured ecclesiastical distinction for the priesthood; of honours for the ambitious; of success for the laborious; and certainly of freedom for all from the yoke of the hated Roman oppressor. And we cannot wonder that, under the circumstances, thousands and tens of thousands of Jews from all parts of the country—men of every rank and station, and men in every conceivable state of feeling and expectation—flocked to the banks of the Jordan either to hear what this strange prophet had to say to them, or to ascertain what message he had been commissioned to deliver from the Lord God of His people Israel.

After a while, John appears to have moved higher up the banks of the stream in the direction of the Lake of Galilee; the people still swarming to his baptism. The moral aspect of the scene is by this time a very striking one. The preaching of the prophet has touched and roused the conscience of the nation; and there they stand—a dense mass, with the prophet at their head—waiting for the figure of the Christ to emerge out of the darkness into which they gaze. Neither John nor his followers know who it is that is coming. "I knew Him not," he says. But both know that someone is coming, and that this someone is the Messiah. And John knows that he has the means of recognising Messiah when He comes. "Upon whom thou shalt see the Spirit descending and remaining upon Him, the same is He that baptiseth with the Holy Ghost." There, then, they stand—the people and John—in an attitude of expectation, eagerly peering out into the future, when Jesus, leaving His quiet home in Galilee, presents Himself in the crowd as a candidate for the rite of baptism. This is the first time, we suppose, that the cousins had seen each other since the day they met as boys in the Temple courts of Jerusalem, eighteen years before. And the obscurity in which Jesus had lived, and the seclusion which John so rigorously observed, would, we suppose, have effectually prevented the latter from forming any idea of the true character of his relative. It is difficult, then, to understand why John should have declined the responsibility of admitting Jesus to the baptism which he administered. Possibly, however, he may have received some sort of Divine intimation on the subject; or possibly there may have been something in the Saviour's appearance and manner which convinced John that He was a superior being to himself; or possibly, again, some recollections of that association with Jesus at the time of the old Passover-feast may have occurred to his mind with a novel force and significance: or, it may be, all these things put together may have wrought in him the conviction of the greatness of Jesus, and of his own unworthiness to baptise Him.

XUM

But why (it may be asked) did Jesus apply for a baptism which is called a "baptism of repentance?" In Him was no sin, and we find, as a matter of fact, that He went straightway up out of the waters of the Jordan without making any confession at all. Again, it is hard to speak positively about such a matter; but the explanation probably lies in the fact that the baptism of John was really a ceremony of admission into the Kingdom—a ceremony not necessarily associated with the confession of sins, unless the candidate for admission had sins to confess. Out of the wreck of a rapidly decaying world a new order of things had arisen—like a Temple—offering refuge, shelter, and the opportunity of worship for all who were inclined to enter in. And through the doorway of that Temple He, who was the forerunner of the vast crowd, must himself pass. "It becometh us to fulfil all righteousness." But the process of passing, though a consecrating process for all, was one of purification only for those who needed it.

But now let us advance to consider the results of the baptism of John in the case of Jesus of Nazareth.

I. In the first place, of course, the circumstances of the baptism put John in a position to fulfil the purpose for which he had been prepared and sent into the world—that of bearing witness to the great Expected, who was at that time also the great Unknown. Centuries before, it had been foretold by the prophet that a messenger should go before the face of the King to prepare His way: that a voice crying in the wilderness should herald His approach, and rouse the nation into an attitude of eager anticipations. These prophecies must be fulfilled. And when the Baptist saw the bright Shekinah-light descending from heaven and resting with a hovering motion like that of a dove upon the person of Jesus, and when he heard the awful voice of the Father sounding from the sky, he knew that they were fulfilled, and he knew also that his own mission was drawing nigh to its close. He seems to have borne a manifold testimony to Jesus. He presents Jesus in so many different points of view. He is, he says, the fulfilment of the Scriptures; the personage of whom Moses in the Law and the Prophets did write. Here we have the Messiahship of Jesus. He is, he says, the "Son of God;" a phrase which, though not at the time completely filled with meaning, yet points to the inaccessible position which Jesus, as we know now, holds as the Eternal Son of the Eternal Father. Then passes before us the sacrificial work of Jesus: for He is the Lamb of God which taketh away the sins of the world. And then the gifts which He is exalted to bestow upon His people: for it is "He that baptiseth with the Holy Ghost."

It seems likely enough that to Jesus and John alone was the sacred light visible and the voice from heaven audible, the crowd on the banks being only dimly conscious that something mysterious was going on, and not being able to enter into the inner significance of the thing. And if so, we may speak of the incident of the baptism in the Jordan as one of the manifestations of Jesus—as the occasion when He was manifested to the great herald, whose business it was to make known His advent to the Jewish nation, and through the nation to the world at large.

II. In the next place, the baptism of John must have had a very marked effect upon Jesus Himself. Maintaining as we do not only the perfect Godhead but the perfect humanity of our blessed Lord, we do not hesitate to believe in the development of His mind and character, and in the gradual unfolding to Him of the great idea of His Messianic life. He was—we feel sure—Divinely educated, and Divinely educated by degrees. We have seen that His relation to the Father had been grasped by Him (perhaps not in its entirety) when He first appeared in the Temple. Simultaneously with that self-revelation rose up in His mind the thought, the belief, the strong overwhelming persuasion that He was to be employed about His Father's business. But what was that business? At the moment, perhaps, He scarcely knew. He was haunted by ideas—grand and glorious, but at the same time dim and indistinct. In the quiet eighteen years at Nazareth, the thoughts would take shape; and just as John began to see more and more clearly that Messiah was at hand, and that it was his special mission to announce His advent, so Jesus would see ever more and more clearly that His work for the Father —the Father's "business"—was the Messianic work spoken of in the pages of Holy Scripture. The culminating point would be the baptism of John. Perhaps even then (I do not know) the Saviour had something yet to learn about the nature of the task assigned Him, and the intense suffering in which He would be involved by undertaking it. And perhaps it was for this purpose, amongst others, that He was brought into conflict so soon after His baptism with the personal head of the kingdom of darkness; it being necessary, as we may suppose, that He should become acquainted by actual experience with the wiles, the malignity, the depths of Satan, the fierce and unrelenting antagonism, the subtle devices of the adversary whom He had come to overthrow. But certainly, at the period we speak of, He knew with a force and distinctness and an emphasis not experienced before, that He was now set apart for the establishment of God's Kingdom of Righteousness upon earth. The day of His baptism was the day of His direct and formal consecration, when He received His great commission from the hands of the Father Himself.

And with the consecration came two things—equipment for the task, and the assurance of the Father's love and favour. Both were needed. Up to the present moment, it may be questioned whether Jesus had been able to work a miracle at all. I think He had not. I think His humanity had not yet been endowed with supernatural gifts for such a purpose. But now—the Holy Spirit having come down upon Him, come without measure—Jesus is conscious of the inflow of a mighty power, which, under the direction of the Father, will lay all the forces of the world—visible and invisible—at His feet. "God has now anointed Him with the Holy Ghost and with power," and He goes out to proclaim that the "Spirit of the Lord God is upon Him."

Observe, also, that for such a nature as that of Jesus—intensely conscious of the Father; intensely devoted to the Father; living, if I may so say, upon the Father's smiles—the assurance of the Father's favour, at the outset of a great work (and this was indeed the greatest of all works), was absolutely necessary. And this assurance was granted when the voice sounded from heaven, "This is My beloved Son in whom I am well pleased."

Let us not be afraid of the doctrine of the true and real humanity of our Lord Jesus Christ. It is as essential to Christianity as the doctrine of the true and real Godhead. And then—accepting the humanity, let us accept also the fact of the education of Christ, of the growth of His mind, of the development of His ideas. With Him, as with us, enlightenment must have been gradual. But does not the Scripture say so? "Jesus increased" (advanced) "in wisdom and in stature, and in favour with God and man."

A HOME IN SICKNESS.

A VISIT TO THE BOLINGBROKE PAY HOSPITAL, WANDSWORTH.

BY HENRY FRITH.

THE railway labyrinth known as Clapham Junction is the station at which we alight, and an intelligent porter at once points out the way to our destination.

"Cross the railway just beyond the schools there—that tall, red building you see; then bear to the right, up a shady road by the cemetery, which you will notice at once. That road is Bolingbroke Grove; and the Hospital is on the left—about fifteen minutes from here, sir."

Following these instructions, we quickly reached the Grove, and, after a few minutes' walking, found ourselves standing outside the railing of a white three-storeyed building, which, as a board informs us, is Bolingbroke House: a Home in Sickness—the "Pay" Hospital of which we were in search. It consists of a plain main building and two wings. A good-sized shady garden in front, and some grounds at the back, ensure a free passage of air; the soft south and west winds are permitted free access, while the ruder easterly and northerly breezes are prevented from encroaching by the environment of houses at the sides and back.

The Hospital faces nearly south-west, having the open space of Wandsworth Common in front. The entrances are at the sides—a small gate in the north paling, and a carriage entrance on the southerly side. We may enter by either gate, and ring the bell at the glazed entrance-door.

We have not to wait long under the portico, and on inquiry for the house-surgeon are immediately ushered into the presence of Dr. Lyster, who, in the kindest manner, consents to accompany us over the Hospital.

"I shall be ready in a minute or two," he says. "You saw the attendant just now? I am wanted in one of the wards.—Bring another cup and saucer," he continued to the servant.

For Dr. Lyster was going to indulge in his five-o'clock tea, a meal he shares with his faithful little spaniel, which, after a while, welcomes us as kindly as her master. We pass our interval of waiting in examining the photographs of the Naval Volunteer schooner Dawn, in which Mr. Lyster has made some professional trips; but in five minutes he again enters the room, and places himself at our service.

The first impression we receive in this Pay Hospital is the sensation of coolness and comfort: wide staircases, hall, and corridors, spacious airy rooms, and excellent ventilation. This impression is deepened as we cross the well-lighted entrance-hall or vestibule, and enter a ward devoted to male patients. This is the Verdon Ward, and contains five beds.

The patients, with their attendant, in this spacious chamber, are very comfortable. Neat screens divide the beds, as curtains do in upper wards. There are flowers, fresh air, and the light is skilfully tempered to suit all requirements. In this ward the patients tell you of their treatment, and the comparatively small payments they make for what are virtually home comforts, regular attendance, and the attention of medical officers of the highest reputation in the London hospitals. Of course, if any patient prefers his usual medical adviser, he can have him to see him at any time. There is no restriction.

Another large apartment, also on the ground floor, is named Elvington. This is sometimes used as a committee-room. On the occasion of our visit it was occupied by a private patient who was enjoying the society of his friends, on whom we did not intrude. Another ward—the Cazenove Ward, for women—is on the same floor. Here we found four patients, cheerful and chatty, who were enjoying some excellent tea and bread and butter. We were informed of particulars in each case, and all were doing well. These cases were too severe for home treatment, and yet the patients were of a class who shrink from the larger hospitals. So the Pay Hospital received them, and although severe and critical operations were needed in some cases, and in others feared, the former were successfully accomplished; and the dreaded knife by skilful treatment avoided, in other cases, with conspicuous success.

In the case of a tricycle accident continual watching was necessary, the brain and scalp having been injured. But the staff proved equal to the severe demands made upon it, and the patient is convalescent. The ladies tell you how comfortable and well-fed they are, with their home comforts about them, and with much more attention than anyone could hope to have in their circumstances if at home or with friends; while in the cases of servants, governesses, and others who are dependent, the gain is truly incalculable.

Ascending the wide staircase, we must not omit to notice the historical clock—a feature of Bolingbroke House—and then we pass into the female surgical ward, in which are four beds. Such operations as those for cancer and severe abscess, and others unnecessary to name, are here performed by first-rate surgeons. We then successively enter the Harriet and Wheeler Wards, and venture to peep into the Matron's sitting-room in her absence—a cheerful, roomy apartment, adjoining her sleeping-room.

Up-stairs, on the higher floor, are the private wards for patients who prefer to be alone. All these rooms are large, airy, and nicely fitted. The ventilation is admirably managed by the doors in the highest storey, by means of which an imperceptible amount of fresh air is continually directed through the building. The sanitary arrangements, it is hardly necessary to say, are perfect. In the basement are the extensive kitchens and culinary offices, and the "Wandsworth Common Provident Dispensary," which makes up the medicines for the hospital, in addition to its other beneficent work.

Concerning the patients themselves there is something to be said. All ordinary medical and surgical cases are admitted; but what strikes one is the general cheerfulness and brightness which prevail. There does not seem to be any despondent inmate: from the doctor to the last probationer, all are lively, if one may so speak. In many cases the patients scarcely pay the expenses incurred, and some are a decided loss to the Institution; but they are admitted, nevertheless, for there is a true charity existing in the minds of those in charge of Bolingbroke House.

The payments vary from two to three guineas a week, and in some cases even less than the former sum. This includes medical attendance and board, with every comfort. Special operations may necessitate special fees, but this is a matter for arrangement. The percentage of cures is remarkable. Notwithstanding the severity of the operations in numerous cases, and some diseases of many years' standing, there were only thirteen deaths in the one hundred and ten patients admitted during the year 1887—88. Sixty-five persons were discharged cured, and thirty-two were relieved.

The inhabitants of the populous districts of Battersea and Clapham are—not too soon—beginning to rouse themselves to the existence of the benefits which lie so close to them, and the result of last year's working is the most satisfactory of any period since the opening of the Pay Hospital. There is no doubt that this species of institution will be in great demand, and were the benefits of Bolingbroke House more widely appreciated, many supposed incurable cases would be relieved, and many poor people would be saved the cost, worry, and anxiety of nursing friends and relatives at home; for in the Bolingbroke Pay Hospital they have a "Home in Sickness," where they or their relations, for a small sum weekly, may enjoy every comfort, and even luxuries to which ordinary hospital patients cannot aspire.

YOUTH.

THE hoary years renew their youth
In tender flushes, roseate hues,
And winter weeps away her frost
In early rains and fragrant dews.

We cannot, if we would, forget
The early rapture of life's spring—
Those quick pulsations stir again
When swallows are upon the wing.

And youth, with summer in her veins,
In sweet accord with earth and skies—
A harp by viewless fingers stirred—
Is one with nature's harmonies.

The hoary years renew their youth,
And strains prophetic fall as dew
Upon the fair, awakened earth,
"Behold, I will make all things new!"

CLARA THWAITES.

DISGUISED BLESSINGS AND CURSES.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "HOW TO BE HAPPY THOUGH MARRIED."

THINGS are not what they seem. We sometimes mistake prosperity for adversity, gain for loss, and vice versâ. We often look gratefully back to some event, which at the time seemed the worst thing that could have happened to us, as the cause of much happiness and prosperity; and, on the other hand, we come to shudder at what once appeared the thing most to be desired.

It did not seem to a lady, of whom I have heard, a blessing when she was robbed; and yet she discovered before long that this was the case. She had directed her solicitor to invest a large sum of money in shares of the City of Glasgow Bank some months prior to its collapse. Imagining that her instructions had been carried out, she heard the news of the closing of the bank's doors with dismay, as the claim of the creditors would have entailed her total ruin. The subsequent discovery, however, of her agent's embezzlement revealed the groundlessness of her apprehensions, her loss being limited to the amount entrusted to her dishonest representative. On the other hand, the unlucky recipient of a single City of Glasgow Bank share as a wedding-present should for once have looked a gift-horse in the mouth, and had no reason to congratulate himself on his father-in-law's liberality, involving, as it did, the loss of all he possessed.

To curse his enemy, so to speak, a member of a certain club, where the person disliked was being balloted for, put in a black ball. It turned out that by doing so he had done the opposite of what he had intended—he had blessed rather than cursed him. The rule was that twenty members at the least should vote, so by adding his twentieth ball, even though it were a black one, to nineteen white ones, he had unconsciously and unwillingly elected him.

> "We, ignorant of ourselves,
> Beg often our own harms, which the wise Powers
> Deny us, for our good; so find we profit
> By losing of our prayers."

This has, more or less, been the experience of us all. Our prayers were not answered at the time, or in the way we wished, and afterwards we came to see that this was a blessing in disguise, and that if they had been so answered we should have been cursed. When the Israelites tempted God, "He gave them their desire, and sent leanness withal into their souls."

A writer on "The Orkneys and Shetland" tells the following:—A native of Hoy went one day to his minister, and said: "Oh, sir, but the ways of Providence are wonderful! I thought I had met with a sair misfortune when I lost baith my coo and my wife at aince over the cliff, twa months sin; but I gaed over to Graemsay, and I hae gotten a far better coo, and a far bonnier wife."

This reminds me of a man I heard of, who, in his youth, was desperately in love with a certain lady. He thought that he could not live without her, and felt broken-hearted when she refused to marry him. Years afterwards he died, and in his will left her a considerable sum of money, "as a small return for your kindness in refusing to marry me, for I have had a happy bachelor's life, and I feel sure, from what I since learned of myself and of you, that if we had married we should have made each other very miserable."

Writing about children, a lady tells us that she had a relation who was married some years without having a child. Her feelings partook not only of grief, but of anguish. At length a lovely boy was granted her. "Spare, O God, the life of my blessing," was her constant prayer. Her blessing was spared. He grew to manhood, squandered a fortune, and broke his mother's heart.

"Give me children, or else I die," said the impatient and weeping Rachel. Her prayer was heard, and at the birth of her boy the mother died. Another impassioned mother, as she bent over the bed of her sick infant, called out, "Oh, no; I cannot resign him." A person present, struck with her words, noted them down in a daily journal which he kept. The boy recovered: and that day one-and-twenty years he was hanged as a murderer!

The fact is that in this strange, unintelligible world, things are so related that we know not what may be the result of any given set of circumstances. "The best laid schemes of mice and men gang aft a-gley." Some little factor that we did not notice, or that seemed too small to be attended to, makes its disturbing influences felt, and forces upon us the truth of the saying—"Man proposes, God disposes."

I know a man who suffers the keenest remorse when he makes a mistake, even when he has done his best. This is very unphilosophical, for without omniscience it is impossible to know what in any particular juncture of affairs is the wisest course to take. A pilot once undertook to steer a vessel out of a very dangerous harbour, and he said to the captain, "Now, you take the wheel, and I will stand amidships, and give you warning when we come near the rocks, for I know every rock." He did so, and no warning was given by the pilot, but presently, as the vessel went along, she gave a violent bump, which threw everybody on board down. The pilot, looking rather foolish, then said to the captain,

"There is one of them." Alas! we are like that pilot, for we often only know of a rock when we are upon it. All we can do is to act up to the light we have, and leave the rest to a Pilot who can be trusted as no earthly one can. "In the morning sow thy seed, and in the evening withhold not thy hand: for thou knowest not whether shall prosper either this or that, or whether they both shall be alike good." "The lot is cast into the lap; but the whole disposing thereof is of the Lord." "So then neither is he that planteth anything, neither he that watereth; but God, that giveth the increase."

"Call no man happy until he die," was a precept suggested by the experience of life; for the happiness a man is enjoying to-day may cause him misery to-morrow, just as the relations and interactions of things may develop a future blessing out of what seems now to be a bitter curse. Even death itself may be a blessing in disguise. When his judges pronounced sentence of death upon him, Socrates said, "You, my judges, should cherish good hope on the subject of death, and remain firmly convinced of this one thing—that for a good man, no event can be evil, whether he lives or dies, seeing that his concerns are never disregarded by God. Nor does that which now happens to me happen without purpose on God's part, for I am persuaded that it is better for me to die and have done with the things of this world. And now it is time that we separate. I go to die, you remain to live, but which of us is going the better way, God alone knows." Shall we who profess and call ourselves Christians have less faith than this man who never heard of Christ? Shall we believe less than Socrates that for a good man "no event can be evil, seeing that his concerns are never disregarded by God?"

WINGS OF THE MORNING.

CHAPTER XII.—THE NEW LIFE OPENS.

THE bungalow taken for Sir Richard was on Malabar Hill, the most beautiful and fashionable suburb of Bombay. It is some distance from the Port, but the drive is enchanting. The travellers were driven first through the European quarter of Bombay, which is magnificent with large spaces and fine public buildings, each of which has room about it, so that its towers and pillared porticoes and balconies can be perfectly well seen. Then the spaces between the buildings are planted with trees—spreading fig and golden-blossomed acacia, and the banyan sending down ragged stems to the earth; and in the enclosed garden of the square in which they stand there is colour—glowing colour—from the masses of purple Bougainvillea that at this season throws itself over tree-stems and railings; and marigolds and sunflowers, not pale as we know them, but burning with vivid gold, and crimson Poinsettias flaming in the sun, that marvellous sun of the East that glorifies everything upon which its light falls. And these wonders of colour are set in the midst of foliage rich and cool, whose forms are strange to the English travellers. "Can that be a palm?" asks Thekla, as she sees a springing, slender stem and a crown of feathery green against the deep blue of the sky. "Yes, yes; it must be! It is!" As she hangs out of the carriage, looking with all her eyes, which are beginning to smart in the dazzling light, she feels that she is really in the East.

These are tree-ferns! How beautiful and graceful they look! And that plant with the gigantic leaves of a glossy dark green, many of them ragged and fringed—can it be the plantain? After this it is scarcely strange to see the people, dark-limbed and statuesque, with turbans on their heads and red and white clothes about their bodies, who move slowly through the wide and sunlit thoroughfares.

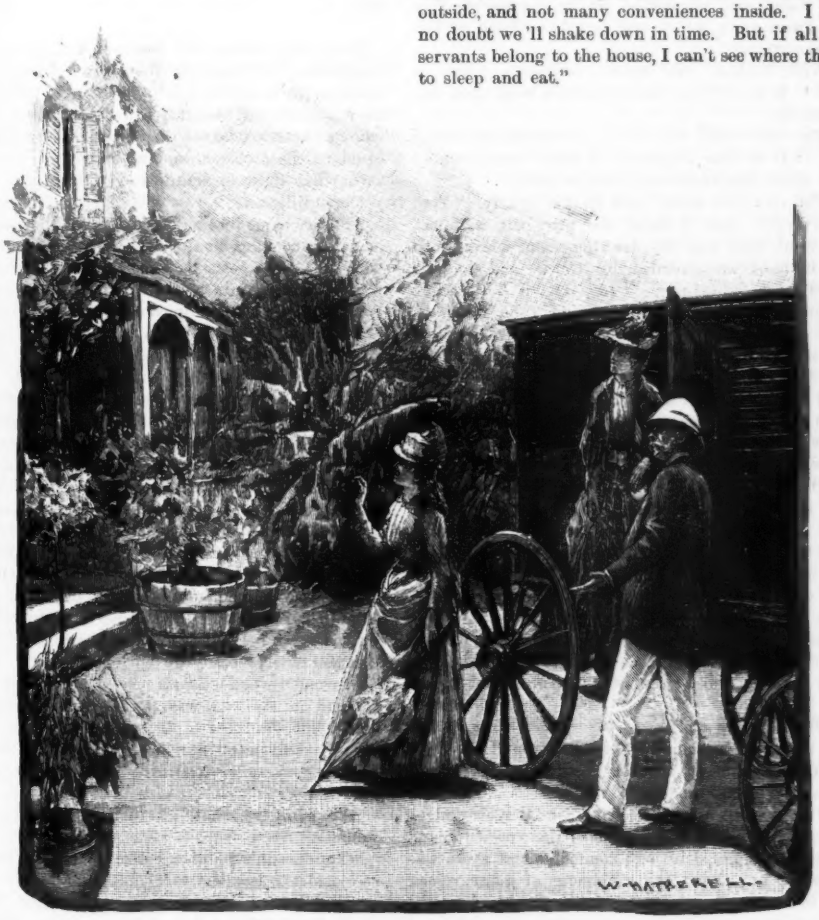
Presently they come out by the sea again, and the road begins to rise. It is overhung on the land side by rocks, clothed with ferns and hanging grasses, and crowned with feathery bamboos, cocoanut palms, and the light-foliaged tamarisk. Below, on the shores of the Bay, barges are being laden and unladen, and large-sailed boats are putting out into the shining sea, and building is going briskly forward—all the work done by the slender, dark-limbed people, who, to Thekla, look like statues in bronze. Again and again she longs to stop and watch them. But they go on. Presently they leave the business behind them. They are in quiet roads, bounded with gardens, in the midst of which are deep-porched bungalows—beautiful, cool retreats, embowered in green.

They were near the top of the hill before the carriage went in through an open gate and pulled up in front of as pretty a bungalow as they had yet seen. Its deep porch and verandah were so deeply hidden in creepers and ferns that you scarcely knew where the garden ended and the house began, while the garden was a very nest of greenery.

"This, then, is our new home! I hope you will like it, girls," said Sir Richard. He addressed them both, but he looked towards Marion.

"Like it? I shall adore it! This is bewildering—enchanting. I feel as if I were in a dream," cried Marion.

"Oh! look! look!" said Thekla.



All in a moment, the porch and verandah had become filled with white-robed figures, and all the figures were bowing, and the eyes of every one of them were fixed upon the travellers.

"Very picturesque and pretty. The servants, of course. How silently they come," said Marion.

"And how nice they look in their white clothes and turbans!" said Thekla. "Ah! there is the man who came on board this morning. His name is Gopal, I believe. They are bowing to us, Marion. I wish we had learned their language. I should like to have something pleasant to say to them."

"It is quite as well that you don't know the language," said Marion. "You would be too pleasant. Everybody says you must be strict with these people, or you spoil them. That 'll do, Thekla. You needn't be so demonstrative in acknowledging their salaams. —Dismiss them, Khansama," to the head man. "You can take us round."

With a wave of the hand, the magnificent Gopal dispersed the eager little crowd of servants, and, bowing low, begged the Sahib and the Miss Sahibs to follow him. As they went through he cast furtive glances at them from time to time, being anxious both to take their measure for himself and, in the interest of his own Sahib-log, to discover how the place impressed them. The house was spacious and airy; but the inside scarcely came up to the promise of the outside. It consisted of one large hall, lighted from above, and divided, by means of a fine carved screen of dark wood, into two rooms, one for dining, and the other for the ladies' drawing-room. Out of this central room opened the bed-rooms and bath-rooms, three on each side, and deep verandahs ran round the whole building. The furniture was plain and light, and, to English ideas, rather scanty. Janet, who had come on before with the luggage, was busy already laying out her young ladies' dresses. She looked rather serious, and Thekla asked her how she liked it. "Well, miss! there's no saying," she answered. "It 's a queer, heathenish-looking place outside, and not many conveniences inside. I make no doubt we 'll shake down in time. But if all these servants belong to the house, I can't see where they 're to sleep and eat."

"'Oh, look! look!' said Thekla —p. 256.

"Don't trouble yourself about them. Indian servants eat and sleep anywhere. That's the beauty of them," said Marion. "I suppose there's a compound outside, with huts."

"Huts! Holes!" said Janet indignantly. "I took them for kennels and cattle-sheds. However," turning to her work, "if they like to live in holes, that's no business of mine."

"None whatever," said Marion, laughing.

A cry of delight from Thekla, who had wandered out to the verandah at the back of the house, was heard, and when Marion joined her little sister, she found her standing, with parted lips and sparkling eyes, looking down upon a lovely prospect. There was the Bay, curving shorewards—a sheet of burnished silver, with ships from all nations gathered on its bosom; and floating between sea and sky were the hills and islands that protect the harbour, in the near distance of a pale green, and fading away, as they retreated, to purple and lilac; while close beneath them, rising gradually from the silver sea, was a city, warm and wonderful, set in the midst of a lush green plain, which was faintly outlined by far, far mountains.

"Well, Thekla," said Marion satirically, "lost, as usual! It is well that one of us has a head upon her shoulders."

"But who could help it?" murmured the young girl. "It is like Paradise. I have never seen—I have never imagined—anything so lovely."

"The view, you mean," said Marion lightly. "Yes; it is pretty. And I think the place will suit us." She went back into the drawing-room, where stood Sir Richard, accompanied by Gopal, and looking round him doubtfully. "It wants a little more decoration, and that kind of thing," she went on. "They don't quite know how to do things here. I saw that on board ship. Even Lady Lucy, nice as she is, struck one as being a little behind the times. We must show them how to live; and the first step must be to make our house attractive. I shall have to spend a few pounds, of course. But you won't mind that, I know, father dear. You are always such a darling."

"Do as you like, child, so long as you don't ruin me," said Sir Richard; and he added, looking at her with admiration, "Our house is sure to be attractive."

"Thekla, father means that for a compliment to us," said Marion. "Isn't it sweet of him?—Thank you, dearest," dropping a curtsey. "Admiration from one's own family circle is one of the most satisfactory forms of flattery. But—seriously—we should be vain if we imagined that the outside world looked at us with your eyes, and we must really make our bower less like a barn."

"My dear, you shall have carte blanche to buy what you please. Just now——" looking round.

"You are hungry, poor darling. So am I.—Khansama, how about lunch?"

"One moment, Miss Sahib, wait," said that obsequious person. He bowed himself out of their presence, and his voice was heard in loud command, and there was a rushing to and fro, and a clamour of many voices, and in another few moments, while Thekla was still dreaming over the view from the verandah, and Marion, who was far too prudent to wish to ruin her father, was making mental calculations as to what outlay would be necessary to make the place pretty, back came that stately Indian, with triumph in his looks. He walked before them to the outer room, and he held back the curtain for them to pass under, and, lo and behold! there was the table spread with cold meats, and salads, and fruits, and crystal bowls of ice, and cooling drinks and coffee. The windows and doors were open to the verandah, and light straw mats, stretched from pillar to pillar, excluded the glare, and punkahs being waved over the table kept the atmosphere cool. It was a very haven of rest and beauty after the rough-and-tumble life of the Amazon.

Marion was enchanted. "Why," she said, clapping her hands, "this is like Monte Cristo and the slave of the lamp."

She took her place at the head of the table, and looking thoughtfully at the chicken mayonnaise in front of her, said, "I think, do you know, father, that I shall like life in the East. I think it will just suit me."

Early that evening, Mr. Isaacson, and his travelling companion, Mr. Stanhope, dressed in faultless evening costume, drove up the hill to the new establishment, having promised to dine with Sir Richard. Gopal, who had been warned of their coming beforehand, was equal to the occasion, and a dinner was set before them that drew encomiums even from the cynical young millionaire.

"You've come into a good thing, and no mistake!" he said, smacking his lips over a pineapple cream-ice. "I wish I could get such a cook. The Amazon cuisine was enough to ruin a man's digestion for ever."

"There are plenty of good cooks in India, I believe," said Marion sweetly. "Are we to lose you soon, Mr. Isaacson?"

"Well, you see, there's nothing much besides yourselves to keep us here," said Isaacson; "and Sir Richard—— Oh! by-the-bye," with a familiar grin towards his host—"that was between ourselves. I am the worst person in the world to keep a secret."

"We are to start almost at once, Miss Ellerslie," said Mr. Stanhope—he was a far more polished person than Isaacson; "we have an invitation from the Nizam—a large hunting-party. I expect it will be very good fun. After that we shall do a little camping-out and hunting on our own account. I leave orders for camp-equipage and servants to follow us. In the spring I must go into Cashmere, and Mr. Isaacson will probably go with me."

"I wonder when we shall meet again?" said Marion. She had not the least wish to see either of them any more; but she liked to say pleasant things.

"We shall meet somehow," said Mr. Stanhope, looking very much gratified. "Will these be your head-quarters?"

"Yes; but we shall go to a hill station in the summer."

"You needn't be at all afraid" (this was a sotto voce made by Isaacson to Thekla); "I'm like the bad shilling, don't you know, always turning up. I say"—she had not even smiled at his witticism, which was exquisitely funny to himself—"what makes you so grave? Had you rather I didn't?"

"Good luck go with you, Isaacson," said Sir Richard. "I only wish I was your age and had your opportunities. I would be off with you to-morrow. What are you going to shoot—tigers?"

"That is my intention, sir. Bring back a dozen or so fine skins, to hang up in the ancestral mansion. Miss Thekla shall have the biggest to make her forget the scolding I once procured her. What! going already?" In answer to an imploring look from Thekla, Marion had risen from the table. "I'm so sorry," went on the irrepressible young man. "When I set that ancestral mansion of mine going," he proceeded, resuming his seat, "I shall taboo this sort of thing. Why should the ladies leave us alone over our dessert? It's ridiculous; it's Eastern."

Marion, in the meantime, was giving her little sister a scolding. "You mustn't be so transparent, Thekla," she said, "showing your little likes and dislikes in that childish way. Tolerate everybody. That's the way to get on in society."

CHAPTER XIII.—HOW THEKLA SPENT HER FIRST YEAR IN THE EAST.

THEY settled down very soon. The first days were full of a curious sort of enchantment which none but those who come fresh to the East, after they have reached years of discretion, can realise. To Thekla it would seem sometimes as if she were moving in a new world, where puzzles which she could not hope to solve were closing her in on every side.

Marion enjoyed the picturesque side of the life. She loved to play the queen, and here she had every opportunity for the indulgence of her taste. As, dressed in a light muslin tea-gown, fresh flowers in her girdle, and a coquettish little lace cap crowning her golden hair, she sat morning after morning in the verandah, while the obsequious Gopal, to whom she had notified the fact that she wished to buy a few pretty things, brought curiosity-sellers in a shoal to spread their treasures at her feet, she might have passed for a princess of the West, receiving graciously the homage of Eastern subjects. And what treasures they brought! "No need to buy," they would say cunningly, showing their bales and boxes; but each one of them, as he watched for signs of approval, felt sure that there was something in his store he could leave with her for a more than fair equivalent in money. And, indeed, though she tried to look indifferent, Marion would often break into an exclamation of surprise. To see all these beautiful things together—that was the wonder of it!

There was frosted silver—delicately wrought cups and flagons, and necklaces and bangles, from Delhi and Lucknow; and there were turquoises and rubies and sapphires from the hills; and there were moonstones from Ceylon; and there was gold and silver woven cloth from Benares; and from Jeypore came garnets and perforated brass-work; and from the north-west curtains of the æsthetic colours—the dead golds and dull reds that Marion loved; and men from Cashmere, so fine in face and figure that they were themselves a sight worth seeing, spread out winningly their rich embroideries and costly furs before the fair Western beauty: and, besides these, there were softly tinted silks from China, and finely wrought weapons from Japan, and quaint pottery from all parts of the East. Could anything be more interesting to a lover of pretty things?

So in the morning Marion bought and in the afternoon she arranged her purchases, setting everyone to work to help her.

In a few days, although she could only speak to her servants through the Khansama, she became pleasantly aware that she was impressing them. And, in fact, her swift decision, her strong will, and her faculty of looking at everything from her own point of view, were just such qualities as could be thoroughly comprehended by the Eastern mind. It went about the house that the big Miss Sahib, as she was called to distinguish her from Thekla, meant to be mistress; and, as this is a determination against which the properly constituted mind of an Eastern subordinate never strives, they made up their minds to obey her.

Thekla, in the meantime, was learning what she could about the new land in which she found herself. If she could have done as she liked she would have spent all her time in the native bazaars and markets, which possessed a wonderful fascination for her. Sometimes in the early morning Janet would walk with her through them, and occasionally Marion would take them in her evening drive to the Apollo Bund; and Thekla would gaze and gaze, her mind full of strange, new, indefinable thoughts.

What did it all mean, this coming and going? For whenever she passed through, it was the same—the crowd that no man could number—the never-ending procession of humanity. Parsis, in white clothes and stiff metallic turbans; and dark Mahrattas from the Ghâts, and finely built men from the north-west, padded calico cloaks thrown round them; and warriors from Punjaub and Scinde, their dark eyes flashing from under voluminous many-coloured turbans; and the lithe, graceful coolie women of the country, red sarees wound about their slender limbs; and Parsi ladies in delicate silken mantles; and stealing here and there through the crowd, a woman veiled in white from head to foot—as these and many more flocked by, mysterious figures, all with a life of their own, but all so strange to her, Michael Grierson's words would come back to her: "The East—strange, dark, unfathomable."

They brought with them a sickness of heart that she could neither control nor understand. Would she ever in all her life hear his voice again? What would she not have given—worlds, she said, in her girlish exaggeration—for one only of those long, delightful talks under the moon and stars that had brooded over the southern seas!

On her return from one of her morning expeditions, she begged to be allowed to learn the language of the country, and Marion, thinking it well that one of their party should understand it, consulted Gopal, who, as usual, was equal to the occasion. In a very short time a small, humble-looking man, with soft dark eyes, presented himself, and having made his salaam, said that he was a native man—a Moonshee—who knew English, and who had made studies in Sanskrit and Persian. He had taught with success, as his papers would show, if her Presence would permit him to open them before her.

Marion requested the Khansama to make a bargain with him, and the little man was engaged to give Thekla daily lessons in Hindustani and Persian.

The bungalow, meanwhile, was rapidly approaching that state of ideal perfection which Marion had imagined for it.

"I think, dear," she said one morning to her father, as they sat at chota-hasari in the verandah, "it is about time for us to begin visiting. The house looks pretty well, and Janet has got my wardrobe into fairly good order. What do you say to making a beginning to-day?"

"Arrange as you like," said Sir Richard. "I leave these things to you."

"Very well, then! Look up your letters of introduction, and we will leave as many of them as we can this afternoon."

"Need I go?" said Thekla.

"No; I think not. We must keep you in the background a little while longer. It is to your own interest, you know. What do you say, father?"

"I do not wish Thekla to go out this season. Next year, if all be well, we will bring her out. I hope you will see the reason of this, Thekla," said Sir Richard.

"Dearest father, I am perfectly happy at home. I had rather not go out. What made you think I should be discontented?" cried Thekla.

"I hope you will not. I hope you will always be as obedient as you are now," said Sir Richard gravely. And then, giving her no time to reply, he began to discuss with Marion the order in which they should pay their visits.

The visiting which began that day went forward gaily, and, in a very short time, the wisdom of Marion's policy became apparent. Curiosity concerning the new English residents had first been awakened. When they notified their desire to become known, admiration and popularity followed. Marion and Sir Richard Ellerslie were visited by everybody, and all the notabilities of Bombay set to work to entertain them.

Then Marion, who felt that she must necessarily return the hospitality that had been shown to her, threw the pretty bungalow open, and there were morning chota-hasaris on the verandah, and wonderful little lunches and afternoon teas, when she displayed her pretty things and wore her pretty gowns, and talked sweetly to parched old Anglo-Indians, who, seeing that she was so pretty, were too indulgent to contradict her about her theories concerning life in the East, which, she was firmly convinced, no one, up to this, had understood or practised.

Gaily and pleasantly that winter passed away.

Thekla, meanwhile, kept in the background. She studied the Eastern languages, and watched the people, and read some books which she was fortunate enough to find in the house, on the religion, philosophy, and literature of ancient India, and always, as she dreamt and studied, the world seemed to be growing larger about her. Some of those who came and went wondered if the little girl whom her father and sister so persistently kept in the background was really as contented as she appeared to be. It seemed unnatural to them that a girl of her age should like to live quietly in the midst of gaiety. The fact was that Thekla had no time to consider her own little personality. In the largeness of the world that was passing before her mental vision, in the overwhelming magnitude of the problems that would now and then force themselves upon her, the little life of the present was dwarfed.

But the days, of which she took so small account, were changing her. Both mentally and physically she was growing. Every day added to her beauty and charm. The depth and strenuousness of her intellectual life gave expression to her large grey eyes; her body caught a new grace from her Eastern friends (she had been allowed to visit some of the Parsi ladies and Hindu women of high rank in their own houses), and the warm sunlight and soft airs of the delightful Indian winter gave colour to her face and roundness to her form.

Before the winter was over she knew enough Hindustani to enable her to speak to the servants, and when the pretty little ayah, Luchmee, came to her, she made still swifter progress.

To Luchmee I must give a few words—very few, for this history has to do with Thekla and her sister, and Luchmee and her little daughter, Sonya, whose sad and often tragic story ought, for the benefit of others, to be told in full, only touched upon it at one or two points.

When Marion began to go out and entertain, she took up all Janet's time, and it was thought well that an ayah should be engaged to wait upon Thekla. Inquiries were made, and one day a pretty Indian woman, upright and very slender, with soft dark skin, and the most plaintive, beseeching eyes that Thekla had ever beheld, came into the verandah and stood, with bent head and half-veiled face, before the two English girls. In the gentlest manner—for the poor little creature looked as if a word might frighten her away—Thekla asked who she was, and bending still lower, she drew a letter from her bosom. The letter was from the principal lady of the Zenana Mission in Bombay, who, having heard that the sisters wanted an ayah, had sent them Luchmee, in the hope that they would at least give her a trial. No recommendation could have been better. Luchmee was added to the household, to which she presently attached herself with the faithfulness and devotion of an Indian woman.

Thekla was enchanted with her, but when she heard her history and saw the little girl Sonya, of whom this poor Luchmee, who seemed only a child herself, was the mother, her liking was quickened by the deepest—the most absorbing—interest.

Luchmee, who belonged to the second highest or Kshatriya caste, the women of which always live in seclusion, had been married when she was a mere child to another child of her own caste little older than herself, and in due time, being then about fifteen years of age, she entered the family of her husband, who, unhappily for her, were grasping, cruel, avaricious people.

Her husband died of fever, after they had been four or five years together, and from that time, according to the cruel social customs of the country, she was condemned to live as one who is dead. Allowed only enough food to keep her alive, deprived of the little vanities and recreations that are natural to her age, scorned, down-trodden, and made the drudge of the house, she dragged out miserably the first two years of her widowhood.

But even worse was to come. To her father-in-law, who was a trader, reverses came; his sons, who had worked with him, went out to seek their fortunes in other towns; the expenditure of the household had to be narrowed down, and the maintenance of poor little Luchmee became a burden heavier than he cared to bear. Harsh before, he was now systematically cruel, and his household followed his lead. Heavier tasks were imposed upon Luchmee; a mistake or inadvertence was punished by blows, and no morsel of food was given to her without a cruel grudging word. But it was not this—it was the looks she sometimes saw on the faces of those about her, that nerved the poor little creature to the desperate step which she afterwards took. She and her child were useless encumbrances. They hated her. Would they compass their death? None knew better than Luchmee how easily a helpless woman could be put out of the way in her country. The sickening terror gave her courage and strength, so that one day she took her child in her arms, and escaped from the dreadful house.

This is not the place to tell of the miseries she underwent in her flight, the tortures of mind and conscience, as well as of body; for she had sinned against her caste, and outraged the social creed taught to her from her infancy. That, with the difficulties encountered by the brave Englishwoman who finally rescued her, must be left to another record. It is sufficient to say here that when she became Thekla's ayah, her family, who declared that, having degraded herself beyond forgiveness, she could never enter their household again, had given up their right in her. She was allowed to serve the foreigner. As for Sonya, her child, now a lovely little girl about six years of age, no one, for the present, disputed her mother's right in her. She lived in the Ellerslies' compound, sharing her mother's hut at night, and being taken care of during the day by the wife of one of the syces, or grooms.

CHAPTER XIV.—AN UNEXPECTED VISITOR.

A YEAR has come and gone since Sir Richard Ellerslie and his two daughters settled themselves in the bungalow on Malabar Hill. It was winter then: it is winter again now. December—the bleak, dull month, when, in London, a nipping frost is followed by a cold drizzle, and that again by a fog so dark and deadly, that to breathe it makes men and animals sicken—December—but not the bleak month, rather the joyous month—the month of deep skies and glowing sunshine, and sweet, brisk airs; for winter—the glorious Indian winter—is in full swing, and Europeans, who have panted through the hot days, and melted through the rains, bitterly lamenting the hard fate that has drifted them to these burning shores, take heart once more, fill their lungs with the fresh sweet air, and assert with conviction that, so long as you have your health, which you can do if you are moderately prudent, India is one of the best places in the world to live in.

To the Ellerslies, this year in India, pleasant as they have found it, has not been fruitful in striking events. Marion is disengaged still—a circumstance which surprises her little world, where everyone knows that she has had plenty of opportunities for establishing herself well, had she felt so inclined.

Sir Richard Ellerslie is much stronger than he was. India suits him, and he says he may possibly spend some years there. Thekla is more decidedly handsome, and far more composed in her manners than when we met her first on board the Amazon. She is better dressed also; for Luchmee, who has much natural aptitude, and who loves her gentle young mistress passionately, has learned from Janet all the arts of the toilette—how to arrange hair well, and to drape gowns gracefully, and to group flowers with taste and judgment; and since she delights to practise her newly acquired skill, Thekla is often constrained to submit to much more dressing than she thinks necessary.

The Ellerslies did not go to Simla in the summer, as Lady Lucy Leveridge, from whom Thekla hears occasionally, urged, for Sir Richard declared that he could not stand the enormous rents up there. He promised his girls a season there later, contenting himself for this first summer with the pretty and comparatively cool places in the Western Ghâts—Matheran, Mahabaleshwar, and Khandala. It was during their never-to-be-forgotten visit to the latter place that Thekla saw the dark cavern, so mysterious and impressive, with its solemn lines of elephant-crowned pillars, where, two thousand years ago, the Indian Buddhists worshipped. That expedition left in her mind memories which could never be effaced. She suffered in those days from the lack of someone to whom she could talk of her new and profoundly interesting knowledge: for her father, if she spoke of it to him, would say that he was no antiquarian, and Marion would smile sweetly at the funny old places, even as she smiled in the faces of her friends. They were curious, she would say, and it was pleasant to have a motive for an excursion; but what was there, after all, to be enthusiastic about? So, sometimes Thekla would fall back upon Luchmee, who listened, of course, with reverent attention, thinking everything her adored Miss Sahib said perfection; but who could not be brought to understand that the present, past, and future of India had anything to say to herself personally.

Sonya, who had been Thekla's companion and pupil for the past year, showed much more intelligence than her mother. Once or twice she flashed out a word or two that electrified Thekla. "Sonya has genius," she said on one of these occasions to Luchmee.

"We must educate her. Think, Luchmee, if she were to be the deliverer for whom you are all waiting! Oh, how wonderful! how wonderful it would be!" Upon which Luchmee, not comprehending in the least, smiled indulgently, and stooping low, in her graceful fashion, kissed the hem of her young mistress's robe. The chota Miss Sahib was Sonya's protector, as she was hers. They lived by her favour. If she was contented, what more could they desire?

This, then, was the position of affairs when the Ellerslies went back to Bombay, the only change in the household being that Janet had left them to be married.

Shortly after their return an incident happened which astonished Thekla exceedingly. There arrived from England a large box addressed to herself, and when she opened it she found that it contained two evening dresses, one of creamy white, and the other of a soft rose-pink, with shoes and gloves and flowers to match them, and two morning dresses and hats.

They were more beautiful than anything Thekla had worn yet, and feeling almost as much bewildered as pleased, she ran to find her father. It was late in the afternoon. He had just come back from the club, and was resting in his library before dressing for dinner.

"Come in, Thekla," he said kindly. "What is it?"

"Oh, father, such lovely dresses have come for me—at least, I suppose they are for me. Did you order them?"

"With Marion's advice. So you like them?"

"They are beautiful—beautiful! Thank you for thinking of me, father."

"But I hear you are to begin to go out this season, my little Thekla, and extra dress at such times is a necessity. Have you anything particular to do? No? Then sit down here close to me for a few moments; I want to look at you."

Smiling and blushing, Thekla obeyed.

"You have changed," said her father, looking at her with a strange fixity. "You are handsomer; your manner and style are better; you have intelligence and adaptability. I think you will make your way in society."

"I hope I shall please you, father," said poor little Thekla chokingly.

"Do you really wish to please me?"

"Indeed, indeed, I do. Try me."

"All this year you have been gentle and obedient," went on Sir Richard. "I wished you to be quiet—you have been quiet. I was particularly anxious that you should take no particular interest in anyone outside of your own family. You have not done so. And you have neither pined nor fretted. I believe the quiet year has done you good. I believe you are wiser than you were."

"I hope so, father. But why——"

"Stop a moment, my child, and let me continue," said Sir Richard impressively. "I, who said to you, Keep quiet, and stay at home, say to you now, Accept invitations, go out, let yourself be seen. But—one moment more—I should like you to know that I had a reason for not bringing you out last season. It was not your youth, for many girls come out quite as young; but I saw you had prejudices——"

"Prejudices, father!"

"My dear child"—he took her hand and held it affectionately—"grant that your father knows you better than you know yourself; but, whether or no, listen to me. I gave you this breathing-time to prevent you from ruining your future. Now, thanks to me, you will enter the world with a free mind. That is enough. If you don't understand now, you will later. Shake off prejudice. Look at things and people with your own eyes. Consider your family's interests. Be a little tolerant, a little prudent, and the time will come, no doubt, when I shall be proud of my distinguished daughter."

He rose as he spoke, intimating thereby that he had no more time to bestow upon her, and kissed her affectionately; then, bidding her put on one of her new pretty dresses, and be in the drawing-room early, as he expected friends, and she must, from this time forth, help Marion to entertain his visitors, he sent her away.

It is a lovely evening. The sun has just gone down, and sea and sky are burning with colour, and a light sea-breeze is whispering through the leaves of plantain and fig-tree, and the air is heavy with the perfume of flowers. Humming a Persian lullaby song picked up from Luchmee, Thekla, whose heart is particularly light this evening, stands between the drawing-room and the verandah, looking out with sparkling eyes, and thinking that the world is a very pleasant place to live in. She has dressed early, as her father requested, and, except for the servants—Luchmee, who is watching her from a corner, and Gopal, who is busy adjusting the room for the evening—she is alone. She is aroused suddenly from her reverie by Gopal, who has darted in front of her, and is looking at her in what she considers a strange way. She is about to ask him if he wants anything, when, with an abruptness curiously unlike his usual urbane manners, he drops behind her, and, looking round, Thekla perceives that a gentleman has entered the room, and is walking across it quickly.

She goes forward to meet him, and then he stops and she stops—he with a laugh, and she with an expression of surprise.

"Mr. Isaacson!"

"Yes, it's me; no mistake at all about it," said the intruder. "I wanted to steal a march upon you, and that awkward brute went and spoiled my little game. Well, and how are you?"

"I am quite well, thank you. Won't you sit down? I will tell my father you are here."

"Thanks! I have just seen him. He's in his study. Sent me on to be entertained by you—that's his expression, you know, not mine. Yes, I'll sit down.—You ——," (an untranslatable Hindustani word to Gopal; Thekla understood it, and it brought the indignant colour to her face), "just set my chair here.—Do you know," looking at her with undisguised admiration, "you have changed immensely!"

"Do you think so?" said Thekla quietly. She brought out her work, some pretty silk embroidery, and began to thread her needle, as a preparatory to going on with it. He noticed that she stood perfectly straight, and that her hand did not tremble in the least. "One moment!" she begged, as he was about to speak again; "the light is rather bad.—Gopal! the lamp, please! Thank you.—Now, Mr. Isaacson," seating herself at the work-table, "I am ready to talk. You were going away to shoot tigers, I remember, when I saw you last. How many did you kill?"

"Not one, I'm sorry to say. I spent two nights in a tree watching for one, and he never turned up, so on the third night I went to bed. But I got a bear or two in Cashmere—I'm bringing you a fine skin, by-the-bye—and some deer, pretty little things, near Agra, and a heap of birds. I went to Simla in the early summer, and found it rather a bore. Such a lot of girls, and all of them so amiable to a fellow! Nice girls, too! But sweetness palls after a time. Don't you think so?"

"I really don't know. I don't think I have ever been tried," said Thekla, smiling.

"Haven't you? That's funny, too," said Isaacson. "Now, I should have thought just the contrary. I suppose," leaning over the table and trifling absently with her silks, "you were surprised at not hearing from me?"

"Oh dear no!" she answered frankly. "I never thought of it."

"Not once? Oh, come! you are joking. Now, I'll let you into a secret. It was Sir Richard's doing. I wished to enter into a correspondence with you then. But he wouldn't have it. 'Wait a while,' he said; 'she is only a child.' I didn't believe him, don't you know, but I see now that he was right. There's a great change in you, Miss Thekla, for the better, if I may be allowed to say so."

She winced. That "Miss Thekla" had brought back unpleasant memories. Would no one come in and relieve her of the task of entertaining this tiresome young man?

"I wish you would tell me about Cashmere," she said desperately. "We think of going there some day."

"Oh, do! Be my guests. I've a first-rate lot of servants. Good managers, up to time, never in the way. Why, it would be the very thing. I'll speak to Sir Richard about it this evening."

At this moment, when Thekla was as red as a rose with vexation, the curtain that shut off one of the inner rooms was lifted by a slender dark hand, and Marion came in.

"I heard voices, I am sure," she said, looking round with a pretty air of mystification; then, as her eyes fell upon her sister and Mr. Isaacson, "You here!" she cried; "what a delightful surprise! This is like old times. And Thekla keeping you all to herself!"

"Well, you know," said Isaacson, stroking his moustache with a gratified air, "she and I were always friends. But that doesn't mean that I'm not glad to see you."

"It is really very kind of you to say so, whether you feel it or not," said Marion gravely, though the corners of her mouth were twitching. "And do you intend to stay long in Bombay?"

"I'll stay as long as my business keeps me."

"Then it is business that has brought you here?"

"Yes, business—most important business for me." He looked roguishly at Thekla, who, being interested in her embroidering, did not respond by so much as a smile. "It may take me long," he proceeded, "it may not. But it doesn't matter in the least. I have time before me, and I mean to carry it through."

"Business! I wonder what it is!—Thekla," said Marion, "I think Mr. Isaacson wants to make us curious. I mean to be perfectly indifferent; don't you?"

"Miss Thekla has just made a very business-like suggestion," said Isaacson.

"Thekla business-like! I shall believe that when I see it," said Marion.

Questioningly Thekla's large grey eyes were lifted. What, she wondered, was this dreadful young man going to say next?

"Bravo!" he cried out. "I've done the trick. I've made her look up. Now, Miss Ellerslie," looking at Thekla with a waggish air, "what do you think of this? A family trip to Cashmere in the summer—you three to be my guests?"

"That was not my suggestion," said Thekla.

"You dear little sensitive goose! why not?" said Marion. "I don't myself see the good of rich young men like Mr. Isaacson, if one can't make use of them."

"Bravo! I like that," cried Isaacson. "Give me frankness."

"And if," she went on, looking at him with a bewitching smile, "father can make up his mind to go, I certainly shall not object. Ah! here he is to answer for himself."

Sir Richard looked extraordinarily benignant that evening. He was beautifully dressed, and his snow-white linen and snow-white hair gave him a touchingly simple and patriarchal appearance.

"Good-evening, for the second time, my dear Isaacson," he said effusively.—"He caught me in my den, girls, quite in dishabille. I sent him on to you, and I hope you have been making him feel at home."

"Oh, yes, Sir Richard. Quite so. Haven't felt so comfortable since I was here last year," said Isaacson.

"That is good hearing. But sit down! sit down!"

Sir Richard seated himself where the full light fell upon him, and Thekla rose swiftly, and brought her chair to his side. "Well, child," he said, stroking her hair kindly—they looked wonderfully picturesque together, and he knew it—"so you like to sit near your old father still.—They make all this fuss over me, Mr. Isaacson, but they won't scruple to leave me when the right man comes by."

"Father!" from Thekla.

"That's not quite fair, is it? Well! we'll change the subject. What have you been telling Mr. Isaacson?"

"She has been proposing a trip to Cashmere," said Marion, laughing. "We three, with Mr. Isaacson for our guide, counsellor, and friend."

"We three, with Mr. Isaacson!" said Sir Richard, before Thekla could speak. "That was rather a cool proposal, wasn't it, my little girl? But never mind!"— as she tried indignantly to protest—"we all know how you meant it."

"But, seriously——" began Isaacson.

"My dear fellow, I can talk of nothing seriously until I have dined. And here is Gopal. Dinner ready! So much the better. Isaacson, you must take in Marion this evening. I see Thekla wants to go with me."

struggle as she would, she could not make either Isaacson or anyone else believe that his society was anything but enchanting to her. Not only so—for she might have hoped that time would correct this misconception—but she was always falling into embarrassing situations. If she exchanged a word with him in public—and her father insisted she should treat him as a friend—someone would smile, or some-

"'Things have gone too far for that.'"—p. 266.

Thekla did wish to go with her father. She clung to his arm as they walked through the long room, and, though her eyes were full of tears, smiles were trembling to her lips. "Thank you, father darling," she managed to whisper.

"Ah! but you mustn't be a baby," he whispered in return.

CHAPTER XV.—DRIFTING.

THAT was the first of many strange and perplexing days. How it happened, Thekla could not tell, but one else would enlarge upon her observation, giving it a different and much more intimate meaning than she had intended. Marion was particularly tiresome in this respect. Then her amusing speech—this is how it was generally characterised—would be repeated to her father, with amplifications which made it even more significant; and blush and protest as she would, no one believed that she had not spoken just so.

In the station after a very short time the Ellerslies and Isaacson were always asked out together, and as Sir Richard never gave an entertainment which did not include his young friend, no day passed without their meeting. And, in fact, though she could not be said to like the young millionaire any better than she had done, Thekla was becoming so far accustomed to him as not to be shocked by his manner and conversation.

One of those pretty little legends, framed no one quite knows how, and believed because no one cares to contradict them, had gone the round of the station. These two interesting young people, it was said, had fallen in love with one another on board ship: Isaacson, who was extremely young and fabulously wealthy, had entreated Sir Richard to allow them to marry at once: Thekla, being madly in love with him, had poured out tears and supplications; but Sir Richard, with a wisdom and disinterestedness as rare as they were admirable, had refused to sanction any engagement until the young people had been put upon their trial. Some could even repeat the magnificent words in which he sent out the young hero on his pilgrimage. "I might take advantage of your youth," so he was reported to have said. "I might cement for ever the union of hearts which you maintain exists between you, by making you one in the sight of man. But consider, for one moment, how I should feel if, for either of you, the hour of repentance came. If you, the rich man, with all the world at your feet, regretted your hasty marriage; if my little girl came to me with tears in her eyes, asking why I had allowed her to leave me so young. No"—and here the reporter would picture his manner: the benevolent, expansive smile, the gentle, but lofty dignity—"No, my dear sir. Leave us to think about you. Take time for thought yourself, and if, in a year's time, you are still of the same mind, come back, and we will see then how my daughter is disposed towards you."

And now he had come back, as rich and as devoted as ever, and the young girl, who had for his sake been living the life of a hermit, had received him with open arms. This legend, which gave an additional interest to the Ellerslies as a family, and threw a new halo of merit round the admirable Sir Richard, was chiefly responsible for the favour with which Isaacson was received.

Thekla did not hear it, and she could not, therefore, have been otherwise than surprised by the way in which her father's friends coupled her with Isaacson. If it was a dinner, he was told off to take her in; if a lawn-tennis match, he was her partner by right; if a riding party, he was besought smilingly to look after her; if she so much as sat down to sing or play in a strange drawing-room, Isaacson would presently be deputed to turn over her pages. She had neither the experience nor the aplomb of a woman of the world, and she was first perplexed, then alarmed. There came back to her some of the strange and terrifying scenes on the Amazon. Once again she saw Murchison's haggard face and eager sorrowful eyes. His voice, tremulous with passion, rang in her ears: "You are standing on the brink of a precipice, and hands—trusted hands—are pushing you over." Once she appealed to her father, and on another occasion to Marion, but neither of them gave her the least assistance; Marion said, with a touch of scorn, that it was the easiest thing in the world to put a man off, if you really wished to do so; and her father, with something less than his usual benignity, begged her not to be foolish and fanciful.

If, in fine, it had been possible for a marriage to come off without the conscious participation and consent of one of the contracting parties, Thekla would certainly have found herself married before that winter was out; but, unfortunately, from Isaacson's and Sir Richard's point of view, that is out of the question. Before the day could be actually fixed, some sort of consent had to be wrung from her, and, to do Isaacson justice, he did not think that much effort would be required to win it. The girl had become accustomed to him, and he could promise her the sorts of things that all women like—fine houses and hosts of servants, and dresses and flowers and jewellery. Why, there were girls at Simla (and girls quite as handsome as Thekla) who would have jumped at such an offer as he could make! As for love and that sort of humbug—I am quoting, of course, from the millionaire—he did not believe in it. Fellows who called themselves poets, and wrote a lot of trash, imagined it. Other fellows read their ravings and chose to rave too. There was nothing real in the whole business.

Arguing thus, Isaacson went to Sir Richard one day and said that he meant to speak plainly.

"This shilly-shally sort of business," he said, with that elegance which had always characterised him, "has gone on long enough."

And when Thekla's father, who was by no means so sure of the state of her feeling, begged him not to spoil everything by being over-precipitate, he answered shrewdly enough—"If she doesn't like me now, she never will. I don't say even then I'd give her up, don't you know! But we'd have to change our tactics, so it's just as well to know how we stand."

On one of those beautiful sunny afternoons, therefore, they gave him a free field. Marion went out to pay visits, Sir Richard went off to his club, and Thekla was left alone.

She was sitting in the verandah, with little Sonya, to whom she had been reading, at her feet, and Luchmee watching them from a corner, when Isaacson's smart mail-phaeton, driven by a pair of black horses, came rattling into the compound.

Like a flash the Indian woman and girl disappeared behind one of the punkahs, and Gopal, with velvet tread and eyes gleaming like a panther's, stole through the long drawing-room and stationed himself in a dark corner near the door that opened on to the verandah.

"My father is out," said Thekla, advancing.

"So much the better. My business is with you," he answered, flinging himself out of the phaeton, and throwing his reins to the syces.—"Take it round to the stable. Shan't want it for half an hour," he sang out to them in Hindustani.

"My father and sister will not be in till evening," said Thekla. "I think you had better go away, Mr. Isaacson."

She spoke firmly, but that keen-eyed watcher behind the screen saw that she was trembling.

"No," he said as firmly. "I don't mean to go away. I don't mean to leave this place until I have had it out with you. Look here, Thekla; be reasonable."

"By what right do you call me by my Christian name?"

"Come, come!" he said soothingly. "You shouldn't really take the high tone with me. Things have gone too far for that."

"What do you mean?" she flashed out, her eyes blazing with anger.

"I mean that every soul in Bombay believes we are engaged to one another."

"Believes! that we are engaged—you and I? How dare you say such a thing?"

"My dear girl," said Isaacson, seating himself, "I have, and I may say I always have had, the courage of my opinions. When I see a fact, I stick to it; and let me assure you that a fact is a precious hard thing to kick against. Now," argumentatively, "what are the facts? I come here, a perfect stranger. I am received everywhere with open arms. That one might understand. But why should we be invited everywhere together? Why should they insist on our being partners at dinner, lawn-tennis, chota-hasaris, tiffins, rides and drives? Can you answer? No? then I will. Because we are supposed to be engaged. Don't be angry. I've liked it well enough, I grant you; but I'm not responsible. I give you my word that I never so much as opened my mouth about you to anyone, except your own father, who, of course, knows my wishes, and Stanhope, who is far enough away not to be able to tell tales. Now these are facts; so why not, like a sensible girl, reconcile yourself to them?"

He drew a little nearer to her. She did not stir. She was standing now, with wide-open eyes and set face, looking out before her. One would have thought that she had not heard him.

"I'm not one of your unreasonable sort," he went on. "I don't want protestations, or anything of that kind. It's quite curious to myself how much I like you; but I can't expect you to like me in the same way. Do as your father and sister wish. Say you'll marry me. In the language of the poets, 'Name the glad day,' and I give you my word you'll never regret it."

He drew nearer to her still. What could this dead silence mean but yielding? He could not see—he could not have understood if he had seen—the dull anguish of her face. How could such as he have guessed that a young girl to whom a splendid and flattering offer had just been made should be stricken even to the earth with bitter pain and an overwhelming sense of humiliation? She was betrayed—she was betrayed—that is what the poor girl was feeling. They—her own friends in whom she trusted—had blinded her eyes and dulled her senses, so that she should drift into this. Ah! that was poor Murchison's word; he had warned her, and she had refused to accept his warning. But she was awake now—wide awake—and she would not suffer herself to drift any longer.

So she thought, standing like one spellbound; and, at last, even Isaacson was awed by the silence. "Speak to me, Thekla," he said, taking her hand.

The touch aroused her. She sprang away from him, and scarcely had she done so before she was aware of Gopal, the soft-footed, standing close to her. His head was bent, his left hand was on his breast, and in his right he carried a silver salver, on which there was a visiting-card. His manner and attitude were even humbler and more reverent than usual, and Thekla attributed to her own excited feeling the circumstance that she seemed to see a change in him. It was as if he understood what was going on, and would help her if he could.

"What is it, my good Gopal?" she said.

"A gentleman, Miss Sahib."

"Where is he?"

"Your Presence, I have shown him into the drawing-room."

"Son of a pig!" growled Isaacson, in Hindustani, "what did I tell you?"

"Surely Gopal has not been told to forbid my father's house to his visitors!" said Thekla, with dignity.

But Isaacson did not hear her. He was striding to the stable to find his phaeton.

(To be continued.)

OF HINDERING THE CHILDREN.

(A MOTHER'S CONFIDENCES.—IV.)

MY heart is very full to-night, and indeed it is a great relief to be able to write to you, dear friend, of the things which are uppermost. Evan is out, attending a committee; the children are in bed, and I have two good hours in which to tell you of our last night's talk. At last we have reached the very kernel of our duty to the children. Ever since Evan and I began those Sunday talks, I have been looking forward to this subject with an emotion which you will understand when I tell you that from the moment I held for the first time our first baby in my arms, the call of Christ to the children has been in my ears; in that first hour of motherhood I heard the words distinctly, as distinctly as if my husband had spoken them—"Suffer the little children to come unto Me!" I was too weak and too much beside myself with the new joy of motherhood to wonder then; but since, I have wondered at the apparently audible voice with which these words came to me. Ever since, that personal message has been to me like the evening bells of a country church: you talk, and forget them; you are silent, and their music fills the air. Truly, I have never had a moment of what you may call soul-silence but I have heard, underlying all other sounds, some strains of that Divine music: "to come"—"to come unto Me"—"suffer"—"suffer the children"—"the little children to come unto Me"—and so it goes on, almost at any minute since I have been a mother; whenever—

"Earth's ruder noise
Of griefs and joys"

has been stilled, the Saviour's "suffer," "suffer" draws my soul as the moon the waters of the ocean. I have never told all this to anybody, and I daresay I could not write about it now, only for Evan's words of last night.

Whatever lighter thoughts and hopes have lain on the surface, the deep thought and purpose of my soul has been the response—"Yea, Lord, we will bring them!" And oh! if I could only tell you all the searchings of heart I have had on this subject, you would understand how I am still quivering after last night. "Surely you have often spoken to your husband about this?" you say. No: I suppose it is true that—

"Each in his hermit cell, we dwell apart."

At any rate, never till last night did either of us let the other into that secret chamber. And then the delight of finding that in this, as in all else, we had been at one—thought for thought, purpose for purpose!

I don't know that I can begin to tell you in an orderly way what Evan said and what I said, and how it all came about. An angel came down and troubled the waters, I think. We both said, and felt, and looked, in a way not to be written down, and it is only now, when the stir is subsiding, that I can see what help and healing we found. I shall try to note down a few of the conclusions we came to, both to clear my own thoughts and, I hope, to interest you.

First: Why is Christ so imperative in His demand that the children should be allowed to "come" unto Him?

He Himself gives the answer. They have a certain readiness in themselves: they are like-minded—"Of such is the Kingdom of Heaven." This quality in the children, which puts them, to speak reverently, in touch with Christ, is what we call innocence. Now, innocence is not freedom from sin. Children do wrong continually, and know they are doing wrong; and not only so, but they do acts of greed, selfishness, cruelty, which would be odious in us. "Remember not the sins of my youth," David says; and he might have said, "Remember not the sins of my childhood." It is rather the fashion to talk as if children were always meek, lovely, and gentle in heart and behaviour; but the fact is, there are few of us who have not recollections of childhood and early youth we might blush to recall. But, after all, we are tender over those children—our own child-selves. Evan said, "Oh, I was the most horrid, greedy little wretch imaginable!" but I could see a gleam of tenderness in his eye for that little wretch. There was a glamour about that little Evan, through which his faults showed dimly. When you want to thresh out a subject thoroughly, it is astonishing how long it takes to clear the floor before you can even begin. It took us a long time to thresh out innocence. We could hardly get rid of the notion that it meant goodness in some form; but whatever lovely quality we tried, we remembered some instance of the contrary fault, even in our little trio—not to say in our own childish selves.

"Crying to be allowed to play with 'that dear little boy.'" - p. 269.

"'Humble himself as this little child'—there it is," cried Evan: "no one can say the children are not humble. A child cannot think great things of himself. He must take upon trust your opinion of him. Indeed, he does not think of himself at all; there is too much besides to amuse him. Yes, I know there are poor little masquerading beings whose parents have succeeded in making shows of them; but they don't count. We may think of children in a healthy, not a diseased condition, and the child is humble; 'tis his nature to!' Now, if you think much of yourself, there is no room left to think much of another; if you think little—indeed, do not think of yourself at all—there is great room within you to magnify another. There you have the first condition of readiness for Christ—a mind open to think great things of Him. And I do believe that is why Christ is, as you say, so imperative in His demand for the children. They, at any rate, are open to the thought of Him, and able to laud and magnify His holy name. You remember the praises of the children were one of the few alleviations of that last week!"

A little further search brought us to "which believe," and here we thought we found the second quality that goes to make up innocence—the faith, the trustfulness of children. They are not a bit like Mrs. Gatty's caterpillar, who believed everything she was told—when it is reasonable. The children do not ask whether it is reasonable or not; they believe because they are told, and here is the very quality Christ demands—the power of believing what we are told. Here we have innocence—in the humility and the faith, or trustfulness, of the little children. Now, see how they delight in fable and fairy tale—in talking beasts and whispering flowers, in the Marquis of Carabas and Cinderella's pumpkin carriage. They live in a world where everything is possible, and where beautiful things are always happening.

And we parents let this "age of faith" go by without giving the children the object of all faith. We say, "They are too young to understand the mysteries of Christianity," and we let slip the time when they can believe, while we wait for the period of their understanding. O fools, and slow of heart! As if human understanding had ever risen to the mysteries of God manifest in the flesh! The sage cannot understand; but the simplest child soul can believe—can comprehend and take into itself the Divine wonder. And why? Nothing astonishes a child, because all things are wonderful. We elders believe with our lips, strain after the truth with our understanding; but because we have so poor a grasp, we measure the King by His service to us. He is our Provider, who gives us all things of this life; our Saviour, who saves us from our sins: more, He is to us, "The Way, without which there is no going; the Truth, without which there is no knowing; the Life, without which there is no living." And well for us! Happy are the people that are in such a case; yea, blessed are they that have the Lord for their God!

"The unseen King will be about their bed."—p. 269

But there is more for the children; for their eyes, is the vision of the King in His beauty, and they, more than we, are able to give themselves to Him with steadfast and passionate loyalty. We want Him for ourselves, for His manifold uses to us. Where should we be without our Saviour, our Healer, our Peace, our Light of Life, our Bread of Life, our Water of Life, the Wine of our Joy? But they, more than we, have the power to apprehend what He is in Himself. It is no mystery to them that the King of kings should live in low estate. Have we not the heir of a line of kings crying to be allowed to play with 'that dear little boy' in the gutter? All things are possible to him that believeth, and the children are able to believe all things. But how shall they believe except they hear? And how shall they hear without a preacher? And who but father and mother can preach the simple thoughts and easy words the little ones can understand? Here is where we may hinder the children, and here lies the gravest responsibility, as well as the highest privilege, of parents.

"King of kings, Lord of lords, the only Ruler of princes:"
"Hearts are as streams in Whose high hand:"

this is the aspect in which the children shall first know their "Almighty Lover," and that because the first and deepest craving of the human heart is for a King. Evan says he believes one secret of the unfaith of the present day is that the kingly character of Christ is not sufficiently brought before people. He says there is a fountain of loyalty in every human heart waiting to flow for the King, and this fountain is what we must open in the children. It is not only a King to rule over us we need, but a King to honour and serve and delight in, One in whose path we may spread our garments of praise.

I can see that it will not be difficult to make the children live all day long in the presence of the King, in the light of a countenance ever smiling upon them. Do you remember a delightful tale of the Barmecides, told in one of Trench's poems?—how they invited themselves to sup one day with a very poor man, who could spread but a scanty meal for them, and how, when they had supped, the Barmecides, father and two sons, sent for masons to make a doorway in the inner wall of their host's cottage, and the opening showed a "palace of delight" made ready for the poor man by his princely guests. So shall the children know of Christ—a King, going in and out amongst the dwellings of poor men, for each of whom He is preparing a "palace of delight;" for "in My Father's House are many mansions." That they cannot see the King will be no stumbling-block to the children, who have not yet learned to "believe their own eyes"—and no more. The imagination that delights in the marvels of Lilliput-land will aid the child's large faith, and the unseen King will be about their path and about their bed, closer and more real than mother's kiss or father's clasping arms.

Thus, with the thought of the King ever before them, all the children's best shall be for Him. The toy, the flowers for the children's hospital, shall be a gift for the King, and shall be that which they cherish most, that they may learn the joy of giving. The little gardens shall be carefully kept for Him, because "He considers the lilies of the field." The best pothooks, the best hem, shall be done for Him, because "He hath done all things well." "The King does not allow——" shall check unlovely countenance, word, and act. "He was subject unto them" shall glorify obedience, and make the children on the alert for every chance to obey. But I cannot disclose, even to you, all the visions my heart is full of—of a holy childhood spent in the garden of the Lord!

CHARLOTTE M. MASON.

THE TRUE SOLVENT OF DOUBT.

BY THE REV. J. R. MACDUFF, D.D.

ADDRESSED TO YOUTH ON THE EXPERIMENTAL EVIDENCES OF CHRISTIANITY.

"If any man will do His will, he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God."—ST. JOHN vii. 17.

IT is only the most commonplace, though, alas! the truest of platitudes, to assert that we live in an age of bold and reckless speculation on doctrinal subjects. The whole citadel of the Faith has been exposed to assault, including some of the leading essential verities. In the case of not a few there is the avowal of unblushing scepticism; a settled and undisguised dislike and abhorrence of all Revealed Truth. And, when a keen godless intellect is combined with a godless heart, such are only too ready to discard moral evidence. They will accept no testimony short of the dry, stern, logical, material demonstration required in order to substantiate facts in science or history, or every-day life. There must be mathematical Euclid-like demonstration or none. And hence, in one sweep, are cleared away as so many cobwebs, not only the doctrines of Christianity, but the belief in a personal God. The Being to whom they are responsible is, with a sembled humility, veiled under the title of the "Unknown" and "Unknowable."

It is not with such we are at present concerned. It is rather with those who are in perplexity, and uneasy under their perplexities. They have been unable altogether to escape contact with the speculative religious theories in vogue. Their own minds may too (apart from any extraneous influences) have suggested hard, if not insoluble problems. And yet, I repeat, they are the problems and stumbling-blocks of earnest inquirers. Some, either personally known to me, or who have sought anonymous counsel, are in the agonies of an honest search after salvation, but are yet arrested and perplexed, or rather perplex themselves, with the preliminary inquiry, "What is truth?" What are the creeds and tenets to be really believed and clung to? How am I to know, amid this diversity of opinion and of conflicting theological dogma, what are the articles of faith veritably of God? To put the case of such yet farther into verbal shape, we are not wrong in formulating it thus: "I would give all I have to believe; but I feel my footing insecure. I am like one walking on a rotten plank or on the bending ice. I cannot follow the Papal advice and allocution to shut my eyes, and, grasping blindfold a strong unseen hand, to surmount thus the peril of steep glissades and yawning crevasses. Amid my own doubts and the doubts injected by others, I feel very unhappy. Is there any escape from this bewilderment, this chaos of insecurity? any method by which I can disperse these conflicting thoughts, and have truths vital to my happiness and peace verified at the tribunal of my own enlightened reason and judgment? I hear of those whose faith is the solid rock; mine is, alas! the shivering reed, blown about with every kind of doctrine and cunning craftiness of men who lie in wait to deceive."

In answering this question, I do not underrate or depreciate other evidences of our holy faith. But I limit myself now to the saying of Christ (Himself incarnate Truth) in the words of our text. This deals with one species of evidence only—the experimental, the reflex, the self-verifying, the evidence emitted and countersigned by a man's own spirit, who has subjectively made trial of the faith and tested it. This, after all, is the true philosophic method, submitting the truth to a personal analysis. As the chemist casts the substance into his crucible, so let the believer take the Rule of Faith as revealed and unfolded in the Word of God, and test it in the moral crucible of his own experience. "If any man will do His will, he shall know of the doctrine."

Brethren, that text has a force in the original Greek, as you will find noted in the Revised Version, which is not conveyed in our authorised translation. The "will" here spoken of (the verb "will") is much more truly and intelligibly rendered by "wishes" or "desires." "If any man desire to do His will (willeth to do His will), he shall know of the doctrine."

Now this brings us at once to what we fear is with many the real secret of their unrest and perplexity and consequent unhappiness. They know not the doctrine, or they reject and repudiate the doctrine or doctrines. Why? Because they have never DESIRED to DO the will. They have never given themselves, to use the common phrase, a fair chance of believing, by their failing to obey our Lord's preliminary condition, that preliminary condition being an honest wish and earnest purpose to do the Father's will, and follow implicitly the dictates and the precepts of His Holy Scriptures.

Take a familiar illustration. What patient could expect to be cured of disease, who before submitting to the required treatment—a treatment, moreover, that had already been successful in the case of uncounted thousands—insisted on raising speculative doubts as to the ability of the physician to heal, or of the medicines to effect a remedy? Would not the competence alike of the physician and his cure be best tested and ascertained by trial, by putting these to the proof? The prescribed remedies might perhaps be severe, perhaps strange; perhaps contrary to the preconceived ideas of the sufferer as to what was best. But when submitting to the regimen, he feels, after a time of patient self-surrender, the rush of health in every pore, the old pang of anguish, first mitigated, and then removed; the sleepless nights gradually exchanged for balmy repose; the appetite that so long nauseated all food, restored: in one word, that he is a cured man: what else could his belief be, but that of perfect unhesitating trust in the skill and ability of the dispenser of the remedies? If he had resisted his physician's will, questioned and combated the propriety of his prescriptions, a sickly and diseased invalid he would have been still, every avenue of health and of physical enjoyment closed around him. But his own will gladly accorded with that of his adviser. He may, I repeat, have wondered much at some parts of the cure, and questioned the expediency of others; yet his feeling and determination was, "I shall try: I DESIRE to do what he bids me; I shall risk my life in his hands." and thus, "willing to do his will," his restoration gives him, in all time to come, implicit faith in the remedies which had proved so entirely successful.

It is the very same with the moral and spiritual cure of our moral and spiritual natures. Here is the great disease of sin: sin with its moral virus in the corrupt and corrupted heart. A Great and Good Physician, in this His own Word, His Divine Pharmacopœia, proffers me a remedy. It is announced to be a perfect one—the only one. What shall be my conduct when this Heavenly Physician is summoned and His cure propounded? Shall I begin to impugn His veracity, and skill, and trustworthiness? Shall I begin to detail my own serious misgivings as to the efficacy of the ingredients He prescribes, and offer objections and difficulties in the way of farther treatment? This would be at once to diminish or forfeit the chance of recovery. Nay! Submitting to His verdict and prescription, acquiescing in its wisdom; in other words, "desiring to do His will," I come to know the reality of the restoration. I come to see the wondrous adaptation of the Gospel as a panacea for all the ills of my spiritual nature. Having thus tested it, I can no longer resist the evidence of my moral sense, the inner experimental evidence. Others may reject my Physician and His remedies, discredit and discount, and denounce them as a spurious imposture, a baseless hallucination. But I have "tasted and seen that the Lord is gracious." I have felt the power of the truth; and nothing now can lead me to disbelieve or discard it. I can say humbly in the words of the Great Healer Himself, which He employed in addressing a perplexed doubter, yet earnest seeker, "We speak that we do know, and testify that we have seen." You might as well try to convince me that the sun in heaven is a delusion and fantasy, as that this Bible, to which I owe a saved soul and regenerated nature, is a fabrication palmed on my credulity. To the scoffer still, as to the scoffers of old, who sought to throw discredit on Christ's cure of the blind man, and shake the faith of the cured in his Deliverer, I can say, "This one thing I know, that whereas I was blind, now I see!"

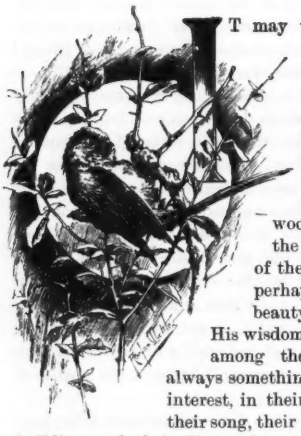
And, my young hearers, that is the evidence, the simple, truthful evidence on which rests the faith of millions. "To the poor the Gospel is preached." How many among the family of believers, lowly, humble, illiterate, know nothing about the other evidences of the schools; and even if you were to unfold them, these would be unable to take in and understand their scope. On what is the faith of such grounded? Call it not a blind, a devout imagination. Call it not the faith of ignorance or credulous superstition. Go to many lowly cottagers, those who are saints indeed; who have their poverty glorified and gladdened with the hopes of the Gospel, living lives of true yet unassuming godliness that would put many of us to the blush. What, I again ask, is the ground of their simple, yet resolute and unshaken, confidence? Why, it is this experimental evidence. They have tried the Gospel remedy—"the balm in Gilead and the Physician there"—and they have found in it the very remedy, and in Him the very Healer they need. Every day, as they continue desirous to do His will, they know more and more of the doctrine. You might as well bid them stand in doubt of their existence as question the divine reality of salvation through the Christ of Nazareth!

Nor is this illustrated in the case of the poor and lowly and illiterate only. It would be doing injustice to the truth of God to confine it to these. Nay, verily, the noblest and most impressive cases in which our text is verified are those in which you see minds of high intellectual culture, but sanctified by grace—such, if I might select as examples the names of two of our greatest experimental philosophers, as those of Sir David Brewster and Sir James Mackintosh—accepting with a child's simplicity the glorious scheme of Revealed Truth, living and dying in the unwavering belief of it. True to the principles of the highest philosophy they lived, doing the will, DESIROUS of DOING it. And they had the promise (the sure promise) fulfilled—"Ye shall know of the doctrine;" "Then shall ye know, if ye follow on to know the Lord." I believe many here may be able, in thought, to revert to someone you have known, of strong, masculine, vigorous understanding, one not likely to be carried away by fanaticism, or to accept of anything as truth unless he felt it to be so in his heart of hearts, one who would scorn to live in the profession of a belief he inwardly repudiated. Yet that man spent an elevated and consecrated existence maintaining the glory of the Cross, and he passed away in the calm, unwavering faith in which he lived, unagitated with one sceptic doubt, unharassed with one sceptic thought! How was this? Again the text tells you; he desired to do the Father's will. In the old phrase of patriarchal days, "he walked with God;" and the God whom he loved and served, revealed to his inner eye the reality of the doctrine, and made true, in his case (as in all of every rank and position who earnestly seek Him), the pledge—"Them that honour Me I will honour;" "Delight thyself also in the Lord, and He shall give thee the desires of thine heart;" "Commit thy way unto the Lord, trust also in Him, and He shall bring it to pass;" "And He shall bring forth thy righteousness as the light, and thy judgment as the noonday;" "If thou shalt seek the Lord thy God, thou shalt find Him, if thou seek Him with all thy heart and with all thy soul."

You will see from what we have just said that there is but one condition annexed to this soul-surrender to the Great Physician and to the making successful proof of the remedies offered. It is that there be a relinquishment of all moral impediments on our part. We cannot expect light to break upon us if we are still living in darkness, shunning the light and life of purity and holiness, the light and life of God, and if our moral being is out of harmony with His. Before we can dream of being athletes in the Christian race, weights and hindrances must be laid aside. The Apostle states and enforces this postulate in a striking passage, singularly interpretive of the words of our text: "Be not," says he, "conformed to this world, but be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind, that ye may prove what is that good and acceptable and perfect WILL of God" (Romans xii. 2). A higher than the Apostle similarly, and in briefer words, thus emphasises this same condition—the fulfilment of the promise of our text is contingent on it—"Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God."

Young men (and I speak to any who may specially need such a word to-day), receive humbly, confidently, reverentially, this great revealed prescription of the Great Healer. We know well that you are above others laid open in various forms to sceptic assaults and insidious sophistries: appeals from the simple statements of God's Word to proud reason. Listen not to them, but take rather the Divine recipe of our text. Set out in life: begin this all-momentous period of existence—anticipate alike the assault of foe without and of the traitor doubt within—by making proof for yourselves of the reality of the truth. Do God's will, and then you shall know of the reality of the doctrine!



I have met with not a few who, in their folly, have reversed this order: who wished to be satisfied of the doctrine first, before they did the will—in other words, who sought to be intellectually convinced before they were morally enlightened. The intellect, the proud intellect, refuses to be harnessed and hampered in this ethical chariot; and then the wheels refuse to move, or rather, the retrogression, the deterioration, begins. What is the result, the inevitable result, when the moral hold is loosened? The desire to do God's will ceases. In the words of Scripture, "when the house is emptied, swept, and garnished," then the seven devils of unbelief are waiting ready to burst in. And they do burst in, and the deadly work of defiant scepticism progresses in a rapid ratio.

Many a man is a sceptic because he wishes to get rid of his responsibility. He flatters himself that, by making it his boast to believe nothing—to spurn conscience as a demon of the imagination, and discard the soul's immortality as a similar unauthenticated dream—he can thus dismiss and bury in oblivion haunting recollections of a sinful past. Though I only repeat what I have already asserted, depend upon it, if you refuse to entertain the "will" to do God's will, you will not only never know of the doctrine, but you will come of necessity to that sad state and phase of mind, when your only belief is that all Christians are hypocrites; that the phrase, "a living faith," is a lying invention; that religion is a sham and a pretence, or its professors dupes and charlatans. This is the shipwreck of faith and of a good conscience; the truth once tolerated comes gradually to be slighted, then despised, then scorned. Unhappy cavillers! going on, not like "doers of the will," from strength to strength, but from weakness to weakness! God has a solemn retributive sentence addressed to such, leaving them in their miserable, proud, petty isolation—"Ephraim is joined to his idols; let him alone."

Let me adjure all with the dew of youth upon them, spurning "devil-born doubt," to try this experimental evidence by making an early consecration of themselves to Christ. Preoccupy your souls with Him. By thus securing possession of the moral citadel, the intellectual is sure to follow. Mark what St. Paul says: "With the heart" (not with the head) "man believeth unto righteousness." He tells us the secret of his own conquest of unbelief. There was no room for one wavering or questioning in the mind of the man who could say: "I live: yet not I, but Christ liveth in me." To him to live was Christ; his heart was so full of passionate, enthusiastic love for his Redeemer that there was no possible entrance for any poorer or baser thought or purpose. We may not be able to live or feel or act like that peerless Apostle, and we should be modest in the appropriation of his phrases to our lowlier standard. But we can have the same aspiration as he had; God helping us, by desiring to do the will and to follow in the steps of his great Lord, we shall have the concurrent reward—the fulfilment of the assured promise—by knowing of the doctrine; and thus, in life and in death, be able to say, in a humble sense, as he said it: "I KNOW Whom I have believed!"

ODDS AND ENDS OF BIRD LIFE.

IT may well be said that to all those who live in the country God has given three great sources of pleasure among the beauties and wonders of His hand: the Trees of the wood: the Flowers of the field; and the Birds of the air. And nowhere, perhaps, is there greater beauty, or clearer trace of His wisdom and goodness, than among the birds. There is always something fresh, and full of interest, in their habits and ways; their song, their plumage, their nest-building and their flight—for all who will but use their eyes.

It so happens that I live in what the people about here call a good "birdy" spot. There are quiet leafy fruit and flower gardens all round my house, where the sound of a gun is never heard. Trees shelter us on all sides, and miles of thick green woodlands are within easy reach, where one may find shelter from the fiercest summer sunshine or the coldest blast of winter. Pheasants and partridges abound, carefully looked after by many keepers; but although Mr. Gaiters and his friends slaughter many harmless creatures, both furred and feathered, they are, on the whole, merciful towards the small birds, which are to be found here in greater number and variety than in many a more promising locality. Hence it happens that the birds and I have by degrees come to be great friends; and in many a lonely ramble through winding lane, field, and wood, I get quiet glimpses of their social life, fortunes and misfortunes, of curious interest. Just outside my garden gate, which faces the high road, is a rustic post pillar-box, that serves for the scanty correspondence of the next two hamlets. The aperture open for letters (at about five and a half feet from the ground) is six inches long, and one wide; while the interior of the box is a small chamber of about eighteen inches high by eight in width. Of this cosy little nook a tiny long-tailed tit has now (May) taken possession, and after a week's careful preparation of the nursery, by lining the whole floor with a carpet of thick moss, and over that a dainty sprinkle of feathers and wool, there she now sits in the dark, jealously guarding her two tiny white eggs. For the last ten years, regularly as May comes round, a tit of the same kind has there built her nest, and brought up a large family, and through the slit in the letter-box safely launched them out upon the world. By this time there must be a very large family of tits in this immediate neighbourhood who have all started in life in this same strange fashion: brought up in the midst of a pile of letters and newspapers, and, when hardly able to fly, tossed out of a post-office (the nursery) window. In this way some scores may have inherited a literary taste, and, remembering what a happy and quiet time they had of it in that dark little room near the garden gate, have shown their good-will to me and my labour with pen and ink by arranging that one or other of the family should always be in residence at Her Majesty's expense. It is totally unlike any bird's usual place for a nest, and yet God seems to have given to them the sense of knowing that it is a place of safety and of peace—though all in the dark, while their friends and companions rejoice in the sunshine and free air.

"A good 'birdy' spot."

Whether the present busy little mother is the same who came to us last year it is hard to decide. I have watched both pretty sharply, and can detect no difference. But whichever she may be, though I seldom see her fly in or out of the nursery window, if I softly open the door at seven p.m. I always find her with outspread wings, keeping guard over her dainty treasure, and looking up at me with a small bright eye shining like a spark in the dark, as if to say "What do you want here? Make haste and shut the door!" Of alarm or fear there is no sign whatever.

If the pile of letters and newspapers grows too big and incommodes her in the nest, somehow or other she manages to push back the most obtrusive; in one case biting the edges of an envelope until half the contents were laid bare; and in another pitching the offender bodily out of the window into the road. Every night the postman regularly at eight p.m. unlocks the box, and takes out the mail, but of him she takes no notice whatever, as if she knew that he had a right to be there, and, if he chose, to turn her out. But Jacob is far too kindly an old man for that.

Though the summers in this part of Hants, as a rule, are intensely hot and dry, the winters are long and severe, and many of our birds must then have a very hard time of it, especially those which feed on insects. In the long frosts of four or five weeks, scores must die of actual starvation. And yet, though I was last year out and about in all weathers, and made my way through many a likely haunt, I very rarely met with a dead bird; certainly not more than half a dozen all through the terrible winter of 1887, and all these were blackbirds, or thrushes, or wood-pigeons, who had perished of actual starvation, and when found were scarcely more than skin and bone in a shroud of feathers.

Of one young cock blackbird thus found dead I made a special note, as he had but one leg; and therefore must have had a doubly hard time of it. We had noticed him before this one summer morning very busy on the lawn, and watched him through a long struggle with a big worm, which he managed to drag out of his hole at last, though it was with great difficulty that he contrived to keep his own balance, and avoid tumbling over on the grass. He had no doubt lost his leg by meddling with one of the keeper's small traps set along the edge of the wood for stoats and weazels. So also, most likely, had a poor, merry chatterer of a starling whom I not long after noticed on the palings in the kitchen garden. Somehow or other he contrived to get through the winter, but one spring morning he managed "to put his foot in it" again, and get into trouble in the chimney of a neighbouring farmhouse, down which he made a sudden and rattling descent with some loose dusty leaves, and fell dead on the kitchen floor.

Within a hundred yards of my house I have noticed more than twenty varieties of birds, which seem more or less to prefer this locality to one more remote from the works and ways of men, both for building purposes and obtaining food. But out of them all, none are more talkative and amusing and peculiar than the starlings, who are with us all the year round; and against whom, when the plums are ripe, old Charles, our gardener, carries on a standing warfare. He alone had not a word of pity for our poor friend with one leg, and only grumbled out something like "He were too fond of them Morellas!"

I have often wondered what the other birds thought of their one-legged companion: whether they noticed any peculiarity in his gait, or whether his wife and children looked askance at his strange way of hopping along the road in a zig-zag, where other people walked straight. But whatever they may have noticed, they kept their thoughts to themselves; unless, indeed, they said a word to the green woodpecker, whose merry laugh I so often heard in the long avenue of beeches; though I never caught more than a glimpse of him creeping up one of the grey mossy trunks. He is a strange, shy sort of a bird, and one can never get to talk to or closely watch him. And in this respect he is not unlike the cuckoos, who haunt this neighbourhood in great numbers, and are about the most puzzling of all our summer visitors. To begin with, the cry of the cuckoo is more like the sound of a human voice than that of any other bird, and, contrary to almost all precedent, it is the female only who utters it. It is not the voice of the gay young spark serenading his lady-love, or chanting a love-song to his wife and family in the nest, but of a young lady in search of a sweetheart, and determined to lose no chance of finding one. I have heard her call him by name upwards of sixty times, without pausing even once to take breath. And if thus oddly behaved in the days of courtship, what shall be said of her behaviour as a wife and mother? She doesn't even build a nest, or the pretence of one, but during the whole of her stay leads a wandering, vagrant sort of life, and attaches herself to no one locality, much less to any fixed abode: flying hither and thither, and laying an egg here and an egg there, as if for mere amusement. And yet this strange instinct, which is such a puzzle to us, has been planted in the cuckoo by the same all-wise and good Creator who gives to each living creature its own special habits and ways of life; who has taught the bee to build her dainty cell of wax, and the bird her mossy nest; and appointed for each and for all of them their fixed times and seasons, in beauty and perfect order.

CUCKOO FOLLOWED BY TITLARK.

The nests the cuckoo chooses for her future children are generally those of birds not half as big as herself, such as the hedge-sparrow, the skylark, the linnet, or one of the finches, and even the tiny wren; but far more often the meadow pipit, a quiet little brown bird, who often follows the wanderer from field to field, or from tree to tree, as if spell-bound, for hours together. In many cases the structure and position of the nest chosen are such that a bird of so large a size cannot possibly lay an egg there in the usual way. It is laid, therefore, elsewhere, and when laid, carried in Madame Cuckoo's bill to its destination, and there cunningly left; and this is easily managed, because it is no bigger than a skylark's, and Cuculus has a very wide mouth. But even then she has to be very careful as to date. It must not be between the completion of the nest and the laying of the first egg by the rightful owner, or the intruder's egg might never be hatched; nor while the hen is sitting, when there would be no chance of getting it into the nest surreptitiously. She searches for a nest where one or two eggs are just laid, and in the absence of the owner lays down her burden, and in a trice is gone. Being of the same size as the other eggs, it excites no suspicion, otherwise it might be turned out, or cause the nest to be deserted. After fourteen days it is generally the first to hatch, and no sooner does the young cuckoo see the day than he at once sets to work to secure for himself the whole nursery, and the sole attention of his deluded foster-parents. He cunningly insinuates himself under the other young birds or unhatched eggs, and by degrees forces them over the edge of the nest, to fall and perish; and having thus got all the room to himself, opens wide his gaping mouth for all supplies of food that come in. Caterpillars, insects, worms, and grubs are all alike welcome to his greedy infant palate, however much his diet may afterwards change; and to keep up an unfailing supply of these dainties both his nurses are unwearied.

YOUNG CUCKOO IN NEST OF TITLARK.

No wonder, therefore, that among the feathered race the cuckoo is by no means a popular visitor, in spite of the loving care of his stupid foster-parents, and the infatuated attentions of the little meadow pipit. Again and again I have noticed that at the very first sound of "Cuckoo! cuckoo!" three or four small birds would hurry away after the false singer, and with great anger follow and dash at her, as small birds sometimes do at a hawk. The mystery of why the cuckoo builds no nest of her own, but lays her eggs in a stranger's nursery, has yet to be solved. Some day it may be solved; and then we shall find fresh cause for admiring another wonder of His hand Who has created nothing in vain, without Whom not a sparrow falls to the ground.

THE CHILDREN'S HYMN.

THE days and weeks refuse to stay,
And still keep gliding on:
What golden hours, since New Year's Day,
Into the past have gone!

How soon the precious time has sped!
To us may grace be given,
In this our youth, O Lord, to tread
The narrow path to Heaven!

We know the Sun of Righteousness
Upon that road will shine—
To guide our steps, to cheer and bless
Our hearts with joy divine!

Thy loving children, we would lean
Our weakness on Thy might,
And seek the things which are unseen,
And walk with Thee in light!

FIVE STONES FROM THE BROOK.

BY THE REV. GEORGE EVERARD, M.A.

THERE is a simple but beautiful poem by Bishop C. Wordsworth that refers to the victory of David over the giant, and which breathes a spirit of holy confidence in God's Word :—

Five pebbles from the brook
The shepherd David drew ;
One of these five he took,
And proud Goliath slew.

He went forth all alone,
No armour had he on ;
But with a sling and stone
The victory he won.

There is a holy stream,
By God's pure well-spring fed ;
Bright, polished pebbles gleam
Like jewels in its bed.

The Bible is that book,
The five books of God's Law ;
Jesus, our David, took,
And one from them did draw.

With that, and that alone,
He went to meet the foe,
And with a single stone
He laid the tempter low.

Lord, arm us with that Word,
With faith in Thee our Shield ;
We need no other sword :
Teach us that sword to wield.

Help us like Thee to fight ;
O give us victory ;
So may we put to flight
Our ghostly enemy.

I too would take five pebbles from the brook. The New Testament is the brook, and the five pebbles are five texts. Yet in a sense they may be all linked together. The link is that the same two words, "one thing," are found in each. And when they come in appropriate order, we may see something of a true harmony in the whole chain.

I.—"ONE THING IS NEEDFUL" (St. Luke x. 42).

WE know well the story of Mary's devotion. She sat at the Master's feet, and drank in His words of life and peace. Her ears were open to welcome His instruction, and her heart was yielded up to Him as her Saviour and her Lord. But Martha was busied about the supper she was preparing, and she looked for Mary's help, and seemed ruffled and put out because her sister still tarried at the Saviour's feet. But Christ took Mary's part. "Martha, Martha, thou art careful and troubled about many things, but one thing is needful, and Mary hath chosen that good part that shall not be taken from her." Martha had done well, for she had received Christ into her house and was anxious to provide Him a bountiful repast, but Mary had done better, for she gave Christ that in which He most delighted—an ear ready to hearken, and a heart prepared to receive the riches of His grace and love.

One thing was needful, and Mary had chosen it. To know Christ, to receive His words, to trust and love and obey Him, and so to have Him for her own—this was her choice and her portion. It was greater far than any earthly treasure, and one she could never lose.

"One thing is needful." It was needful for Martha and for Mary eighteen centuries ago ; it is as needful for you and me to-day.

What is needful for a man perishing with hunger? Surely it is wholesome food. And man's soul is hungry, and Christ is the living bread that cometh down from heaven, who alone can satisfy our longing desires. What is needful for a thirsty man? Is it not pure, refreshing water? And Christ is the spring and fountain-head of the river that maketh glad the city of God ; and whoso drinketh of this water shall never thirst. What is needful for a man in rags and tattered garments? Is it not suitable clothing? And Christ is our robe, our covering, our righteousness, in which alone we can stand before God. What is needful for a man stricken with the plague or some deadly disease? Is it not the medicine that will heal and restore him? And Christ is both physician and medicine. His precious blood, His life-giving words, His purifying, quickening, strengthening grace : these alone can heal and restore the sin-stricken soul. In short, man is a sinner, with a soul that will live as long as the everlasting God ; and what does he need but a free and full salvation, a Saviour merciful and faithful, and able to save to the uttermost?

Never forget it! One thing is needful. Ten thousand things may be pleasant and profitable for this present life—fair means, and good health, and kind friends, and a comfortable home, and times of recreation, and interesting books, and suitable occupation, and I know not what beside ; but one thing is needful—to be at peace with God, to be renewed in Christ's image, to have Him as an Almighty Friend ever by your side, to seek first His Kingdom of righteousness, to live for Christ, to live like Christ, to live in Christ while here below, so that you may live with Christ in His bright Home above. In God's sight, in sight of a dying hour, in sight of the great eternity that lies before you, everything else is child's play, a passing vanity, a thing of nought. O for the heavenly wisdom to follow the one thing needful, to choose the better part of Mary, which can never pass away!

II.—"ONE THING THOU LACKEST" (St. Mark x. 21).

WHAT a contrast we have here to the words spoken of Mary! These words were spoken by Christ to the Jewish ruler. True, there was much in him we admire. He came earnestly, seeking instruction from Christ. He came running and kneeling to Christ, and said to Him, "Good Master, what shall I do that I may inherit eternal life?"

He was, moreover, moral and upright in his daily life. As to the letter of the law, he had kept it from his youth. There were in him none of those dark blots and foul blemishes which disfigure the life of so many young people. So, we are told, Christ beholding him, loved him. Yet, after all, he came sadly short of the true standard. Christ tested his earnestness and resolution, and it faded away in a moment. His high tower of goodness and obedience collapsed. He manifested that neither love to God nor love to man was with him supreme. "Go thy way, sell whatsoever thou hast, and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven; and come, take up thy cross and follow Me."

It was a hard saying, and he could not keep it. He lacked that sense of sin which would have made a Saviour better to him than his great possessions. He lacked that faith which would have enabled him to see the treasure in heaven far more to be prized than earthly riches. He lacked that love to Christ that would have led him to esteem Him as the pearl of great price, and to sacrifice all gladly for His sake. He lacked that unselfish love to his neighbour that would have made him content to part with his wealth to feed the poor and hungry. A man may go a long way in religion, and yet after all may come short of the Kingdom. Here was one who combined great earnestness, high morality, respect, and honour to the Saviour, and, no doubt, a life of careful attendance on religious ordinances, yet when put to the test he failed utterly, and forsook Christ instead of humbly following Him.

How is it with you who read these lines? Are you earnest in religion? Are you moral in your outward conduct? Do you regard Christ as a teacher, and come to learn of Him? Perhaps all this, you say, is the case. So far it is well. But what is there further? Is there any depth in your religion? Have you dug deep, and built your house on the rock? Is there an honest conviction of your sinfulness in God's sight? Is there a desire for a new heart? Is there a readiness to take up the cross, to own Christ before the world, to give up what you value for His sake, to perform unpleasant duties—in fact, to choose Christ and His service, in shame, poverty, loss of friends, and all things, rather than the world's favour, with all that it can bestow? Would you prefer Christ in a parish poor-house rather than sin and its service in a palace?

Which do you follow, the young ruler, who kept his wealth and forsook Christ, or Matthew, who rose up from the receipt of custom, and left all and followed Him? "One thing thou lackest." What a sorrowful reflection it may be by-and-bye!—"I once was very near Christ, but I left Him. The world's chain was too strong for me. I thought of Him, I came to His House, I desired to be His, but I could not take up the cross and count all things as loss for His sake. So I turned my back upon Him, and with Him I lost my soul, my heaven, my all."

On a stormy day I have seen a ship in the far horizon come out from the thick darkness of the black cloud, and cross a bright patch of sunshine on the ocean, and then go back into the darkness, and thus be seen no more. May it not be so with many a soul? There is a time when a voice calls and there is a response. There is a coming for a moment into the light of Christ's presence, and a glimpse of all the glorious privileges of His Gospel. But, alas! this is all. The soul goes back. The darkness covers it. And Christ mourns over another that chooses "darkness rather than light," and the transitory possession of a day instead of the lasting joys of eternity.

III.—"ONE THING I KNOW" (St. John ix. 25).

IMAGINE the joy of the man who uttered these words! All his life he had been stone-blind. He had never seen one ray of the glorious sunshine or the countenance of one dear to him. But He who was the Light of the world, and who giveth sight to the blind, drew near. He made clay and anointed the man's eyes, and sent him to wash in the pool of Siloam; and the man went, and came seeing. But there were those who hated the Lord Jesus, and tried to make light of His glorious works. It was so in this case. The Pharisees questioned the man, and spake against the Lord for healing on the Sabbath. The man said but little, but he stuck to his text. He had received sight, and he knew it, and was sure that He who had done this work must be some great one sent of God. The Pharisees tell the man to give praise to God, but that He who had healed him was a sinner. But the man stands firm as a rock. He had gained such a benefit as was beyond all price, and he glories in it. "Whether he be a sinner or no, I know not. ONE THING I KNOW, that whereas I was blind, now I see." What a picture of true conversion!

A light arises in the soul, and the soul cannot but be conscious of the marvellous change. Many things may yet be a source of difficulty; but of one thing there is no uncertainty. I was blind, and now I see. I was blind to the greatness of my sins. Ten thousand times ten thousand breaches of God's holy law were written down against me, but I saw nothing of my sin or danger. But now I see sin everywhere: sins of thought, word, and deed, sins of neglect and omission, sins of motive and principle; above all, the sin of refusing the marvellous love of redemption. I was blind to the imminent peril in which I stood. A soul unsaved, a heart unchanged! The pit of destruction opening close at my feet! But I see it now; I see the fearful abyss of woe from which grace has redeemed me. I was blind to my Saviour's love; I knew nothing of the tender pity that brought Him from heaven to save the perishing. I knew Him not as the merciful Shepherd who laid down His life for the sheep. But I see it now; at least I can see something of the exceeding love which reaches a lost sinner like me, and promises to bring me to everlasting glory.

I was blind to the joy and comfort of true religion. I reckoned it a burden and a bondage. I put it from me as a painful necessity, that perchance might do for a sick-chamber or for a dying-hour. But I see it now. I see there is more true joy in one hour's service of Christ than in a lifetime of sinful indulgence. To know God as a most pitiful Father, to know

Christ as an unchangeable Friend, to claim as my portion the precious promises of the Word, to hope for a blessed rest hereafter—here is joy that never fails.

The old security is gone
In which so long we lay;
The sleep of death has been dispelled,
The darkness rolled away.

New hopes, new purposes, desires,
And joys Thy grace has given;
Old ties are broken from the earth,
New ones attach to heaven.

"ONE THING I KNOW." But let each of us inquire: Do I know it? Have I a plain witness that all is changed? I may not know, as this man did, the exact time that it took place, but is it a reality? Does it influence my daily walk? Have I such a sight of the Lord Jesus as in some measure transforms me into His image? O let me seek certainty in religion; not "I hope," but "I know"; and the witness of the Spirit will give this.

IV.—"ONE THING I DO" (Phil. iii. 13).

I SEE here a racer. His whole soul is given to one object; everything else is as dust in the balance: shall I win this glorious race? Shall I receive the crown of victory? So he presses forward, with his eye on the goal. If he falls, he speedily rises again; he turns not aside; he tarries not to pluck the flowers by the way; he has no time to talk with the spectators on the course. Such a one was Paul; he had known the power of God's Spirit; he had learnt the secret of a true conversion to God. Once blind, on the way to Damascus the light burst upon him; he had seen the marvellous glory of the Saviour's love.

Now he goes further: he runs in the path of God's commandments; he is bent on knowing more and loving more, and serving better the Master whom he loves. He loses sight of the steps already trodden, and eagerly covets the highest attainments, and the most successful labours to bring in souls to the Kingdom. "This one thing I do: forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before, I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus" (Phil. iii. 13, 14).

Such, too, should be the desire and aim of each true-hearted disciple of the Lord Jesus. One short life, and yet how much to be attained and how much to be done! How much evil yet cleaves to us, how much of possible grace and virtue we have not even seen or touched! How much more prayerful, unselfish, zealous and self-denying we ought to be! How much more complete should be our consecration to the will of God! How much more we might abound in intercessions and good works on behalf of Christ's Church! Therefore let us follow this "one thing" of the Apostle.

Let me lay aside by-ends and double motives, and self's excuses, and the world's enticements, and set out with new aspirations to the glorious position of a whole-hearted follower of the Lamb of God! Let me catch the spirit of the Master: "Wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business?"

Let me steadfastly determine to make no compromise with the world, the flesh, or the devil, but aim, at all seasons, in all duties, and under all circumstances, to do and to suffer the will of God and to glorify my Father in Heaven. And let me do this depending continually upon grace from on high, even the working of the Holy Ghost in the heart given by the exalted Saviour. Apart from Christ I can do nothing and be nothing; but relying upon His promise—"My grace is sufficient for thee"—I may follow in the footsteps of Paul, and press on till the crown be in sight.

V.—"BE NOT IGNORANT OF THIS ONE THING" (2 Peter iii. 8)—

"WHAT one day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day." We come to the last link in the chain. We have here the last of these one things which we have been pondering. And what is this one thing which St. Peter here points out? It reminds us of two points worthy of our notice. First, what a short dream is life and all that pertains to it! If in God's sight a thousand years be as one day, what a brief span is our sojourn here—at the most only some three-score years and ten, and often far, far less. Then, too, we are reminded that Christ will soon appear in His glory. True, more than eighteen centuries have rolled by since He ascended from Mount Olivet, but this makes no difference. One or two thousand years are as nothing before Him who has all eternity in which to accomplish His work. Let me ever bear in mind these two points. My life here is but a vapour, a shadow, a hand-breadth, and all its joys and sorrows, and cares and burdens, are but for a moment. Then, also, I must remember the King is coming to reward abundantly His faithful ones, and to take them to share His Kingdom and His glory; and no less to judge men for their wicked ways and deeds, and to bring out before the universe the secret thoughts and hidden schemes of iniquity by which they have dishonoured Him and wronged their fellow-men.

In the sight of that day, how every one of the truths I have named assumes a most solemn importance!

No doubt will then exist as to the one thing needful, and how little was everything else compared to it. Where there has been the one thing lacking, all outward professions will then be utterly in vain to conceal it. The one thing known, the eyes opened by grace to behold the Saviour, will then give place to a still clearer vision, the beatific vision of the glorified Redeemer coming with ten thousand of His saints. The one thing done, the single eye that sought only to win the heavenly race in pleasing and serving God, will bring its great reward, the crown of life that fadeth not away.

"Lord, grant me the one thing needful. May I never lack the grace to love Thee, nor to give my life to Thy service; and when Thou shalt appear, set me at Thine own right hand to share Thy glory for ever. Amen."

Thou hidden love of God.

3.

Tis mercy all, that Thou hast brought
My mind to seek her peace in Thee;
Yet while I seek, but find Thee not,
No peace my wandering soul shall see:
Oh! when shall all my wanderings end,
And all my steps to Thee-ward tend?

4.

Is there a thing beneath the sun
That strives with Thee my heart to share?
Ah! tear it thence, and reign alone,
The Lord of every nation there;
Then shall my heart from earth be free,
When it hath found repose in Thee.

5.

O Lord, Thy sovereign aid impart,
To save me from low-thoughted care;
Chase this self-will through all my heart,
Through all its latent mazes there;
Make me Thy duteous child, that I
Ceaseless may "Abba, Father" cry.

6.

Each moment draw from earth away
My heart, that lowly waits Thy call;
Speak to my inmost soul, and say,
"I am thy Love, thy God, thy All."
To feel Thy power, to hear Thy voice,
To taste Thy love, be all my choice.

"OUR CONVERSATION IS IN HEAVEN."

BLINDFOLD among vain shadows one was groping as she went,
And for a treasure dear to man, the pearl of heart—content—
When, lo! the Saviour's tender call was threaded in her dream:
"Come, learn of Me, and thou shalt find; I am Life's crystal stream."

Then rise there solemn questionings anent this boon of boons—
They vex the watches of her night, they haunt day's soft saloons;
And wider yet and wider parts the rifted Heaven above,
And in its strengthening glow she sees One worthy of her love.

And by its light the misty towers grow wondrous clear to see;
"Who would not turn aside and look on such a sight?" says she;
And so, the dawn is on her face, the everlasting day,
Now her soul is in the glories of the City far away.

So might he look who saw the doors of heaven uplifted high,
When to his crown Elias sped, fast as the steeds could fly;
So Stephen set his angel-face, so gazed the orphan ring
When, out of sight, a throne of pearl bare up and up the King.

And Grace hath locked those palms of hers, now innocent and still;
Nor can they part asunder, save on errands of goodwill;
Her Saviour's own handmaiden now, her body, strength, and soul,
In meekness still to follow on, long as His ages roll.

CHAPTER XII.

"TEARS, IDLE TEARS!"

"The tear forgot as soon as shed."—GRAY.

THE news of Mrs. Kenyon's illness spread rapidly amongst the guests who had assembled to do honour to her grandson's majority. Everyone was anxious to get away as quickly as possible, and relieve the stricken household of the presence of outsiders, but it was some time before the numerous equipages could be brought round. Horses had to be harnessed and coachmen to be found, and meanwhile the lawn in front of the house was crowded with people waiting for their carriages, and talking in undertones of the sudden catastrophe that had brought the Verecroft fête to so abrupt a termination. There was no one to take leave of, and people stood uncertainly about, wondering what to do, and waiting for news. A thrill of expectation ran through the crowd when the white-haired old butler came down the great steps at last, and gave a note to Mr. Burgess, the family lawyer, who was a distant connection of Lady Vereker's. He stood up in his carriage, which had just arrived, and made his voice heard above the crunching of carriage-wheels and the hum and buzz of voices—

"I am commissioned to apologise to you all for the absence of Sir Raymond and Lady Vereker, and to inform you of its melancholy cause. I regret to say that Mrs. Kenyon has been seized with paralysis, and that little hope is entertained of her recovery. She is believed to be dying—no!" said the old man, pausing, and pointing solemnly to a window where a hand was already drawing down a blind. "She is not dying—Mrs. Kenyon is dead."

He took off his hat and stood a moment silent, and then he bowed gravely, and was driven away, and everyone else followed as silently and speedily as they could. It was impossible not to be shocked and dismayed. Whispers of consternation and sympathy were heard on every side, and even those who only knew Mrs. Kenyon slightly were impressed by the tragic ending of the festal day. Everyone looked subdued and sad, and Lady Rosalie wept aloud, and was roundly scolded by Miss Jackson for doing so.

"What was Mrs. Kenyon to you, or you to her?" she inquired, when at length their coachman was found, and they were driving back through the park, where the village boys were still playing cricket, and gaping at the long line of carriages that passed by.

"Oh, do you see?—they don't know!—they haven't heard!" sobbed Lady Rosalie. "Baker, tell them to stop——"

"Drive on, Baker!" said Miss Jackson. "Dear me, Rosalie, what business is it of ours? Why should these lads lose their game because there's an old woman less in the world? And why should you cry your eyes out for a person you didn't care two pins for when she was alive? I think you ought to be ashamed of yourself."

"Ashamed of being kind and sympathetic?" Avice asked sarcastically. She did not like Hilda Jackson at any time, and she never liked her so little as when she was domineering over the friend whose bread she ate.

"Never mind," said Lady Rosalie, drying her eyes cheerfully. "I shall be better now. But I really was upset, and a good cry does one a world of good."

"Good? When your face is the size of a pumpkin and the colour of beetroot!" said Hilda scornfully. "You're not a young woman by any means, but that's no reason you should give up all regard for your personal appearance. There's something quite indecent in going about with a face like that. Pull down your veil, and don't whimper any more, for goodness' sake!"

Lady Rosalie meekly obeyed, and Avice did not know if she was more indignant with the tyrant or the slave.

It was a very silent drive. Avice had abundant food for thought; Lady Rosalie sniffed behind her veil, and tried furtively to wipe her eyes without being detected; Miss Jackson mused savagely on Captain Hallam's defection, and amused herself with watching Lady Rosalie's manœuvres, and fixing a deterrent eye on the unlucky handkerchief as soon as it appeared; and Daisy, who always found tears infectious, sat in her corner with quite an April face, and smiled and cried alternately. She was much impressed by Lady Rosalie's grief, but she had never even seen Mrs. Kenyon, and there was so much, so very much that was pleasant to remember in this day that had had so tragic an ending. It had been delightful to watch the cricket, and really get to know what a "long-stop" was, and what was meant by an "over" and a "bye." Mr. Vereker had told her a little, and Captain Hallam a great deal, and Daisy felt quite learned as she thought it all over now. Then there was the delightful luncheon, where Lord Blackstone had been as good as a chaperon, and a great, great deal more amusing; and then—and Daisy smiled and glowed till Lady Rosalie was quite scandalised at the radiant face—then there was a wonderful walk by the river, which she did not think she could tell even Avice about, unless Avice "pumped" very much. The Avon was one small blue flower the poorer for that walk, and Daisy how much the richer! She felt as if everyone must know, as if everyone must see the tiny spray of green, with its pale turquoise crown, that was fastened in her dress, and stirred with every throb of the happy little heart. Surely Miss Jackson was looking at it now! Daisy put up her hand, as if to guard her treasure from that withering look, and ran up-stairs as soon as she got home, to put it safely away in her Birthday-book.

She looked at the little gilt-edged volume rather wistfully. Which of the three hundred and sixty-five days it contained was his birthday, she wondered? What were the words that had been fitted to it, and were they of good omen and worthy of their honourable place? But as she did not know which the remarkable day was, she laid her forget-me-not in the space allotted to the 20th of June.

"Just to remind me when I had it," she told herself, with a happy little laugh. As if there was any fear she would forget!

And meanwhile Lady Rosalie was talking to Mrs. Meredith, and enjoying herself thoroughly. She had come in with Avice and Daisy to give their mother an account of the memorable day, and as Hilda was not there, she was free to dilate on the tragedy of Mrs. Kenyon's death, and weep over it as much as she pleased.

"Rosalie likes crying—those large women always do," Hilda had often said, with immeasurable scorn; and there was a certain amount of truth in the charge. Melodrama was dear to Lady Rosalie's soul; she liked to have her nerves thrilled and her feelings harrowed by other people's troubles, and her real sympathy for them was curiously mixed with a sense of personal enjoyment. She would not have hurt a fly, but if the fly was to be hurt she liked to be there to see. She was really grieved that Mrs. Kenyon was dead, but it was delightful to have anything so startling to relate. The tragic story, with its pathetic contrasts of feasting and merriment under the very windows of the chamber of death, lost nothing of its horror and pathos in the telling. She described with infinite zest the maid's unexpected appearance, her breathless agitation, and their own horrified surprise. She told of the consternation that had spread amongst the guests when Lady Vereker and Sir Raymond had been summoned from their midst, and of the thrill that had passed through them when the blind of Mrs. Kenyon's room was drawn down. And she wept copiously, and enjoyed herself with an intensity of enjoyment that was only tempered by the reflection that Hilda would be sure to ask what had made her nose so red.

Mrs. Meredith listened with all the interest Lady Rosalie could have desired.

"Mrs. Kenyon dead!" she said, in low, awestruck tones; and her interest never flagged till the end of the tale. She did not say that she had ever known Mrs. Kenyon, but Lady Rosalie felt that her tones implied more sympathy than is generally aroused by the death of a perfect stranger, even in circumstances as tragic as these, and plumed herself on the success of her narration.

"She was as interested and as sorry for her as if she had known her herself," Lady Rosalie said afterwards to Hilda Jackson.

"How do you know that she didn't?" Miss Jackson asked. "Do you know anything about Mrs. Meredith, Rosalie, except that she's your next-door neighbour, and that you took one of your absurd fancies for her and forced yourself on her acquaintance? I was asked a dozen times to-day who the Miss Merediths were, and I hadn't a word to say. Who are they? I wonder myself often! They are ladylike, I grant, and Avice is good-looking; but who knows anything about them?"

"Who wants to know anything about them?" said Lady Rosalie, with a sort of feeble defiance.

"I do," said Hilda promptly. "The girls go about with us, and it puts us in a very awkward position to have to confess we don't know who they are. Does Mrs. Meredith ever mention her husband, or her father either? We infer that such people have existed, but we never hear anything about it."

"Her husband is dead, we know."

"Do we? We know that Mrs. Meredith wore widow's weeds, but do we know more than that? Sometimes I think the deceased Meredith never existed, and sometimes I think he's in existence still! Perhaps he's in an asylum, or perhaps he drops his h's and isn't presentable. If he is dead, why doesn't she talk about him, like other widows do? Why doesn't she hang up his likeness, and descant upon his virtues, and vow there never was such a man before or since? We shouldn't know if they used to have their little tiffs! We should take it all in—or you would, my dear; and I don't believe she's ever mentioned him in all the years you've known her."

"She is very reserved, I know; but I don't see why you should fancy such horrid things. I dare say she would tell me all about her husband if I wanted to know, but she has never happened to mention him, and so of course I couldn't."

"You mean you didn't particularly care about it. If you had really wanted to know, I don't think delicacy would have restrained you," observed Miss Jackson with asperity.

She was standing on the soft bear-skin hearth-rug, in her favourite attitude of aggressive alertness, that always reminded Avice of a belligerent sparrow, and looking at Lady Rosalie with an irritation the poor woman felt to be undeserved. Was it her fault that Captain Hallam had transferred his attentions to Daisy Meredith? That was what was making Hilda so bitter against the Merediths, Lady Rosalie thought; but she knew her friend a great deal too well to betray her suspicions.

"There's a mystery," Hilda said now, regarding the unhappy Lady Rosalie with a menacing glance. "There's a mystery, and I mean to find it out. It didn't matter when you only introduced them here, but now, I suppose, Lady Vereker means to take them up, and if they get into the county set, there'll be no end to their pride and folly."

"Lady Vereker can see they are ladies, and that is enough for her."

"Lady Vereker is one fool, and you are another," rejoined Miss Jackson, whose good manners were apt to disappear through the window when temper came in at the door, as love is said to do when poverty enters in like manner, "and as I don't mean to make a third, or—or to allow anyone I care for to do so, the sooner you find out the Merediths' history the better."

"I thought you meant to find it out yourself," said Lady Rosalie, with a faint attempt at self-assertion.

"I mean you to find it out for me," Hilda said calmly. "What chance should I have alone? I have not the entrée of the Hermitage, nor am I intimate enough with Mrs. Meredith to ask her questions like that."

"And do you suppose I shall use my intimacy to ask her things she does not wish to have known?" asked Lady Rosalie indignantly. She was not without honourable feelings, and she was really angry with Hilda for suggesting what seemed to her dishonourable, and still more angry with herself because her conscience told her that, however she might protest, she would end by doing as she was bid.

Hilda knew it quite as well as Lady Rosalie. She fixed her small cold eyes on her friend's shrinking face, and announced her intentions with unmistakable clearness and decision. "You will find out for me who and what Mrs. Meredith's husband was, and whether he is alive or dead——"

"As if I could ask her that!" murmured Lady Rosalie.

"There is no need to ask her in so many words, and she would probably refuse to answer if you did. Surely you can find out without the clumsy blunder of asking? You don't want for wit when you choose to use it, and you will please to use it now."

"I can't see what you want to know for."

"That is my affair," said Miss Jackson with an inscrutable smile. "Yours is simply to get me the information, and leave the rest to me."

She went out of the room, as if she considered the matter settled, as indeed it was. Lady Rosalie might protest that her friend was unreasonable, and the thing she asked impossible, but Hilda knew very well that she would do her best to comply with her request.

"She will cry for five minutes," she thought, with a derisive laugh, as she ran up to her own room, "and while she dries her eyes, she will be considering what to say to Mrs. Meredith! She knows better than to disobey me."

CHAPTER XIII.

"MINE OWN FAMILIAR FRIEND."

"Beware the friend who only speaks to praise, Stabs with a smile, and with a kiss betrays."—C. L.

Miss Jackson had not exaggerated or over-estimated her power. Lady Rosalie was better born, better bred, and decidedly more clever than her husband's cousin, but she was governed as absolutely by the woman who lived on her bounty as ever helpless dependent was by overbearing patron.

Everybody who knew the Rosery knew that Hilda Jackson, and not Lady Rosalie Finch, was the actual ruler of the pretty little house. People joked about it, and wondered at it, and speculated not too kindly about it. There must be some reason for this reversal of the usual relations, and no doubt Miss Jackson knew something or other which gave her the whip-hand of poor Lady Rosalie.

But for once the gossips were wrong. In the days when most unaccountable things were accounted for by witchcraft and magic, a woman who was accused of obtaining undue influence by the aid of these dark arts, made a reply that has lived to this day. "The only witchcraft I used," she said, "was the ascendency of a strong mind over a weak one," and Hilda Jackson might have made a similar defence. Hilda was not so clever as her friend, but her will was as the will of ten beside Lady Rosalie's, and nine times out of ten Lady Rosalie was quite grateful to have her mind comfortably made up for her. When the tenth time came, and she was not glad, the force of habit was too strong for her, and she was sure to submit in the end.

On the present occasion she was less tractable than usual, but as Hilda had foreseen, she gave way at last, and went off to the Hermitage quite meekly, telling herself that after all—unless Hilda's suspicions were correct, which she did not for a moment believe—there was no difficulty in the matter. It was true that Mrs. Meredith was reserved, but they were such old friends now, and even the most reserved of women are glad to unbosom themselves sometimes.

So Lady Rosalie adopted a rather sentimental vein, talked of the many years they had known each other, and related many anecdotes of her own youth, in hopes of drawing responsive recollections from her friend. It was provoking, at the end of an hour's ingeniously artless chatter, to discover that Mrs. Meredith had told her nothing at all, or nothing but what she already knew. Of her children's early days, of Lady Rosalie's kindness to them and to herself, of all the details of her Leamington life, Mrs. Meredith was quite willing to speak; but of anything anterior to that, not a hint was dropped, nor a word spoken.

"She might have known what I came for," Lady Rosalie thought, looking at the proud, reserved face.

The window was open, and Mrs. Meredith sat beside it, embroidering an apron for Daisy, and looking, to Lady Rosalie's fancy, unusually handsome and dignified.

"What a splendid woman she must have been twenty years ago!" she reflected. "I wonder who and what she was?"

Lady Rosalie tried to recall the different beauties she had known, but either her memory failed or Mrs. Meredith had moved in a different sphere from herself. The latter seemed the more probable supposition, her friend thought now, for Mrs. Meredith must have been strikingly like Avice, and Avice's was not a face one was likely to forget. "Quite as handsome and quite as proud!" thought Lady Rosalie, feeling that she had come on a "bootless bene," and wondering how she should excuse herself to Hilda for her failure.

The thought acted as a spur, and she made another effort. Hilda had stigmatised direct questions as clumsy devices, but Lady Rosalie was at her wits' end.

"I have told you so much about my Charlie—will you not tell me about your husband now?" she asked, laying her hand on Mrs. Meredith's with an affectionate gesture. She told herself she meant no harm, but all her life long she could not forget the anguished look in her friend's beautiful eyes, she could not forget how cold her hand turned, or how white her lips became.

"My—husband?" she faltered slowly. "Never—never utter that word to me again, Lady Rosalie. I have no husband, as you know. It is my one hope and prayer that I may forget that I ever had."

The repressed passion in her voice electrified her hearer.

"I beg your pardon," she stammered. "I did not know—I had no idea you felt about it like this. You never told me before——"

"I did not mean to tell you now," said Mrs. Meredith. "I was surprised into it." She looked at her friend beseechingly. "Lady Rosalie——"

"Call me Rosalie," said Lady Rosalie, pressing the poor cold hand. She meant to repeat whatever she might be going to hear to Hilda Jackson, but that did not prevent her being very sorry for Mrs. Meredith, and feeling quite affectionately towards her. Mrs. Meredith looked at her searchingly.

"You are my friend, I think," she said, "and Heaven knows I need one! I ask you, as a friend, not to repeat what I have been foolish enough to say. I would not have the girls know." Her voice failed her, but her eyes were full of eloquent appeal.

"They do not know, then?"

"They know nothing, and if I can help it they never shall! They think I am a—they think I am like other widows, like the happy women to whom the memory of their husbands is their dearest and most sacred possession. It—it is not so with me."

"Was he so unkind?" asked Lady Rosalie, with genuine interest, and another sympathetic squeeze.

"No—not unkind. One could forgive unkindness," said Mrs. Meredith bitterly. "But I cannot talk about it, even to you. All I ask is that you should not repeat what I have said."

"I will not—indeed I will not," promised Lady Rosalie—for was it not just possible that Hilda might forget to ask? "I cannot think how you can keep such things to yourself!" she said, with unaffected astonishment. "Why did you never tell me anything before? What are friends for, if it is not that we may open our hearts to them, and relieve our sorrows by telling them to those who can sympathise with us?"

Mrs. Meredith smiled with a fine disdain that reminded Lady Rosalie of Avice in her most disdainful moods.

"Do you think I want sympathy?" she asked. "If I had wanted that, I should have stayed amongst those who knew. They sympathised with me—oh, yes! they sympathised!—and their sympathy drove me as nearly mad as a woman could be whose reason still remained. I should have gone mad if I had stayed amongst them, or I should have died. And so I came away, and brought my children here, and vowed to know no one—until your kindness overcame my resolution."

"I am glad it did, both for your sake and my own," said Lady Rosalie, with a kiss that brought a grateful dew to the sad, haggard eyes. "Was it far from here, dear, that you lived, when all this trouble came?"

The garden gate opened, and Avice and Daisy came in. The mother's eyes rested on them tenderly, and then turned to Lady Rosalie with passionate appeal.

"Remember!" was all she said; but a thousand

"'How beautiful they are!' said Lady Rosalie."—p. 287.

"Far enough to be sure that no one would suspect where I had gone."

"And does no one know?" asked Lady Rosalie, wondering where Mrs. Meredith's income came from, and who it was that paid it. Someone must know her present abode, she thought, or how would remittances reach the Hermitage?

"No one knows but my lawyer," said Mrs. Meredith briefly.

fears, a thousand prayers for secrecy and silence were in the agitated word.

"Indeed, you may trust me!" whispered Lady Rosalie. But half an hour later she was closeted with Hilda Jackson, and before she was allowed to make her escape she had yielded up every detail of her visit to the Hermitage to that pitiless catechist.

"I told you there was a secret," Hilda said triumphantly. "Was it likely that anyone would bury themselves alive in that way, unless there was some reason for it? It is exasperating to think you did not get it out of her after all."

"The girls came in," pleaded Lady Rosalie. "But, indeed, Hilda, though she told me there was a secret, I do not think she would ever have told me what it was."

"Very likely not," agreed Miss Jackson. "She is just the sort of woman who would be cut in pieces rather than say a thing she did not choose. Well! we must find it out. We know there is a secret, and I will not rest till I know what it is."

"She will tell me nothing more, I am sure."

"And so am I, so you must use your wits. You are in and out of the house continually, and there ought to be no difficulty in finding a clue. I wonder if their name really is Meredith?"

"My dear Hilda!"

"My dear Rosalie!" mimicked Miss Jackson, scornfully. "Did you never hear of such a thing as changing one's name? When people want to keep their existence as profound a secret as Mrs. Meredith seems to desire, it is generally the first thing they do. However, that may or may not be, and it is not the real point after all. But I must say I should like to examine the marks on that quaint old silver which you rave about! Is the crest the Meredith crest, I wonder; and is it marked with an M? Mind you look at it well the next time you go in."

Lady Rosalie promised, and Hilda took care that the promise was kept.

"It seems such a mean thing to do!" poor Lady Rosalie said. But though she murmured, she obeyed, salving her conscience by assuring herself that it could do the Merediths no harm, and relieving her feelings by sending the girls some Indian bangles which were just going out of fashion, and buying a "Christian Year" for their mother, in which she inscribed, with many flourishes, and a good deal of wonder if the name she wrote was the true one—"Mrs. Meredith, from her affectionate Rosalie."

She put it up in a sheet of note-paper gay with roses and finches, and took it across one morning, when she had delayed her visit as long as she dared.

Only Avice was at home, Mrs. Meredith and Daisy having gone for a walk, and perhaps Lady Rosalie was not as sorry as she professed to be. She was always more at ease with the girls than with their mother, and Avice admired the little book so much that Lady Rosalie's self-complacency was almost restored.

"I'm so glad I thought of it! I thought it would be just in your mother's way, though I like a different style myself."

Avice smiled. She knew that Lady Rosalie spent her Sunday afternoons in singing emotional hymns, with tears of quite sincere appreciation running down her cheeks, and was glad that she had chosen something so much more to her mother's taste.

"How kind you are!" she said gratefully. "I think sometimes that all the happiness of our lives comes to us through you."

Lady Rosalie's complacency was quite restored now. She had many weaknesses, but perhaps her pet weakness was the desire to pose as a deus ex machina to all her friends. She would have been glad to see them happy on any terms, but she was still more glad when she could persuade herself that she had been instrumental in bringing their happiness to pass. There was a thrill in Avice's voice, a depth of gratitude that almost made her uncomfortable, considering what her errand at the Hermitage was; but after all, she was going to do no harm, and it was natural enough that Avice should be grateful to her. She knew what it meant, of course. Avice was thinking of Sir Raymond, no doubt; and certainly, but for her, they never might have met.

"I'm so glad I got you to Verecroft," she said. "You'll always remember that your first invitation came through me, won't you, dear? And you'll ask me to your swellest dinners——"

"Lady Rosalie!" cried Avice, flushing scarlet, "what do you mean? What are you talking about? I did not say a word about Verecroft——"

"You didn't mention it, certainly, and I won't tease you, dear. You're a very good girl, and he's quite too delightful, and the course of true love does sometimes run smooth, whatever that old fogey of a Shakespeare may say! You haven't seen him since the fête, I suppose?"

"Seen whom? Shakespeare?"

"No, Miss Simplicity; that won't quite do! Seen whom, indeed! But of course he can't go out much just yet. The funeral was not till yesterday, you know; but now that is over, I suppose we shall see our friend again. I hope you'll be kinder to him than you were on his birthday, Avice! I really thought you were a great deal too bad."

"I cannot imagine why. Sir Raymond Vereker is nothing to me——"

"Of course not! A young man never is anything to a young woman till the engagement-ring is on her finger," cried Lady Rosalie gaily.

She shook her head and laughed, and then she got up, and began to walk about the room, turning over the magazines on the table, admiring Avice's work, and fluttering to the book-shelves, where she stood reading the titles of the books. "Oh, dear!" she cried, as she ran her eye over them, "here's another 'Christian Year;' what a pity you have one already!"

"Everyone has, haven't they?" said Avice, floundering amongst her pronouns in the reckless way we all do. "Mamma's is a very old one, and I am sure she will like to have another."

"I hope so," said Lady Rosalie, taking the book down and looking at it. "But this isn't your mother's, is it? It has 'M. Dalrymple' written in it—'M. Dalrymple, from her affectte husband Hugh.'"

"It is mamma's. Oh, yes! I can remember that little brown 'Christian Year' with its red edges ever since I can remember anything."

"Was Dalrymple her maiden name?"

"I think not. Mamma never talks much about her people, but I know we have an uncle Fazackerley, and I believe he is her brother."

"Fazackerley? Not the banker, I suppose?" said Lady Rosalie, with vivid interest.

"I don't know."

"I think you would know, if it were! Fazackerley the banker—that would be an uncle worth having! Why, Avice my dear, perhaps you're an heiress in disguise!"

"Very much in disguise, I'm afraid," said Avice, laughing; but Lady Rosalie did not laugh.

She was full of curiosity and conjecture, and the unexplained name in Mrs. Meredith's book made her as eager to see the handsome old silver in the dining-room as if she had been Hilda herself. She made the excuse of setting her watch by the dining-room clock, and went in, to the dismay of the nervous little parlour-maid who was laying the cloth. It was a simply furnished room, but some richly chased goblets and butter-boats stood on the sideboard, and Emma was just placing a set of old-fashioned castors on the table.

"How beautiful they are!" said Lady Rosalie, taking up one goblet after another, and seeing with a thrill of interest and excitement that they all bore an unmistakable "D." "It is quite a treat to look at such beautiful things. Are they heirlooms, Avice, or what?"

"We have always had them," said Avice; "I believe they belonged to poor papa."

Lady Rosalie said nothing for a moment. She felt that she might be on the edge of an important discovery, and her heart was beating rather fast.

"Can you remember him?" she asked, averting her eyes.

"I can, but Daisy can't remember him at all. She was only three when he died."

"And where were you living then?"

"Oh," said Avice, looking a little surprised, "I don't remember that. It was a big place, with horses and soldiers, and Uncle Ru—that's my uncle, Rupert Fazackerley—was there. I remember that, because he came to tell us that papa was dead."

"Then your father was not with you when he died?"

"No, he was away. And mamma—oh! poor mamma!—they thought she would have died too. She was ill a long, long time, and then we came here; and she cannot bear to talk about him even yet."

"Oh!" said Lady Rosalie. She was really too astonished to say more. It was evident that Avice entirely believed the account she gave, but Lady Rosalie suspected that she herself knew more than the daughter had been allowed to learn. The mother's anxiety for her silence proved that, and she respected it so far as to say nothing to Avice now.

She told herself she would say nothing when she got home, but it was not long before Hilda knew all about it, and about the book which was Mrs. Meredith's, but which bore the name of "M. Dalrymple."

"And the silver is marked with a D," ended Lady Rosalie. "I had never noticed it before, because of the chasing, but it is quite plain when you look at it closely. Do you think their name can be Dalrymple?"

"It is quite possible, but I don't see that we are much further, if it is. Why did they change it?—that is the question," said Miss Jackson. Suddenly she sprang up. "There's the luncheon-bell, Rosalie, and you've got your hat on still."

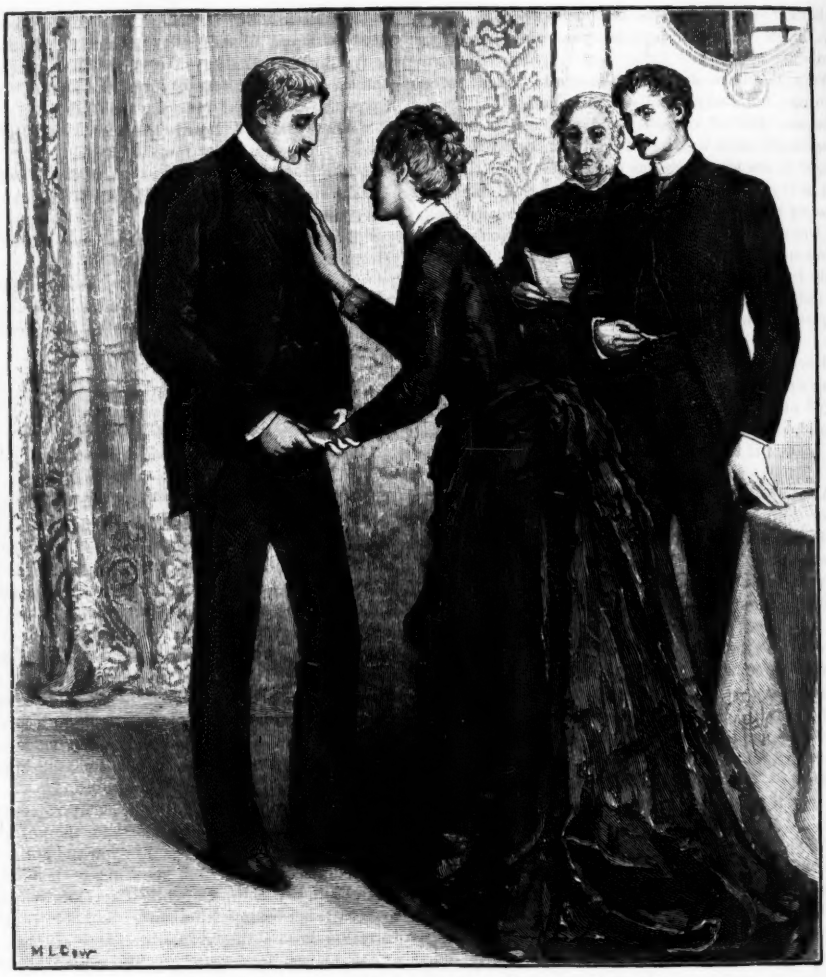
Lady Rosalie hurried away, for a cold or spoilt dish was an equal abomination to her friend and herself. Both the ladies gave their whole attention to the salmis, and it was not till the sweets were put upon the table that Miss Jackson said—

"Where have I heard the name of Dalrymple lately? It seems quite familiar to me. Oh, I know! Captain Hallam was talking about some Dalrymple Pasha, an Englishman who is likely to come to the front in Egypt."

"But he can't have anything to do with the Hermitage?"

"No," said Miss Jackson, with a faint little sneer. "He's rather a distinguished man, I believe, and people don't change their names to avoid creditable connections."

CHAPTER XIV.



MRS. KENYON'S WILL.

"The manner of giving shows the character of the giver more than the gift itself."—Lavater.

The death of Mrs. Kenyon threw a gloom over Verecroft that even Sir Raymond's presence could hardly dispel. Lady Vereker had been deeply attached to her mother, and the sense of bereavement was accentuated by the tragic suddenness of her loss. For some days she seemed quite prostrated by the shock, and Lancelot found himself obliged to put aside his own private troubles to console the dear lady for whose sake he bore them uncomplainingly. Better, far better, Lancelot thought, that his own life should be wrecked, and his own soul go a-hungered, than that the woman who had been as a mother to him should mourn over her son's disappointed hopes, and reproach him as the cause.

In some ways he was a better comforter than Sir Raymond, who was full of remorse for the unfortunate quarrel he had had with Mrs. Kenyon the night before she died, and shrank from speaking of her unless he was absolutely obliged; while Lancelot was pleased to recall her many kindnesses, and to dwell with Lady Vereker on the virtues that were all that either of them cared to remember. The eccentricities that had been so puzzling and annoying, the injustice Lancelot had so often resented on his cousin's behalf, the irritability that had grown upon Mrs. Kenyon of late years, were all things that might be forgotten in the gracious silence that falls upon the failings of the dead. Lady Vereker remembered only that her mother's love for her had never varied or failed, and Lancelot that he had lost one of the best friends he had.

If he had thought so before, he might be excused for thinking so still more when the will was read. It was a surprise to everyone concerned. Mr. Burgess had brought with him a formidable document engrossed on the orthodox blue paper, and couched in the cumbrous phraseology in which lawyers delight; but a sheet of notepaper which had been found in Mrs. Kenyon's work-basket made it, as the lawyer said, "as useless as a piece of waste paper." The little sheet of cream-laid was enclosed in an envelope, inscribed "My Will," and both that and the writing within were in Mrs. Kenyon's hand. The new will had only been made the night before her death, but it was duly signed and witnessed, and was in all respects a valid instrument. It ran thus:—

"'Did you think I looked as if I wished it otherwise?'"—p. 289.

"I, Ada Kenyon, widow of the late Marcus Kenyon, Colonel in H.M.'s 17th Lancers, being of sound mind and in the full possession of my senses, do hereby give, devise, and bequeath the whole of my personal property, in the Funds and otherwise invested, to Lancelot Vereker, son of the Rev. Raymond Vereker, Vicar of Stowe-by-the-Marsh, Lincolnshire, deceased, to have and to hold for his own personal use, without let or encumbrance in any way whatsoever, save only—

"That if in the Providence of God, in whose hands are all human affairs and the issues thereof, it shall ever come to pass that the young man known as Sir Raymond Vereker of Verecroft, Baronet, shall be in need or want, while the said Lancelot Vereker, through the accruing of other monies, shall be in no need thereof, these monies of mine shall pass to Sir Raymond Vereker of Verecroft, whether he may be known by that name or by any other.

"Whereto witness my hand, this 19th day of June, 1882. (Signed) ADA KENYON.

"Witnessed by { HANNAH STEVENS, lady's maid. / GEORGE HOPKINSON, gardener."

The will might be valid, but it was certainly a curious one, and the last clause was incomprehensible.

"Did she think I wanted to change my name?" Sir Raymond said, as he shook hands with his cousin, and wished him joy of his unexpected good fortune.

"I am a great deal too proud of being Vereker of Verecroft for that."

"I should think so," agreed Lancelot. "Why, Ray, I'd rather be Vereker of Verecroft than King of England!"

It seemed to each too natural a sentiment to elicit any comment then, but both remembered it afterwards with curiously mingled feelings. It was Mr. Burgess who said, with his formal little bow—

"I suppose I may be allowed to say, Mr. Vereker, that I hope there is as little chance of one as of the other."

Lancelot hoped it so sincerely that he did not even trouble to say so. He was indeed quite confused by his unexpected inheritance, and was only anxious to get out of the room and be able to think things over by himself. It was true that Sir Raymond had told him that Mrs. Kenyon had declared her intention of leaving her money to him, but he had regarded it as an idle threat, and the reading of the will had found him entirely unprepared. He wondered—he could not help wondering—if Lady Vereker and Sir Raymond understood that the surprise was as great to him as it could possibly be to them. He looked at Lady Vereker with deprecating earnestness. He knew her face so well that he could not but see that she looked hurt and grieved.

"I knew nothing of this," he said eagerly. "Ray told me, but I did not believe it. If you think I ought not to take it——"

"My dear Lance! you cannot help taking it," said Lady Vereker. "Did you think I looked as if I wished it otherwise? I do not, I assure you. I am glad—we are both glad, are we not Ray?—that the money should be yours. If I looked hurt, it was not about the money—it was that my dear mother should have spoken so strangely of Ray. She does not call him her grandson—she calls him 'the young man who is known as Sir Raymond Vereker'! How angry she must have been to speak of my boy like that!"

"But you see she wished Ray to have the money if he really needed it," said Lancelot.

"Yes," said Mr. Burgess. "That is evidence of a kindly feeling, Lady Vereker, and you must not think too much of the rest. It was a strange expression, certainly, but it struck me as I read the will that Mrs. Kenyon had been trying to write like a lawyer, and when ladies do that they are apt to use very strange expressions indeed. It is a pity, a very great pity—if Mr. Vereker will excuse my saying so—that the old will cannot stand; but there is no doubt as to the validity of the new one, and I cannot honestly advise Sir Raymond to contest it."

"Contest the will? I'm delighted with the will!" cried Sir Raymond, shaking his cousin's hand again. "We wanted Lance to be independent, didn't we? And now he is, and I'm heartily glad of it."

Lancelot wrung the hand that looked so dark against his own, and got himself away, too much moved to speak, and Mr. Burgess rose to take his leave.

"There will be no need now for the rent-charge we were speaking of, I suppose?" said the old lawyer, who was more interested in keeping the estate together than in portioning remote cousins, however deserving they might be. "Mr. Lancelot is independent without it, and I doubt if he would accept it now."

And indeed Lancelot so entirely agreed with Mr. Burgess's view, and so flatly refused to avail himself of any further provision, that the old man was made happy the next day by being empowered to destroy the deed he had begun to draw up. Mrs. Kenyon's "monies" did not amount to a large sum, but it was sufficient to justify Lancelot in refusing any further assistance, and to give some colour to the report that he had come into a fortune.

"I suppose that is why he never comes near us now?" said Lady Rosalie a week or two later. "Dear me, Avice, don't look at me like that! You couldn't look fiercer, child, if I'd abused Sir Raymond himself. He comes in just as he always did, and I think it is very odd of Lancelot to desert us so completely."

Perhaps in her heart Avice thought so too, though she did not do him the injustice to imagine that his change of fortune had anything to do with it. He was not the sort of man to be unduly elated by an accident of that kind; and besides, the change, whatever it was, had been before that. Avice could not forget his altered manner at the Verecroft fête, and though she had thought of it often since—far oftener than she would have been willing to confess—she had not been able to find an explanation. She had not seen Mr. Vereker to speak to since. Once or twice she had met him on the Parade, and she knew that there was the same difference in his manner, that his bow was just a shade colder and his smile much graver than before. It was nothing to her, she protested to herself a dozen times a day; but her pupils found her unusually impatient over their blunders, and Daisy knew that her nights were restless, and wished Sir Raymond would speak out.

"Do you think he will be at the party?" Daisy asked wistfully, breaking in upon the musings that were giving so sad a curve to the beautiful lips.

"Who is he?" Avice inquired irritably. There was no need to ask what party, for since a card had come for a dinner at Lord Blackstone's, Daisy had talked about nothing else.

"I meant Sir Raymond," Daisy explained diffidently.

"How can I tell? I shall think it very bad taste if he goes out so soon," said Avice, and the sympathetic little sister felt that such majestic indifference was a thing she would have been quite unable to achieve.

"There is the flower-show to-morrow; perhaps he will be there," she said consolingly. "There are always such a lot of things from Verecroft, and some of the Verekers will be sure to go."

But, to Daisy's disappointment, Lancelot was the only one of the Verecroft party to witness Mr. Hopkinson's triumphs at this particular show; and it was not till near the end of it that he came to speak to Lady Rosalie and her friends. The tent was crowded, and Lady Rosalie and Daisy were a little in front. By the time he had spoken to Avice, they had passed on, and he could not leave her alone. It was the first time he had been alone with her since the memorable night when Sir Raymond had confessed his love. He had not dared to seek an interview, but it seemed to him now as if he must say something, must offer some explanation of conduct that must have seemed so like caprice. But no words would come. How, indeed, could he explain? How could he tell her that he had resolved to withdraw a suit he had never attempted to urge? How could he assume that she had even noticed his change of manner—much less that she had been affected by it? To apologise would be to insult.

Avice walked by him as silent as himself, until pride forced her into speech. She could not let him suppose that she was hurt or offended, for what right had she to be either? She cast about for some safe topic, and the sight of Daisy, looking rather wistfully about her, suggested Captain Hallam to the elder sister's mind. She was so anxious for a reliable opinion of the man whose attentions to Daisy were so marked, and Mr. Vereker would be sure to know all about him.

"What do you think of Captain Hallam?" she asked shyly, glancing up at the grave, silent face, just as the silence was becoming unendurable.

"Think of him? I think he is one of the finest fellows I know, and one of the best," said Lancelot heartily.

"Oh!"—with an accent of surprise he could not help remarking—"but men and women see things so differently."

"How do you mean? Don't you like Captain Hallam, Miss Meredith?"

"Doesn't he—isn't he rather fond of—flirting?" she asked.

"It depends what you mean by that. I think he has been very foolish in one particular instance," with a glance and smile that pointed the words.

They had come out of the tent now, and Avice saw with a thrill of indignation that Captain Hallam and Miss Jackson were disappearing down one of the shrubbery paths, apparently absorbed in the most intimate conversation.

"Yes, he has been foolish there," said Lancelot, in a tone of excuse; "but—but there are reasons why I think it would not be quite fair to judge him from that."

Avice remembered Lady Rosalie's declaration that it was "all Hilda's doing," and appreciated the reticence that would not blame a woman even to clear a friend. She made up for it by blaming the man quite fiercely herself, and, though she said nothing, it seemed as if Lancelot understood.

"I think you are too hard on him," he said, looking down on the severe young face. "You do not understand. You are so different yourself, you could not understand. If you really knew Hallam, you would like him—yes! and respect him too. What he wants is to fall in love with a really good woman."

"Do you think a really good woman would care for a man like that?" said Captain Hallam's severe young censor.

"If she knew him, and made allowances, and did not judge by appearances——"

"What else can one judge by, when one does not know?"

"And yet they may be so false—so misleading!" cried Lancelot, with a thrill of personal feeling in his voice. "I cannot explain what I mean, but I know so well how impossible it is not to be misunderstood sometimes. There are circumstances that may oblige a man to seem false in order to be true—oh! you cannot understand it, but indeed it may be so, and then——"

"And then?" said Avice softly. She understood at least that they were not talking of Captain Hallam now.

"And then," said Lancelot gravely, "he can only trust to his friends' charity, to think as kindly of him as they can."

CHAPTER XV.

ON THE SCENT.

"There is a lust in man no charm can tame,
Of loudly publishing his neighbour's shame."—HARVEY.

AVONMEAD, the house Lord Blackstone had taken for the summer, stood a little way out of Warwick. It was not his own property, but a furnished house the old man had taken in order to be near his son, and the guests at his table to-night were chiefly Phil's friends and brother officers. The head of the table was taken by Miss Hallam, the eldest and only unmarried daughter, an uncompromising old maid, who drove Hilda Jackson to the last pitch of exasperation by constantly appealing to her as to a contemporary who might be expected to have similar tastes and feelings. Miss Hallam, who was some ten years older than her brother, looked all her forty years, and at least five more; while Hilda, petite and well made up, hardly looked more than seven-and-twenty, and carried her thirty-five summers with airy and juvenile grace. Miss Jackson excessively resented the assumption of equality of age, and felt that the joys of dining at Avonmead were considerably discounted by the depressing conviction that her hostess would allude to the time "when we were girls together" half a dozen times before the evening was over.

Miss Hallam was a tall, angular woman, a plain likeness of her brother in features and colouring, and possessing a good deal of her father's ability and shrewd common sense. Her hair and eyes and complexion were all of a pale neutral tint, unrelieved by the bronzed cheeks and vivacious blue eyes that saved her brother from looking as insipid as most men of his type. She had been visiting friends in Scotland, and had not been at home for some months, but she had heard enough of the Merediths to look with a good deal of interest at the two beautiful girls who followed Lady Rosalie into the room, and whose plain white dresses were so much more to her taste than the elaborate costumes in which Lady Rosalie and Miss Jackson appeared.

Hilda had made a desperate attempt to regain her lost ground in Captain Hallam's affections, and was robed in a chef d'œuvre of Madame Pontet's skill, in which she looked as harmoniously gorgeous as a tropical flower; while Lady Rosalie flattered herself that she looked a Finch all over in a dress of soft grey tulle, with a black velvet train, and a stomacher composed of crimson roses. She wore a bull-finch in her hair and another in the centre of her fan, and carried a large bouquet of roses.

"And if people don't know that I am Rosalie Finch, it won't be my fault," she said with great satisfaction, as she shook out her puffings and settled her train, and craned her neck to catch a glimpse of herself in the pier-glass before which Miss Braithwayte seemed a permanent fixture. "But, dear me," added the kind-hearted woman, "no one will look at me when you three girls are by."

She said it in all good faith, and the lucky little speech sent Hilda into the drawing-room with a glow of satisfaction on her face, and made her quite civil to Lady Rosalie for the rest of the evening. But if Hilda was for once pleased with her friend, she was pleased with very little else. Captain Hallam did not take her in to dinner, but left her to old Colonel Parker—as if she had been a dowager—and went in with Daisy Meredith himself. Mr. Selwyn, the vicar of Buddington, took in Miss Hallam; and Lord Blackstone, Lady Rosalie; while Avice was left to the tender mercies of Captain Lennox, a silent man who studied the menu with close attention, and when he had advised her what to eat, drink, and avoid, seemed to think he had fulfilled the whole duty of man, and devoted himself to his dinner with a quiet mind.

Captain Hallam had no attention to spare for his left-hand neighbour, and Avice found the long dinner decidedly tedious and dull. How fast everyone else was talking, she thought, her own taciturn captain always excepted. What a running fire of jests and laughter Lord Blackstone and Lady Rosalie were keeping up! How noisy Miss Jackson and the Colonel were! how much Captain Hallam seemed to have to say to Daisy, and how he dropped his voice when he spoke to her! Avice had plenty of leisure to note all this, and to reassure herself by recalling the terms in which Lancelot had spoken of Philip Hallam. She would not let herself be too anxious after that, and when Captain Hallam turned at last to his silent neighbour, he found a readier smile and a kinder look than Daisy's sister had ever given him before.

He was very grateful; but after all, it was not Avice, but Daisy he wanted to talk to—Daisy, who had never given him anything but kind looks and ready smiles, just tempered with a coy, delicious shyness that seemed to him the most beautiful thing in the world. She was too happy to be shy to-night, and was smiling and chattering artlessly, almost as much to Lord Blackstone's delight as his son's.

It was perhaps as well that none of them could see Hilda Jackson's face, or the looks she cast at happy little Daisy. Miss Hallam would have nothing to say to the new style of floral decorations, and a great epergne that had been presented to Lord Blackstone when he left the bar always stood in the centre of the table. It stood there now, and if it was of no other use, it served at least to screen poor Daisy from the malefic glance of Hilda's jealous eyes. Avice saw it once, and shuddered to think that Daisy should have roused such vindictive passion. She turned towards her with an elder sister's instinct of protection, but Captain Hallam's broad shoulders intervened, and Avice—little as she had once been disposed to like him—found herself comforted by the thought of such stalwart guardianship. How glad she was that she had asked Mr. Vereker's opinion, and that it had been so favourable!

And then she caught Mr. Vereker's name, and found that Mr. Selwyn and Miss Hallam were talking about Verecroft, and was glad that Captain Lennox was too absorbed in discussing a dish of quails to be in any danger of interrupting with irrelevant remarks.

"They all feel it dreadfully," the vicar was saying, and she easily understood that he was referring to Mrs. Kenyon's death, "but Vereker—that's the cousin I told you about, you know——"

"The young man who is so useful in the village?"

"Yes. He wanted to take holy orders, I believe, but Lady Vereker objected."

"Objected! Oh, why?"

"I couldn't quite make out. Mrs. Kenyon was at the bottom of it, I fancy, as she was of most things that went on at Verecroft."

"How they must miss her!" said Miss Hallam.

"Yes, indeed! And, as I was saying, Lancelot Vereker seems to feel it more than anyone else. There was always a strong attachment between them, though I used to think it was more on Mrs. Kenyon's side than on his. But I never saw a man so changed."

"Changed! How!" Miss Hallam asked, and Avice's earnest gaze betrayed a depth of interest of which she was quite unconscious.

"Oh, in every way! It seems as if he had lost all hope and interest, and that sort of thing. I thought at first there must have been some unpleasantness about the will; but Lady Vereker, and Sir Raymond too, are as nice as possible about it, so it can't be that."

"Perhaps he's in love?"

"In love? Oh, no!" laughed the vicar, with a touch of scorn at the feminine suggestion. "He's not at all the sort of man for nonsense of that sort. Besides, if he were, this legacy ought to smooth his way. He's not what people call a great catch, like his cousin, you know; but he's as eligible as most young men now, and people are too glad to get their daughters off in these days, to stand out for more than a competence."

Thus the vicar, who was perhaps all the more useful in his day and generation for knowing his world so well; and Avice listened with a beating heart. But no more was said about Verecroft, and once more the dinner seemed flat and insipid to Avice Meredith. She was glad when Miss Hallam looked at Lady Rosalie, and the ladies rose at last.

"You sing, don't you, Miss Meredith?" Laura Hallam asked, and Avice went to the piano willingly enough. Singing was easier than talking to-night, and as her voice rose and fell on the soft night air, it seemed as if some of the burden that oppressed her took flight on the wings of song.

"Trust me all in all or not at all,"

Avice sang, and she saw no longer the lamplit Avonmead drawing-room, with the moonlight coming in at the open windows, and mingling weirdly with the rosy light; she was at the flower-show again, and Lancelot Vereker was speaking, and her heart was answering his appeal.

Her voice brought the men in from the dining-room, but she would not sing again. Miss Hallam took her place, and played very delicately some old-fashioned pieces, with a great many runs and spread chords; and Hilda Jackson sang the "Lost Chord" in a voice that could never have been strong, and was now hardly audible three feet away.

"'The sound of a great Amen!'" Captain Hallam whispered wickedly to Daisy. "I really think it's the smallest I ever heard."

Miss Jackson could not hear him, but she looked conscious of failure, and fell on Lady Rosalie for playing her accompaniments too loud.

"I must get someone else to do it if you bang them out like that!" she said indignantly, as she sailed away to the corner where Captain Hallam was leaning over Daisy's chair.

But as she approached they vanished into the moonlit garden, and Hilda sat down on the deserted chair in a dumb fury her whitened lips and panting breath betrayed, and fanned herself into something like composure. No one was near her but Lord Blackstone and Colonel Parker, who were talking politics, and were much too engrossed to notice her, and by degrees she recovered herself, and listened mechanically to their discussion of the "Egyptian Difficulty," and the question whether Admiral Seymour and his iron-clads would bombard Alexandria or not.

It was the question everyone was asking, but which no one not in the secrets of the Government could answer. They could only wonder, conjecture, and surmise, and were certain of nothing but of the valour of their fellow-countrymen, whether on sea or land. Of the prowess of their adversaries there were the conflicting opinions for which a large ignorance allows so fine a field, and Captain Lennox, who had joined the others, had strong views on the point.

"The fellaheen can't fight. Rice-fed beggars never can," he said with conviction.

"Well, I don't know," said Colonel Parker. "Look at the Turkish troops! They're not much better fed, and I wouldn't wish to lead a finer set of fellows. Upon my life, I was tempted to sell out, and take the Sultan's service, when all that fighting was going on, two years ago."

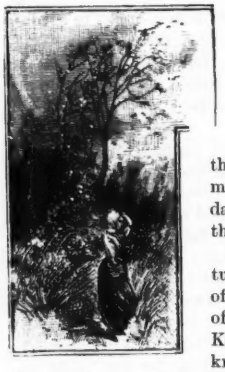
"Like Dalrymple Pasha," said Lord Blackstone, and Hilda sat up and listened with sudden interest.

"Who is Dalrymple Pasha?" she asked, and Colonel Parker turned round courteously.

"Who is he, Miss Jackson? I thought everyone knew about the Dalrymple case, but I suppose it was before your day."

"And who was he?" she asked again.

"He was a man who was cashiered for forgery. I forget the details of the case——"



"It is the details I want!" said Hilda, compressing her lips till they were like a fine red line.

Lord Blackstone laughed.

"In that case, Miss Jackson, you had better come to me," the old judge said, "for I was the man who tried him."

THE WAIFS' PICNIC.

THINKING it would be of interest to our readers, especially those who have contributed towards the support of the "QUIVER Waifs," to hear from time to time how they are faring, we give this month a short account of a day in the country which they enjoyed together.

It has been our good fortune to pitch our tent in one of the most charming parts of the charming county of Kent. Our secluded valley, known by the romantic name of the Valley of Castles, with its little stream flowing through meadows and hop-gardens, its wooded hills on either side commanding an extensive view into the broader valley of Holmsdale, is a locality sufficiently lovely to delight those familiar with the finest scenery of England, and must be nothing less than Paradise regained to the little London child that finds its way thither.

So we invited the "QUIVER Waifs" to our house, and by appointment met them at Holborn Viaduct Station in time for the early morning train; and, after an hour's ride, reached our destination. Our own little girls were waiting to receive us, and, after the first shyness had worn off, they and the Waifs became excellent friends, and romped to their hearts' content.

As our readers will remember, little Willie is fortunate enough to be boarded out in a small village in Hampshire; still, though the pleasures of a country life are not new to him, he appeared to enjoy himself thoroughly. It was not his first visit to Kent, moreover, for he remembered well, in the old days when he had tramped the country with his mother, some time spent there among the hop-pickers. Willie is growing a fine little fellow, and his frank remarks, delivered in Hampshire brogue, are very amusing. He has lately arrived at one of the first mile-stones on the way to manhood—namely, the dignity of trousers. He still ponders very deeply over his future in life: the last time we saw him he had fully determined to be a soldier; he has now, however, mentally beaten his sword into a ploughshare, for he tells us that he has made up his mind, this time for good and all, to be a farmer, adding, in confidence, that there is a gentleman living in his neighbourhood who has treated him with great kindness, and who, he thinks, has some intention of taking to him when he starts in life. He now runs errands for this gentleman between school-hours, and is going to be taught how to milk the cow—a first step towards becoming a farmer, no doubt.

Christine grows a big girl, and bids fair to become a fine strong woman—unlike Winnie, who is a gentle, delicate little thing. We could not help wishing it were possible to give her a month in the country instead of a day.

After an early dinner we started for a favourite spot in the woods two miles distant, where we had planned to take tea in amateur gipsy fashion. There were so many things thought indispensable for a picnic, that when they were all stowed in the little pony-trap that was to take us, there was only room enough left for half the party, so we of the stronger sex, including little Willie, had to foot it across the hills to the place of rendezvous.

We had fine fun in the woods: all hands joined heartily in collecting sticks and making a fire to boil the kettle, and the cloth was spread on the grass beneath a giant beech-tree. Certainly, the ground was rather uneven, but, with the exception of upsetting a cup of tea and the preserve, all went well. We disposed of our legs as best we could, most of us adopting the Eastern plan of reclining at meals, though scarcely with Eastern grace. The tea was voted unanimously a success, in spite of the gnats, who seemed to enjoy our company all too well. Then our artist, who had been officiating as light porter and stoker, drew out his sketch-book and busied himself with making the accompanying sketch of the Waifs' corner of the table—if I may so call it. The sturdy little girl to the right is Christine; next to her sits Winnie, and little Willie reclines in Eastern fashion like one to the manner born.

THE "QUIVER" WAIFS.

This trying ordeal over, the children made the woods ring again with their shouts. In swinging, playing at hide-and-seek, and in gathering blackberries, the time flew swiftly by, and as the dusk of the September evening gathered round we made our way home as we had come.

There was still an hour to spare before starting for the train. The lamps were lighted, Christine's eye caught the piano, so the day was brought to an end by the singing of a few tunes which were familiar to all.

On the way to the station Christine exclaimed with great energy, "I can't help thinking what a nice day we have had," and Winnie's little voice chimed in, "I should like to come to your house again, sir." We could not but reflect how little it costs to make a child happy, and regret that we had not more often sought that purest, most sane of all pleasures—the giving of pleasure to children.

THE CITY OF GOD: ITS HISTORY, CHARACTER, AND PRIVILEGES.

BY THE REV. ALEXANDER ROBERTS, D.D., PROFESSOR OF HUMANITY IN THE UNIVERSITY OF ST. ANDREWS.

"Ye are come unto the city of the living God."—HEB. xii. 22.

WE cannot but observe, as one of the most remarkable characteristics of the New Testament, the little account which it takes of death. This appears both in positive statements which it contains, and in the implied ideas which it not unfrequently suggests. Thus, in one passage, we find the announcement that Christ has "abolished death," as if no such event now entered into the experience of His people. And in another passage, we hear the Saviour Himself declaring, "Whosoever believeth in Me shall never die," as if there lay before the Christian no such thing as a descent towards the tomb. Well may language of this kind arrest our attention and excite our inquiry, for nothing like it is to be found in any other volume, or has ever been heard except from Divinely inspired lips. All books of mere human composition refer to death as an awful necessity, which will cut off our present existence from that which is to follow, and which is surrounded by a mystery that we strive in vain to penetrate. But the New Testament represents it as being merely the removal of the believer from a lower to a higher state of existence. It is to him no terrible occurrence—no penal infliction—it is simply the messenger that says to him, "Come up higher;" and transports him from the position which he has occupied upon earth to his home in heaven.

In accordance with this view, we observe that the sacred writer speaks in the words at the top of this paper of believers as having already "come to the city of the living God." They have no dark gulf to cross before they can become members of the family of God. They are already numbered among His children; already within the precincts of the heavenly Jerusalem; already entered upon that blessed region which is for ever gladdened by the light of His love. The Church on earth and the Church in heaven form but one great community, living under the same King, and partakers of the same happiness and glory. Hence, dissolution is not death to the believer, in the true meaning of that fearful word. It does not overtake him as a herald of wrath, but comes unto him as a harbinger of blessing, putting an end to all his sorrows, and introducing him to unspeakable felicity and peace. And thus we understand the language employed by the New Testament with regard to the point in question. An eminently gifted writer, thoroughly imbued with the teachings of Christ and His disciples on this subject, has said—

> "Is that a death-bed where the Christian lies?
> Yes; but not his—'t is death itself there dies."

And as thus the true followers of Christ never have to grapple with the real "King of Terrors," but simply pass at dissolution from a lower to a higher place in God's Kingdom, it may truly be said, with regard to all such, that Christ has "abolished death," and that they are already "come to the city of the living God."

Several questions naturally suggest themselves in connection with these words. Among these, we are led, first of all, to inquire, so far as we are able to know it, into

THE HISTORY OF THIS CITY.

WE glance at the famous cities of earth, and we eagerly listen to what can be told regarding them. It may be Nineveh, with its buried magnificence, or Jerusalem, with its ever-living interest, that attracts us. It may be Thebes, with its hundred gates, or Babylon, with its massive walls, of which we read. It may be Athens, with its intellectual triumphs, or Rome, with its military conquests, which wins our attention. Be the place what it may, we desire in every case to know something of the history pertaining to those cities which have held a prominent position in the annals of our world. And much more may this feeling be excited with respect to that City which is referred to in the words before us; for all true believers are themselves members of it, and have therefore a personal interest in every particular connected with it.

But, when we begin to inquire, we find that very scanty materials have as yet been furnished for making us acquainted with the history of this City. In fact, it is only one chapter of that history, so to speak, with which we can be said to have almost any acquaintance. This world of ours forms but a small part of the City of God, yet it is of scarcely more than the earth which we inhabit, with the comparatively brief spiritual history belonging to it, that we derive any knowledge from Scripture. Who can tell what events may have taken place on the surface of our planet in those prehistoric ages of which no record has been preserved? Many narratives of surpassing interest may be written in the annals of eternity with respect to the City of God on earth during those inconceivably remote periods of which science can give us only a dim and uncertain glimpse. And then, when we pass from our world altogether to a contemplation of that mighty universe of which it forms but an insignificant portion; when we think that "the City of God" embraces within its far-extended limits myriads of globes which are thousands of times larger than our own; and when we reflect that, in all probability, these have been for innumerable ages the abodes of intelligent beings—we feel what a grandeur belongs to the City here spoken of.

and we can imagine with what a thrilling and ceaseless interest its history, so varied and exhaustless, will be perused throughout eternity.

But, in the meantime, we cannot travel beyond what is revealed in Scripture with reference to the City of God on earth, in connection with the fallen children of men. And, brief as the record is, in comparison with what remains to be told of the universe at large, we need not hesitate to believe that the story is at least as marvellous as any other connected with the unnumbered worlds which God has made. I love to think that every star in the firmament has its own special revelation which it makes of the Almighty. The highest conception which we can form of the design of creation is that which regards it as being in its several parts a book in which is written some account of the infinite perfections of its Author. And scarcely a more sublime or attractive idea of our occupation hereafter could arise in the mind than that which supposes our being permitted to read leaf after leaf of that mighty volume, and thus to acquire an ever new and increasing acquaintance with the nature and attributes of God. But I confess that I can form no higher notion of what may be told of our Father in heaven than that which is conveyed to us by the history of our own world. Let every orb in the sky have its special revelation to make respecting God. Let the whole universe be inscribed with an account of His wondrous and adorable perfections. Let us discover ever fresh cause to worship and praise Him, as we pass from one to another of the works of His hands. Yet never, surely, shall we find a loftier display of His attributes than that which has been made in our own world. For here has dwelt God incarnate; here has the great plan of redeeming love been accomplished; here has been offered that Divine sacrifice in virtue of which sinners are pardoned and accepted; here has been revealed that mercy which not only forgives the transgression of the guilty, but, in its exuberant bounty and grace, constitutes them heirs of everlasting glory.

Let us think, then, of the history of the City of God on earth: and are we not impressed with its marvellous character? Let us take our stand at its central point, the Cross of Christ: and, looking round from that position, do we not feel what a striking revelation of God's nature is set before us? We see love that has stooped from the glory of heaven to the shame of Calvary; and as the result of that love, we hear salvation proclaimed to the guilty inhabitants of our world. From Eden onwards we behold the blessed effects of Divine grace upon the souls of sinners. The burden of their transgressions has been removed, the depravity of their hearts has been subdued, their league with Satan has been destroyed, their downward course to destruction has been arrested, and amid the adoring and rejoicing wonder of the heavenly hosts those who were by nature "children of wrath" are changed into the loving and beloved children of the living God.

We next proceed to inquire more particularly into the character of those who dwell within that "City of God," the history of which has already received a brief consideration.

Now, the moment we glance at the inhabitants of this City, whether as viewed in heaven or on earth, we perceive that there is one feature which they all possess in common, and which imparts to them an essential unity, notwithstanding all the differences which otherwise belong to them. There are diversities of rank among the angels, and there are degrees of glory among the redeemed; but all are distinguished by their purity, and could not otherwise have a place in God's presence. The law of the Kingdom of Heaven is that "into it nothing shall ever enter that defileth." Not a stain of spiritual pollution rests upon any of God's servants above. They are all pure, even as He is pure, reflecting His glorious image as in myriads of resplendent pearls, and thus multiplying throughout the holy City in which they dwell that unspotted radiance which beams upon their souls from the throne of the Almighty.

The same law holds good with respect to the City of God on earth. Here, too, righteousness, though as yet only inchoative and imperfect, is the characteristic which marks out the true followers of Christ from all others. Infinitely diversified they may be in other respects, but they agree in having been "created anew in Christ Jesus unto good works," and in desiring to advance in the way of holiness. No two believers that ever lived have been exactly alike in talent, disposition, or attainment; and yet all have been at one with respect to the aspirations after purity which dwelt in their hearts. We perceive, on glancing at the saints of God as portrayed in the Scripture, how varied were their natural characters, and how they retained these diversities after they became partakers of God's grace. It is easy to see how marked was the distinction between St. Peter and St. John, or between both and St. Paul; and we have every reason to believe that such original differences of character will be preserved for ever. God delights in variety throughout all His works. There is no monotony either in creation, providence, or grace. Every pebble has its own distinct configuration; every flower its own special beauty; every human form its more or less marked differences from all others; every mind its peculiar measure of capacity and power. There have been no two years, no two days even, since the creation of the world, which exactly resembled each other; no two histories, either of nations or individuals, that have been precisely alike. And this diversity, which so strikingly pervades the natural world, is found equally to prevail in the spiritual. No two cases of conversion to God have presented quite similar features, and no two souls which have been sanctified by His Spirit exhibit the very same kinds or degrees of excellence. Variety is thus characteristic of all God's operations in every department of that mighty Kingdom over which He rules. And, as this diversity amid unity—this specific difference amid generic oneness—imparts a charm to our existence here, so we cannot doubt it will be hereafter. In that variety of rank, and tendency, and attainment, which will distinguish God's people in heaven, we find a foundation for the friendships which they will form, and the mutual aid, as well as enjoyment, which they will furnish to each other throughout eternity.

But along with all this variety which pertains to the people of God now, and will doubtless exist in them for ever, there is, as I have said, also an essential unity by which they are distinguished. "Without holiness," it is expressly said, "no man shall see the Lord." The desire after righteousness—a growing conformity to God's will and image—is the infallible criterion of a man's spiritual state, and furnishes the only sure evidence that he has a place among those of whom we are told that they are "come unto the City of the living God."

Having considered the history and the inhabitants of the City referred to in the words before us, let us now contemplate, for a little,

ITS PRIVILEGES.

THESE privileges are many and great; and feeble indeed is all that human speech can say regarding them. We must leave it to eternity to develop them in their full extent; while, at present, we can simply glance at one or two of those blessed peculiarities by which, as we know, this City is distinguished.

First, it is possessed of absolute security. There is a great King within it—even the King of kings and Lord of lords—and His omnipotence is the pledge of its eternal safety. No enemy can prevail against it. Salvation has our God appointed for its walls and bulwarks, so that all within its enclosure are safe for ever. Now, is not this an enviable privilege? Truly blessed is it, in a world of danger like ours, to possess such an assurance of safety. Others may be tempted and perish, but no fatal danger—no final disaster—can happen to those who, by faith in Christ, have entered into the City of the living God. To every such one are these grand old words addressed—"The Lord is thy keeper: the Lord is thy shade upon thy right hand; the sun shall not smite thee by day, nor the moon by night: the Lord shall preserve thee from all evil: He shall preserve thy soul: the Lord shall preserve thy going out and thy coming in from this time forth, and even for evermore."

Another special prerogative of this City is its enduring happiness. Need I quote the emphatic terms in which this is set forth in Scripture? "And there shall be no night there," we read, "and they need no candle, neither light of the sun, for the Lord God giveth them light; and they shall reign for ever and ever." No night of sorrow to interrupt their joy; no night of ignorance to cast its dark shadow over their minds; no night of spiritual apostasy to cut them off from fellowship with holy beings; no night of death to put an end to their happiness; but, continually rejoicing in the light of God's own countenance, "they shall reign for ever and ever." Well may the hearts of believers be cheered under their present trials by the anticipation of such blessedness hereafter. Yet a little while, and heaven, with its endless joy, shall efface all remembrance of the sorrows of the earth. For conflict there will be peace; for anxiety there will be comfort; for pain there will be pleasure; for the dread of death there will be the assured anticipation of an endless life; and, looking forward to this, all true believers may well adopt the language of the Apostle, and declare, in the midst of present afflictions, "We rejoice in hope of the glory of God."

Again: the City here spoken of will be distinguished by increasing glory and happiness for ever. This is both the most precious and peculiar of all the privileges which belong to it. When we look back upon the past history of our world, we see many cities rising up before us whose glory was once great, but has long since passed away. Scarcely anything is more melancholy than to stand on the site of queenly capitals like Babylon or Nineveh, and contrast their present desolation with the accounts which have come down to us of their former magnificence. But, even where no such striking changes have occurred, how numerous are the cities which seem to bear inscribed on their modern aspect the sorrowful words—"Ichabod—the glory is departed." A few squalid huts now rise upon the ruins of the once luxurious Corinth, and the once warlike Sparta. Tyre, that grand commercial city, whose merchants were princes, has now literally become "a place to spread nets upon;" while Ephesus, with its world-famed temple, is altogether forsaken, except by the antiquarian, who may be seen searching curiously among its ruins. Such is the fate, sooner or later, and in a greater or less degree, of all the cities of our world. They flourish for a time, and then sink into decay: their grandeur vanishes as the wing of centuries sweeps over them; and at last their greatness becomes only a matter of history, in striking contrast to the humble appearance which they come ultimately to present. But it is altogether different with this City of God. Its glory, instead of waning, continually increases with the lapse of time. We can see how this has been the case in the past, while age after age has developed more fully the character and attributes of the Church of Christ on earth. And so shall it be for ever. More and more will the City of God increase in every element of happiness and glory. Infinite progression will attend her throughout the endless ages of eternity, and constantly accumulating bliss will flow into the souls of those who, through an earnest faith in Christ, have attained to the inheritance which is above, which is "incorruptible and undefiled, and that fadeth not away."

BILLY'S WINDOW GARDEN.

IN TWO PARTS.—PART I.

"'Hallo, dad! So yer've got company!'"—p. 300.

MR. JOHNSON, more particularly known as "the Corporal," had an ugly, kind face. Whether a myth or no, I cannot tell, but it was said that in a southern county where he was born and bred, and where more frequently than in any other part of England heronries are to be seen, one of the members of these brotherhoods had disobligingly pecked out his right eye. This scar had not only given him a sinister appearance, but it had necessitated his leaving the army, and being put on a pension. This "unattached life" was to him a matter of reluctant compulsion, as he had been proud of the service, and an unusual favourite with the rank and file. But now that he was thrown on his own resources, necessity, as has often been proved, was "the mother of invention." One thing was certain: Johnson, from his antecedents, could not be relegated to a life of idleness. He had inherited a very small but competent income from his father. This, with the aforesaid pension, made him, in his own eyes at least, an independent man, and, with his modest social aspirations, he felt he had not only enough, but to spare. As he had the singular and somewhat inharmonious combination of a love of boys and a love of flowers, he happily thought out a safety-valve for his favourite resorts by hiring, at his own expense, a room in one of the most needy districts in the great East of London. This, by degrees, he had furnished on a frugal but substantial scale—a desk, a relay of second-hand school forms, one or two maps on the wall, and a lot of framed coloured lithographs of seeds, grasses, leaves, and flowers. He had long been known and liked in his old regiment for the interest he took in the young recruits. It had been his persistent endeavour to instil into them his own love of flowers and of nature in general, and he contrived somehow to have always a few sympathetic hearers and disciples. In repairing, therefore, to Lime Lane, he was only carrying on and carrying out old employments. Undeterred by a series of rather unsuccessful efforts, he had, in course of time, succeeded in getting, after their day's nondescript work, a few waifs and strays whose natures were tolerably amenable to civilising influences. He had to submit at first to a good deal of rude banter—uncomplimentary remarks on his conspicuous, or rather inconspicuous, eye, and other things. But everyone soon discovered his genuine goodness, kindness, and generosity, and the Corporal came to be installed quite as a small chieftain, among the youth at least of these heathen tribes of the East.

He found he could secure his non-military recruits best—indeed, alone—by personal call and solicitation, and it was one of these occasions which forms the ground of this story.

Leaving the exact position of Crocket Court indeterminate, also reserving a description of the room in question, let me record a few scraps of the conversation between the Corporal and one who, he was discriminating enough at once to see, would prove an acquisition to what, in compliment to his military life, he used to speak of as his "roll-call." It will be observed that Billy, the small hero of our narrative, made havoc, as might be expected, with the Queen's English, and was largely tainted with the East End vernacular.

"Well, no; I ain't got no objection to coming—leastways, if the chaps won't chaff a feller like me."

"We shall be glad to see you, my lad," was the Corporal's hearty reply, "and next Tuesday is the day we give the flower-seeds.

"You have plenty of birds," said the Corporal, "to keep you company. They seem, anyhow, to enjoy the mossy roofs as much as you."

"The sparrers?" said Billy. "You 're right there, and werry good company they are—about the best in the court. Look at 'em now, a-peepin' over that old trough. They is the pluckiest little chaps. W'en it 's bin rainin' cats and dogs, till yer'd think they hadn't a dry feather on their backs, they'll come out as h'uppish as you like, a-puttin' their 'eads first on one side and then on t'other, askin' as plain as can be if there ain't no crumbs to be dispoged of this day."

But at this point it became manifest that Billy's visitor, with all due deference to the sparrow community, was edging his way towards the door.

"I'm afraid, friend, I must bid you good-night," he said, "for I have two other calls to make; but I shall see you on Tuesday at eight, and Tim will show you the way if you don't know it."

"All right," rather pleased at being unexpectedly accosted as "friend"; "I expect I'll turn up, and 'ave a go at them seeds."

"All right, my boy. I like the look of you, and shall be pleased to have you in my regiment of East Enders."

* * * * * *

It was very early on the Wednesday morning following the visitor's call, that Billy stood again at his window. His face wore the comfortable and self-satisfied aspect of one who has a great deal of important business on hand.

"Hallo there! what are yer after now?" interposed a snarling voice from the bed at the other end of the room. "Yer might have been lightin' the fire and bilin' the water, in place o' potterin' among that old crockery of yours, wot 's no good to nobody!"

Billy was apparently quite used to this form of address, and to the tone which accompanied it, for he scarcely stirred from his former attitude, and only responded with filial reverence, for the voice had come from all he had hitherto been taught to regard as father.

"Look 'ere," continued Billy, suppressing any little hurt feeling, at the same time rising and going up to the bed, "that gemman as called t'other evenin', wot I told you of, has given me all them seeds. And he says if I looks after 'em proper, and gives 'em a wash of an evenin', by-and-bye I 'll 'ardly know but I'm in Covent Garden w'en I looks out of my window. This 'ere 's red 'satonaria,' I believe he calls it, and this 'ere 's blue, and this, wot I'm sowin' first, is mignonette. Don't you remember, when I wor a werry little chap, mother had a plant of 'im in the h'old garden, and sometimes w'en we'd be watchin' at the door she 'd say to me, 'Here, Billy, father 's a-comin' home; yer can pick a bit of my mignonette and give it 'im to put in his coat'?"

The father made no answer, but turned on his side, and, as Billy thought, fell asleep again. If he had not been so engrossed with his flower-seeds he might have heard the sigh that followed his words. He little knew the vision he had awakened of a past which the stern man oftenest tried to banish rather than to recall. Visions of a far different and more sunshiny abode—visions of a pale face and welcoming smile—visions of its growing paler and paler—visions of thin hands clasping Billy the tighter as they grew more transparent, and of tears falling on his curly hair. Ah! how often tender human hearts are found to beat and throb and yearn under rough exteriors, and hard voices, and unmannerly ways; and how little it takes to wake up the slumbering chords of music that have long been silent!

Meanwhile the boy first returned to his seat by the window; then, with sudden resolution, up he jumped, fetched a few sticks from a corner of the room, and with evident familiarity with the art, proceeded to light a fire and put on an old kettle, whistling sotto voce all the time. Having concluded, he took a penny from the mantel-piece, and went off to invest in the usual supply of milk.

"It was werry jolly," related Billy, on his return, in reply to a question old Will addressed to him as to the doings of the previous evening. "There was a lot of fellers all in a big room with picters 'angin' up. Bob Noggs was there, and ain't he turned a swell! And that gemman wot come here stood at a table. I was a bit late, yer know, and he was speakin' w'en I got in. But as soon as 'e see me 'e says 'Good evenin', Bill; how are yer?' I wished I hadn't 'ave gone quite so late, for all them turns and stares at me as if I wer' a scarecrow. But Mr. Johnson, 'e says, 'I'll show you a seat,' and he puts me down right before the table on a form, and he says, 'This ere's Bill Blackley, and 'e 's the first lad I've found wot 's cultiwatin' flowers on his own 'ook, and I'm werry glad to 'ave the opportunity of introdoosin' 'im to yer!' Then if the mister didn't give us a rare talkin' to about what he had seed in Indiar and Chinar, and all about cactuses, and palmses, and holives. Then he comes home to Hengland, and how he kept us all alive about grasses and soils and climates, and took us, too, all in his mind like, a walk through woods, and even gave us a word in passing on hinsects and hanimals. And he was lovely on birds; and then this brought him to speak of my sparrows, and all the chaps looked at me, and some sniggled, and some nodded their 'eads approvin' like, which gave the place to me more of an 'ome look. But though the gemmin doesn't preach and sermon at you, he tries to say something that will do a feller good, and I'm not sure but he's set me a-thinkin', and drove a nail, like, into my 'ead. Well, this was what he did and what he said, just as he was finishin' up. He takes one seed out of one bag and one out of t'other, and 'e says, 'Look 'ere. This is saxonaria, and this is convolvulus, and this is mignonette. This'll be red, and this blue, and this 'ere is more for the smell nor the colour. Yer'd never believe,' says he, 'unless yer saw it, that such fine flowers would come out o' them brown-lookin' things. Now,' 'e says, 'I'm goin' to tell you about a different sort of seed, afore we diwide them.' All of a suddint 'e looks up, and 'e says, 'But this is the beginnin' and end of the thing. Listen! Wotever yer sow'll be sure to come up—that, and nothink else! Now, keep in mind that, my lads. W'en it's done, it's done.' Then 'e says, 'Wot sort of seeds do yer think yer've been growin' all these years? I expect some of yer have been sowin' thistle-seeds for a good long time, wot'll bother yourselves and yer neighbours for many a year. Instead of bad deeds and bad words, it 'ud be a precious good thing if we could hall say this evenin', and w'en the last evenin' of our sowin' comes, that we'd put in nothing but wot'll come up sweet and beautiful and——'"

"There," said Will, unaccustomed to so long a palaver, and perhaps the reaction after his good breakfast setting in, "if your tongue ain't tired, my ears is. I've 'ad about enough of yer, so I'm off."

* * * * * *

The months are flitting away, and Billy's first evening in the Iron Room has become quite an old story, though many a one has been passed since then in the same place. The seeds in the window garden, too, have sprung up, and somehow managed to struggle into beauty, gathering in every ray of sunshine and every gentle raindrop, and wonderfully unaffected by the unfavouring influences around. Billy watched their development with admiring eyes, and tended them with all the care of which his rough nature was capable. They were his first thought in the morning, and his last waking dream at night. It is true he had less time at his disposal than of old; for somehow in the damp spring weather old Will had managed to take a cold, which settled in his chest, and at length kept him an unwilling prisoner; while Billy had to take his place at the barrow, and go from street to street and house to house from early morning till the shadows began to fall.

With the occupants of the court, neither in days of health or sickness, had Will ever cultivated an acquaintance. There was one house directly opposite which had never had a tenant within his remembrance, but always stood there quiet and dreary, with faded yellow blinds drawn closely down, and damp weather-stains like slimy finger-marks upon its walls. Rumour said that once on a time, in that very room, a murder had been committed, and that no one since then had cared to make it a home. Certain it was that not a sign of life had brightened it within Billy's recollection, and that everyone, with general consent, had a sort of cold-shouldered feeling to the deserted dwelling. There was even a legend that it was haunted—a myth which was made the most of by all the youthful "nurse-gals" of the vicinity, and played a redoubtable part in the training of the young and rising generation.

As we have already hinted, during his invalid life Will spent a considerable portion of the day at his window, and weary enough he was of the prospect.

One day, in the dark autumn weather, Will felt worse than usual, and only crept from his bed to his chair late in the afternoon. Perhaps, then, being more weakly than usual, it was not to be wondered at that when, having taken up his post of observation, he saw, or fancied he saw, a slight movement of the blind at the opposite window, accompanied by a suspicion of some shadowy form reflected on it, he imagined it a confirmation of the ghostly story. Will looked again. No; it is gone, his eyes have been playing pranks with him. But sure enough, before he has time to withdraw them, there it is again, and of this there is no mistake. It was the face of a little child, with the bonniest blue eyes he had ever seen—and such a pair of rosy cheeks! The apparition was so abrupt, and altogether so different from his imaginings, that Will could not resist smiling to himself as he looked across. The small maiden seemed as much interested in the old man as he could possibly be in herself; or rather, we must, in the first instance, give the credit of the compliment to Billy's window garden, at which the child was evidently pointing her finger. But when that sudden smile flitted over the grave thin face, the new-comer at once took it as a token of friendly welcome, and returned it with interest. This sudden liking for the little stranger was all the more remarkable, as Will had rather a settled objection to the children of the court.

Next morning, he wondered, indeed, whether he could have dreamt it all. But, no; sure enough, when he rose, sooner than usual, the opposite blinds were drawn up to the top; there was a glow of firelight in the room, and now and then, as it passed to and fro, glimpses of a tall, slight form in widow's dress, and a little figure that always followed in its wake. The broken pane of glass, too, was mended; the windows rubbed till they shone again, and the place of the weary blinds taken by neat white curtains. Then, by-and bye, a railway van came rattling up with a well-worn but comfortable armchair, some bedding, a large brown chest, and the inevitable nondescript crockery.

As the days went on, there was quite a telegraphic communication of nods and smiles established between the old man and the blue-eyed child, such as would much have surprised Billy had he been in their secrets.

Will never thought the day properly begun until he had taken his usual seat and looked out. He had a silent morning greeting from his opposite neighbour. I scarcely think, as time passed, he could have slept as soundly as usual without the "good-night" kiss of the hand that was wafted to him from the other side of the street.

With the opening of the year came real January weather—frost and cold—which seemed to shrivel poor Will up, and brought back that hacking cough which summer days had modified. Ventilation is a very good thing in its way, but when the wintry wind pours through the chinks of the window, and the snow oozes its way on to the ledge, it is scarcely the thing for an invalid. So the old post of observation had to be resigned, and the chair to be drawn to the fireside. Poor Will! The days seemed very long, and he counted the hours till Billy's return.

Now, it happened one morning that he confided this feeling of weariness and ennui to his son, and that day being an extra snowy one, and no custom coming in Billy's direction, the latter determined, by way of happy surprise, to return two hours before his usual time. With this pleasant thought in his head, he stole softly up the creaking stair on tiptoe, boots in hand, lest they should advertise his coming. But as he neared the top he suddenly paused, and bent forward in an attentive attitude. Could it be? Yes, there was his father's voice. Was the old man talking to himself? No, there is another voice, clear and high. Billy's curiosity can stand it no longer, for at that moment a peal of laughter, such as had never been heard in the room since Will's occupancy, floated to Billy's ears. He opens the door with a sudden jerk. He is quite right; his father is not alone, for on one knee (as if he had been accustomed to fondle children all his life) sits the blue-eyed neighbour of the opposite house, whilst on the other lies an equally blue-eyed specimen of the doll sisterhood, staring complacently up at the grimy ceiling, and apparently long resigned to the loss of a portion of her upper and lower limbs.

"Hallo, dad! So yer 've got company," remarked Billy, the first surprise being got over. "I comed 'ome early to see as how you were gettin' on, not knowin' as yer were expectin' two young ladies."

Will had felt it nothing out of the way before Billy came home to ride a rosy little girl on one knee and a dilapidated doll on the other. But when his son's sharp black eyes appeared at the door, a sort of shamefacedness came over him. Some sweet, tender feeling, new, yet old, had awoke in his heart at the child's touch, and he would fain have sheltered and veiled it, as we do all sacred things. Will, too, was not quite sure in what light his young hopeful might look on this invader of his territories, and an embarrassed pause might have ensued, had it not been for the small maid herself, who asked, looking from one to the other, "Is this yer little boy?" whereat Billy, after one stare of surprise, burst into a laugh, and exclaimed, "Well, yer are a rum 'un! Wot's yer name, granny?"

"My leal name, wot they gived me in church, is Nelly Malia, but my 'ittle name wot mother calls me is Wosebud, or Wosie, and my 'ittle girl's name is Maly—that's mother's name. Wot 's yours, boy?"

"He's called Billy," said old Will, "and he's more nor twice your age, Rosie."

It was wonderful how the old man's tone mellowed before the child's gaze.

"Billy? That 's a vely nice name; but you ain't never said 'How do you do?' and getting down from her perch, she ran towards him.

Billy looked at the small fat hand outstretched to him, and for the first time felt his own was far from being in a state to grasp it. He took it, however, in his grimy palm. But Rosebud was not satisfied; her merry mouth fell.

"Why, you ain't never tissed me," she said.

Billy's eyes opened, if possible, wider than they had done since his entrance, and for a moment he hesitated. Then the quick glance softened unwontedly, and stooping, his lips met the persistent upturned face. With that kiss vanished all Billy's doubts as to the acceptance of this new acquaintanceship. From that hour Rosie found a place in his garden as Queen of Flowers.

(To be concluded.)

Our Vicar's Wife

LONG years ago, when I was young,
And wore a frill and Tam-o'-Shanter,
In our church choir there sat and sung
A fair and most inspired chanter—

A little girl, named Nellie Dale,
With golden and luxuriant tresses,
Whose cheek, like any lily pale,
Won ever matronly caresses.

She was as gentle as a dove,
And though of very lowly station,
Sang, as she had been taught above,
The strain of holy adoration.

A cripple from an early hour,
She had not shared those many pleasures
Which spring from health and active power,
But God had given her other treasures—

In the bright world that lay around,
The flowery mead, the wood, the river—
And with a gratitude profound
She e'er was mindful of the Giver.

The bird and bee were friends of hers;
The butterfly with painted pinion
Would linger long about the furze
Which blossomed in her fair dominion.

All Baby-land rich tribute paid
To her, and shared with her its gladness;
And not one subject was afraid
To seek her in its hour of sadness.

She was beloved by rich and poor:
The wise from her might wisdom borrow;
And pride before her cottage door
Would droop its plume, and sigh, "Good-morrow."

One morning in the month of May,
When bloom was all the landscape crowning,
She by the mill-pond chanced to stray,
And found a little lambkin drowning.

Her crutch was stretched with eager hand
(For not to aid were cruel slaughter),
But as she helped the wean to land,
She slipping fell into the water.

When next she saw the light of day,
She found the miller bending o'er her,
And, in his own rough, honest way,
Doing his utmost to restore her.

A fever followed, long and sore;
Life was despaired, but prayer and labour
Strove not in vain—at length once more
We met our darling little neighbour.

But, wondrous! from that very day
She won another lease of life, sir,
Her crutch was banished far away:
She's living still: our Vicar's wife, sir.

JOHN GEO. WATTS.

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

INTERNATIONAL SERIES.

Feb. 16th. The Ministry of John the Baptist.

To read—St. Luke iii. 1—22. To learn—St. Matt. iii. 2.

I. CALL. (1—6.) Nothing whatever heard of John since his name was given at his circumcision, except one verse (i. 80). That told of his growth in body, mind, and soul—preparing for his future work. Remind what the angel had foretold as to his greatness (i. 15). The time now come for him to be shown to Israel. Notice—

(a) The time. Rulers and chief priests specified.

(b) The message. God's word came, perhaps in a dream as to Joseph (St. Matt. i. 20), perhaps by an angel as to his father (i. 11). Anyhow, he recognised God's message and obeyed at once.

(c) The place. The low-lying lands about the Jordan, between the Sea of Galilee and the Dead Sea.

(d) The prophecy. Isaiah, 700 years before, had foretold his coming and its object, viz., as a pioneer to prepare the way for Christ the King. (Is. xl. 3.)

What would be done for a king? A road made. Obstacles must be removed — people informed about the king. So with Christ the King from heaven.

Therefore John preached repentance—put away sin; prepare hearts to receive the Messiah.

Told also of Christ's coming to bring salvation.

II. The Preaching. (7—14.) A revival of religion takes place. Multitudes, even from far-distant places, crowd to hear this new preacher.

Notice what he says to the different classes of people—

(a) The multitude, i.e. of Pharisees and Scribes (see St. Matt. iii. 7), noted for formality in religion and undue attention to outward observances.

They must show fruits in their lives—mere profession not enough.

The day of testing close at hand.

(b) The people. Noted for niggardliness. Must be self-denying and generous. True religion thinks of wants of others.

(c) The publicans. Farmers of taxes—noted for extortion. Must be fair and honest. Do duty to man as well as God.

(d) The soldiers. Noted for brawls and discontent. Must live peaceably and be contented.

That is, each person must give up his own special sins.

III. The Baptism. (15—22.) People began to think he must be the Messiah. But what is the difference between him and Christ?

He is the servant—Christ is the Master.

He baptises with water—Christ with Holy Ghost.

He preaches of judgment—Christ executes it.

And now Christ Himself comes to be baptised. Why?

(a) To set an example to His people.

(b) To institute Baptism as means of admission among His people.

(c) To fulfil all righteousness, i.e., to perform all that He Himself enjoined.

What signs of God's favour were shown Him?

1. The Spirit of God descended upon Him.

2. The voice of God proclaimed Him His Son.

Lessons. 1. The nature of repentance. Lay aside besetting sin. (Heb. xii. 1.)

2. The blessings of Baptism. Admitted into God's family. "If children, then heirs." See that ye walk worthy of vocation.

Feb. 23rd. The Temptation of Jesus.

To read—St. Luke iv. 1—13. To learn—Heb. ii. 18.

1. The Circumstances. (1, 2.) Christ, baptised as man, is now to be tempted as man—thus shared man's whole life, able to sympathise and help. (Golden Text.) Notice these points—

The time. Directly after baptism—full of Holy Spirit.

The manner. Led by Spirit—not going wilfully into temptation.

The place. Wilderness — wild beasts for companions. (St. Mark i. 13.)

The season. A forty days' fast when hungry and faint.

The tempter. Satan himself, prince of fallen angels.

II. The First Temptation. (3, 4.) To doubt God. Why might Christ not work this miracle?

He would be casting doubts on—

His Sonship—just declared at His baptism.

God's power—to keep Him alive without food.

God's love—in letting Him feel hunger.

It would also be taking His own way to supply wants.

So He answers, "Man shall not live by bread alone." (Deut. viii. 3.)

How is this an answer? Because it states—

(a) God's power in the past—kept Israelites alive in other ways than by bread.

(b) Man's true life is to obey God's Word.

III. Second Temptation. (5—8.) To forsake God. Notice these points—

The sight. The world's pomps and vanities.

The offer. Earthly power and glory.

The condition. To fall down and worship Satan!

At once Christ answers, "Get thee hence," etc. Why?

Because this world's blessings are all empty (vain).

Because God alone is to be worshipped.

III. Third Temptation. (9—13.) To presume on God. Notice—

He took Him to the Holy City and Temple.

He quotes Holy Scripture to Him. (Ps. xci. 11.)

He assures Him of the care of holy angels.

He tempts Him to presume on His Sonship.

But (a) Holy places do not necessarily keep from sin.

(c) God's angels keep us safe only when we are doing God's will.

So Christ answered, "Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God." To tempt God is—

To provoke God, as Israelites at Massah.

To presume on God's care, as Jonah when fleeing to Tarsus.

Satan, being resisted, left Christ. (James iv. 7.)

Lessons. How to meet temptation.

1. In the power of God's Holy Spirit.

2. By the Sword of the Spirit—the Word of God. (Eph. vi. 16.)

3. By the example and aid of Christ. (Golden Text.)

March 2. Jesus at Nazareth.

To read—St. Luke iv. 16—30. Golden Text—St. John i. 11.

Introduction. Ask where Christ was born—and where brought up. Lived at Nazareth till thirty years old—the age at which priests began their work. (Num. iv. 35.) Now, having been baptised and tempted, pays a visit to His old home.

I. Christ Welcomed. (16—22.) Picture the scene in the village.

The day—Sabbath—day of rest and worship.

The place—the village synagogue—house of prayer for all pious Jews.

The congregation—Christ's relations and friends coming in a crowd to see Him.

The cause—fame of His miracles, such as turning water into wine at Cana. (St. John ii. 11.) All these spread abroad.

The service—singing of Psalms, reading of Prophets. (Acts xiii. 27.)

The reader—Christ stands up to read the appointed lessons.

See how the passage wonderfully foretold His own work.

(a) God's Spirit had just descended on Him.

(b) He had already healed broken-hearted father at Capernaum whose son was sick unto death. (St. John iv. 46.)

(c) He was by His preaching causing the blind to see the light of the Gospel.

(e) He, having overcome the devil, could deliver those taken captive by him. (2 Tim. i. 26.)

Notice about this message of salvation. It was—

(c) Surprising from one thought to be only Joseph's son. But it was also (d) True—from One who is the Truth itself.

II. Christ Rejected. (23—30.) What did they want Him to do?—

Work some miracles here, as He had in other places.

Why did they want this? Two feelings prompted them—

(a) Curiosity—to see some wonderful works.

(b) Jealousy—that others should see these things and not they. Christ shows them that God's blessings were not confined to His own special people.

For whom did Elijah work a miracle of mercy? The woman of Sarepta, a city of Zidon, beyond borders of Holy Land. Who was healed by Elisha of his leprosy? Naaman the Syrian.

How were they affected by all this?

They were filled with hatred against Christ.

They rejected Christ from among them—even tried to kill Him—but He escaped from them.

Why did they thus reject Him? Because of their want of faith. They wanted signs and miracles to show He was the Son of God. But His holy life spent amongst them was the best sign—but their eyes were blinded.

Lessons. 1. Christ's message is the same now. Glad tidings of deliverance from Satan—liberty, joy, and peace are ours still.

2. The danger of rejecting Christ. He never went to Nazareth again. Now is the accepted time.

March 9. The Great Physician.

To read—St. Luke iv. 31—44. Golden Text—St. Matt. viii. 16.

Introduction. Nazareth rejected Christ, Capernaum received Him. Nazareth His own city by residence, Capernaum by adoption. Nazareth visited once only, Capernaum frequently.

This seems to be His first visit to Capernaum.

I. Preaching. (31, 32.) Christ's great work that of preaching or teaching—came as God's Son to declare the Father. Where did He preach?

On the hill-side, as the Sermon on the Mount. (St. Matt. v., etc.)

By the sea, as when He gave the seven Parables. (St. Matt. xiii.)

Always on the Sabbath in the synagogues.

What was there to notice about His teaching?—

He spake with power—believed in His own message, as One come from God.

II. Healing. 1. The unclean spirit.

What a sad disturbance to the Sabbath worship.

A man with evil spirit possessing him. Notice about the spirit—

(a) He recognised Christ—"I know Thee who Thou art."

(b) He feared Christ—"Let us alone," he said.

(c) He obeyed Christ—coming out of the man.

Are there such evil spirits now? Yes; of same kind, if not of same degree. Envy, pride, lust, hatred, malice, and such-like—all sins of the soul are works of the devil.

How can they be cast out? Only by the power of God.

Christ must be recognised—"Lord, have mercy."

Christ must be obeyed—resist the devil, and he will flee.

2. Peter's wife's mother. Synagogue worship over, with its exciting scene. Christ needs food and rest. Where does He go? Notice—

Simon Peter was a disciple and a married man.

He was hospitable, and wished to entertain Christ.

He was in trouble—his mother-in-law suddenly stricken down with fever.

What an inconvenient time for a guest! Was it so? What did Christ at once do?

(c) He strengthened her. Fever leaves people weak, but she at once resumed her household duties.

3. Many sick. No wonder Christ's fame spread. He had given wine at Cana, cast out evil spirits, healed a great fever.

So they brought sick of all kinds in body and mind.

What a blessing Nazareth lost and Capernaum received!

III. RESTING. (42—44.) That Sabbath had brought no rest to Christ.

So He retired into a quiet place for prayer and communion with God.

The people followed Him full of love and gratitude.

But He could not stay always at Capernaum. He must preach in all the different cities.

LESSONS. The blessings of receiving Christ. He forgives sin and heals disease. Blesses soul and body. (Ps. ciii. 3.)

Healing art God's gift as much as any other.

Therefore seek Him in all want, trials, sorrows. He will never fail those who trust in Him.

THE HEART OF THOMAS TITT; OR, THE BIG MAN AND THE BIGGER.

BY THE REV. P. B. POWER, M.A., AUTHOR OF "THE OILED FEATHER," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER IV.

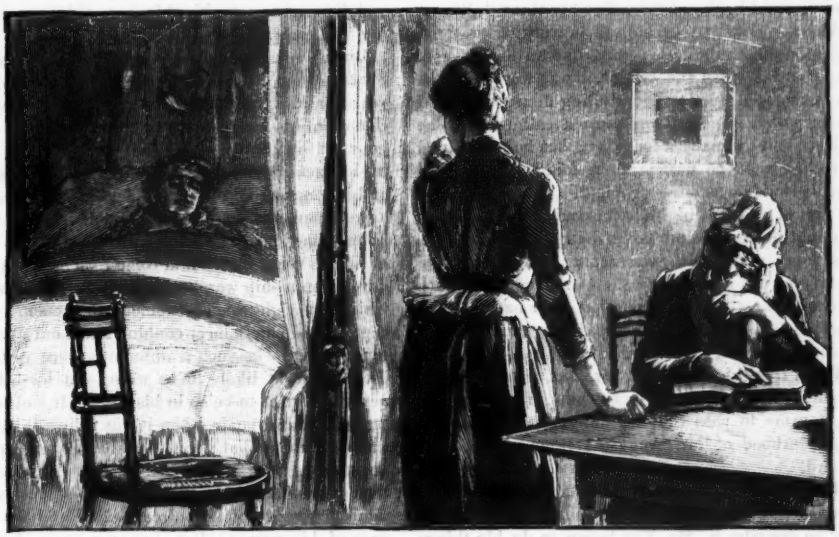
IT did not suit Tom's master—the chronometer-maker—to have any apprentices living in his house; and so he paid those he had so much a week, and let them find themselves. The chronometer-maker was not a stingy man; and he allowed his apprentices what was reasonable enough. It was from what he had for himself that Mr. Titt determined to provide for Mary Dacres, and this involved a good deal. In the first place, it necessitated a change of residence on Mr. Titt's part; and secondly, a change of diet. For, whereas Mr. Titt had had a good large bedroom on a second floor, he had now, for economy's sake, to get a little nearer the fixed stars, and such comets as might from time to time be out on the spree; in a word, he had to move to an attic, the dimensions of which seemed to be exactly suited to his diminutive size.

Moreover, he had to alter his usual bill of fare. It had never been very extravagant; it now had to become somewhat meagre. In fact, Mr. Titt's diet now dealt largely in porridge, and brown bread (whole-meal) and milk. He found out that these were the most nourishing and the cheapest articles of diet he could get; and as I am always thankful when I see virtue rewarded, I am glad to say Mr. Titt throve upon them. Not but that now and then he had a little something else, but they were always cheap dainties; and I believe that, on more than one occasion, they consisted of some ready-fried fish, which on a Saturday night appealed from a barrow to the dwellers in the neighbourhood of Tottenham Court Road. But even these small economies did not prove sufficient; and after a couple of months' trial, our little friend was at his wits' end as to how he could meet his self-imposed liabilities, and carry out his scheme of completing Mary Dacres' education.

A neighbouring comet (for Mr. Titt might be said almost to go to roost among the stars) helped him to a solution of the difficulty.

In the first place, by keeping him awake. He could just watch its tail as he lay in bed, and watching naturally kept him awake; and a man thinks more practically when he is awake, than when he is asleep.

In the next place the comet helped him by being something strange. That heavenly body put its tail to a use that it had never contemplated. That tail had, no doubt, its own uses in its own sphere; but who would have ever thought of its having anything to do with the plans, perplexities, and contemplations of an attic dwarf?



Nevertheless, it had. For, as I say, keeping Tom Titt awake, he was thoughtful; and his thoughts were upon how to carry out his provision for Mary Dacres. He was ready for any amount of self-sacrifice, he would have made mincemeat of himself if he could; but even that would not go far, for he seemed to himself so small that he would have only made a respectable sausage at the most.

The propinquity to strange things often suggests strange thoughts; and I must leave it to your own judgment, good reader, to settle whether the strange comet had anything to do with the strange notion which came into Mr. Titt's mind.

The thought uppermost was how to raise some money—a thought which many people find very perplexing, and incapable of being solved in a satisfactory manner.

Perhaps it came out of the comet; but certainly it came into Mr. Titt's mind that he would put himself into communication on the matter with Mr. Spring, his master. And he would make him a proposition. Mr. Tom Titt could not hide from himself, however modest he might be, that he was the steadiest hand in Mr. Spring's employment, and that his master set much store by his work. "Now," thought Titt, "if I make Mr. Spring an offer to remain with him for three years after my time has expired, provided he will allow me three shillings a week extra until I am out of my time; and if I allow him to deduct this money from mine during the three years I agree to serve him, perhaps he 'll advance it to me. 'T will be something strange for an apprentice to ask, I know; but," said he, cocking his eye at the comet, "that comet 's a strange thing, too; and if there are strange things in the heavens above, why should there not be in the earth beneath?"

In the nature of things, one cannot be astonished at a master's being somewhat surprised at an apprentice's making him such a proposition as that made by Thomas Titt to Mr. Spring. That gentleman could not make out what this extra money could be wanted for; he imagined that his apprentice must have been living too fast, whereas, indeed, he had been living almost, if we may so describe it, a little too slow.

"Together they watched by the bedside."—p. 309

Moreover, he was rather inquisitive as to what the money could be wanted for, which put poor Tom almost into a fix. However, the interview ended happily. If anything could have made Tom make a sudden start and shoot up a couple of inches, Mr. Spring's ending of the interview would have done it. "Well, Titt, I respect your silence, as you have given me your word that the money is wanted for a good purpose. My confidence in you has never yet been misplaced; and I feel that it never will be. You shall have the money. There will be no need for any legal paper. I trust your word, and if you remain with me, I hope you will have no reason to repent it." And so Mary Dacres, by a combination of little Titt's self-denial and credit, with the extraneous help of a comet, was provided for until such time as she should be able to do for herself.

And Tom Titt grew bigger and bigger—bigger and bigger as bigness is counted somewhere higher up than amongst the comets and their tails, Somewhere where some folks would think that things were strange altogether, so unlike are they to things here; they would be all comets, and many-tailed comets, to them.

At last the time of Mary Dacres' education came to an end; and she was installed as assistant teacher to Miss Docens, which latter lady had faithfully kept her promise, and never let the young girl know by whom she was befriended—she only lived in the mystery that she had a friend; it never entered into her mind that the little fellow-weeper at the long past funeral could be thus befriending her through life.

And now, Mr. Titt set himself to work off the debt, which he did to the last penny, like an honest man. And the day when the last of it was worked off, he commemorated the fact by inviting himself to a real dinner. What many people would call a dinner, he had not had for many a long day; but he had a kind of feeling that he wished to feel independent, and that he could do as other people did, if he liked; and the fact of his knowing that he could do it, I have no doubt prevented him from doing it much more. You must remember, good reader, that our little friend was but human, and therefore compassed with infirmity like all of us; and what more natural than that he should feel that he could do as other and bigger people did, if he liked?

Freed from his liabilities, Mr. Titt felt warranted in going to live a little way out of town; and so, it came to pass that he came to reside in the neighbourhood of Mr. Augustus Roundabut Swellingford.

There he established himself, and there on his small means he began to do big things. At first, if I may so describe it, Mr. Titt began to do big things in a small way—at least, small to the human eye.

There was that boy who was the pest of the place, fast going to the mischief, whose father could make nothing of him, nor his mother either, who had actually put out his tongue at his grandmother, though she was expected to leave him something; and who had gone so far as to square out before his uncle and aunt. Tom Titt took him with him to the sea for a week, and then himself took him up to town to his work every day, and called for him and brought him home, and so snatched him from the vice into which he was drifting; and that little man could lead this young wild Will about as though he had a hook in his nose. Yes, Tommy, you were a big man to get that lad to go so quietly with you, when it took two policemen on one occasion to work him along to the station, when he was taken up for window-breaking—as a pastime not recognised by the law.

I think, Tommy, you were big when you went yourself into the "pub," and fetched home your poor neighbour Jones; and went security for the rent for three months, so that he and his should not be turned into the streets; and when he became an altered man—that was your triumph, Tommy; it was through you, Tommy, that the drink that overcomes so many strong men, was in that case overcome—"honour to whom honour is due." That was a big man who drove discontent and misery, and starvation, and degradation, out of this house; and all that Tom Titt did by taking that drinking man in hand; at least, so it would be thought in that place where, as compared with folks' ideas about things here, all is strange—stranger far than the comets with their tails.

And so you kept on, and on, Mr. Titt, until you were well known up There as a big man; a man who tackled big jobs, and entered on great enterprises, and did mighty acts, big things, as things are counted big up There.

But we must get on with your life, Mr. Titt. Old Spring, your master, had now lived a good many years in the world, and sundry thoughts began to come into his head about going out of it; and before he went out of the world, he meant to go out of his business. Chronometer-making is anxious work, and Mr. Spring began to get nervous. He had had a great name in his day; he had it now; and what if anything should go wrong with any of his instruments? What if it should come to a question, some day, when a ship was in the region of sunken rocks, which was right, his chronometer or the sun? for the captain and chief officer couldn't make out at all how there came to be such a difference since yesterday; the sun wasn't likely to be wrong—at least, he had never known it to be so in his time. It looked a bit queer now and again when it was eclipsed, but folks knew all about that; but there had never been any question as to its keeping its time. All these ideas took possession of Mr. Spring's mind—principally, no doubt, owing to his impaired health, and the weakness of his nerves; but, however groundless, they were real to him; and he acted accordingly.

There was but one man to whom he could entrust his business. There were plenty who would buy it; who just wanted the name of it; and who would most likely make ducks and drakes of that name before long. But Mr. Spring had taken nearly half a century to build up his good name; and he did not mean in perhaps as many weeks to throw it away.

There was one man whom he could trust, and that one was Mr. Titt, his foreman. He should have the business, if they could come to a suitable arrangement. And this they easily did. Mr. Spring was to leave his name in the business, and for three years he was to have half the profits, and for three years a quarter, and then the business was to be wholly Mr. Titt's. And so Mr. Thomas Titt's being "diddled," and "dished," and "done for," meant his being installed as the real owner of the business of John Spring, chronometer-maker to the Admiralty.

It was at this period of his life—at the commencement of his partnership with Mr. Spring—that we find Mr. Titt ensconced in Tittsville, a snug little villa in the immediate neighbourhood of his old abode, and also of Mr. Augustus Roundabut Swellingford, the big man, at least ostensibly, of the place.

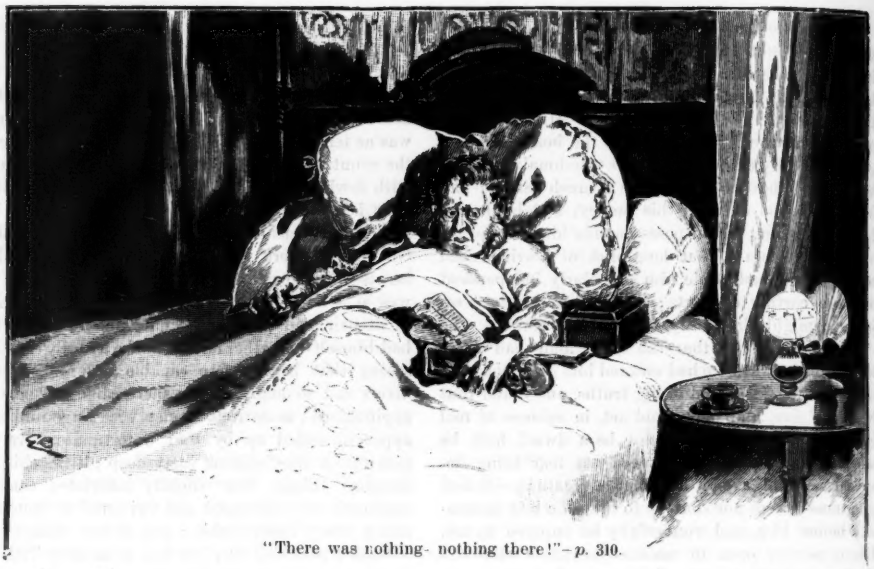
XUM

If Tittsville had been built for its owner alone, it would, no doubt, have been a very little house. But it was built for Mr. Titt's heart, and not merely for his body; and for the ideas, and feelings, and affections, which were in Mr. Titt's heart. Mr. Titt looked on to the future. He knew that the business was a good one. By adding first-class watchmaking to it, he believed that he could make it much larger; and he had visions of using his money, and his house, for big purposes, for purposes outside himself and his own little wants. That long diet of porridge and brown bread had made him singularly independent of mere earthly comforts; and so had his long sojourn, I might almost say, amongst the stars.

It was no wonder that the little man had great ideas, for, in truth, he had entered into great relationships, and had got hold of big truths, and found that he could live, and move, and act, in spheres of real greatness. Here he need not be a dwarf, here he need not be weak, here he need not fear being despised, here this avenue and that to greatness—to real greatness—were not shut up to him; he had immensity before him, and wonderfully he enjoyed it, too. His eyes were open to realities, he knew what was shadow and what was substance; what was only opinion, and what was truth; what was the make-believe of honour and position, and what these things were themselves. And all this had its good effect upon him; he grew in confidence and in comfort, and reached out to bigger and bigger things.

All the side of the railroad where our little friend lived might have been called Tittsville, so entirely did this little man's influence pervade it; and so completely did he dwell in, I might almost say, every home.

As to his own house — Tittsville proper — the station-master never knew who would be there during the week, in the way of queer people.



Mr. Titt seemed to have the knack of finding out queer people in London—anyhow, people who were not generally asked down to such a nice house as Tittsville; and who, if they had by any miracle got down to Mr. Swellingford's, would have been pitched out of the grounds with a pitchfork, and out of the house with the tongs. Mr. Titt had a wonderful housekeeper, and she seconded him in all his plans for doing good. When he was in need of such a functionary, he advertised for one, and in his simplicity brought upon himself much trouble, especially as he had incautiously given the address. Determined to get a head of the establishment who would be one with him in entertaining such folk as he chose to give rest for a while for the sole of their foot at Tittsville, he committed the amazing imprudence of advertising for "a lady with a heart, to preside over a bachelor's establishment."

My dear reader, can you imagine what the poor man brought upon himself? Innumerable were the answers he received. They came on coloured paper and plain; they came marked "Private and Confidential," and they came with devices of the real thing, with an arrow stuck through it, as much as to tell Mr. Titt that he had indeed hit the mark, and that the bow drawn at a venture had only too well done its work. There was the lady who had "a heart for any fate," and the one whose consistency was as tender as a spring chicken (this lady lived in the country, and helped to supply Leadenhall market with fowls), and didn't want asparagus to set it off (this lady had no garden, but a neighbour of hers had, and occasionally helped on Covent Garden). Oh dear! There was such a variety of excellent hearts—of nonsuch hearts—that poor Mr. Titt, who was of a humble mind, tapped his own little heart in despair, and wondered what kind of a heart he had himself—whether it must not be awfully deficient, seeing that hearts were capable of excellences so divers and so many. Then there came the personal applications: monstrous women with huge umbrellas appeared, called up by that unfortunate advertisement from the feminine vasty deep; little chirping, hopping things, like slightly inebriated canaries, appeared, who chirruped and twittered to show they had a cheery heart within; and, at last, things came to such a pass that Mr. Titt had to shut up Tittsville for a week, and betake himself to the seaside, where, without any advertising at all, he found what he wanted, in the shape of the middle-aged widow lady at whose house he lodged, and who was about to give up the lodging-house line of life; and who, from having people continually coming and going, was quite ready for any guests whom Mr. Titt might choose to invite.

The siege of Tittsville being raised, that hospitable mansion opened its door to many a poor stricken one, and there did little Titt grasp with a strong hand the poor desponding one, and start him or her afresh again, and rest the poor, weary, and worn, and brain-addled one, and send him or her out again into the battle of life, furnished afresh for the strife which they all must wage.

I wonder what those who dwell high up, above that comet's tail, thought of these proceedings of Mr. Titt? I wonder what opinion they had of himself? I wonder, when they looked upon the grandeur of Mr. Augustus Roundabut Swellingford, aye, and of many a prince and potentate of the world, and compared their might and power with that of Mr. Titt of Tittsville, which they thought the biggest and the strongest man? I believe they thought Titt; there was a sense in which Mr. Swellingford was big, there was another and a higher sense in which Mr. Thomas Titt was bigger.

So time passed on; Her Majesty's ships were kept straight by Mr. Titt's chronometers; and though they and the sun agreed that there should be always some difference between them, on the whole they got on very well together. Business prospered. Titt and the widow benefited mankind; and Titt lived in domestic peace, for the widow was an honourable woman, and took no advantage of her favourable strategic position to capture and bear off as spoil of war the little man whose house she kept.

"There was nothing—nothing there!"—p. 310.

Meanwhile, what had become of our friend Mary Dacres? She too was prospering in the world. A widow lady, uncommonly like the one who did the honours at Tittsville, used to take lodgings now and again for the benefit of her health in the village where Mary lived, and this widow formed a great intimacy with the young girl, and got her a place as companion where there was not too much to do, and where the salary was comfortably sufficient; in fact, little Polly Dacres that was, lived the life of a lady; and the good widow was always her friend.

But her old and earliest friend—the friend who wept with her at the funeral of her little brother, mingling his tears with hers—she never saw. He wrote to her now and again, but in person never came. Many a time she wished to see him, but he never seemed to take the hints she gave.

No change came over the outward form of our little friend, as time wore on; only his eyes became more full of human and of heavenly love, and a peace ineffable grew up upon his face. But a great change came over Mary Dacres—the change of development—the change of expansion—the blooming of the bud—the noontide of the dawn. Many wanted to marry her, but none found favour with her; she was not for marriage; and none could tell the reason why.

Ah, reader, though she knew it not, Mary Dacres had given away her heart long, long ago. She gave it to the tears which mingled with her own, and she never took it back. There are seeds which lie long, long in the ground, because circumstances are against their development into fruit and flower, but they are seeds still. In them are all the potentialities of all that after their kind has been, or can be; and let them be freed from the too heavy pressure of the superincumbent earth, and they will throw out both root and shoot, and flower and fruit—such was the love of Mary Dacres; circumstances were against it—it had no chance of development, but there it was; and who can tell where and when such seeds will sprout?

All Mary Dacres' store in the way of love were some letters, which certainly were not love-letters as we should call them—not one of them had a superlative degree—there was no superabundance of adjectives; there were no symbolic but unsatisfying x x x x's to which mystic meanings were attached. In a breach-of-promise case, a lawyer would not have given twopence for the lot. But they were precious to Mary Dacres; and some of them had to be pasted at the back, for they had fallen into ugly cracks from having been read so often.

Letters, like flowers, and human folk, and some say even gems, are male and female; and as Mary Dacres had these few male letters, so had Mr. Thomas Titt some few female ones. He had a treasure-box—the little man was so far like a little child—but, unlike the little child's, the treasure-box had in it great elements of grief.

The letters were such as Mary Dacres felt that she could write him under the circumstances in which she was placed. His had gradually become less and less of the old boy-and-girl letter—less and less even of the grown-up man's letter. They had become designedly short; for, though he had a hard struggle before he could master the thought, and make it his own, he wished her as much as possible to forget him, and to marry, if opportunity occurred, someone in his opinion more suitable to her than he could ever be—even supposing she could love such as he.

But the letters, such as they were, were precious. Meanwhile, time was passing on, and bringing all sorts of things with it. Amongst the rest, it brought low fever to the side of the railway by which Tittsville was built. And it brought it to Mr. Titt himself.

There he lay, fever strong upon him now and again, but evermore the same sweet peace on his countenance, and the same look of love in his eye. And he was sick nigh unto death, and his life would have passed from him without Mary Dacres ever knowing the mystery of how or why it was that he left her all he had, with the exception of what he left in charities, and the provision he made for the faithful widow, who had been not only harmless, but also faithful and true up to the very end, had it not been that, the fever running high one night, and delirium coming on, the sick man let out the whole secret of his life and soul, in such-wise that the faithful widow sitting by his side took it all in, and, moreover, wrote it all down.

Thus it came out, in various conversations supposed to be held with Miss Docens, how it was he who had arranged all for Mary's caretaking as a child; what privations he had undergone for her sake; and—what the widow well knew, for she had been the agent in it—how Mary was really the mistress, and the one she lived with the companion; and how her large allowance came out of Mr. Titt's pocket. Thus, too, it came out why he had almost dropped correspondence with her when she came to womanhood. Looking at his own physical infirmities, he thought himself unworthy of her; and he dreaded the idea of love growing up between them.

For her sake he had fought with himself; and, big man as he was, conquered himself; and now that he was about to die, it might be said to be in the arms of Victory. The one who conquers himself is the greatest conqueror of all.

I don't excuse the good widow. I think I should not have been inclined to have undertaken the responsibility myself; but women will often do, especially in matters where the heart is concerned, what men would not. The widow sent for Mary Dacres, and together they watched by the bedside for the few short hours which seemed to remain.

And there Mary heard with her own ears all that the widow had heard before; and, looking upon that flushed but peaceful face, saw the only one she had ever loved. The far-off funeral tear was now an ocean that was girdling and beating upon her heart.

The fever never left the sick man, but he had consciousness enough to know that there was a new and beautiful face near him. He knew that a white soft hand held his; he knew that he heard another voice save that of his widowed friend; and in that voice he seemed to find exceeding joy. He was under the impression that the watcher was another-world being, sent to help him in his last hours, and be with him as he parted from all of earth. That voice—ah! he knew that voice. Yes, Mary had died, and he had never heard of it; and now she was come for him, and he smiled upon her another-world smile, and closed his eyes—but not in death, only in a long, long sleep, which seemed like death.

What passed in that sleep, who can tell? but so it was that it did not seem strange to the sick man that his hand should be held by one whose features he knew full well; more amazing still, that his forehead should be kissed by the lips of the one to whom the hands belonged. Perhaps if he had not looked still dazed this might never have happened; and, indeed, he looked dazed enough to warrant Mary Dacres in thinking that he would not know what she had done.

Another long sleep, and the waking this time was to life and the beginnings of health; and a new babyhood indeed of weakness, but also a new manhood—heart-life, home-life, were to be his. The shedding of a sympathetic tear, long years gone by, was to open a fountain of life in his home and in his heart; and the waters, gathered long behind the cold, hard rocks, now overflowed, and they were not to dry up—even with death itself. Mary Dacres and the good widow never left Tittsville again. The first remained there as his wife—the other as an honoured and a helpful friend; and if height were to be measured by happiness, Mr. Titt must have been chopped up into at least six pieces to have brought him down to the ordinary stature of man. If, too, in doing good, Mr. Thomas Titt had been a big man before, he was twice as big now. Out of his own blessedness he blessed others to the full, and when at last he died (as even the biggest of us must do), the shadow of the great church tower, reared by his munificence, fell on the large monument of the little man. Those who loved him so well, hid in death what had been his bodily insignificance in life.

The great church tower, with its peal of bells, was one of the big things that he had done; and the sounds of these bells played around his tomb as though they were glad to make music, even round the stone that covered his remains.

Augustus Roundabut Swellingford, since I wrote the last few lines ending with the death of a little body, but the fresh and new life of a big soul, I have been out in the open air. It is well that I should have been, before I come back to you. It is well that there should have been a break, lest any of the savour of that big soul should by any chance cleave unto you, or its atmosphere might lend you an air of false importance, and make you look big. Augustus, shall I tell you what I saw out in the open? A May tree, a crooked little tree with the first of the May out upon it. There were many trees statelier and bigger not far off, but the crooked May tree drew me to it. It was a propheey of all that comes with spring. Augustus, it spake of little Tom Titt, but it said nothing concerning you.

But I must say something. The folk who have heard something about your beginning will naturally expect to hear something about your end.

It is not much I have to tell them; but, such as it is, they shall have it.

When first you did life the honour of entering it, you were large, and large you continued, in one sense, up to the very end.

Yes! Mr. Swellingford became a great man upon the Stock Exchange. He was a "bull" and a "bear" up and down for many a year, always or nearly always catching whatever he tossed up; and hugging tight whatever he trampled down, but stooped to pick up again and make his own. He was big almost to his very heart's content, and that is saying a great deal.

Not only did Mr. Swellingford entertain a Lord Mayor at dinner, but he became a Lord Mayor himself, and concentrated in his own person all the glory of robe and badge, and the fur cap, and mace, and sword.

By degrees all his side of the railroad became Mr. Swellingford's; by degrees he got such an interest in certain stocks that he could knock them about as he pleased; people drove down from London in their carriages to his dinner-parties, which really were given for himself, and not for them at all.

Mr. Swellingford's name became great in the City. He was reported to be a millionaire, and he encouraged the report.

But Mr. Swellingford's soul lay a poor weazened, shrunken, narrow, miserable thing within his great body, and in his great house—the husky part of Mr. Swellingford was very big, the kernel part was very small.

The eyes above the comet could see nothing within the big man, nothing but the fact that there was a something there which was shrivelled: they saw a "might have been," and they saw a "was not."

Swellingford filled the circle in which he moved in the City; Swellingford was the biggest man in the parish where he lived; Swellingford was the member for the borough close at hand. But Swellingford had no place in human hearts, and there was a world in which Swellingford did not live or move at all—the world of true humanities; the world of spiritual affinities; the world of feelings and spiritual life—there he was a deformed and miserable dwarf.

There is such a thing as growing smaller and smaller, and shrinking and shrinking, in the life of the soul. So shrank Mr. Augustus Swellingford, until in that world which lies outside "the City," and outside Mr. Swellingford's side of the railway, you would have had to hunt diligently for Mr. Swellingford, ere you could have found him.

And when you had found him, you would have asked yourself the question whether this was what was originally intended to be a man?

And for him, too, there came the inevitable hour. Like the rich man of old, he had to die and be buried.

And he did die; but not such a death as you and I, good reader, would like to die. On his death-bed he felt himself shrinking, shrinking—everything seemed so vast, and he seemed so small; he wanted to catch at something, at somebody—his independence was all gone. No angel had come for him! He was alone!

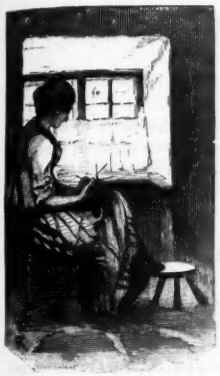
With his banker's book, and the list of his securities, he tried to comfort himself; but somehow the figures all seemed round O's; there was nothing—nothing there. He even ran his eye over his will; but that only told of what he had to leave; and what comfort could there be there?

And now, all the things in which he might have been great came before his eyes. What Tom Titt knew in life, Swellingford came to know in death, but too late; with what was truly the big, the great, he had no part.

In a fit of desperation, he had down his lawyer, and remade the will, leaving every penny he had to charities, hoping in that way he might get a grip of the real, and be somebody in another life; but no one blessed him for this, and his relatives cursed him for it.

Even he himself felt that this could do but little good, and that he was departing into eternity a shrivelled soul.

Mr. Augustus Roundabut Swellingford died—not a jot of his bigness abated here, but with shrivelled miserableness There—the There whither he was going; and There was the real measure of things and men. He died knowing that he was going to the infinitely Great, and that he was infinitely small.



It was the end of one of earth's big men, even as Mr. Thomas Titt's was the death of one of heaven's big ones. Ah, yes! there are

THE BIG MAN, AND THE BIGGER!

"LET YOUR LIGHT SHINE."

A CHAPTER FOR THE SICK AND INFIRM.

WE have read of a certain kind of diamond, which, having been exposed for a while to the light of the sun, will emit light when taken away into darkness. So many a life, numbered by the Lord of all among His jewels, has caught the radiance of the Sun of Righteousness, and is shining for Jesus amid circumstances of surrounding gloom. Well-known workers, busy servants of Christ, active and energetic lives, are not the only ones to whom comes the Divine bidding, "Let your light shine;" you also must have place and part in this bright and glorious ministry, even though mists may seem to linger around your lot. Your removal from outside work does not mean that you are to be a cumberer of the ground; you can serve and glorify the Master upon your sick-bed as truly as the brethren work for Him who bear the burden and heat of the day.

The greatest trial of all is to do nothing, to feel oneself useless and existing in vain. If such a feeling has ever come to you, resist it as an evil temptation, as thankless complaining, and utter falsehood. No heart that loves God exists in vain, no life that is hidden within the Rock of Ages can be useless and worthless. And should Satan repeat the whisper, silence the thought by taking the golden prescription—

"Do something for somebody, quick."

"Yes, indeed," you may be inclined to sigh, "how I only wish I could; but I am far too infirm to be helpful. I can neither serve God nor my neighbours." Are you too infirm to give to those around you the best and truest wealth—the blessing of love? If you outpour to others the sincere and fervent love of your heart, you are helping them more than you understand—you are reflecting to deathless souls that sure and strong love which yearns over them, and which keeps aglow the tenderness in your heart and life.

Invalids have been as helpful before now as many a public standard-bearer. Nobody likes to say "No" to a sufferer; thus many a promise of good has been gained, many an inspiring message dropped by the way, many a Christ-like pleading has obtained response, where from lips less feeble it might have been spoken in vain. We have heard of an invalid teaching a Bible-class from her couch of weakness; of another composing letters and messages to bring home the Gospel to the heart; of another taking charge of a number of birds without, that learned to look upon her as a mindful and tender friend, and relied in their helplessness upon her own. What a gracious ministry may be found in sewing, knitting, mending, for the orphan, and some life yet more needy than ours, and in preparing texts for the Flower Mission, and designs to brighten school-rooms and bare, unsightly walls!

There is always something the weakest of us can do for our God and for our brethren. A great mission-worker among the Indians, when laid on a bed of weakness, busied himself in teaching a young learner his letters, and remarked, "I have often prayed to God to make me useful. I can no more preach the Gospel, but He leaves me strength enough to teach this child his alphabet." There is one sick-room where, could we enter, we should see a list of "Requests for Prayer" placed within sight of the invalid. A list is regularly forwarded to her of the requests that have been handed in and offered up at a neighbouring prayer-meeting, and then this sweet, helpful soul takes up the petitions, and echoes them before His mercy-seat Who is the hearer and answerer of prayer. Is this feeble one too infirm to be a fellow-worker with the Infinite Compassion?

Yet you may whisper, "I am too weak to serve, too tired sometimes to pray." Then the Lord, Who knows what you cannot do, O yearning heart, as well as what you can, has a ministry for you still. Remember Him, keep your gaze on Jesus, do and bear His all-loving will—not patiently alone, but thankfully, praisefully, triumphantly. Rest in the Lord, and let your restfulness, your faith, your peace, soothe and calm many a troubled heart around you, many a careworn life. Thus may you through the darkness be shining for the Master; the shadow of His wing is sheltering your light, lest the blast of affliction should quench it. Rather let His face behold that the winds of sorrow but fan its radiant glow—let your light shine through pains and tears, till the mists uprise, the day dawn, and the darkness eternally flee away.

NOTES OF CHRISTIAN LIFE AND WORK IN ALL FIELDS.

HELPING HANDS FOR SEAMEN.

A SAILOR'S OFFERING.

"OH, Lord, advertise Thy love through us." Such was the prayer we heard recently offered by the leader of a meeting, aglow with earnest zeal; it was a forcible expression, bringing home vividly to the heart the truth that every Christian is to be an "advertisement"—known and read of all men — of the Master's goodness and compassion. Miss Child, of the Sailors' Welcome Home, Ratcliffe Highway, is still holding up the flag of Gospel truth, still extending practical sympathy in the midst of seafaring wanderers; and the free suppers provided in the winter, the gifts of books and warm articles, the letters written to sailors in different ports, combine to help forward Christian work among Englishmen and foreigners alike. A man rushed into this institute one day, wanting to sell his watch and tools for drink. The counsel and prayers of one of the workers so calmed and affected him, that he also was led to pray, and was saved from falling back into the intemperate career which was his besetting temptation. The sailors on their voyages are missionaries themselves, as was evidenced when a stranger entered the Home to ask after a shipmate who had sailed with him two years since, and who had proved a blessing to the ship, his consistent example often preventing evil words. The stranger became himself surrounded by the good influences of the Home, thanks to his memory of the Christian sailor whom he had met on board. Mr. R. H. Hunter, of 2, Park Circus, Glasgow, writes to acquaint us with a new work, started on behalf of the orphan children of sailors. Trustees will seek out deserving cases, and personally deal with the funds, assisting the widowed mother to bring up her child, or placing the orphan in a suitable home. If prospered, the "Sailors' Orphan Society" will also care for the needs of fishermen's children. The following cases, among others, have been already aided:—The family of a carpenter who perished with his ship; the little daughter of a man who raised himself from before the mast to be captain, spent his savings to buy instruments, but was lost in a gale; and the children of a chief steward and chief engineer. Help is guaranteed by this Society for twelve months at a time, each case being reviewed when the year expires.

AN INTERNATIONAL TEA-PARTY AT THE "WELCOME HOME."

THE HIDDEN BIBLE.

Many who can make but a poor show to our mortal sight have been used by God to prove what great things He can do through the weak and poor of this world. "I have come from the grave of my best friend," said a minister, who had laid to rest all that was mortal of a poor old pensioner. "H. was only a poor man, but he managed to pay the rent of two pews at our place, and these pews he filled with the young and with strangers. In the week he would go about inviting strangers to come in and hear the Gospel, and then he saw they had a seat and a warm welcome. Many a conversion has been wrought by means of that humble old pensioner." Surely for each and all of us there is a heavenly mission, if only we yearn and pray for a place among those who are fellow-workers with the Lord. A colporteur in an Austrian district applied to the Bible Society for employment. He was short, somewhat deformed, feeble-looking, and the work needs health and vigour, so the agent was inclined to think him unsuitable; but he pleaded to be tried for a month, and the arrangement was made. "A Bible brought light to my father and mother," he said; "it was the treasure of our home, and we hid it so securely that the authorities could never find it, though, when my parents no longer went to mass, they suspected we possessed a Bible. They even turned up the garden in their search, but they never succeeded in taking our treasure away. The Bible has done so much for us that I long to spread it far and wide." In a month that colporteur had exceeded the usual rate of sales; his fervour, his devotion were tireless—fitness of soul in him triumphed over unfitness of body. If the parents rejected him, he would read God's Word to the children; in the end, he laid down his life for his brethren, for he persisted in proclaiming Christ to a man sick of an infectious fever, which fastened upon him when the labourer's task was done.

FOR THE STUDY AND THE FIRESIDE.

In view of the fact that the International Sunday-school lessons for this year are taken from the third Gospel, the issue by Messrs. Nisbet of the second and third volumes of the "Biblical Illustrator" on St. Luke is specially interesting to teachers. Conductors of Bible-classes who follow the International Series will find these volumes full of notes particularly suggestive to them. The thoroughness with which the work is done may be estimated by the fact that no fewer than eighty-eight pages are devoted to illustrative references to the parable of the prodigal son, although the pages are by no means small ones. Preachers who do not already know this series should make a point of procuring the three volumes on St. Luke's Gospel. Dr. Pentecost, too, has been writing on St. Luke, specially on the chapters selected for the International lessons, and teachers may well find in some of his notes help on points of detail, which it is, of course, impossible for us to give in our "Scripture Lessons." Dr. Pentecost's volume is published by Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton, who also send us the annual volume of "The Mother's Friend," admirably edited by that devoted friend of all mothers, Mrs. G. S. Reany. To "Miss Meredith," one of two stories from the same publishers, a pathetic interest is given by the death of the author, Miss Amy Levy, between the writing and the publication of the book. The story is a pretty one, attractive principally in the new setting it gives to a favourite turn of plot, but exhibiting within small compass some very clever character-studies. Its companion volume is "A Snow Flower," by Hester Day, in which the old landlady and the younger of her two girl-lodgers are wonderfully typical characters, the one of matured experience and the other of girlish impulsiveness. Of all explorations the most interesting to the Christian and Bible student must, of course, be that of the land whose soil was trodden by our Lord. Most heartily, then, do we welcome Major Conder's valuable work on Palestine which has just been published by Messrs. G. Philip and Son, as one of a series dealing with "The World's Great Explorers and Explorations." Major Conder's graphic account of the methods adopted by the survey party of which he was leader, and of the results achieved, will be read with great interest by all lovers of the Bible stories. What Major Conder says of his own experience as an explorer is true, though of course only in a smaller degree, for all who carefully follow him in his description of his work and its results. "There is hardly an historic chapter," he says, speaking of the relation between exploration and the study of the Bible, "which I was not able to read with the scene of the events recorded before my eyes; there is not a poetic line in the Old Testament which is not more vividly brought home by a memory of Eastern scenery and life." As a prize or present to an elder Sunday-scholar this work would be most useful. How great the need for, and how wide the scope of, the charitable institutions and agencies of the Metropolis, may be gathered, even at a glance, from the new edition of the "Charities Register and Digest," which has just been published by Messrs. Longmans and the Charity Organisation Society, whose secretary, Mr. C. S. Loch, supplies a valuable introduction to the work. By far the most complete and thoroughly classified work of the kind that we have seen, this is a volume that should find a place in the library of every minister and Christian worker in London.

"THE DEADLIEST HERESY."

The Rev. Mark Guy Pearse said once that the deadliest heresy is to be unloving. If the boys and girls of the present day grow up heretics in this unkindly sense, it will not be the fault of the many gentle agencies that are circling their young lives with blessing. Surely never did Christian solicitude hearken more earnestly to the cry of the children! Hearts cannot be content that little scholars should lack food and clothes, and that the lambs, on whose young lives rests the "celestial benison," should be oppressed by cares and sorrows that thoughtful sympathy can uplift. We would remind our readers of the Marylebone "Old Clo'" Fund, which helps so many of the poorest of our school children. Every application for garments has to be vouched for as deserving by a teacher, and the committee represents both Board and voluntary schools. The Hon. Sec. of this society, Mr. George Macdonald, 50, Arundel Square, N., informs us that many readers of THE QUIVER have sent parcels, but these could not be individually acknowledged, as addresses were omitted. "Might I ask you," he writes, "to thank them through your columns?" Old clothes and new contributions are still urgently required, and we shall procure more room in our store-cupboards, more warmth within our souls, and more smiles upon little faces, if we turn out the disused garments of our household in favour of the "Old Clo'" committee. The Children's Industrial and Floricultural Society sets hands, and brains, and hearts to work in various helpful ways. The president is F. W. Isaacson, Esq., M.P., and particulars may be obtained at 71, Grosvenor Street, Oxford Street, E. Prizes are given from time to time for fretwork, sewing, cookery, maps, models, dolls, etc., and the culture of flowers is specially encouraged. Several bulbs are given to the children, with suitable instructions, and those who raise the best plants are rewarded. The workers give their services from a desire to benefit the young and to brighten their lives. Who shall judge of the influences in poor and struggling homes of spring's sweet blossoms—shining crocuses or hyacinths, or lovely "venturous snowdrops?"

"CHILDREN OF THE LIGHT."

Many of our readers went last summer, no doubt, over some of the wonderful lighthouses that are the pride of their keepers, the hope of those voyaging across the waters, and the salvation of countless lives. What thought and ingenuity have been spent upon the lamps and prisms and machinery, and how clear and careful are the instructions: "Light the lamps every evening at sunset, and keep them constantly burning, bright and clear, till sunrising." So over the darkness of the sea there comes faithfully, regularly, the flashing light, without which so many would make mistakes and be lost and destroyed. We heard of a dear young Christian who, when tenderly asked if she loved Jesus, was moved to tears, for she said in her heart, "What a dim light mine must be if others are not sure that I love Jesus!" The Master's disciples are children of light, walking in eternal sunshine, reflecting the brightness of His face; but they can only mirror His brightness and send it gleaming out to the perplexed and wandering, as their lamps are constantly relit by means of prayer. "Let your light shine" is His abiding word to the humblest soul wherein His own light is kindled. A poor despondent man once said, "I have no more influence than a farthing rushlight," but he was aptly reminded that a farthing rushlight is by no means without influence; badly used, it can set a house on fire, or burn down a haystack—rightly used, it can be helpful in many a needful home-ministry, and it can enable human vision to read a chapter in God's Word.

"ANCIENT CHURCH IRONWORK."

The paper on this subject which we gave on page 104 of our December number did not profess to exhaust the list of examples. To do that would manifestly be impossible in the space at our disposal. There is little room for wonder, then, that some very interesting specimens of church ironwork escaped notice. We are enabled, thanks to the kindness of the Rev. E. Wrenford, to give an illustration this month of one of the most interesting of these omitted examples—the south porch of Sempringham Abbey Church, Lincolnshire. The porch itself is a wonderful instance of well-preserved Norman work, valuable on that account alone, and built at least eight hundred years ago. The old door within the porch is covered with scrolls of ironwork, said to be of Danish origin. The wonderful preservation of porch and door is no doubt due to the protection afforded by a chamber over the porch, which has now been removed. The historical associations of this curious old fen-country church, into which we cannot now enter, are well worth studying.

SOUTH PORCH, SEMPRINGHAM ABBEY, LINCOLNSHIRE.

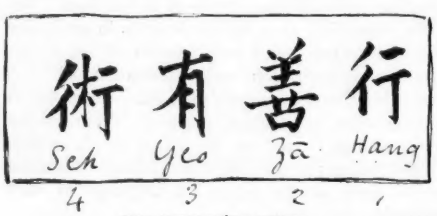
THE DOCTRINE OF THE INCARNATION.



Canon Bright's recent volume of sermons, published under the collective title of "The Incarnation as a Motive Power" (Rivingtons), will be sure to find many appreciative readers. The combined force and grace of style of which Dr. Bright is so thoroughly master, together with that accuracy of definition which leaves no room for mistake as to the Canon's meaning and views, are fully exemplified in this little volume. It is quite possible that many of our readers will be unable, like ourselves, to subscribe to everything contained in this book; but at the same time they will be heartily in sympathy with the general spirit and purpose of these discourses, in exposition and illustration of that great Christian doctrine which in the present day is being assailed in various quarters. We therefore thank Canon Bright for his latest work, which, without being polemical in tone, enforces this great central truth of the Gospel in language at once convincing and devotional.

"THE SWORD OF THE SPIRIT."

Many years ago, when "affairs of honour" were the fashion, a faithful preacher of the Gospel was visited once by a stranger who handed him a challenge to a duel. The cause of offence was stated to be the fact that the minister had, in the pulpit, attacked and denounced the character of the man who thus challenged him to mortal combat. Perhaps the visitor experienced some surprise when the challenge was accepted; at any rate, both principal and second must have felt that to gain the advantage over one so unaccustomed to arms would not be difficult. "We leave to you the choice of the weapons," said the visitor, politely. "I shall fight with the sword," was the minister's reply; and arrangements were made accordingly. At the appointed time and place the principals met, one armed with a veritable sword, the other with his Bible. "Friend," said he to his opponent, "I never heard of you before a stranger waited on me to demand satisfaction on your behalf. If I have wronged you, I am heartily sorry; but in what way can I have given you offence?"—"You preached a sermon the other evening," was the answer, "describing my character in every particular; you attacked me personally in public, and you had no right to do so." The minister then remembered he had been trying to describe the state of the transgressor, the soul without God and following the ways of evil. "I only preached what I find in God's Word," he told his opponent, and, turning to his Bible, he read aloud text after text concerning the condition of the sinner and those who oppose themselves to God. These passages personally convicted the heart that a little while since had so hotly resented Scriptural truth. This singular interview was the means that led to that soul's salvation, and thus did the sword of the Spirit win another glorious conflict, and triumph over passion, iniquity, and pride.

A PRESENT FROM NAN-KING.

The Viceroy of Nan-King, Tseng-kuo-chüan, uncle to the well-known Marquis Tseng, has lately addressed a letter of cordial gratitude to the Shanghai Famine Relief Committee for their efforts on behalf of his sorely distressed countrymen. He has also presented to each member of the Committee a wall-tablet, bearing a complimentary inscription. There is one in my view as I write, a board forty-five by eighteen inches, richly faced with gilding, from which stand out very handsomely four Chinese characters which express, "Full of schemes of benevolence." At first sight this may seem an insignificant token of appreciation; but in consideration of the long-standing anti-foreign prejudices of the Chinese, we hail the Viceroy's action with sincere satisfaction. Its importance is, we think, illustrated by the remonstrances addressed to him by co-officials concerning a deed of "such unprecedented condescension."

THE VICEROY'S TABLET.

A PROTESTANT ORPHANAGE AT FLORENCE.

This institution exists at 2, Via del Gignolo, fuori Porta alle Croce, to provide a refuge for orphans of Protestant Italians, and to educate on moderate terms the daughters of colporteurs and missionaries. Some of the girls are fitted for domestic service, while others are teaching in schools and families, thus doubtless influencing others by their own Scriptural training. The Home was originally founded by Signor Ferretti, who contrasted the position of women in England with that of the women of his native country, and longed to see Italian girls brought up under improved and enlightened conditions. American friends have greatly helped the enterprise, which depends on the gifts of friends and the support of individual pupils by sympathisers. Many helped by this institution are the children of pastors who have given their all to Christ's service, amid difficulties and obstacles. "The children of such parents," say the Committee, "are in a peculiar manner entitled to the help and sympathy of all Protestant Christians." Travellers through the beauties of smiling Italy would be interested to inspect the Orphanage, which may be visited any week-day; applications for admission are numerous, but the means are very limited, and increased contributions would encourage the Executive Committee to widen their influence. The Secretary of the Home in England is Miss Reynett, 3, Cranley Place, Onslow Square.

AN OLD BOOK FOR YOUNG READERS, AND NEW BOOKS FOR OLDER READERS.

One of the most interesting of recently published books, at least from an historical point of view, is Mr. Elliot Stock's fac-simile reprint of the—as it was supposed—lost first edition of John Bunyan's "Book for Boys and Girls; or, Country Rhymes for Children." But we confess that, from any other point of view, there seems little enough justification for the republication of these "verses" in an age more critical than Bunyan's own, but with a greater and more general respect for his writings. If the republication was to take place, then nothing could be better than this reproduction of the very paper, type, and binding of the original edition; but we very much doubt the wisdom of thus resuscitating a work so far inferior in value to the great dreamer's other writings. From the allegorical verses by Bunyan to the second volume of Mr. Spurgeon's "Salt Cellars" (Passmore and Alabaster) is an easy transition. This concludes the collection of "proverbs, together with homely notes thereon," to which we made reference when the first volume was published. Now that the work is completed, we can even more heartily commend it to all public speakers and writers. Another work by Mr. Spurgeon is before us in "Around the Wicket-Gate" (same publishers). Its sub-title admirably describes the little volume as "Friendly Talks with Seekers concerning Faith in the Lord Jesus Christ," and there is little need for us to say more concerning it than that it is written in the earnest, homely style that ever characterises Mr. Spurgeon's writings. All who remember Professor Blaikie's papers in our own pages, entitled, "In Perils Oft," know something of the trials and the heroism of the pioneer missionaries in the South Seas, among whom John Williams stands foremost as the "martyr of Erromanga." Now they may learn something more of the strong interest that all Christians must feel in the biography of this individual worker from the biography by the Rev. J. J. Ellis, just issued under the title, "John Williams, the Martyr Missionary of Polynesia" (S. W. Partridge and Co.), in which the author has well brought out the telling points in this most striking life. The little volume before us entitled "Horatius Bonar, D.D. : a Memorial" (J. Nisbet and Co.), is obviously more a memorial of the tributes of friends at the time of his death, than actually a "memorial" in the ordinary acceptance of the word, of the great hymn-writer whose loss all mourn. Still, it is not without value, especially to those who knew him, or who heard any one of the discourses printed in the book, which is accompanied, we must not forget to note, by an excellent portrait of the author of "I heard the voice of Jesus say." "The Hammer" (Seeley and Co.) is the title of a story of the Maccabean times, by Professor Alfred Church and Mr. Richmond Seeley, of which, as we gather from the preface, the outline of the tale is Mr. Seeley's, while the filling out is the work of Professor Church. How this story is told, no reader of "To the Lions" needs informing. The period illustrated by this tale is one comparatively unknown to the general reader, but perhaps Professor Church's work may serve the purpose not only of interesting all his readers, but also of stimulating the zeal of some to fresh study of this little-known time. "Under Salisbury Spire" (same publishers) is a pretty story by Mrs. Marshall, of the time of George Herbert, in which the poet himself plays no inconsiderable part. "Lion-Hearted," which is also issued by Messrs. Seeley, is the story of Bishop Hannington's Life, specially re-written for boys and girls, by the Rev. E. C. Dawson. All three of these works of Messrs. Seeley's are admirably adapted from their get-up for popular use in a Sunday-school or similar library.

"He sold her a Testament"—p 318.

"THAT TESTAMENT DID IT ALL!"

One who labours in connection with the Metropolitan Tabernacle Colportage Association tells that a man in Poole asked him if he remembered, six years ago, asking the driver of a ginger-beer van for a lift? "I drove that van," he said, "and you gave me a New Testament. I was a drunkard and swearer. In the stable that night I read the Testament a little, and sometimes I resolved to throw it away, but I could not destroy it. I kept on reading, and at last I cried to God for mercy. Now I have belonged to a Christian society five years, and have been made the means of conversion of others. I am in a good position; my wife is happy; my home is comfortable. That Testament did it all." Unhealthy literature is answerable for much that is evil and deplorable alike in town and country; colportage opposes such literature by that which is pure and wholesome. Bibles and helpful books and magazines are widely sold, and tracts are distributed; also, as opportunities occur, the colporteurs visit the sick, and hold religious services. Those who work this association, of which Mr. Spurgeon is president, describe the operations as being wholly unsectarian, "doing work for the friends of a full and free Gospel anywhere and everywhere." About eighty colporteurs are now at work, with much blessing resting on their labours. In this corner of the vineyard, however, as in all others, there is yet room for more. We note that in one year more than 13,000 copies of THE QUIVER were distributed by means of these visitors from door to door. A worker who presides at a stall near a London station tells of a man who came and stood beside him offering a publication for sale, and calling out, "Salvation for the body! never mind the soul; we know nothing about that!" but the colporteur spoke of his Testaments as telling of salvation both for soul and body, and he sold out all he had. "What music have you got there?" asked a lady who mistook a colporteur for a travelling player. He sold her a Testament, telling her that if she read and believed what he brought, she would have "music in her heart."

A MARKET MINISTRY.

A speaker, pleading for the needy and neglected, told of a small child whose face was pressed to the window one dull, rainy day, and who suddenly requested his mother to empty his money-box, and let him have the contents, as he wanted to purchase umbrellas for "the people that go by's." He could not watch with indifference their cold, dripping, uncared-for state. "There spoke the God within the child," said she who told the incident, and it is in proportion as our hearts care about "the people who go by's," that the spirit of our Master is revealed within us. He who has love towards God will have love for his brothers likewise. Market employés are not always the most attractive, gentle, prepossessing people to deal with, but great and glorious results have followed the work of the Christian Mission in Billingsgate, which has now extended its labours of love by a new building, comprising a coffee tavern, hall for services, library and reading-room. About ten thousand people assemble at the market daily, and some of these would be prevented by the hours of business from sharing in the benefits of similar missions. It is wise and right that Billingsgate should have a Christian mission of its own, caring not only for the employés, but for poor waifs and loiterers and hangers-on. By advice and succour, food and shelter, Christian love and Gospel invitations, our friends at Billingsgate are carrying on prayerful struggles against the unbelief of which nowadays some think and speak so lightly, but which brought tears of unspeakable compassion into the eyes of our Divine Redeemer.

THE BILLINGSGATE MISSION.

"BE YE STEDFAST, UNMOVEABLE."

There is too much evil about for any of us to rest upon our oars, or be content with the record of the past. "So-and-so used to be so helpful; he must be a great blessing to the neighbourhood," is a remark to which silence is often the best answer. The helpful worker has grown weary or discouraged in well-doing, and the places of former influence for good know him no more. There may be grand and glorious work for God going on, of which outsiders little dream, but, as a rule, if a heart and life be on the Lord's side, outsiders know it, and they know too when the workers drop away and relax the efforts once so earnest and so brave. We have not to do with a stern and relentless taskmaster, who exacts work from us when really unfit for the strain; we are serving under a Lord of love, and His love constrains us not to desert our post so long as we can help forward His Kingdom of mercy and peace. The Roman sentinel amid the ruins of Pompeii stood at his post, grasping his war-weapon, though the earth shook beneath him, and was found after centuries just where his duty had called him. Shall we lay down our weapons because we do not get on comfortably with certain fellow-workers, because we are not sufficiently appreciated, or because we have "worked enough in the past"? God can win the fight without us, but are we willing to desert our Captain's side?

WHILE THE NIGHTS ARE LONG.

While the nights are long is the time to study the stars, as well as the books which shall guide us in that study. So we welcome just now "Star-Land" (Cassell), in which are reprinted Sir Robert S. Ball's "talks with young people about the wonders of the heavens," so simple that all can understand them, yet so learned that there are few who may not gather something from a perusal of them. "Come, ye Children" (same publishers) is described by its author, the Rev. B. Waugh, as a series of "Heart Stories for the Young." The addresses of which it consists are plain and practical—such as children can easily appreciate—and might well serve, in many ways, as models for teachers. We have received a copy of the second edition of Mr. Gregory Smith's poems collected under the title "Fra Angelico" (Longmans), in which those who do not already know them will meet with some charming verses, notably "To J. K." and "The Good Shepherd." Miss Mason, of the House of Rest at Kilburn, edits a monthly record, called Rest and Reaping, of which she has sent us the bound volume for 1889. It is full of matter which cannot fail to be of interest and assistance to all Christian workers. "How to Study the Bible" is the expressive title of a little volume just issued by Messrs. Nisbet, and consisting of contributions on this most important subject by a number of eminent Christian teachers, among whom we notice the lamented Professor Elmslie. This would be an admirable work to give to a young reader. From the same publishers we have received "Friends and Friendship," by Mrs. Alexander Russell Simpson, a series of very thoughtful and suggestive chapters whose scope is well shown by their title. Another new edition before us is "Consolatio: or, Comfort for the Afflicted" (Rivingtons), a cheaper issue of a helpful and interesting compilation by the late C. E. Kennaway, and provided when it was first issued with a preface by Bishop Wilberforce of Winchester. "Seed, Flower, Fruit," is the title of a series of capital "Sunday Chats with Little Folks," written by that friend of the little ones, Maggie Symington, and published in very attractive form by Messrs. Skeffington. "Little Prince Frisco" (McCorquodale and Co.) is a pleasant little fairy tale, written and illustrated by Mrs. Fred Reynolds, which we wish had reached us a month earlier, in time for mention when our friends were buying Christmas presents for young readers. In "Laugh and Learn" (Blackie and Son) we have a decidedly original method of combining instruction with entertainment for very little readers. Indeed the book, which is by Jennett Humphreys, and is profusely illustrated, is intended even to teach children to read, as well as to provide them with easy steps towards further lessons. We heartily commend it to all parents.

"ALL BRIGHT ABOVE!"

These were the words of one lying in weakness and pain, just before his release, and they may well be our cheer when winter seems to get within as well as without, and the chill winds seem to have swept life's blossoms and foliage away. Depression seizes sometimes upon the child of God, upon the faithful worker; we are not always on the mountain-top, but we can always be sure of this, "It is bright above, all bright above!" What changes the passing year has brought to many, what changes lie hidden in the months to come! But the sunlight of God's love will enfold us, and will be lamp, and star, and glory through every track He has ordained. A Christian worker, in circumstances of loneliness, perplexity, uncertainty, was comforted by a verse a friend happened to repeat in her hearing, and which fixed itself in her memory just at the time she needed the reminder—

> "My bark is wafted to the strand
> By breath Divine,
> And on the helm there rests a hand
> Other than mine."

What entire trust we place in him who steers our course when we are out upon the waters, believing him to be experienced, and knowing just how to get us to our desired haven! Shall we not trust that Hand which guides our life-bark, that Heart which knows the end from the beginning, and which makes no mistakes? Whatever circumstances seem, God is love, and we may calmly trust the present hour and the future to His ever-mindful care. Mark Guy Pearse tells of a man who complained of the pitiless east wind, and who received from an angel the key of all the winds; he felt sure all would go well under his control, but he grew frightened, for the more he considered the more he realised that he knew nothing of earth's wants, and he prayed that God would send His angel to take back the key of the winds. Then the Lord Himself drew near, and put it back against the wound-prints in His own sacred hand. There, too, hung the keys of His servant's life, and He whispered tenderly, "My Kingdom ruleth over all." The vision taught the murmurer how unwise, how unsafe it is to imagine we could choose better than the Master; even the east wind has its work to do—a blessed work—bringing the land into right condition after long-continued rain, sweeping infection, disease, aside by its sharp, keen breath. And the dreamer came to this decision of abiding truth—"Our only safety is, in everything to love and trust and praise."

"THE QUIVER" ORDER OF HONOURABLE SERVICE.

Two additional "distinguished members" have been enrolled since the publication of our last list, and up to December 6th, 1889:—

Name.	Address.	Years in Situation.
Ball, Nancy	Sidcot	66
Peddie, Mary	Perth	51

This Distinguished Members' class, which consists of those servants who have held their present situations not less than fifty years, is the only class of the Order now opened. All communications regarding enrolment must be addressed to the Editor of The Quiver.

We give an engraving from a recent photographic portrait of Nancy Ball, who is now, we think, "Queen" of the Order.

AN ADULT SUNDAY-SCHOOL IN PARIS.

A large audience of both sexes in Manchester, assembled for Bible study, suggested to a Christian worker the thought, "If only we could reproduce this in Paris!" On returning across the Channel he found a class for young women had actually been started, and by degrees the Sunday-school for adults was developed and increased till it grew into several classes, most of which are taught by ladies. About one hundred and twenty scholars are gathered together, studying the Bible where it is so little known, and where the Lord's Day is so little regarded. "Here is the hope of France," truly remarked a visitor who looked in at the earnest groups. These adult classes are connected with the McAll Mission. Amid the gay, bewildering varieties of the fair city of Paris, not a few may like to be made aware of the adult school flourishing in the Salle Rivoli, 104, Rue St. Antoine.

PUNCTUALITY AT WORSHIP.

Many a Sunday-school teacher knows the disturbance and interruption caused to a lesson by the late entrance of scholars, and how difficult it seems to secure once more the attention that has passed from the lesson to the new-comer. "I invariably notice," said a minister once, "that I lose my hold on the congregation when the man who lights the gas comes softly round." There seems an irresistible influence in the furtive steps up the aisle that triumphs over the most carefully prepared discourse. Lighting the gas during service is a necessity that arises but seldom. There is an interruption of a different character which is much more familiar, namely, the creaking sound of the late-comer's boots, the rustling of the apparel of unpunctual representatives of the gentler sex. Sometimes the late-comers decline to content themselves with seats in the rear, and sail up to front pews, the observed of all observers, interrupting devotion to a lamentable degree. It must happen to everyone at times to be legitimately constrained to arrive at the service late. But those detained by duty till after the hour should be careful to enter during singing, and, if possible, to sit at the back: let them not desert God's courts because of enforced unpunctuality. It may bring cheer and encouragement to the preacher's heart to notice their resolute attendance despite obstacles, and will afford suggestive thoughts to others. The Lord of All knows those of His worshippers who cannot arrive early, and He likewise knows those who can. A little forethought and management might often prevent the habit of "running the gauntlet" of a congregation engaged in worship. Apart from the selfishness connected with habitual unpunctuality, there is the solemn thought that it is irreverent to Him in whose name we meet. A considerate reply was given by a worthy woman who was asked how it was she could always manage to be early in her place at the service. "It is part of my religion," she said, "not to disturb the religion of others."

THE BOYHOOD OF ST. PAUL.

BY THE REV. J. TELFORD, B.A.

TARSUS (AS IT IS NOW).

ABOUT twenty years after the Crucifixion of our Lord, the name of a great preacher began to be heard in the cities of that pagan world in which he lived. His path was beset with perils and privations, which made his life a scene of daily martyrdom. Old customs, venerable superstitions, vested interests, all the pride and prejudice of the human heart, banded their resources to bar the progress of this fearless soldier of the Cross, who seemed as though he would never rest till he had won the world for his Master.

The story of St. Paul's missionary labours is one of the most precious possessions of the Church of Christ. A comrade, who shared some of his joys and sorrows, has described not a few of its most striking incidents in the Acts of the Apostles; but the busy worker himself found time, in the heat of the battle or the quiet of the prison-house, to send words of cheer or words of counsel to soldiers whom he had enlisted in the glorious cause. Sharers of his toil and trouble, they became also sharers of his hopes when that trumpet voice roused them for the good fight of faith.

Every page in St. Paul's life is laden with interest. We seem to be at school again, learning how to bear our crosses, learning how to witness for Christ, learning how to win the careless and the opposer for our Master. Each incident seems to echo his own words—"Be ye therefore imitators of me, as I also am of Christ." But no page of his biography is more suggestive than that which tells of the boyhood at Tarsus.

Here also "the child is father of the man." Influences surround us in our early days which put their stamp on all following years. We carry with us to the grave the impressions made on us in the cradle. Parents, teachers, companions are all at work. What suggestion, what warning, there is in such a thought! There is indeed, as John Ruskin says, no excuse for a thoughtless youth. The death-bed is the only place where a man may rightly be thoughtless. "No thinking should ever be left to be done there." In view of such possibilities, we may well pray that God would make the influences around us holy, and help us to escape those which would leave a taint on character.

What lessons, too, for those who are parents and teachers! Alexander the Great had a tutor, or undergovernor, who fanned his boyish passion for glory by stories from the "Iliad." The blood of Achilles was said to flow in the veins of Alexander, and Lysimachus seized on this tradition to give weight to those memorable lessons in ambition which soon bore life-long fruit in the boy, who became the conqueror of the world. Be careful what you do. Bad companions may perhaps be pleasant, but they will lower your standard of duty, and may spoil your life. Have good friends, good books—for books are sometimes the most pleasant, most helpful friends. Then, with God's grace, you will have a blessing as long as you live.

I.—THE HOME OF ST. PAUL.

"But Paul said, I am a Jew of Tarsus, in Cilicia, a citizen of no mean city; and, I beseech thee, give me leave to speak unto the people."—ACTS xxi. 39.

FEW things help us so much to understand the early life of the world's great workers as a picture of their homes. St. Paul never ceased to be proud of Tarsus. He was not like some villager who has never wandered more than a few miles from the humble cottage where he was born. Such a one may think that spot more important than any other, because he has not seen the great world which lies beyond the circle of his native hills. But when St. Paul spoke of Tarsus as "no mean city," he was a traveller whose feet had trodden the streets of the world's proudest centres of trade and culture. He had not yet seen Rome, but Antioch was familiar ground; Ephesus had been the centre of the three most memorable and fruitful years of his itinerancy; Corinth, where the glories of Greek civilisation still lingered in a kind of Martinmas summer, had also been his head-quarters in his European mission. Few men of his time knew the great cities of the East and West so intimately as did St. Paul. Yet here in Jerusalem, the great centre of the religious life of his nation, he speaks of Tarsus as "no mean city."

He did not exaggerate its importance. It bore the proud name of metropolis. It was a university town, more illustrious for philosophy and general education than even Athens or Alexandria. The city was associated with some of the most stirring scenes of history. Four hundred years before St. Paul was born in Tarsus, Cyrus reached the city on his way to attack his brother, the King of Persia. The hereditary prince of the province furnished him with money and troops for the disastrous expedition which ended in the death of Cyrus and the retreat of the Ten Thousand.

Seventy years later Alexander the Great entered Tarsus. Heated with a rapid march across the plains of Cilicia, he bathed in the cold waters of its river Cydnus. The fever which ensued nearly cost him his life. His physician prepared a remedy, but as Alexander was about to drink it he received a letter which asserted that the doctor had been bribed by the Persian king to poison him. The young king, with perfect trust in his well-tried servant, handed him the letter whilst he drank the medicine. He lingered awhile at Tarsus till his strength was restored, then he set out again on his career of conquest.

The air of Tarsus was laden with memories such as these; but another soldiers' story was still fresh in the minds of the old men of Tarsus. Fifty years before St. Paul's birth, Mark Antony, the Roman general, arrived in the city. He had summoned Cleopatra to join him there. The Egyptian Queen came, nothing loath. The galley which bore her up the Cydnus was the most gorgeous that had ever floated on its waters. Its sails were purple, its oars of burnished silver, its raised poop shone with gold. There, on a splendid couch, with spangled canopy, lay the queen, attired as Venus. Around her were troops of waiting ladies. Seductive music and clouds of sweet incense completed the allurements of the scene. All Tarsus flocked to gaze and wonder. Mark Antony himself followed. From that day he was her willing slave. His former greatness was soon buried in sensual sloth: the world was lost to gratify unholy passion.

St. Paul was too profound a student of history and character to overlook such incidents as these. His boyhood must have caught a halo of romance from these memorable pages of local history. There is no doubt that the boy loved his city. Nor can his name ever have been without interest to his fellow-citizens. With what enthusiasm the members of the Synagogue must have hailed his fierce zeal for the religion of their fathers; with what deep joy in later days the Christians of the city must have thanked God for his labours before Barnabas appeared to introduce him to the wider field of service at Antioch!

St. Paul's boyhood, then, was spent in a wealthy, far-famed, cultured city, whose name was woven into the web of many a thrilling story, in whose streets walked scholars whom its fame had drawn from far and wide across the blue waters of the Great Sea. The Apostle of Jesus Christ never forgot the claims of Tarsus upon him. He who rejoiced to count himself debtor both to the Greeks and the barbarians had a warm place in his heart for his native city. His first real mission work was done there. After his flight from Damascus and from Jerusalem, he found himself free to visit his home at Tarsus. It was impossible for such a man to be idle. The "Odyssey of Woes" which is given in the eleventh chapter of 2 Corinthians has many stories of hair-breadth escapes, of privation and of suffering, which seem to belong to these days in Tarsus. Readers of St. Chrysostom may derive not a few illustrations of St. Paul's mission work in and around his native city from the narrative of the great Archbishop's exile in Cilicia. More than three hundred and fifty years after the Apostle set out with Barnabas for Antioch, that wonderful preacher, John of the Golden Mouth, whose marvellous sermons had swayed all hearts in Antioch and Constantinople, wandered among the mountains north of Tarsus. Read the story of his midnight wanderings, when the bearers extinguished their torches lest the bandits who infested the region should pounce upon them; remember how, worn out with pain and weariness, they stumbled in the darkness over the rough rocks; think of the little preacher broken down with the strain of his good fight against empress and courtiers, as he lay shivering on his bed, with the great pile of blankets heaped upon him to save him from the bitter cold of the Cilician hills. Then, with these touching incidents fresh in your mind, read again the story of a greater even than Chrysostom, who climbed those same Cilician hills, that he might tell the story of Jesus to the people of his own province. "In journeyings often, in perils of rivers, in perils of robbers, in perils from my countrymen, in perils from the Gentiles, in perils in the city, in perils in the wilderness, in perils on the sea, in perils among false brethren; in labour and travail, in watchings often, in hunger and thirst, in fastings often, in cold and nakedness." *

* 2 Corinthians xi. 26, 27.

II.—THE ROMAN CITIZENSHIP.

"And the chief captain came, and said unto him, Tell me, art thou a Roman? And he said, Yea. And the chief captain answered, With a great sum obtained I this citizenship. And Paul said, But I am a Roman born."—ACTS xxii. 27, 28.

BUT St. Paul's boyhood was not merely coloured by the associations of his native city. A mightier influence than that of Tarsus surrounded the Jewish lad from the cradle to the grave. Who can tell how much the world and the Church owe to the fact that the future Apostle was a Roman citizen? In his native place and in Jerusalem he was known as Saul, but as he passed out into the stirring scenes of missionary life, his other name, Paul, which had probably belonged to him all his life as a citizen of Rome, became more prominent. That was the name by which he was soon known throughout the Gentile world.

It is not easy to tell what an honour that birthright was to Paul. He saw the great officers of Rome walk the streets of Tarsus; he listened to the story of victories won by her soldiers in all the earth. He too was a Roman. Wherever he went that proud city would cast her mantle about him to protect from injury and wrong. Yet, whatever the boy may have dreamt of the future, how little he could foresee what a priceless boon his Roman citizenship would prove itself. Great indeed was the protection and honour it gained for him in later days. It made the magistrates of Philippi come in terror to beseech the prisoner to leave his prison; it saved him from the scourging at Jerusalem, and won him the ear of the chief captain; it snatched him from the hands of unjust governors at Cæsarea; it won him a hearing before the Emperor himself in Rome. "My bonds," he wrote to his friends at Philippi, "became manifest in Christ throughout the whole Prætorian guard, and to all the rest." Still later, he summed up the providential purpose which had shaped all his course at Rome: "That through me the message might be fully proclaimed, and that all the Gentiles might hear."

Nor must we forget those exquisite passages of the letter to the Philippians, in which the Apostle, who was himself a Roman citizen, wrote to those who counted that privilege the crowning glory of their city: "Our citizenship is in heaven"; and again, "Only let your course of life as citizens be as it becometh the Gospel of Christ." Thus his Roman citizenship, which coloured St. Paul's life, also suggested some of the happiest thoughts of his Epistles. Think of the boy growing up in Tarsus with that proud honour. Little did he know in what sorrows it was to comfort him, what strength it was to lend him for his life-work. One may well linger over this phase of the boyhood. Prize well every privilege; who can tell how much his advantages of culture or birthright may be the means of helping on the cause of truth and of God on earth?

III.—A HEBREW OF THE HEBREWS.

"If any other man thinketh to have confidence in the flesh, I yet more; circumcised the eighth day, of the stock of Israel, of the tribe of Benjamin, a Hebrew of Hebrews; as touching the law, a Pharisee; as touching zeal, persecuting the church; as touching the righteousness which is in the law, found blameless."—PHILIPPIANS iii. 4—6.

DEARER far than all else to St. Paul, even in his boyhood, was the fact that he belonged to the chosen people of God. The innermost circle of privilege was his by right. Trained in a home like his, he soon learned to prize every distinction of his race. There is a glow of the old self-satisfaction lingering in the particulars piled together in this Epistle. One after another he had nailed them to the Cross. His early consecration, his illustrious descent, his tribal history, his family religion, his own flaming zeal—all are here, but all are crucified with Christ.

In the young Benjamite we find all the tribal characteristics. "Benjamin shall ravin as a wolf; in the morning he shall devour the prey, and at night he shall divide the spoil." So Jacob summed up the spirit of the tribe in his dying prophecy: that is a type of Saul the persecutor. Moses must give us the epitome of his life as Paul the Apostle: "The beloved of the Lord shall dwell in safety by him; and the Lord shall cover him all day long, and he shall dwell between His shoulders."

How fragrant these tribal memories were is seen from the fact that he bore the name of the first king of Israel—the greatest man, till the second Saul was born at Tarsus, of all the tribe of Benjamin. The infant child was on the eighth day dedicated to the service of God in the synagogue of Tarsus. Nor is it less noticeable that he grew up in a circle where no hostile influence was allowed to penetrate. He was a Hebrew of the Hebrews.

Yet more: his father was a Pharisee. It is no exaggeration to say that Pharisaism coloured St. Paul's life from its earliest hour right on to the end. The Pharisees of the provincial towns probably escaped those influences which smothered almost all better feeling in the Pharisees of Jerusalem. The idea of the party was in itself a noble one. They were Jewish patriots, who awaited the coming of their Messiah in a fever of desire. They were not blind to the evils which threatened to eat out all noble aspirations from the national character. It seemed as though everything might be lost before His Kingdom came. We speak with bated breath of the perils which scepticism brings. Sometimes we almost regard them as peculiar to our own age. But there were perils as great in the boyhood of St. Paul. Some of the leading spirits of Judaism—priests and high-priests of the very Temple—sapped the foundation of all worship, and denied the authority of the Word of God by their doctrine that there was "no resurrection, neither angel nor Spirit." Great was the sin of the Pharisee, greater far was the sin of the Sadducee.

The father of St. Paul was a Pharisee. He took care that when his boy left home to finish his education in the Holy City he should enter the school of the noblest Pharisee of the day, Gamaliel. The result may be seen in the whole after-course of St. Paul. The flaming zeal of the persecutor showed that he had caught an unbounded enthusiasm for his race. He bore with him into the service of Christ the same ardour. In the dispute between dead scepticism and fiery zeal he was always ready to take his old side—a champion of the hopes to which the Pharisee clung: "Men and brethren, I am a Pharisee, a son of Pharisees: touching the hope and resurrection of the dead, I am called in question." In this sense St. Paul was true to his party to the end. A Pharisee, a persecuting Pharisee, then a Christian Pharisee, always and to the last a true, God-fearing Pharisee.

Such influences already moulded his character even as a boy at Tarsus. Whoever forsook the Synagogue, his father was there. He often spoke to his little son of the nation's hopes, of the bright dawn that should soon come with the Messiah's Advent. Thus reverence for God, fidelity to His service, the joys of a good conscience—all these were Saul's as a boy at Tarsus.

His own picture of Timothy's Bible studies in childhood was drawn from memory of days in his own home. To him then, and always, it was the glory of the Jews that to them "were committed the oracles of God." Every page revealed the love which God bore his race. Think of that boy bending over the Book of God. He saw Jacob's head lying on his stony pillow whilst his strange dream brought heaven so near in his loneliness. For a Sadducee such a dream meant nothing. For the little Pharisee it was laden with truths as to the nearness of God, and the grace which made him share Jacob's wanderings. The angels were ministering spirits sent forth on messages of love. Every page of his Old Testament opened Saul's eyes to the infinite mercy of our Father in heaven.

Which of us loves his Bible as that boy of Tarsus loved his? Your Bible and mine is richer far than the book he prized so well. It tells of Jesus, who lived and died for us: of St. Paul and all the Apostles, who spread the fame of Jesus throughout the earth. Let us prize and love that precious Book which is able to make us wise unto salvation.

IV.—TAUGHT A TRADE.

"For by their trade they were tentmakers."—ACTS xviii. 3.
"Ye yourselves know, that these hands ministered unto my necessities, and to them that were with me."—ACTS xx. 34.

OUR picture of the boyhood will be complete if we remember that St. Paul was taught a trade. There is little doubt that his father's position was one of comfort, but it was a national custom that every boy should be taught some trade on which he might fall back if other resources failed. St. Paul's master, Gamaliel, said, "He that hath a trade in his hand, to what is he like? He is like a garden that is fenced." Not to teach your boy a trade was considered almost like teaching him to be a thief.

Life has many ups and downs. The boy at Tarsus little thought, whilst he learned to weave the goat's hair for which his province was noted, into tent-cloth for the shepherds and travellers of the East, what independence, what comfort, his homely art would bring. In Corinth it won him that precious friendship with Aquila and Priscilla; at Ephesus and Thessalonica it made his life a pattern of diligence, and helped him to preserve that manly independence which all generations have learnt to admire. Nor was this all: the Apostle's skill gave bread to those companions who, like himself, had suffered the loss of all things.

Not least precious is this last fact of the boyhood. Diligence in early life will make you self-reliant. You will know that if other props are removed your own hands can minister to your necessities.

This, then, is the picture of St. Paul's boyhood at Tarsus. There he grew up in the love of God and the love of man. The foundations of that noble character which all ages reverence were laid there in the home, the Synagogue, the school. In after years he fought against the new religion, the fiercest of its foes, breathing out threatenings and slaughter. A few more years, and he was fighting for Christianity with the same fiery zeal. Saul the persecutor and Paul the Apostle: what a contrast is there! yet both are one in love of God, in undying enthusiasm for the Jewish race, and in whole-souled consecration to religion. The boy learned as a boy that he had a work to do for God, and that he must do it with all his heart. He lived in God's world, he enjoyed God's love, he had been dedicated as a child to God's service, he had been trained for his life-work by ten thousand ministries. Therefore he laid all his rare gifts on the altar. The question which broke from his lips on the way to Damascus was the keynote, the watchword of his whole course: "Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?"

You too have many gifts, and God wants them all. In the fight against sin you must be His soldier; in the saving of the world you must be His witness. Set your heart on serving Him. Speak for Jesus, and live for Him. Let no appeal for help in God's service be made in vain. What sacrifice St. Paul made to serve that new-found Master! what infinite recompense was his! "Howbeit, what things were gain to me, these have I counted loss for Christ." A little later, and he is saying, "Henceforth there is laid up for me the crown of righteousness." If St. Paul's Master be ours, St. Paul's blessedness will not be denied us, for the crown is for "all them also that love His appearing."

WORTHY TO BE LOVED.

CHAPTER XVI.

THE DALRYMPLE CASE.

"Every crime
Has, in the moment of its preparation,
Its own avenging angel."—COLERIDGE.

"I WAS the judge who tried him," said Lord Blackstone, and Hilda's face flushed and her eyes glittered.

"You!" she exclaimed. "Oh, Lord Blackstone, do tell us about it, please! What was it he did, and how was it found out?"

The old peer smiled. He was as willing as any other old man to relate his experiences, and there was something decidedly flattering in the way Miss Jackson hung upon his words. The two officers were not interested; they moved away to the piano, where Lady Rosalie and Miss Hallam had just begun a duet, while Avice stood by them and turned the pages of the music. Very stately and beautiful Miss Meredith looked, with the rosy light falling softly on the fair, pale cheek, and tinting the rounded ivory of the hand and arm; but as Hilda looked at her she smiled a faint bitter smile. Would she look as proud, Miss Jackson wondered, if she knew the subject of her conversation with Lord Blackstone, if she knew of whom they were really speaking?

"It was a sad case," he was saying now, "and I remember it as if it was yesterday. The court was crammed, for the people concerned were all pretty well known, and a great deal of interest was felt. There was quite a sensation when the prisoner was brought in—such a fine, handsome fellow he was, and he looked round the court and pleaded 'Not guilty!' in a way that might have made anyone think he really wasn't."

"And was he?"

"Unfortunately, there couldn't be any doubt. He looked the ideal of a soldier and a gentleman, but a man never knows what he will do till he is tempted. Drink and debt are the two great feeders of our law-courts and our gaols, and whether Dalrymple drank or not, he was proved to be over head and ears in debt. He had made a runaway match a few years before with the daughter of a great London banker——"

"Not Fazackerley?" ejaculated Hilda.

"Yes—but how did you know?"

"I didn't know. It was only a lucky guess," she stammered. "Go on, please! It is as good as a story, only so much more interesting. He had run away, you said? It's getting quite romantic!"

"I'm afraid the romance was over, and the inevitable prose had come. Old Fazackerley had disinherited his daughter, and as Dalrymple had only his pay, they could not have been well off. Any way, he got into debt, and forged the endorsement of a bill."

"What is that?" Hilda asked, with her most youthful air.

"Well, it was shown that Dalrymple had been to money-lenders to try and raise five hundred pounds on his own acceptance, and the men had refused. Dalrymple then promised to get a better name than his own, and came back the next day with the endorsement of a well-known man of property. With this he got the money, but when the bill became due he could not meet it, and the endorsement turned out to be a forgery. Dalrymple then pretended that he had raised the money not for himself, but for his brother-in-law, who, he said, had procured the endorsement. But the brother swore that he had never seen the bill before, and knew nothing whatever of the transaction. He was quite a lad, an innocent, blue-eyed boy, who was at college still, and it seemed to me that the trying to lay the blame on him was the worst part of the affair."

"What was the brother's name?"

"It was a brother-in-law, Frank Fazackerley, the banker's youngest son. There was a peculiar baseness in putting it on to him, as he was Mrs. Dalrymple's favourite brother, and the only member of her family who would have anything to say to her husband."

"I wonder what the wife thought?"

"Poor thing, I never heard of her again. Our courts are like the Greek stage: the real tragedies are enacted out of sight. The true sufferers are not the guilty sinners who stand in the dock; they are the mothers who bore them, the wives whose hearts break for them, the children whose lives are shadowed by their shame."

Miss Jackson did not answer. She was thinking too deeply to be able to attend to the old man's moralisings.

"Do you know what his Christian name was?" she asked earnestly.

"His Christian name? Why, yes," said the old lord, his voice softening curiously. "It is not a thing one often remembers, but I do in this case, as it happens. I had just lost a dear little son of mine, and had come back from his funeral only the day before. It gave me quite a shock, I remember, to find that the name of the first prisoner I had to try was the same as my poor little boy's."

Some women would have asked no more, but Hilda prided herself on not being sentimental.

"What was it?" she asked bluntly.

"It was Hugh," Lord Blackstone said, with a tender intonation. "Poor little fellow, he wasn't quite two, and I think his mother never got over it. She died the next year."

But Hilda was not thinking of little Hugh Hallam. She was thinking of Hugh Dalrymple, who had stood in the dock before the dead boy's father, whose name was written in the book that belonged to Daisy Meredith's mother. That the name should be Hugh was only what she had expected, but it seemed a shock to hear it. The confirmation of her suspicions was so complete, the evidence seemed so overwhelming. The girl who was walking in the garden with Philip was not Daisy Meredith: she was Daisy Dalrymple, the forger's daughter, and the secret of her parentage was in the hands of the woman whom Philip had scorned for her sake. She got up, for sitting still seemed impossible to her, with this secret burning in her breast.

"How beautiful it is outside," she said, looking across the glimmering flower-beds to the walk where Daisy's white figure and Philip's black one were dimly visible side by side; and if any promptings of pity had stirred in her heart before, they died down at the sight.

She passed through the open window with a smile upon her lips; but it was a smile that on a woman's face is more dangerous than a frown.

The garden at Avonmead was not large, but it was redeemed from commonplace by the river that glided by it, and the beautiful towers that reared themselves in the moonlight a quarter of a mile away. The moon was nearly at the full, and the night was soft and warm. The glaring tints of the geraniums and calceolarias were toned to neutral greys, the house gleamed softly white, the river, dark on either hand, showed a long trail of silvery light, the grey old castle stood out clear against the sky.

"'The splendour falls on castle walls,'" quoted Philip, and though Daisy told him that there were no snowy summits, and that bugles never sounded at this time of night, he persisted that no quotation could be more appropriate.

"For, listen!" the young man cried—

"'O love, they die in yon rich sky——'"

"It is not a rich sky," said perverse little Daisy. "It is a cold moonlight sky, and your quotation is all wrong, Captain Hallam."

"The first line, the first words are not," said the audacious captain. "Let me tell you them again—

"'O love, they die in yon rich sky,
They faint on hill or field or river;
Our echoes roll from soul to soul,
And grow for ever and for ever.'

Daisy, dearest Daisy——"

"Quoting Tennyson, Captain Hallam?" said Hilda Jackson's voice, and the pair who had been standing so close together started guiltily apart, as two other shadows mingled with their own.

Lord Blackstone had followed Hilda into the cool sweetness of the moonlit night, and Daisy turned to him as to her natural protector.

"He would come," she whispered to this kindest of old men.

"Of course he would, my dear!" said the old lord cheerfully. "But he has had his innings, and now it is my turn. Has Phil shown you the bank where you can see both the castle and the church at once? No? Then come with me. It is the prettiest view we have, and you ought to see it, especially by this light. What could Phil be thinking of, I wonder?"

Daisy ventured no suggestions on this point, but she went willingly enough with Lord Blackstone to see the famous view; and Philip Hallam and Hilda Jackson were left alone together.

"Stay!" she cried imperiously, as he seemed inclined to move in the direction of the others. "Stay! I have something to say to you."

Captain Hallam was a soldier, and a brave one too, but he looked decidedly alarmed. Conscience makes cowards of the bravest, and his was by no means void of offence as regarded the woman by his side. It might be true that the initiative had been on her part, but no man can flirt with a woman as he had flirted with Hilda without giving her a certain power over him. After a flirtation like that, the possibility of "peace with honour" is not always the simple thing it seems.

He wondered what she was going to say, what line she was going to take. Of course she was furious at finding him with Daisy, and he felt uncomfortably conscious that he had given her the right to be angry, the right to reproach him, and even to call him to account. Was she going to do so? he wondered. He had heard from other men that the fair Hilda could be dangerous, and it was with quite a sensation of relief that her opening words fell upon his ear.

"Do you know who it was you were talking to just now?" she asked gently, and—absurd as it seemed—she looked at him as if she expected a reply.

"Of course I know. Do not you? Did you not see it was the youngest Miss Meredith?" he answered sulkily.

Hilda laughed softly.

"I saw that it was the young lady who goes by that name."

"Well?"

"Well! It is not hers—that is all."

Philip stepped back, and looked at her curiously. If it was a jest, it was a poor one, he thought; but the face that confronted him in the moonlight forbade the idea of jesting.

"What do you mean?" he asked uneasily. "Do you—— But no! it cannot be—you do not mean that she is married?"

"Be easy on that score," she said, with a mocking smile. "Married? Oh, no! I should think that is the last thing she is likely to be. Men are not very particular where a pretty girl is concerned, but I fancy most men would think twice before they married a forger's daughter."

She spoke with cold distinctness, but her bosom rose and fell with suppressed feeling. Philip looked at her with widening eyes, in which wrath was gathering fast.

"Do you know what you are saying?" he exclaimed. "How dare you utter such a slander—and to me?"

And then, as they stood together on the white moonlit path, with the night wind rustling and sighing in the bulrushes by the river and fluttering the leaves of the poplars, whose shadows mingled with their own, she told him all she knew.

He heard her to the end without a word, but with a close attention that never flagged. She felt that if there had been any loophole for unbelief, he would have seized it—that his silence was the surest proof that she had not told her tale in vain—and a throb of triumph darted through her heart.

She ceased at last, and he stood before her silent, dumb with grief and pain.

"Well?" she cried impatiently, "have you nothing to say? Will you not thank me for showing you the precipice on which you stood?"

"Why did you tell me?" he asked. "If it was revenge——"

"Revenge? Oh, Philip!"

She half put out her hand, but he did not take it, and even in the moonlight he could see her cheeks burn.

"All she thought was how to spare her further pain."—p. 331.

"How you misjudge me!" she cried reproachfully. "Revenge? that was the last thing in my thoughts. I told you to warn you, to save you, to prevent your life from being wrecked by a designing girl——"

"Silence!" he said sternly. "If you must speak of Miss Meredith——"

"Miss Dalrymple," she corrected.

"Meredith or Dalrymple, it does not matter: whoever speaks of her to me must do so with respect."

"Respect—for the forger's daughter!" she said, with a laugh that stung like a whip. And then, with a quick look at his agitated face, "But perhaps my warning came too late? Is it so? Am I to congratulate you, Captain Hallam?"

There was pain enough in her own voice now, but the mockery that had rung in it a moment ago made him hard.

"I cannot tell you," he said quietly. "It is for her to decide. I can only tell you that what I have heard to-night will not deter me from asking her."

"You will ask her now you know who she is?"

"Certainly," he said, with a grave little bow. "Did you think that I should not? If that was why you told me, Miss Jackson, you might have spared yourself the trouble!"

CHAPTER XVII.

AN ANONYMOUS LETTER.

"I know not how to tell thee.
Shame rises in my face, and interrupts
The story of my tongue."—OTWAY.

"MAMMA," said Daisy, coming into the little room where Mrs. Meredith was supposed to keep her accounts and write her letters, "I want to speak to you. I have had a letter that I think I ought to show you."

Letters were by no means frequent at the Hermitage. With the exception of the lawyer, who forwarded her dividends as the various quarter-days came round, Mrs. Meredith had no correspondents, and her children were too much used to the fact to regard it with suspicion, or even with surprise. Hilda Jackson would have found in it another link in the chain of evidence that went to prove that Mrs. Meredith was not an ordinary widow, with ordinary friends and relatives, who, if they did not visit her, at least kept up a natural intercourse through the medium of the penny post. But Avice and Daisy had no such thoughts. They accepted the absence of correspondence with the half-unconscious loyalty with which children accept whatever is unusual in their parents' lives, and did not trouble themselves to seek for an explanation. It is the unfamiliar, not the unusual, that provokes comment, and the Merediths were too accustomed to blank posts to be at all surprised at them. Mamma did not like writing letters, they said sometimes, and were more than satisfied by the meagre explanation.

They had few correspondents themselves. Their old school-fellows wrote to them occasionally in faint German characters on the thinnest paper; and sometimes Avice had an application from a would-be pupil, or Daisy a note from one of the friends to whom Lady Rosalie had introduced her protégées; but of the voluminous correspondence most girls indulge in they knew nothing.

It was a surprise to them both to come down, two days after the dinner at Lord Blackstone's, and find a letter laid by each of their plates. Daisy's was an oblong blue envelope that suggested a circular or a bill; but Avice's was a thick square missive, with the Vereker crest and the Buddington postmark, and Mrs. Meredith could not help glancing anxiously at her elder daughter as she unfolded and perused the closely written sheets. She had a shrewd guess as to the nature of their contents, and as she watched Avice's expressive face, she sighed.

Mrs. Meredith was not a worldly woman, but the mother of two portionless girls could hardly see what she believed to be an offer of marriage from a man like Sir Raymond Vereker and not wish him success, and she knew, as she looked at Avice, that the wish was vain.

"She does not love him," thought the mother, who knew her daughter's face so well; and she felt quite sure of it when Avice handed her the letter.

They were alone then, for Daisy, after a glance at her own little note, had flushed scarlet, and, putting it in her pocket, had hastily finished her breakfast and hurried away to read it. Both mother and sister had been too much occupied with the more important document to notice her, but now that she was gone they were not sorry to be alone.

"Well, my dear?" Mrs. Meredith said, rather wistfully; and Avice understood the dawning regret in her mother's voice and eyes.

"I am afraid you will not think it well," said Avice. "I am very sorry for him, and for you too, mamma. I would have done it, indeed, if—if I could."

"You are sure, then, it cannot be?"

"Quite sure, mamma."

It was all they said, these two who needed so little speech. There was a little pause, and in the silence Mrs. Meredith's eyes were very tender, and Avice's cheeks burnt red, but neither spoke a word.

"It is a good and honest letter," Mrs. Meredith said, as she gave it back at last, "and I am sure it comes from a good and honest man. Answer it at once, as plainly and as kindly as you can."

It was all the comment she made. She left Avice to write her letter, and went to the little morning-room that was called her own, but she did not settle to her usual avocations. She stood for a minute gazing out of the window, and then she sat down with idle hands and musing eyes.

"I wonder who it is?" she said. "I wonder who it is?"

She knew so little of her daughters' friends—the friends who were theirs and Lady Rosalie's, but not hers. She had no personal knowledge of any of them, and though there had been no intentional concealment, it happened that Lancelot Vereker's name had hardly been mentioned to her. He was always overshadowed by his cousin's more imposing personality, and she had come to think of him, when she thought of him at all, as of a figure in the background, with little individuality of interest. And indeed, this was how Mr. Vereker appeared on the canvas of Daisy's artless narrations, the chief source of Mrs. Meredith's information. Daisy liked Lancelot, but she was rather afraid of him, and felt none of the romantic admiration she entertained for his picturesque cousin. He was only a nebulous sketch in the graphic descriptions, in which the figures of Sir Raymond, of Lord Blackstone, and Captain Hallam stood out in full relief, glowing with colour and vivid with life. The name of Lancelot Vereker never even occurred to Mrs. Meredith as the possible key-word in the problem she was considering as she leant back in her chair, and wondered for whose sake Sir Raymond was refused.

Her thoughts were so full of Avice that she scarcely remembered Daisy or Daisy's unpretending-looking letter, until Daisy herself stood before her with the letter in her hand, and the whole little figure instinct with excitement and indignation.

"I thought I ought to show it you," Daisy said, holding out the sheet of blue paper much as she might have held some loathsome reptile. "I thought I ought to show it you; but oh! mamma, mamma! don't fancy I believe it. I know it is not, it cannot be true; but I thought you ought to know what wicked things it says."

She knelt down by her mother, and Mrs. Meredith looked at her with a terrible fear whitening her face. Women who have a secret are so easily alarmed, and this woman had gone through so much to keep her secret from her daughters' ears. She bit her lips to bring the colour to them, but it fled again as her eyes fell on the opening words. The letter was written on coarse blue paper, in a hand that was evidently feigned, and began thus:—

"Miss Daisy Dalrymple——"

"It was Meredith on the envelope," Daisy explained; "but read on, and you will see."

"Miss Daisy Dalrymple,—You call yourself Meredith, but the name you bear is not your own. Your name is Dalrymple, and you are the daughter of Dalrymple the forger, who was for five years a convict at Dartmoor. If you doubt my word, ask your mother, or, if you prefer it, ask Lord Blackstone. He tried your father when he was Mr. Justice Hallam, and can give you full particulars.

"One who knows."

This was all the signature, but it is doubtful if Mrs. Meredith got as far as that. The letter fell from her trembling hands, and she bent her head upon them, rocking herself to and fro like one in stress of sharp physical pain. She did not speak, but there was something in her silent anguish that made Daisy's heart stand still.

"Mamma!" she whispered, shuddering with a sickening, nameless dread. And then her voice rose sharply in the silence, as her fears took shape and grew. "Mamma! oh, mamma! what is it? Won't you speak? Won't you say it isn't true? Only that, mother!—only that—just a word——"

The fear-sharpened voice broke, and dropped into sudden silence. Daisy understood that the word she asked for could not be spoken—that the hideous charge was true.

She understood quite clearly, but she was too horror-stricken to feel much yet. Reflection would bring with it sorrow and shame enough, bitter comprehension of all the truth implied, keen perception of its effect on others, sharp realisation of all it meant for themselves; but just now it seemed as if heart and brain were paralysed, and refused to act. All she knew was that her mother was silent because she could not deny the charge; all she thought was how to spare her further pain. She took the shame-bowed head and held it gently to her breast.

"Don't tell me anything, mother. Don't tell me anything, for I know!"

But Mrs. Meredith was not a woman to be soothed by caresses, nor was her trouble of a nature to yield to such ineffectual consolations. She drew herself from Daisy's grasp, and sat up, looking ghastly in the sunshine that streamed into the room; and when she spoke, her voice was hard and her face cold and almost stern in its pain.

"I knew it must come," she said. "I have fought against it all these years, but I knew it must come. The sins of the fathers shall be visited on the children—why should I think that mine should escape?" And then she burst out passionately, "But I did think it! I hoped, I believed that the curse had passed us by. My little fair, innocent babies! I brought you here, and I thought you would be safe. I thought you were safe. I thought the curse had passed us by, and it has come upon us, after all!"

She bowed her head again, and broke into hard tearless sobs, that frightened Daisy almost more than the storm of tears that followed.

"Oh, mamma, don't!" she cried piteously from time to time. She had found Lady Rosalie's tears infectious, but she was not crying now. She was awed and bewildered by the violence of her mother's grief. She had seen nothing like it in her bright young life, and she did not know how to deal with it, or what to do or say. "Can I get you anything?" she asked helplessly. "Shall I call Avice?"

But her mother clutched her arm almost fiercely.

"No, no!" she gasped. "Not Avice; not Avice—it would kill her!"

The thought seemed to give her strength to calm herself, and by degrees the long-drawn choking sobs ceased. But she still held her daughter's arm, as if she was afraid to let her go.

"Avice must not know," she said, in faint, exhausted tones, looking imploringly into Daisy's agitated face. "We must not tell her anything about it."

"How can we help it?" Daisy said sadly.

"I can help it—do you think I have not learnt silence in all these years? And you will learn it, if you try. We will help it, Daisy; we must! Oh, my dear! surely one of you may be happy still. No one knows it but ourselves, and if we are strong and brave, Avice need never know."

"Someone knows it," Daisy said, taking up the letter. "They must, or they could not have sent this. Oh! I wonder who it is?"

"It is someone who wants me to bribe him to silence, I suppose," said Mrs. Meredith, with a flash of scorn. "He has over-reached himself in sending the letter to you, for it was for your sakes that I cared for silence."

And then, as they sat together in the sunny little room, she told Daisy the story of her father's life, of the honours he had won in his country's service, of their brief wedded happiness, and of his terrible fall.

"And where is he now?" Daisy asked eagerly, moved by a wonderful compassion for the father who had sinned so deeply, and suffered so sorely for his sin. But there was no sympathy in her mother's tones.

"I do not know," she said coldly. "I have not seen him since the day he tried to swear away an innocent boy's honour to cover his own guilt."

The luncheon-bell broke in upon their talk, and Daisy marvelled to see how resolutely her mother subdued her emotion at the sound.

"Come with me, and bathe your eyes," she ordered; "Avice must guess nothing—Avice must not know."

"No," assented Daisy meekly. But, though she did her best, it was perhaps well that Avice was too much absorbed in her own thoughts to notice her sister's manner.

The burden of her terrible secret lay heavy on Daisy's heart. It was dreadful to know that their father was a felon, but it was all the more dreadful because she could not tell Avice, and rest in the sympathy that had never failed her yet.

As for that other sympathy that she had come to think of as still more intimate and deep and true, Daisy dared not even think of it till she said her prayers that night. What had the forger's daughter to do with Lord Blackstone's—with Mr. Justice Hallam's—son? What, indeed? It seemed her only consolation that she could pray for him still, and Philip Hallam's name went up to heaven that night with tears that would have wrung his heart.

When Daisy rose from her knees at last, she went to her little bookshelf and took down the birthday book. It had learnt by this time to open at the 20th of June, and as the poor child saw the little faded flower, the blue eyes filled again. She pressed her lips to the page where her withered treasure lay.

"Good-bye," she said softly. "Philip, dear Philip, good-bye."

CHAPTER XVIII.

LADY VEREKER'S MESSAGE.

"I had a message to send her,
To her whom my soul loves best."
ADELAIDE PROCTER.

AVICE'S refusal of Sir Raymond's offer was a surprise to everyone at Verecroft, especially to Lady Vereker. That any girl should refuse her incomparable son would have seemed inexplicable to Sir Raymond Vereker's mother, but that Avice Meredith should have done so was all but incredible. But Sir Raymond had shown her the letter, and it was impossible to deny that the refusal was as decided as words could make it. It was amazing, intolerable, incredible; but it was true, and Lady Vereker was too indignant to be able to rejoice that her son was free from the "entanglement" she had once deplored. All that long struggle with herself had been unnecessary. The girl she had been so unwilling to receive as a daughter had shown herself equally unwilling to accept that honour. But Lady Vereker found no consolation in the thought, or if she did, it took nothing from her indignation at the fact of her son's rejection.

"It will break Ray's heart," she said to Lancelot; and Lancelot did not contradict her. He had seen Sir Raymond as he read the fatal letter, and the white, drawn face had haunted him ever since. For a moment there had been in Lancelot's breast a fierce, sharp thrill of overmastering joy, but it had died down speedily. Whether Avice married his cousin or not, she could never now be his. How could he woo the girl Raymond loved? He could not do it, he knew, any more than he could find words of sympathy now that would not savour of hypocrisy, at least to his own sensitive ear.

"Ray will break his heart," Lady Vereker said; "he loves her so deeply, unworthy as she is."

"Unworthy!" Lancelot roused himself at the obnoxious word. "No, Lady Vereker, she is not that! If—if you knew her better, you would know and understand that she is worthy of all the love and honour Ray can give her."

"If she were worthy of his love she would return it," the mother said quickly, and looking at Lancelot with some surprise. Were all the men bewitched about this girl? she wondered. Even Lancelot, who so rarely showed an interest in any woman, was moved, and unlike himself.

"Believe me," he said earnestly, "Miss Meredith is all Raymond thinks her, and more. If she has refused him, it is from no unworthy motive. How could it be?"

How indeed? Any girl might be glad and proud to be Lady Vereker of Verecroft, and to decline to be so for the reason Avice had given was scarcely a proof of unworthiness. "I cannot accept your flattering proposal, because I do not love you," Avice had written; and though Lady Vereker's wrath had risen high at the frank avowal, she owned that at least it argued a disinterested purpose. Only it seemed so incredible that it could be true!

"Who could help loving Ray?" she asked her unfailing counsellor, to whom it seemed so much easier to talk of Raymond's refusal than it was to discuss it with Raymond himself. And, indeed, Sir Raymond had utterly refused to discuss it. He had told his mother of his rejection, and had shown her the letter, but he would hear no word to Avice's disparagement.

"Do you not understand that I love her?" he said. And then he went and shut himself up in his own room, from whence he issued only to seat himself at the organ in the hall, where from his boyhood he had poured out his soul in moments of unusual emotion.

Mrs. Kenyon's sharp words had sent him to it many a time in almost ungovernable passion, and by degrees he had soothed himself, through stormy march and restless fugue, to the calm of German Lieder, of ballad or of song.

They had called the beautiful organ the "David" of this fiery young Saul in those old days, and as Lady Vereker listened to the sweet mournful sounds that came to them from the hall, she recalled the old name with glistening eyes.

"'David' will do him more good than we can, Lance. But oh! my boy, my boy, it is hard, it is hard! He was so happy; and though he is not vain, how was it possible for him not to expect success? And I had fought it out with myself, and conquered all my prejudices. I was willing—I was more than willing to receive her, if only she could have loved my Ray."

Lancelot looked down at her with a smile that was curiously sweet.

"Perhaps she will yet," he said. "She does not know him as you and I do, but she will learn in time. Oh yes! he is so good, so handsome, so honest and brave and true, she cannot help it when she knows our Ray as he really is."

And indeed Lady Vereker thought so too, if only this better knowledge could be gained.

"I wish Ray had not been quite so precipitate," she sighed. "We could have had her here, could we not, Lance? She could have seen him at home—at his best. But now—I do not know—perhaps she would not come?"

"I don't see how you could ask her now," said Lancelot, with a thrill of involuntary relief.

It was possible—he persuaded himself that it was even easy—to wish for his cousin's happiness, but to witness it would be quite another matter. He could talk of it and plan for it with Lady Vereker, away from the glamour of Avice's eyes and the sweet fascinations of her presence, but to live in her daily companionship while Raymond wooed her heart away would be more than he could bear.

"I don't see how you could ask her here," he repeated; and it seemed that Lady Vereker agreed.

"I could go to her, perhaps?" she said doubtfully. "I could go and assure her how glad I should be to welcome her. Perhaps Raymond did not make that clear. Perhaps she does love him, and is too proud to own it, not being sure of her welcome. That seems more likely, doesn't it, Lance?—a great deal more likely than that she could know Ray and not care for him, don't you think?"

"Yes," agreed Lancelot, "it is much more likely; only you saw what she said."

"Oh yes! but I think nothing of that—nothing at all. Girls will say anything to save their pride."

"Some girls, perhaps. I do not know about that," said Mr. Vereker simply; "but I feel sure that anything Miss Meredith said would be true."

"But you said yourself she might come to feel differently in time. I will go to her, Lance; I will go and plead for my boy; I will tell her how he loves her, how much we all wish it. Do you remember when we went to ask Lady Rosalie about her?"

Did he remember? Would he ever forget? He saw it all before him now: the pretty rose-coloured drawing-room, Lady Vereker sitting by the window, Lady Rosalie playing a low rippling accompaniment, and Avice singing as surely no other woman had ever sung before.

"I remember," he said shortly.

"How curious, and doubtful, and anxious we were! But it is not like that now. We know her, and we know how sweet and beautiful and ladylike she is, and we believe that she is good; and Raymond loves her—my dear boy loves her, Lance."

Lady Vereker stopped, and looked at him with eyes that shone through tears.

"I will go to her," she said again; "and if a mother's prayers can move her, I will bring her back to Ray. What is the name of Mrs. Meredith's house? The Hermitage, isn't it? But it is next to Lady Rosalie's, I know."

Lancelot did not know if he were glad or sorry to remember that Mrs. Meredith did not receive.

"It would be of no use," he said; "Mrs. Meredith does not see anyone, I know. She is quite an invalid, I believe."

It was not the case, but it had suited Lady Rosalie to hint as much, and so afford a natural explanation of her friend's inexplicable behaviour, and Lancelot repeated the excuse in all good faith. Lady Vereker looked much disappointed.

"What a pity!" she cried. "One can say so much more by word of mouth than by letter. And now that I am not going out, I am not likely to meet her anywhere."

She paused a moment, considering with herself, and then she looked up at Lancelot with the smile he never knew how to resist.

"You could see her, could you not, Lance? You meet her now and then; you could tell her all I want to say. After all, I do not know that Ray would like me to go to her; he might think it undignified. But you could speak for me—yes, indeed!"—as Lancelot drew back with unmistakable disinclination for the task—"why should you dislike it? It might make all the difference if she knew just how I feel about it."

"You could write, could you not?"

"I could, of course, but it would not be the same thing. I would much rather you spoke to her."

"Surely it would have much more effect if Ray spoke himself."

"Ray would not have the courage, poor fellow, and he would certainly lose his head. He loves her so much, he would not be able to understand, as you or any indifferent person might, how much was real disinclination, and how much was pride. No, Lance, I see you do not like it, but I think you will not refuse to do it when I ask you for Ray's sake, and for mine!"

It was a plea that had never failed before, and it did not fail now, though his consent was given with a pain she did not dream of. She only thought that Lancelot was more ungracious than she had ever known him before. For a moment he did not speak, and when he forced himself to answer, his voice sounded cold and hard.

"Very well," he said shortly; "I will give your message. I cannot do more than that."

He went away and left her wondering at his manner, but she knew that the promise so briefly given would be kept, as well as Lancelot knew that the keeping of it would be the hardest thing he had ever done in his life.

He was anxious to get it over, now that he had passed his word, but it was some days before he saw Avice, and in the interval he had worked himself into a fever of painful apprehension. How was he to advocate Sir Raymond's cause—he who loved her so well himself—so well that the thought of her drove sleep from his pillow, and the sight of her when at last he descried her approaching made his heart leap madly in his breast?

He was walking into Leamington, hot summer day as it was, for hard physical exercise seemed the only relief from the constant oppression of painful thoughts; and as he left the high road, and turned into the path leading to the lonely upland meadows known as the Guy's Cliff Fields, he saw a figure descending the soft green slope, a field's length away, that could be only Avice's. His first impulse was flight, and then he pulled himself together as a man might have done to face a yawning battery or the glitter of cold steel, and sat down on the seat under the trees before the mill, to collect his thoughts and await her coming.

He could not have chosen a fairer or more peaceful resting-place, though he was thinking little enough of the beauty, and feeling nothing of the peace. Before him lay the pool, large as many a mountain tarn, with the castellated mansion of the Percys reflected in its dark cool depths; behind him was the pretty, rustic mill, with the great black wheel scattering its silver spray from its moss-grown steps. But Mr. Vereker did not see anything of the beauty before him. His eyes were dazzled still with the sight of the white-clad figure coming down the hill, and his heart was beating so loud that it drowned the hum of the mill. He could not see Avice from where he sat, but he knew she would soon be there.

And indeed she was drawing near, though she paused now and then to pluck a flower or admire the beauty of the view. There were two little girls with her, the children of the curate's ailing wife, whom Avice had volunteered to take for a country walk; but they were not intimate enough with the stately Miss Meredith to be quite at their ease, and gladly availed themselves of her suggestion that they should try and find some flowers to take back to their mother. She could see them gathering meadow-sweet by the hedge as she stood looking round her and drinking in the beauty of the scene. The sky was so blue above her; the furrows that rose and fell like the waves of the sea, were green as only Warwickshire pastures can be; great clumps of trees cast broad cool shadows, in which cattle were peacefully lying; a little square church-tower showed greyly to her right, and before her the fields sloped down to the mill, whose drip and murmur she already heard.

But though she heard the mill, she could not see it, or guess who was waiting there for her, and she went on to her fate, thinking more of others than of herself. The children came back laden with flowers and eager to display them, but Avice had not much attention to bestow on the creamy, scented plumes. She was wondering what fresh trouble was clouding her mother's eyes, and why Daisy was looking so sad and unlike her usual joyous self. That the cause could be the same never entered her head. Avice had heard nothing of the anonymous letter, and could not conceive it possible that her mother and sister could have a mutual trouble in which she did not share. But Daisy was changed—that was undeniable; and Avice was secretly inclined to lay the alteration to Captain Hallam's charge, and to be very indignant with that defender of his country. "Is he flirting, after all?" she wondered, knitting her brows. It needed all her faith in Mr. Vereker's judgment to acquit his friend of trifling as she thought of Daisy's altered looks.

And then suddenly Captain Hallam, and Daisy too, vanished from her thoughts. She had helped the children over the little rustic bridge, but as they made for the seat under the trees they could see that it was already tenanted.

The next moment Lancelot had risen, and the children hoped the gentleman was going to offer them his seat. He did not do so. He only flushed all over his face, and shook hands with Miss Meredith as if he did not quite know what he was doing.

She was more surprised than he was, but decidedly more self-possessed.

"How is Lady Vereker?" she asked; and then, avoiding the awkwardness of Sir Raymond's name, she began to talk of the beauty of the mill—to wonder how deep the pool was—and to tell him that Lady Rosalie had not gone to the sea yet, though she was always talking of doing so—till he felt that something desperate must be done.

They had re-crossed the bridge, the little girls demurely following, when Lancelot suddenly stopped.

"Let those children go on first," he said; "I want to speak to you."

The words were imperative, and Avice hesitated a moment. Then she obeyed.

"Run on, dears," she said. "I like you to keep in front, and then I know you are all right."

Somehow, when Lancelot spoke like that, and looked at her with such masterful eyes, she could not but do his will; but at least she could find some presentable reason for the facile obedience of which she was half ashamed, and it was quite true that her impromptu guardianship would be more efficient if her charges were in front.

"Wait for me at the stile," she said, as they sped away, nothing loth; and then she looked at Lancelot, and dropped her eyes, she did not know why.

Lancelot was not looking at her. He was staring straight before him, and when he spoke his voice was quite unlike his own.

"I have something to tell you," he said: "a message to give you, if I may."

"A message?" she echoed in surprise. For a moment she wondered if it was from Sir Raymond, and a fine scorn darted from her eyes. Surely he cannot have answered the letter she made so decisive by a message?

"It is from Lady Vereker," Lancelot explained. "She thought—she feared that perhaps you did not quite understand."

"Understand what?" she asked curtly. If he had been looking at her, he would have known that there was a dawning offence in her face; but he blundered doggedly on.

"You must forgive me if I speak of what you may consider a private matter. You have had a letter from my cousin, I believe?"

"Well?"

"It is about that. Lady Vereker is afraid——"

"Lady Vereker need not be alarmed," she flashed out quickly. "I have already refused her son."

How proud the voice was, and how sharply edged with pain. He began to wonder if Lady Vereker's theory could be true.

"You do not understand," he said. "Lady Vereker was afraid you might not do so: that Sir Raymond had not made it plain how entirely she approves his choice."

He stopped for a moment, for his lips were parched and dry, and Avice looked at him with a very curious expression. She did not help him by so much as a word, and he went on rather breathlessly—

"She desired me to tell you that if you entertained any doubt of her consent, you may at once dismiss it from your mind. She does more than consent: she cordially approves, and she trusts that if any doubts on that point influenced your decision, you—you will reconsider it," ended Lancelot.

He had not looked at her once as he went through his task, and he did not look at her now. If he had, he would have seen what might have altered both their lives. For just a moment Avice's proud face wore the look a child's face wears when it meets rebuff where it expected a caress. There was a pathetic surprise in it—surprise blended with mortification and pain, pride stung to the quick, love wounded to death. The next moment pride gave her calmness and courage and strength.

"It is very good of Lady Vereker to send me so kind a message. What answer do you think I ought to send?"

"I!" he exclaimed. "How can I tell you? I have done my part. It is for you to decide."

"I should like to know if you agree with Lady Vereker—if you wish it, too?" she faltered, with burning cheeks. But if any secret hope of his dissent prompted the words, it died there and then.

"I have only one wish," he said gravely, "and that is that Raymond should be happy. If you can make him so, Miss Meredith, you will make me so also."

"Very well," said Avice quietly. "I will try."

She put out her hand, and as he took it their eyes met. But his were full of the exaltation of self-renunciation, and hers were blind with pride.

"Good-bye," she said. "We are only taking you out of your way, and the children are waiting for me."

He had meant to go into Leamington, but he accepted the dismissal.

"Good-bye, Miss Meredith. I will tell them what you say. Lady Vereker and my cousin will be overjoyed, and I—I thank you for them both."

He lifted his hat and turned away, and Avice went on to the stile where the little girls were waiting.

"Where is the gentleman?" they asked, as she came up alone. "We thought he was coming with us."

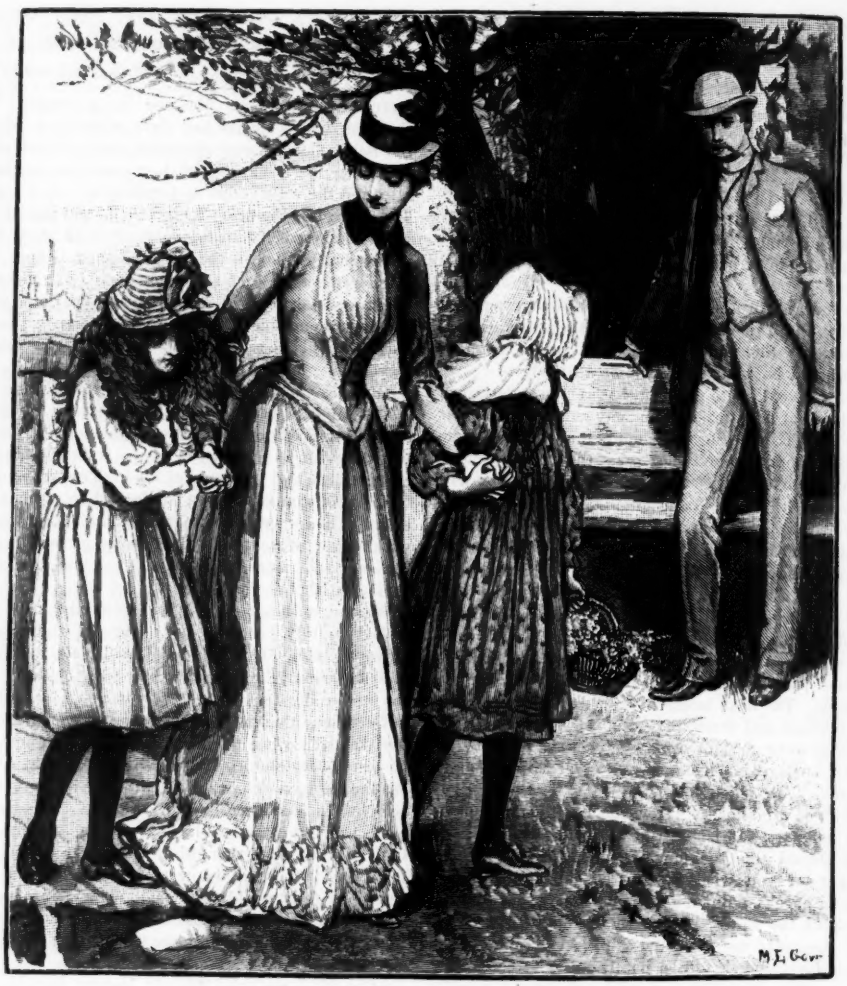
"No," said Avice, in an odd, stifled voice. "I—I thought so too—but it was all a mistake!"

CHAPTER XIX.

UNEXPECTED GUESTS.

"I do remember an apothecary."—Shakespeare.

Avice walked home like one in a dream. The children, whose spirits had risen with their run in the fields, chirped, and chattered, and skipped along beside her, but she answered their questions mechanically, and the walk ended as formally as it had begun. They soon left the fields behind them, and passed into wide boulevard-like roads, bordered with trees, with villas showing above the well-trimmed hedges, and soft stretches of turf for equestrians lying between the carriage-road and the high footpath beyond. More than one rider turned to look at the two pretty children and the tall handsome girl who carried herself so proudly but whose face was so pale, and whose eyes took so little note of outward things that she might have been walking in her sleep; but Avice saw and noticed nothing. Her only conscious thought was the wish to be alone, to escape from the glare of the sunshine and the sound of the high childish voices.



She was thankful when at last they reached the curate's house, and Grace and Emmie disappeared within it, with shy thanks for "such a pleasant walk." She was still more thankful to get home, and creep unnoticed to her room.

When she reached it she locked the door, and looked wildly round her with a long-drawn quivering sigh. How blind and foolish she had been! She understood it all now, but why, oh, why had she not understood it before? It was so simple, so self-evident, that a child might have understood. She blamed no one but herself, for indeed there was no one else to blame. It was so natural that Lancelot should have felt a special interest in the girl he believed to be his cousin's future bride. This was all he had felt, this was all he had shown, and she, fool that she was, had thought it meant so much more than this. But she knew now that only her own egregious folly could have magnified it into more.

Her cheeks burnt at the thought, all alone as she was. She threw herself on the floor with a despairing cry, and buried her face in her arms.

"Grovel!" she cried fiercely, lashing herself with her own words. "grovel, as you ought! Idiot that you are, could a man not be civil to you but you must fancy he loved you? Was he a man to care for a pretty face? and what else—what else—have you that is worthy of him? See what your conceit and folly have brought you to, and weep—ay, weep tears of blood!"

But she did not weep; she only lay and writhed in silent humiliation. Did he know, did he suspect? she asked herself in an agony of shame. Was that what his change of manner meant? Was that why he had charged himself with Lady Vereker's message? But at least her answer to it must have shown him his mistake. It had been given on the impulse of the moment, but she was glad and thankful that pride had nerved her so to speak. Whatever happened, she would not go back from her word. She liked and respected Sir Raymond—she was even fond of the handsome, impulsive boy, and people said such feelings quickly turned to love. They would in her case, no doubt—and any way, when she was engaged to his cousin, Lancelot Vereker could no longer think she had ever cared for him.

"The next moment Lancelot had risen."—p. 331.

She got up, strong in the thought, and ashamed of her shame. Why should she so abase herself for any man? She would at least so carry herself that if he had ever guessed her miserable secret, he should own himself mistaken. When she was Sir Raymond's wife——

She shivered a little, and the face her glass gave back was so white and wan she could not restrain her pity.

"You poor thing!" she said aloud. "Where is your spirit, your pride, your decent self-respect? Cheer up! You may have a lover before the sun goes down; and is this the sort of face to greet him with, I should like to know?"

So she mocked herself in very bitterness; but there was truth in her words, she knew. Sir Raymond would lose no time in coming, she felt sure, and there were her mother and Daisy to prepare for his visit, and for her change of views as to the answer she would give him when he came. She dashed cold water in her face to bring back its colour, and then she dressed her hair with unusual care, and put on her freshest muslin, and went down to the room where her mother and Daisy were sitting, humming a fragment of her latest song.

"You have come back, then?" said Daisy. "I did not hear you come in. Did you have a nice walk, Avice, or were the children too unendurable?"

"They were not unendurable at all—they were very good indeed," said Avice, wondering how her tale would get itself told. If her voice would only be a little steadier, and if it were not so impossible to pronounce Lancelot Vereker's name! It was a relief to hear the luncheon-bell, and to know that nothing could be said till after that.

But when they were in the drawing-room again she knew that further delay was impossible. She went across to the window, steadying herself against the frame, and making a pretence of looking out, in hopes that her face might not be seen.

"I have had a message from Lady Vereker," she said abruptly; "and, mamma, I think perhaps Sir Raymond will be coming here to-day."

"Did you not write to him?" asked Mrs. Meredith. "Surely there can be no need to see him after that?"

"I wrote," said Avice slowly, "but—but I know some things now that I did not know then. I should like to see him, if I may?"

"You shall do as you like. But, my dear, it seems to me a needless pain——"

"No, mamma, you must not think that. It will not be a pain, I believe," said Avice gravely; and her mother looked at her in unconcealed surprise. For once she did not understand her child.

"What do you mean?" she asked uneasily; but Daisy sprang up with a flash of unselfish joy.

"Oh, mamma, don't you see?" she cried. "She means—she means that she has changed her mind!"

"As a woman may," said Avice lightly, kissing her sister that she might not catch her mother's eye. She knew only too well how inexplicable her conduct must seem to the mother who knew her so well, but there was some consolation in Daisy's unsuspicious delight.

"It is as you said, mamma: one of us will be happy," Daisy whispered eagerly. "And oh! mamma, look, there he is!"

Sir Raymond was coming up the garden walk, the dark face all aglow with happiness, and Mrs. Meredith looked curiously at the man of whom she had heard so much, whom once—little as he knew it—she had rocked in her arms to sleep. The bright Alpine hotel, with its mirth hushed to sudden mourning, the stricken widow, the helpless babe, all came back to her as she watched the young man's eager steps.

"He was such a fair, fragile little thing," she thought; "who could have thought he would have grown up like this?"

How far it was to look back and to remember! how strange it seemed that the child of whose life they had all despaired, for whose impending fate she had herself shed so many tears, should meet her again, alive and well, a suitor for her daughter's hand! It was impossible to deny herself to a visitor like this, but she stood up to receive him with an agitation for which her long seclusion seemed scarcely an adequate excuse. It was indeed impossible to see the son of the man who had been snatched by death from her husband's side, and not remember the husband for whose safety she had thanked God upon her knees. Would she have given thanks if she had known? she thought bitterly now, and with the thought came an overpowering conviction that she ought to reveal her daughter's parentage to the man who sought her for his wife. Conscience told her in no uncertain tones that she had no right to let the forger's daughter wed this scion of an unblemished line, at least without letting him know what he was doing. She knew that she ought, but she could not. Conscience bade her speak, but shame and dread of wrecking Avice's happiness held her dumb. Another time, perhaps.

So she heard the story of his love, and looked at Avice, and held her peace. Surely, she thought, as she drew Daisy from the room, and left the newbetrothed together, surely one victim was enough.

And meanwhile Lancelot Vereker was tasting the full bitterness of his self-renunciation. The inevitable reaction had come, and if he did not regret the sacrifice he had made, he felt that it had cost him even more than he knew. He withdrew to his own room on some pretence of business, but the papers on the table lay untouched beside him, and his thoughts dwelt with maddening iteration on Avice and his cousin. He knew just how she would look, how she would blush and smile, how——

He got up with some wild desire of undoing his own work, of wresting her from Sir Raymond, and claiming her for himself, when the door opened, and the footman handed him some cards on a silver waiter.

"The gentlemen asked for Sir Raymond, and said they had come on business. Will you see them, sir, or shall I tell my lady?"

"Where are they?" Lancelot asked.

"I didn't know Sir Raymond was out, sir, so I showed them to his room."

"Very well," said Lancelot; "I will see them there."

He looked at the cards as he went along. One was inscribed—

"Le Pasteur Martel, Chamounix."

The other bore the words—

"Dr. Fletcher, Savile Row, London."

THE HYMNS OF HEAVEN.

II. THE HYMN OF THE BOOK.

(Rev. v. 9.)

BY THE REV. WILLIAM MURDOCH JOHNSTON, M.A., VICAR OF EAST TWICKENHAM.

THE hymns of heaven are songs not of sentiment but of adoration. They have a subjective or personal element, but their chief thoughts are external existences rather than internal or individual experience. Our later hymns are the development of a later civilisation, when the mind and heart are crushed back upon themselves—crowded round in big cities with men and women who are struggling to live, and to whom religion is not a natural and necessary development of life, but a fresh accretion of anxiety, and a new and inconvenient burden. It is something, therefore, to such minds that they may turn back to the days when the world was freer and wider, and when their eye, like Abraham's, can look up to the stars, and discover in them the pledge of Providence and the symbol of plenty.

It is the burden of life that lies unexpressed but understood beneath this vision of the Roll, whether it be the life of nations or the life of individual men. All is wrapped in clouds of impenetrable uncertainty and doubt. In England, said Edmund Burke, we always stand upon the verge of some great mutation. Kings and Empires become age after age subject to sudden and vital changes. The great man falls at a single stroke of adversity; the mean man is always battling against the flood. The morrow of life for States and for men is equally unknown.

But what is true of the future of life is almost more true of its meaning and its duties. Nothing is so mysterious as existence. The fallen man who cries out in despair against God's act of creation only utters a breath of that long, low "Why?" which questions perpetually why life was and what it is. Let us leap the gulf. But even there darkness becomes more dark; for somehow we cannot rid ourselves of the thought that we shall exist when all the present environment of life has passed. And when we turn in happier mood and nobler ambition to seek and to perform the duties of life, to grasp its right beliefs and accomplish its right tasks, we find no guide nor talisman, for conscience is perverted or fearful, and knowledge is scant and imperfect. "No man in heaven or earth or under the earth was able to open the book." It lay sealed upon the hand of God.

This is the point to which the hymn brings us. The mighty angel issues the challenge, and in the silence which ensues only one voice is heard—the voice of a man who weeps because of the mystery of life. But Heaven made us not for tears, nor for weak despair. There is a leonine boldness and power beside the Throne of God, source and offspring* of a race of kings: His power has been tested otherwhere. He overcame then, and He is able to open the book now.

Let us turn, with St. John, and look at—

I. The Book. I have said that it is the Book of Existence—of human life in all its variety. It is described as written on both sides of the Roll, so that no space is left; for the story of the world, when all is told, will be a perfect tale, and, in the Eye of Omniscience, every deed is already done, and every thought conceived.

And while it lies in the hand of the Supreme, man seeks an interpreter. It was not in old times merely that our fathers sought the horoscope of a life. Not alone did Saul go in the night of distress to his Endor, nor the Greek to his oracle at Delphi. The necromancy of the world is not dead—it has only changed its aspect. And we seek of the stars of chance and fortune, we apply at the oracles of history, we call up the Samuels of the dead that they may instruct or advise us in our need. But none can help.

Happy is failure if it lead to a better success, and bright the hour of tears if it beget years of rejoicing. It is the mission of the elders—that is, of the Church of Christ—to show the way, and to bid the heart be glad. "Weep not," it says to the despairing world. "Life and duty and suffering are great mysteries, but there is One who can unfold them all."

II. Look at the Champion of Life.

1. The past is here united with the present. He is the Lion of the tribe of Judah; for no age lives by itself nor dies by itself. Insignificant monarchies and princedoms have sprung up over the world, and, after a fitful existence, have disappeared. But none has departed without leaving a heritage that affected its successor for many a year, and maybe affects it to the present hour. Bethlehem may be the least amongst the princes of Judah, but great enough to beget the Ruler of Man. Judah itself disappears not, though Jerusalem be assailed and her Temple consumed. History all the world over is developing the future, and is the child of the past. A man—small and mean and narrow though his lot may be—bears yet in his hand some portion of power and responsibility which is big with issues for those that come after him. The ancestry of the nineteenth century is an unviolated line up to the origin and source of our race.

2. He is the Eternal Sacrifice. It has been perhaps the chief intellectual contribution of Christianity that it has taught us the inherent power of sacrifice. Other systems regarded it as a necessary adjunct of life, springing from sin and its results. But its one use, they thought, was to render possible an escape from the wrath of offended deities. Christ has changed alike the conception, tone, and essence of all that. He not only made full and perfect Atonement for the sins of the world, but taught us by His example that sacrifice is happiness and power—that it is the one sure road to light and peace, the one royal road to success and joy. And the Christian idea of sacrifice is not alone self-abasement, an effort at the cost of ourselves to accomplish something more important than we are. If it ends with ourselves, we become self-conscious, morbid, narrow—the very opposite of Christ. Sacrifice, in other words, must have an object distinct and apart from itself.

3. He is the dauntless Conqueror. His very going out is conquest (νικῶν): his determination is to conquer still (ἵνα νικήσῃ). This is the Interpreter that cheers and encourages man. His own task was the heaviest that Earth ever witnessed. When the Tartar hordes first left their Eastern home and spread westward in a broad stream over Asia, few could have foreseen the fall of mighty peoples and of ancient tribes before their swoop. When Mahomet—exile and refugee—first conceived his own greatness, and communicated his vision to his friends, not a soul dreamt that he would be the conqueror of Asia and Africa. But the work of Jesus was infinitely huger than these. Physical force stands lowest in the scale of power, moral force is great, but greatest of all is the force of the Spirit. This was Christ's weapon, and it is as keen to-day as when it was wielded by the Apostles in Asia or at Rome.

III. See how the poetry of Heaven turns life into brightness and song.

This again is the song sung by the Church and by Creation. Life sings of life resolved; the Church sings of life redeemed. Both united sing to Him who has made the darkness clear and the way distinct. What then is the view they take of life?

1. It is a consecrated thing: priests we are unto the Eternal—the way not our own act or choice, but the calling of God as He called Aaron, and the act of Jesus when He died. It was a decisive act—done then, and done definitely, and done for all time (ἠγόρασας). A voice breathed and spoke above us when we heard it not. In Palestine the Moslems have covered over a famous abode of the illustrious dead. Their mosque stands above the cave of Machpelah; and so sacred is the spot where the bodies of the patriarchs were laid that none has been ever known to enter the chamber of death. Is this not a rebuke to us that we count ourselves trivial things—only to be amused and pleased for a few years; to leave no mark of good men behind, and to pass into an uncertain fate when we are compelled to go hence? Is it not a loud rebuke to those who defile their lives with sin and vice, and forget that God has made them His dwelling-place? Is it not an appeal to the living to live not unto themselves, but for that higher purpose of devotion to the right and true and holy—in one word, to Him that loved them and gave Himself for them?

2. It is a united and consolidated power. The true reading is not kings, but a kingdom. This is the cry which St. John heard before, while he did the daily work by the lake of Galilee, and Jesus came near, proclaiming that the Kingdom of Heaven was at hand. It is the truth which the Church of Christ has endeavoured through many centuries to understand and to realise, that we should be one—united outwardly and inspired inwardly—in Christ. It is a dream that will one day come true: a vision, seen it may be with only a poet's eye, and expressed only in song; but the vision is the Apostle's, and the song is a song of Heaven. That is our constitution—"Thou madest us:" the past has registered it; the present prays for it; the future will rejoice in it.

3. It is a reigning power. "They are reigning," said the elders. It seemed a wonderful statement to make just then, when St. John was in Patmos; for the home and birthplace of Christians and of that Kingdom of Christ was already menaced with armies that did not know defeat. Already persecution was awaking from its brutish sleep and showing its hideous countenance. Tolerance that had long marked the government of Rome was growing impatient. The Church was in danger and dread. And yet, they say in heaven that the redeemed are conquering. Let the centuries since then declare whether they were right, and although fortress after fortress of the Church, and of the sacred, awful heritage it guards, has been assailed in every age, let history suggest and philosophy decide what is the greatest power upon earth now. Only the Christian man is a living, deathless force. Let him go forth like his Master into the world that is round and near him, amongst his companions and friends, amongst strangers if God gives him grace, and he will have his testimony to add that Christ and Christianity and life, interpreted and inspired by them, is reigning and must reign upon the earth.

MISTRESS ANNE BRADSTREET, POETESS.

A CERTAIN corner in our American Old Cambridge—that "Old Cambridge" which seems so new compared with its English forbear—I seldom pass without meeting a quaint figure which I am sure no one sees but myself.

It is not an imposing figure. It is a girl-woman of twenty, with a slight limp, and pale features seamed with small-pox. Her raiment is soberly rich, of English make. A prim little hood is tied under her chin, forming a close border about her high-bred face. As her full cloak blows aside I can see that her nun-like wimple is plain and pointed, without lace, but of the finest texture; that she is well busked and buckramed in her full-gathered gown, and that her "bib" is of duchess-like quality, although plain to austerity. Her head droops and her complexion lacks the bloom of English youth. The whole character of the figure is gentle and thoughtful: without weakness, yet with more of mental activity than of intellectual force, more of spiritual resignation than spiritual fire. She gazes dreamily at the crowded Harvard University buildings. Her eyes are full of vague amaze at the ceaseless procession of street cars where she knew only a faint waggon-trail over greensward, and at rows of shops covering her own garden.

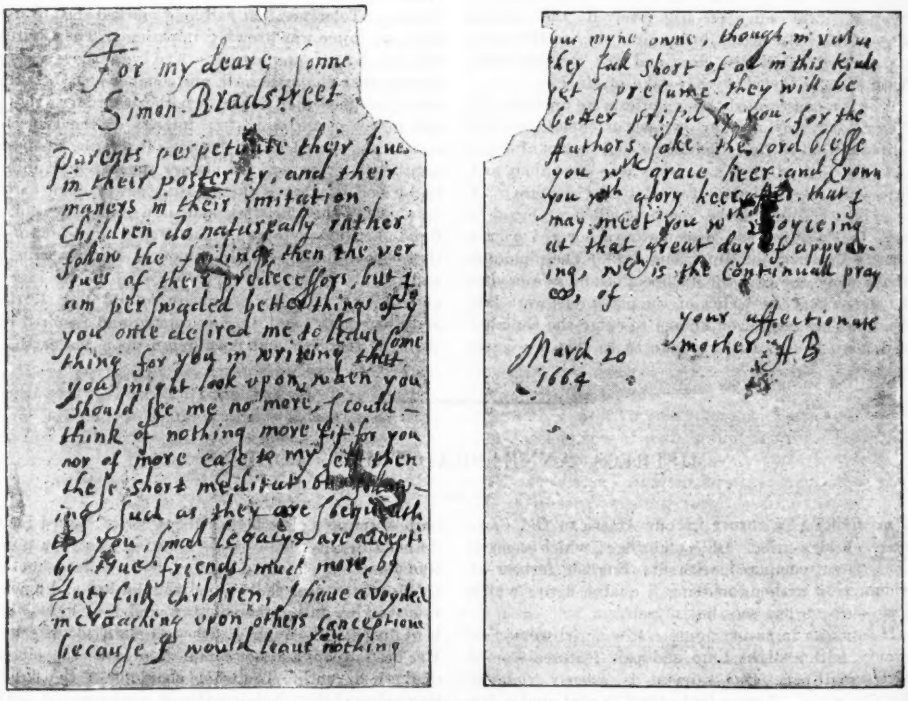
I feel no pride at my own fulness of life compared with her shadowiness. I realise that I am here only for my little day and hour, upon ground where she dwells in poetic history yet, though dead more than two hundred years.

It cannot be for love of this spot that Mistress Anne Bradstreet in my fancy frequents it. Fresh from an English castle and all the graces and elegancies of aristocratic life, such as they were in Charles the First's reign, it is probable that she never loved this wilderness home, where wild beasts ravaged her borders, and tomahawk and war-whoop haunted her dreams. She indeed wrote, later in life, "When I came to this country I found a new world and new manner at which my heart rose, but I soon submitted."



Anne Bradstreet was the daughter of Thomas Dudley, deputy governor of Massachusetts, and wife of Simon Bradstreet, a later governor of the same. She is distinguished particularly as the first poet who wrote on these savage shores. That Pierian spring first spouted in Old Cambridge, precisely at that corner where in spirit I daily meet her. Fortunately for American literary history, that first American poem was dated, and entitled "Upon a Fit of Sickness, Anno 1632."

When it was written its author was not yet twenty years old, and the "poem" is really more like a childish sob than a woman's plaint. Young women of our time are given to writing of their own early doom and picturesque tomb in the midst of their bloom, but we have no reason to suspect Mistress Anne thus inclined. Her affectations were manifold, but they are conceits of literary form, not of personal feeling.

The only real interest of the poem is as a literary curiosity. It shows what weak stuff could be called poetry in this New World when the Stuarts were kings, even though Raleigh, Spenser, and Marlowe, and a man named Shakespeare, had already tried their hands at it in the Fatherland. There is no flux of sentiment in it; no maundering in any of her poetry of dead Junes and wasted kisses; yet we cannot but be touched by the English schoolgirl rhyme:

"Twice ten years, not fully told,
Since Nature gave me breath,
My race is run, my thread is spun,
Lo! here is fatal Death.
All men must die, and so must I;
This cannot be revoked;
For Adam's sake, this word God spake
When he so high provoked."

This was Mistress Anne's youthful poetry. It would be manifestly unfair to give it as a specimen of her

FAC SIMILE OF A LETTER FROM ANNE BRADSTREET TO HER SON.

BRADSTREET HOUSE, NORTH ANDOVER, MASS.

muse, considering that she never gave it publicity herself, but for one very sufficient reason—that it is no worse than pages of verse that she did give to the world, and that the world—at least the New World—was vociferously grateful for.

This conventional verse was looked upon with awe and wonder where the forests were primeval. Mistress Anne was hailed as the new western star, risen to cast a lustre of poetry upon an almost unknown continent equal to any radiance that gleamed upon the old. In time Mistress Anne came to be known as the "Tenth, or American Muse." America claimed her, America boasted of her. She has gone into American literary history as the first of American poets. For all this, there was absolutely nothing American about her, nor yet about her poetry. She was English in every drop of her blood, every instinct of her temperament. She was distinctively English in her piety, and in all her reading; her housekeeping was English, and her later home imitative of an English manor-house; her furniture was sent from England, all her guests were English, and English to her last day was every item of her dress. She looked from her English sitting-room through English window-panes, and only the wild landscape reminded of her exile.

Anne's father, a gentleman by birth, was brought up as a page in the family of William, Lord Compton, afterwards Earl of Northampton. Later he became steward to the Earl of Lincoln. Before entering the Earl's service he had become a Nonconformist, married "a gentlewoman whose extract and estate were considerable," and had become the father of little Anne. The future "Tenth Muse" was born 1612–13, four years later than John Milton, and probably at Northampton. Not much is known of her childhood, save that she was brought up in Puritan strictness, and that she was always a delicate child. All we know of that period is what she herself told in after years, at a period of life in which she found all emptiness and folly that was not godliness, even the gaiety of childhood. She wrote then:—

"In my young days, about six or seven, I began to make conscience of my wayes, and what I knew was sinfull, such as lying, disobedience to parents, &c., and avoided it. I also found much comfort in reading the Scriptures, especially those places I thought most concerned my condition; and as I grew to have more understanding, so the more solace I took in them.

"In a long fitt of sickness which I had on my bed I often communed with my heart and made my supplication to the Most High, who set me free from that affliction.

"But as I grew up to bee about fourteen or fifteen I found my heart more carnall and loose from God, vanity and the folleyes of youth take hold of me. About sixteen the Lord layd His hand sore upon me and smott mee with the small-pox. When I was in my affliction I besought the Lord and confessed my pride and vanity, and He was entreated of mee, and again restored mee. But I remembered Him not according to ye benefit received.

"After a short time I changed my condition, and was marry'd, and came unto this country, where I found a new world and new manners, at which my heart rose. But after I was convinced it was the way of God, I submitted to it, and joined the Church at Boston."

Poor little English bride! She even did not come to this "new world and new manners" of her own wish and will. She was not seeking freedom to worship God in her own manner, for she could do that in her chamber. Doubtless she was not in sympathy with the worldly ambitions of her father and husband, who, despite their high religious zeal, certainly emigrated to the New World full of schemes for a new and powerful political establishment. Though in sore affliction she confessed her pride and vanity to the Lord, the natural girlishness was still sufficiently present to make her hunger for the delicacies and daintinesses of her life in Europe. She could not forget, amid the shrieking of wild cats and howling of wolves, the brightness of an English home. In one of her poems she is mildly reminiscent of "glittering plate and jewells," "the hatts and fans, the plumes, and ladies' tires" that made her wish "some part at least of that brave wealth" was hers. There is ground for suspicion, too, that at heart, Puritan in habits and faith though she was, Mistress Anne was more than half a Royalist. Certain changes in her poetry, according as the Commonwealth or the Stuart dynasty was in power, betray this feminine weakness for a gay "cavaleer."

Anne was only sixteen when married to Simon Bradstreet, aged twenty-five, son of a Nonconformist minister of Suffolk, and at the time of his marriage steward to the Countess of Warwick.

In her writings is continual evidence of a devoted love for her lord—a seemly and decorous love, craving his moral support and the spiritual influence of his presence, but as far from clutchings and pantings as her poetry is from the wild ravings of a certain school of the present day.

Directly after the marriage, both the families, Dudley and Bradstreet, sailed for America, where they were soon after established at Newtown, now Cambridge, and the meditative Anne began to solace her homesickness by writing "poetry."

We have seen what manner of verse it began by being. Later in her life it became more forced and unnatural, full of artificial conceits, distorted analogies, and figures dragged in by the nape of the neck. It was strictly imitative work; not a breath of spontaneity was in it; the work of one seeing life and nature only by their feeble reflection in books. She even thus could have chosen better models than she did, for all the great Elizabethans were open to her. But those gay playwrights and poets and their Jacobean successors were naturally distasteful to one spiritually nurtured as she was. "Paradise Lost" was not yet written, and Anne preferred to model her style upon a Puritan rather than upon a Cavalier. Even in copying Quarles and Wither, she imitated them not at their best; for Wither was a true lover of Nature, and one of her chosen poets, when he did not turn his back upon her to write conventional rubbish. As he turned his back upon Nature, so Anne turned hers. So completely did she turn it that one almost doubts if Nature even existed for her. A poetic soul was the same sensitive instrument then that it is now, and ought to have been responsive to the imaginative influence of boundless solitudes, the mystery of unknown space, the voices of sea and forest, even of the mysterious red man, then as much a part of wild nature as sea-gulls and wild heron screaming over the marshes. Nothing whatever of any influence of the kind appeared in her work. Even her few descriptions of Nature were the commonplaces of her school, and all the imagination she had was devoted to the concocting of pedantic classicism and fantastic imagery.

The two families, father's and daughter's, lived near each other; their gardens almost joined.

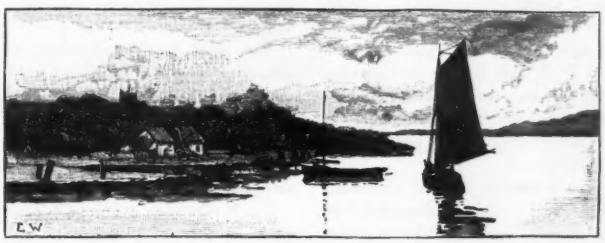
We may imagine in what luxury her poetry was composed at that day, when we regard the picture drawn by her father, the richest man in the colony:—"I write but rudely, having yet no table, nor any other room to write it than by the fireside, upon my knee, in this sharp winter; to which my family must have leave to resort, though they break good manners, and make me many times forget what I would say, and say what I would not."

As we realise all this pioneer discomfort, loneliness, and anxiety, during the Cambridge residence in 1630 and after, perhaps it is not surprising that the young woman's poetry bore such titles as "Deliverance from a Fever," "Deliverance from a Fit of Sickness," "Deliverance from a Fit of Fainting," "After much Sickness," "After Sickness and Weakness," "Submission to Chastisement from God," "Thankfulness for Health," "On the Restoration of my Husband from an Ague," "Upon the Restoration of my Daughter, Hannah Wiggins, from a Fever," "Upon some Distemper of Body," and Epitaphs, Lamentations, and Elegies, upon all her dead relatives, and "The Vanity of all Worldly Things." It is a curious list, and one that contrasts curiously with the character of women's poetry to-day. Most of that of to-day is in the form of dainty whimpers and whines at fate; of sniffles not vivid enough to be sobs, and dampness not vital enough to be tears—that passion has been blighted, and everything comes to dust and ashes at last. The poetical pendulum has swung to the other extreme, and women nowadays chant, in public, sensations and emotions that our Tenth Muse would have prayed to be delivered from as from a "distemper."

Our poetess did not die until 1672, seven years before the Great Plague. Long before then she had become the pride and glory of the New World. Many of her years were spent in Andover, Massachusetts, where she died; and to that remote settlement all the intellects and literary taste of the colony looked as to its guiding poetic star. To have written a book was a mighty thing in those days. For a woman to have written one made her the eighth wonder of the world. Cotton Mather, in his eulogy upon Governor

Dudley, called her her father's Crown of Glory, and compared her to Hypatia, the literary Empress Eudocia, and "the three Corinnaes," not to the advantage of those highly respectable ladies. Her poems were extravagantly praised by the Puritan divines of her time and after it, and a worthy head of Harvard College, President Rogers, declared that a third reading of her volume of poems left him "weltering in delight."

Still our muse apparently had not all the colonial world at her feet. It seems that her richness of costume displeased some of her neighbours, and she was thought to send too often to England to refresh her magnificence. So, too, her devotion to literary pursuits and indifference to household affairs called some criticism down upon her head. Her consciousness of this was allowed to appear in her poetry, and she wrote :—



"I am obnoxious to each carping tongue,
Who says my hand a needle better fits,
A poet's pen all scorn I thus should wrong,
For such despite they cast on female wits;
If what I do prove well, it won't advance,
They'll say 't is stolen, or else it was by chance."

Mistress Anne herself was not without the current prejudice against clever women, or else she threw a sop to Cerberus in affecting to have it! In the "poem" of "The Four Elements," where she argues that the "Antique Greeks were more mild" than her contemporaries in their opinion of women, else they would not have made the Muses Nine of that sex, and Poetry itself, Calliope's own child, she discreetly modulates down to—

"Men have precedency and still excel,
Men do best, and women know it well;
Pre-eminence in all and each is yours,
Yet grant some small acknowledgment to ours."

Mistress Anne died in North Andover. She must have lived a secluded life there, even though her husband was a prominent magistrate. The house in which most of her children were born was burned to the ground in 1666, the very year of the Great Fire in London. The house built upon the same site a few years after is still standing, but utterly devoid, because of alterations, of all impressiveness of age or colonial dignity. No proof exists that Mistress Anne ever lived in the house, though efforts have always been made to associate her name with it.

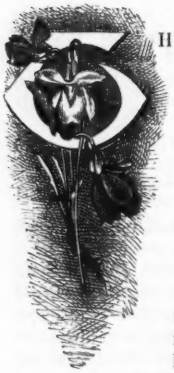
THE CHILDREN'S PRAYERS.

THE tender twilight falls:
And, bent beside my knee,
While shadows climb the walls,
The clustered heads I see!
And, free awhile from household cares,
I sit and hear the children's prayers.

O pure young souls and white,
For grace they sweetly pray!
And, precious in His sight,
He will not say them "Nay."
Who gently in His bosom bears
These lambs, and listens to their prayers!



It is His joy to hear
Their fond petitions rise!
In love that casts out fear,
Beneath His holy eyes,
They kneel, unvexed by hurtful snares
Of faithless thoughts that mar our prayers!

Lord, that we may become Trustful as children are!
Our lips have long been dumb,
Our steps have wandered far,
Forgetful of the golden stairs
Of faith and love, the children's prayers!

BILLY'S WINDOW GARDEN.

IN TWO PARTS.—PART II.

THIS first visit of little Rosebud was only the forerunner of many such, and, though perhaps unconsciously alike to father and son, it was evident a new life-interest had taken possession of the old room. Indeed, it soon came to be a matter of surprise to Billy if, returning in winter afternoons, he heard no sound of childish talk and laughter, or, looking up the court in the spring evenings, caught no glimpse of a little head craned up close to the window garden. Will, at all events, always managed to be on the outlook about the time his son usually made his appearance at the end of the next street. Billy, on catching sight of the bent familiar figure, was wont to remark to himself, "It seems like a welcome 'ome. As soon as I can see the flowers I can see dad, and I know 'e's a-looking out for me. It gives yer a kinder warmish feelin', even w'en there ain't no sun."

Between Rosie and Will, the flowers lost nothing by Billy's absence; indeed, they seemed now to belong to a sort of joint-stock company, and many a pot of forget-me-nots or red daisies found their way in early summer to the opposite house.

Rosie's mother was not long in making acquaintance with her darling's new friends. Now and then were tempting bits of food prepared by her deft hands to coax the invalid's failing appetite, and many a womanly office of patching or darning was fulfilled, with an unobtrusive kindness at which even Will could take no offence. Then, by-and-bye, it became an established arrangement that every Saturday the widow and her little daughter should come across and give their neighbours' room what they called "a reddup for Sunday."

At first, Will was somewhat inclined to resent this as a less warrantable intrusion, but the time soon came when he began to view it with equanimity and approval—indeed, to look forward to the clatter of Rosie's dust-pan and broom upon the stair: yet more to the unaccustomed sense of Sabbath rest and completeness which came to him with the unwonted surroundings of neatness and order. Very often in the afternoon of Sunday, when Billy had gone to his Bible-class, Rosebud would come dancing in, in her clean white pinafore and blue frock, reserved for festivals, and perching herself beside her friend, or ensconcing herself on his knee, with one arm round his neck, would prattle to him of her simple thoughts and doings, or retail the Bible story her mother had told that morning, or sing him hymns in her clear piping treble, little knowing what answering chords she set vibrating to the old melodies. Sometimes Mrs. Staddon would drop in to tea, with a few scones or a cake to add to the frugal meal, and a cosy party would gather round the table. After tea came what was to Rosie one of the most important events of the day—what she called "my Sunday t'eat;" for then alone did Billy, as the extreme of condescension, allow her, with her own dimpled fingers, to gather flowers from his window garden. But it is only part of the pleasure to gather the spoil; to divide it is quite as great; and, dearly as she loved them, Rosie would never think of keeping all the pretty blossoms to herself.

Old Will always had the first choice, and as he stooped to kiss the little giver he invariably said the same words: "She 's the sweetest flower of all!" Rosie made one discovery, however, about Will and the flowers, and that was that whenever there chanced to be any spray of mignonette amongst the treasures, his hand was sure to be stretched out for it, though somehow it trembled a little, and his voice shook as he made his usual little speech.

* * * * * *

Two years have sped quietly away as we have just described, and the opposite neighbours have now become established friends. It is summer-time once more—hot London summer-time, with its stifling, simmering air—when we find the same party again gathered in the old room. Not, this time, on a Sunday, but a Wednesday evening in the end of June.

"A Wednesday evening!" That is far too commonplace a way of putting it. Mind you, it was no ordinary evening this, but the day of the season to which Billy (not to speak of his three companions) had been looking forward with eager expectation for well-nigh a month. For was he not that night invited by good Mr. Johnson to the great "Floral Tea?" and did not his admission-card, with its border of roses and lilies, stand on the mantel-piece, to the admiration of all beholders? More than that—is he not to compete for a prize to be given for the best bouquet grown on a window-sill? and, though there are twelve competitors, have not Rosie and he some wild hopes and visions of certain success? How they have watched every blossom that came and went in the little garden; how they have discussed this arrangement and that; how many secret and apparently unpremeditated excursions have they made to the corner whence Tim Pray's casement can be seen, with comparison of garden produce! Would the solitary rosebud blow out too full? Would the mignonette go to seed? Would the fern they had tried to shade so cunningly dry up in this furnace of brick and mortar?

And now the day is come, and Rosie and her mother have just mounted the stairs, and are watching and superintending with much interest the concluding portions of Billy's toilet. Mrs. Staddon has put a patch on his jacket and furbished up the old garment, so that Will, with pardonable exaggeration, declares it to be "better than new." She has washed and starched his only collar till it absolutely shines. More than this, from Rosie's pocket appears a parcel at which she will at first only allow Billy to peep, and the contents of which finally develop into a brilliant red tie. This, as the finishing touch, Rosie, mounted on a chair, puts round his neck, and Billy, consulting the old cracked glass that hangs on the wall, and which has had more use this afternoon than in the whole course of its existence, pronounces it to be "a stunner."

Rosie capers round him with admiring eyes, marvelling mentally at the transformation that can be effected by a white collar and a red tie, and feeling something like Andersen's Princess when her swineherd developed into the Prince in disguise. Will, too, nods approval from time to time, and ejaculates at intervals—"Sure enough, fine feathers makes fine birds!" "Yer are a reg'lar swell!" "Well, if that there prize was fur neckerchers, yer'd get it, and no mistake!"

"Clasping the nosegay in his feeble grasp."—p. 347.

The old man had become weaker since the summer had set in, and, dry and warm as the weather was, did not seem to have the power to dismiss the cough that shook his frame. Lately he had taken to lying most of the time in bed, not caring to rouse himself except when Rosie's light step would be heard on the stairs; or, perched beside him, Rosie's voice would chatter away on dolls and flowers, repeating the text she had learnt that morning, or singing her favourite hymns of the "Sweet story of old," or the "Better Land" above. But even this often tired him now, and he would lie back and shut his eyes while his companion sat patient and quiet, with her little hand in his.

That very day, wearied out with her constant prattle of bouquets and prizes, he had lapsed into one of these long silences. Rosie thought he must be asleep, and gently drew the old curtains so as to shade his eyes from the light. But, raising himself more actively than usual upon his pillows, he turned to her with a sudden question—

"Rosie, does any of your hymns or textes say anything about there bein' flowers in 'eaven? Them jewels and pearls ye were singin' of is all werry fine, but they ain't nat'rl, like, to me. I'd like mainly to know about the flowers."

"I don't rightly know," said Rosie. "There's fruit trees! beautiful—beautiful fruit trees, as grows beside the water. It's a river, but mother says it's much prettier nor our Thames; not mucky at all, but just like as clear as our mirror when we've given it the Saturday clean. But flowers! I dunno, I'm sure. I'd like there was, wouldn't you, old Will?"

"Aye, would I," answered the sick man. "But if there's fruits I reckon there must be blossoms, and they're flowers, ain't they? My! if there is, won't I 'ave a winder-garden ready for Billy if I ever gets there! It wouldn't be like 'ome without it! Yes, and then 'e'll be sure to know which 'ouse it is!"

Rosie looked at the old man with a surprised, half-inquiring gaze, for he spoke rapidly and eagerly, and unlike his usual weak tones; and still, as she got down from her post and prepared to leave him, she could hear him muttering to himself as she closed the door—"Yes, know which 'ouse it is—know which 'ouse it is!"

And, now that evening has come, he seems wonderfully to have revived, and makes his little jokes and tells old tales, and recalls long-forgotten scenes of when he "wor a young 'un." The old man had not talked so much for months, and, leaning on his pillows, sat up in bed, his eyes bright with excitement, and a tint of golden colour showing in his poor pale cheeks.

The toilet is at length finished, and still some little time must elapse before Billy need set off. There are, however, other preparations to complete which must not be hurried. The celebrated bouquet has been made up for an hour at least. We may say, in passing, that the creamy rose had delayed its opening till that very day, and formed the centre of a mass of scarlet geranium, encircled by mignonette. But its crowning adornment has been left to the last, for Billy fears lest the delicate fronds of maiden-hair should fade ere they reach their destination. Now, as spray after spray softens the brilliant scarlet, and shows up the delicate tint of the rose, exclamations of delight burst from Rosie and her mother; while Will shouted, with all his feeble strength, "Hurrah!"

Another moment, and a different and more feeble sound from the bed caused Mrs. Staddon to look up from the bouquet and spring to the side of the invalid; while Billy, following her movements with his eyes, observed a sudden tremulousness on his father's lips. He fell back on his pillows, and fainted away.

Though it was not long before Mrs. Staddon's restoratives brought back the old man to consciousness, it was only too manifest that he was seriously ill, though at the time they were unaware that the unlooked-for change was owing to the rupture of a small blood-vessel in a vital part. He seemed dazed and bewildered, and spoke in tones so feeble that they could hardly catch the accents. A warm cordial, prepared by his kind neighbour, seemed so far to revive him that colour and animation returned to his features. To all Mrs. Staddon's pleadings that Billy should send a doctor when he went out, the invalid returned a decided negative.

"You let Rose sit aside me," he said, "while Bill's gone; and she'll do me more good nor all your doctors."

"I ain't a-goin'," broke in Bill, who, during all the proceedings, had up to this point maintained a most unusual silence. "I ain't a-goin' nowheres, dad, so yer can just make up yer mind to it! No, I ain't!" he concluded, with an emphasis apparently addressed rather to his wavering determination than to those around him.

In vain Mrs. Staddon promised that on the slightest symptom of increased illness a messenger should be sent to recall him. In vain old Will urged that he was all right, and should lack for nothing. Billy was inexorable, and, with a very firm expression about his mouth, stood proof against all arguments, only showing any sign of weakness by steadfastly avoiding even a glance at the neglected bouquet which an hour before had been the pride of his heart.

At length, manifestly it was vain to press him more, and Will could only say, with a tear in his eye that had not been seen for many a year, "Well, ye're a good lad, Billy; I don't desarve to have such a good 'un. I'm main sorry you should lose yer spree, but as ye're set for to stay with yer old father, I will say it do him a power of good to see yer."

So after they had had a quiet cup of tea together, and the widow had given Billy a few needful directions, she left with Rosie for her own abode, thinking rest and quiet would be the best of remedies after the excitement of the day.

The father and son were left together. For a while the sick man seemed restless and uneasy, but ere long he began to drowse occasionally, or, half waking, half sleeping, to mutter unconnected sentences, among which Billy could catch floating reminiscences of the day. "A regular swell!" "Yer must go, Billy; I'm h'all right." "Ah! a good lad, a good lad!" But everything mingled with words which recurred again and again—"I'll have a winder-garden;" "He'll know which 'ouse it is;" "A real beauty I'll have for him;" "Yes! yes!"

But at length the murmurings ceased, and, greatly to Billy's delight, his father fell into quiet slumber, though now he noted more clearly how wan and white the face had become which lay on the pillow near him. So the evening wore on, and still Will slept peacefully, with only an occasional sigh or moan as he moved his position.

How long the time seems to Billy! As the streets become less noisy and silence settles on the court, he can more clearly hear the clocks striking the hours and half-hours, and each that passes appears longer than the last. At length, when half-past twelve has sounded, he begins to think he may himself go to rest if he leaves the candle burning, and puts everything he supposes may be needed by the bedside. As he commences to carry this into execution, his eye falls for almost the first time on his neglected bouquet. He takes it up, looks at and smells it, with just a little swelling at the heart; for ah! has it not taken part in the dreams of months? and are not dreams almost as hard to part with as realities?

Never mind, Bill. You have lost your evening of pleasure and forfeited your prize. But your self-sacrifice is better than all prizes. You will not go unrewarded at last by Him whose eye loves to mark unselfish deeds, and whose lips have said: "It is more blessed to give than to receive."

But lifting his eyes from inhaling the mignonette, which formed a setting for the gayer blossoms, he saw that his father had once more opened his eyes, and that they were fixed upon him with a bright wide-open gaze that seemed filled with some happy thought. Before, however, he could speak, old Will raised himself on his pillows, and stretching out his thin hand, said in clear, soft tones, "Give father the mignonette; he's coming home;" and then, as his son wonderingly complied, c'a.sping the nosegay in his feeble grasp, he lay down once more and closed his eyes.

He seemed to be comfortably resting, so Billy, rolling up his jacket as a bolster, settled himself on the floor. He had been over-excited by the events of the day, and it was long before he could get to sleep; and still, whenever he began to drop off, it seemed to him as if his father's words were sounding in his ears and awaking him. But, as is the wont in the land of dreams, it was not always his father's voice that spoke them, but gentler accents echoing from his childhood's days: "We'll go and meet father; he's coming home—he's coming home."

At length, weariness prevailed, and Billy did not wake till the day had brightened, and through some crack in the blind a sunbeam stole in, wavered on the wall, shimmered on the coverlet, then lingered with warm soft touch on the pale hand which still held the bright flowers.

* * * * * *

Then, and only then, did he know that father had "gone Home."

* * * * * *

The years are gliding by, onward and onward, since that June night, and Billy is fast growing into manhood. He still lives in the old house, and still keeps the old barrow of former days, just as he keeps the bright black eyes and ready speech of yore. "If the barrer was good enough for his father, surely it was good enough for him. As for the h'attic, it was more like home to him than any other wheres, for it wor the only place he could, as you may say, see his old dad."

Yes, this was true—that the familiar presence lingered still in many a tender thought which those who knew Bill best would hardly have expected to find beneath his sprightly exterior. Never does the scent of mignonette greet him as he enters his room but it recalls that June evening in years gone by.

* * * * * *

Still more years have passed like milestones on life's highway. But these, and other engrossing thoughts time has nurtured, have not suffered Billy to neglect his flower-garden. On the contrary, he gave it rather extra attention; though his taste this season seemed to have undergone a pronounced transformation, for instead of the brilliant scarlets and blues which had formerly been his pride, the window exhibited little else but white blossoms, all the rest of his stock being stowed in less favourable positions in his living-room. He had coaxed a rose-tree to venture its delicate blooms in Crocket Court, and taught some white pinks to make their home on his window-sill. A myrtle, too, is being tended with care, though it cannot be said with any return of gratitude.

There is one other feature of Billy's present life which must be named. Is it a curious illustration of the law of heredity that he has recently taken up that custom of his father's of looking out every night at what used to be called "the haunted house," and sending signals to it across his flowers as the morning breaks? Our readers will, by this time, too plainly guess (they don't require to be taken into confidence) that it is a "haunted house" still. Yes! haunted, not by the dreary shades of a dead past, but by bright-winged spirits of hope and love and future joy.

* * * * * *

It is morning—just such a morning as that on which, long years ago, we saw Billy planting his flower-seeds. His is the only blind up in the court, and his friends the sparrows are the only inhabitants who have begun their work before him. Even they are astonished at his unexpected apparition. He has a pair of scissors in his hand, and soon blossom after blossom—pale roses, sweet pinks, dark myrtle—are lying on the table. One would have thought he would have regretted such wholesale spoliation; but no, a smile is on his face and a sparkle in his eye. What can have taken the lad? It is Billy's wedding-day! He is making a bouquet for his bride, of which each spray of rose and myrtle and each cluster of mignonette is a love-token. Glances are taken and returned at and from the window opposite his own, he returning to his work with a self-satisfied air and a muttered, "All safe! Right you are!"

One very seasonable, albeit quite unexpected, interruption occurs alone to his labours. Hearing the rumble of what he concluded to be a barrow, on looking out of the window he observed, with no small wonder, a coster with donkey and cart. A rather cumbrous square box occupied the entire cart, and the whole was explained as he saw Pat and Jim, of the Flower Society, turning the corner, and in a few minutes helping the coster up the narrow stairs with a substantial chest of drawers of polished mahogany, with bright brass rings. In as short a time as I have been in telling it, the same occupied the place of honour opposite the fireplace. Pat and Jim, having performed their mission, retreated without giving opportunity either for explanation or thanks. But when Billy had time to recover from his bewilderment and utter amazement, his eye soon fell on a white ivory plate, neatly inserted above the key-hole of the centre drawer—

"WILLIAM BLACKLEY AND HIS WIFE,
WITH GOOD WISHES, FROM MR. JOHNSON AND ALL THE FLORAL SOCIETY."

O Thou, to Whom, in ancient time.

Words by JOHN PIERPOINT, 1824.

Music by CHARLES H. LLOYD, M.A., Mus.B.
(Organist of Christ Church Cathedral, Oxford.)

2.

Not now on Zion's height alone
The favoured worshipper may dwell,
Nor where at sultry noon Thy Son
Sat weary by the patriarch's well.

3.

From every place below the skies
The grateful song, the fervent prayer,
The incense of the heart, may rise
To heaven, and find acceptance there.

4.

To Thee shall age, with snowy hair,
And strength, and beauty, bend the knee;
And childhood lisp, with reverent air,
Its praises and its prayers to Thee.

5.

O Thou, to Whom, in ancient time,
The lyre of prophet bards was strung;
To Thee, at last, in every clime,
Shall temples rise, and praise be sung!

"IN REMEMBRANCE OF CHRIST."

BY THE REV. A. BOYD CARPENTER, M.A., RECTOR OF ST. GEORGE'S, BLOOMSBURY.

"This do in remembrance of me."—St. Luke xxii. 20.

MAN holds within himself the secret of his power. True, he is surrounded in the vast world which encompasses him by forces greater than himself. But great as these are, they are of little practical avail as far as his wishes are concerned, until he puts forth power of his own to enlist and act upon these, and adapt them to his service.

But when once man develops inward power, he begins to act upon the outward world. As he grows in mental vigour and mental discrimination, as he acquires knowledge and understanding, and gains an insight into the secret workings of the physical world, so does he gain a power for utilising the great forces of the world. And when in addition to mental power he shows moral force as well—the strength of resolution, and patience, and persevering energy—he is well on the high road to become the master of that world which at the time threatened to crush him as an altogether feeble thing.

Now, what is true thus generally respecting man and his relation to the world at large, is also true in the special sphere of moral and spiritual life—the secret of moral and spiritual life is within. Men have too often imagined that it lies principally, if not wholly, without. "Give us," they have said, "rules to follow, laws to obey, authority to guide us, and then men will live, and speak, and act aright." But of what avail are rules, and laws, and authorities, if they find not a recognition, an appreciation, an acceptance within the man himself? The law must be obeyed, the system received, the authority respected. And no law, or system, or authority can be efficient unless it wins to itself the devotion of the consciences and hearts of those to whom it appeals. Man himself is the ultimate factor deciding in the depth of his heart the reality of his allegiance to law: for there can be no truly moral obedience which is not the willing and cheerful yielding of the spirit to what it conceives to be good, and beautiful, and true.

Hence the great problem in morals, the great practical problem, has been not only to erect a good system of moral obligations, but also to touch the springs of the heart, to make men love what is right, to clothe authority and law with the pure affections of the heart. There has, as a fact, been a twofold need—on the one hand, to show men what is right, and on the other hand, to make them love and respect it; in other words, to make an appeal to man's enlightened conscience, and also to his affectionate loyalty. And wherever this has been done, there has a great moral power been called into existence within the man himself. The man has realised a Kingdom of God within himself which defies the flight of time, or the temptations of material advantage, or those fashionable opinions of the world which are never for long the same. He is a law and life unto himself—which yet binds him in ardent sympathy and devoted spirit to the lives, and interests, and destinies of his fellow-men.

Now this is just what Christ has done, and that as no other teacher, reformer, or influence has accomplished. He has quickened the conscience, touched the heart, and inspired the life of men in a way which has never been approached either in depth or completeness.

"This do in remembrance of me," says Christ, referring in the first instance to the Lord's Supper. But in this He affords an illustration of His method in dealing with men, whereby He reaches the very heart of man, and using what is best there, re-creates the man into His own likeness, and makes him at the same time His active disciple.

"This do" refers to active, practical life, lived out under the recognition of Christ's authority to command obedience.

"In remembrance of me" suggests the duties of life as set forth in that noble example which Christ has presented to the world, together with a pathetic, ennobling appeal to the best and purest and most grateful and generous feelings of the human heart. And these form an inward power, a spring of personal, moral, and spiritual force, that has shown its ability in resistless might to accomplish great and noble things. Here, then, is an inward power of a threefold kind—a power of love, a power of conviction, and a power of activity.

Let us briefly look at these: and in doing so let us consider—

I. This method of Christ in contrast with other methods which He might have adopted.

1. Christ might have merely commanded, offering no reason; without an appeal to affection, or gratitude, or some sense of duty, He might have taken his stand on pure authority, and from that lofty height have issued His command for unhesitating and absolute obedience. This no doubt would have had its effect. Then those who recognised His moral greatness would have yielded obedience. But it would have been the obedience of law, and as such it would have failed to touch the heart or inner springs of emotion or conscience. Love would not have mingled with the sacrifice or inspired the obedience. No great moral influence would have been wrought in the soul; and the law would have lacked the support and inspiration to be found only in a personal and affectionate allegiance of the heart. Duty would have been mechanical, obedience forced, and discipleship would have lacked that joy, that freedom, that personal co-operation which love alone can inspire.

2. Christ might have threatened. This no doubt would also have had its effect with some. The more timid would have yielded; and, out of fear of inconvenient consequences, many might have been induced to avoid evil ways. A wholesome fear and clear apprehension that sin does work out misery for the transgressor, are useful and indeed healthy factors in all ethical teaching. But they do not form the whole nor indeed the highest and most efficient motive for right conduct. At best, fear acts as a deterrent, and exercises a kind of negative influence on the life and conduct. But it has no power to awaken a love of what is true and good, and a free and joyful following after the higher duties of existence. It has no power to create an inner life of goodness that shall be the abundant and unfailing source of a corresponding manner of living. If obedience to bare command is mechanical, that to fear is servile. And Christ sought not to awaken fear as the great factor of the soul, but that love which, when made perfect, casteth out fear.

3. Christ might have worked by offering rewards. He might, as men have been wont so often to do, have held out the enticements of personal gain, and the profits to be derived from obedience to Him. And if only He could have made these prospective rewards dazzling enough, and well calculated to meet the selfish cravings of men, many would have flocked to His standard and made loud and ardent profession of discipleship. Only show men where gain—such as they regard gain in the worldly and self-gratifying competitions of life—awaits them, and there will be a mighty leverage for moving them to listen and to follow.

But of what character will men be who are thus moved simply by hope of reward? Do not self and the system of "pay" play quite prominent enough a part, without Christ's having driven the poisonous influence deeper into the human soul? "Will it pay us to be good? Is it worth our while to follow Christ?" How base, ignoble, and corrupting a motive like that! If that be the inducement, then all moral distinctions between right and wrong vanish. Right becomes only another name for profit, and wrong another name for loss. Such was not, could not have been the method of Him who said, "He that seeks to save himself shall lose himself, and he that loseth himself for my sake, the same shall find himself."

II. Christ's method.

Christ adopted a nobler, profounder, and far more efficient method—

1. He appealed to the natural affections of the human heart, to that love which He believed capable of being drawn out, and that once drawn out would become the grandest weapon in all the armoury of the human soul.

And in doing this He showed—dared to show—a great and sublime faith in man, and did not hesitate thereby to put honour upon human nature. He believed that these simple fishermen could and would love Him—that they were capable of responsive influences of love in answer to His own, and that theirs was a love that could live after He had been taken from amongst them. He believed that they had a power of affection that could hold its own against the terrors, the seductions, the oppositions of a world hostile to the teaching and spirit of their Master. He appealed to their friendship, their gratitude, their tender recollections; for it brought before them all the love, the goodness, the services, the patience, the self-denial, the sorrow, the sufferings, the faith and hope and joy of Him who thus addressed them, and in so doing became tender and expressive, pathetic and winning beyond the power of words to describe.

2. But look at the object towards which Christ thus directs their love and remembrance. Not only would He awaken love, but He would fain awaken love of the highest and best; would stir up within their hearts and minds that which shall purify thought, elevate desire, and quicken conscience. For it is no blind love, no fanatical passion that Christ desires to be the working force within the souls of men. It has well been said that there is no real love that is not made up of two factors—love and admiration. The love which is fascinated by what is poor and mean, ignoble and unworthy, is no true love, and can never act as an elevator and purifier of the soul. As its object, so is its effect—to drag down or to uplift. It is just in accordance with this law of human love that Christ acts when He puts Himself forward as the object of His disciples' affectionate and obedient remembrance—"This do in remembrance of me." There is at once love the tenderest and most winning, and a life and character beyond all comparison the sublimest and purest that the world has ever seen. The deepest love and highest admiration are thus called forth by the object which Christ thus offers for the love of His followers. For there was an object not only supremely worthy of their most worshipful affection, but one that was calculated more than any other so to act upon their love as to stir it into the most elevating and heroic passion. To love Christ, to keep Him in undying and deepest remembrance, what was that but to raise the mind to a conception and realisation of the noblest ideal, and to inspire the secret recesses of the heart with the presence of that love and wisdom and purity of which Christ was at once the perfect pattern and unfailing source? It was just this which made Christ's appeal to love so efficient, as it is just this which distinguishes Christianity from all other faiths—that it can and does place before mankind an actual life—bone of our bone, flesh of our flesh—lived out in the great practical walks of the world, which was the perfect realisation of those sublime teachings which it enunciated for the guidance and observance of man.

XUM

Here, therefore, we have love—warm, intense, personal—that attaches itself not to a mere law or system or abstract principle; but as it was personal to those who felt it, so was it personal in its object. That Person was the highest and the best representative of the true life of every man. And so we see at once the ideal, and the great inward spiritual power for the realisation of that ideal, in all who lived by faith and love.

3. Christ's method was practical.

"This do in remembrance of me."

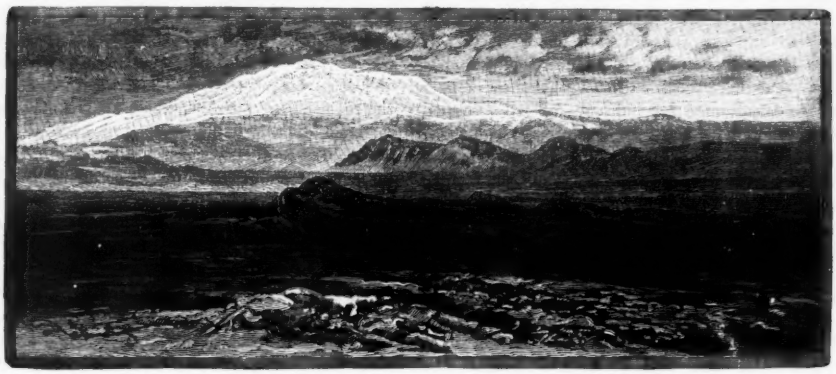
(a) Here is love in action. The discipleship of Christ is not to spend itself in mere contemplation, nor in its inner world of emotion, however tender and deep these may be. Life is too real, the call of duty too imperious, the needs of the world are too pressing for the follower of the Christ to sit with idle hands! That life of the Christ Himself was too crowded with the busy activities of work for anyone to suppose that idleness could have any part in His Kingdom. We need not, therefore, feel surprise that here, coupled with the most tender appeal to affectionate remembrance of His disciples, is the injunction to act.

(b) But this is more than a mere command. We saw above how the bare command was not the weapon employed by Christ. The injunction is inwrought with the appeal, "In remembrance of me." There lies the motive of action. "Translate your love for me, your recollections of me, your grateful remembrance of me, into action; and let that action be the outward and visible service which before the world you are tendering to me. Act out of love, and gratitude, and loyalty to me." Thus the practical side of life became the result—the natural, eager, earnest result—of the inner life of love, gratitude, and devotion to Christ. Naturally, spontaneously, irresistibly came active service, by the very necessity of love yearning to give expression to the devotion which had captured the heart.

(c) But not only do these words contain the motive to action—they likewise suggest the manner:—To act in remembrance of Christ is to act even as He acted; to observe His life and conduct, and to carry these as the pattern into all the duties which devolve upon us—in a word, to act as He acted; in all diligence and faith, with purity and love, and loyalty and zeal—in a word, to be practical Christians, whose lives are shaped upon the model of the Master, and whose souls are filled with the holy fire of His love.

Such was Christ's method, a method calculated to touch the innermost spirit with the most powerful and sublime motive, to lead men forward to the very highest ideal ever placed before their minds, and to translate this great and noble, this purifying and elevating power into a life of corresponding power and beauty and reality. That method constitutes the most comprehensive appeal that can be made to man. It appeals to his appreciation of what is best and noblest in all the world's history. It appeals to his sense of gratitude as awakened by all that Christ has done for the elevation and progress of the world. It appeals to his own better nature, for it is the voice of man's true self which comes speaking out of the life of the perfect Son of Man. And he who listens to this, he who answers by love and obedience, he who opens wide his heart to the inrush of Divine love which waits to bless him, shall find that secret of inward strength that shall make him strong to be, and strong to bear, and strong to do—which is indeed the power of God unto salvation.

NORTHWARD HO!



ICELAND'S LARGEST TREE.

ICELAND! There is a shiver in the very name! Nor is there wanting a suggestion of the Polar Sea—white bear and reindeer, the long Arctic winter, aurora borealis, frozen ears and nose, and diet of whale-blubber and train-oil. Iceland! It might as appropriately be named Fireland, for the fearful lava-stream flows through all its history, and its inhabitants date their records from volcanic eruptions, awful in their suddenness, widespread in their desolation. Encircled with a romance dating from one's schooldays, and out of the beaten track of the tourist, Ultima Thule presents a newer field of exploration to the holiday-maker. Thus it was that some few years ago I booked as passenger by a "first-class steamer, containing first-rate saloon accommodation," bound from Leith for Reykjavik.

When I boarded that "first-class passenger steamer" my resolution almost wavered. She was a small cattle steamer, dirty and objectionable. The beasts had evidently invaded the sacred quarter-deck. What was not cattley was coaly. The saloon was a tiny cabin; there was no steward, and the captain was in his shirt-sleeves. My fellow-passengers were a couple of tourists, a cattle-dealer, and two Icelanders. We steamed up the Scotch coast, through the Pentland Firth, and into the Atlantic. The second night closed upon us, and "to-morrow," we said, "we shall see land!" But at three in the morning we were roughly roused from our slumbers by a tremendous shock, followed by a rush of steam, which sent passengers and crew on deck, to find that the propeller was broken. We had sprung a leak, and out of sight of land, out of the track of vessels, our first-class steamer helplessly rose and fell on the long unbroken billows of the North Atlantic. A gale springing up, we helplessly drifted for four days, and wondered vaguely if we should be wrecked; but more by luck than wit we managed to make the harbour of Stromness. My fellow-tourists, having had enough of Iceland, made the best of their way home by land. The rest of us awaited the relief steamer telegraphed for, and were by her safely conveyed to the east coast of Iceland, and early one morning anchored at the entrance to a fjörd. A boat was lowered, and I, being anxious to see what I could, obtained permission to accompany those who were going to land.

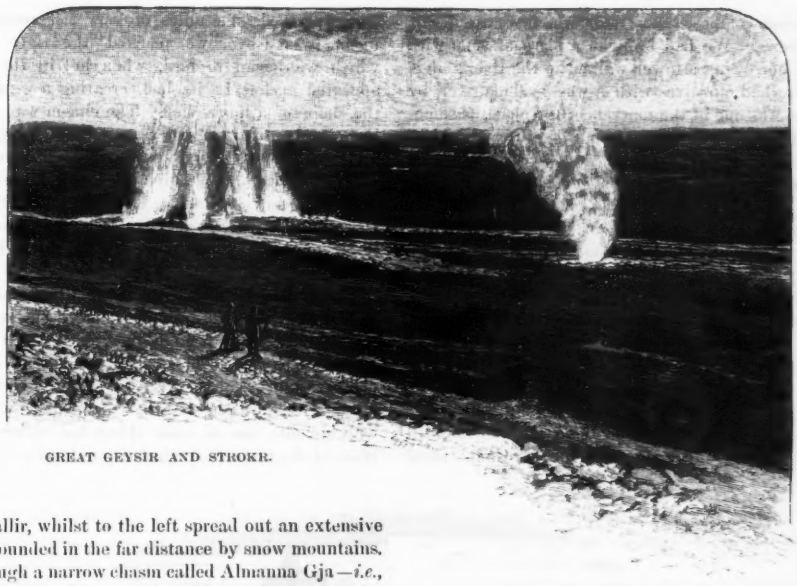
MOUNT HECLA, FROM THE LAVA PLAIN.

The fjörd was narrow but deep, the scenery wild in the extreme. On either hand barren rocks, verdureless from where the long slimy seaweed swept their base, towered aloft, seamed and scarred with wind and weather; a line of snow which marked their limit stood out whitely against a narrow strip of cold grey sky. The young day was raw and chilly. There was no cry of sea-bird, no sign of any living thing; nothing to break the silence of desolation but the sound of the oars in the rowlocks.



On reaching the head of the fjörd, we landed on a rocky beach. Pieces of wreck lay scattered about, mingled with seaweed and fish-bones. There were two or three low stone cabins, scarcely to be distinguished from the rocks, and half concealed by strings of fish hung out to dry. The air was redolent of fish in all stages of decay and preservation.

After my companions had transacted their business, we returned to the vessel, and all that day steamed along the coast, rugged in its grandeur, and finer than anything I had seen. Often the weather-beaten precipices would be broken by fjörds, and often glaciers were visible, some of enormous size. At one spot a river fell bodily over the cliffs into the sea. We cautiously made our way at half speed; for the coast so often changes as to make the chart unreliable, and the open channel of last month may be barred by hidden rocks to-day. However, without any misadventure we arrived the next day at Reykjavik. Hailing a boat, we were conveyed to one of the small jetties on the sea-beach. It was covered with long slimy green seaweed, so extremely slippery that the first who landed immediately fell sprawling; I, seeing this, followed with fearful caution, but, alas! I measured my length at once; so seeing that we could by no means stand, we discreetly crawled on all fours, and in this highly dignified manner entered the capital.

A long straggling street, the houses unpretentious, but with bright flowers in every window; a square, presided over by a statue of Thorwaldsen, the sculptor, a native of the place; a cathedral, a college, a gaol, no shops, no hotels—such is Reykjavik.

By persevering inquiry I managed to get a lodging for the night in the top room of a private house which an English lord was just vacating, and I bargained for my meals in another dwelling-house some distance off. Then I hired a guide who spoke English, a tent, an enormous pair of boots, and five ponies. With this retinue I departed the next morning for Thingfallir, the old parliament place.

As there are no roads in Iceland, we followed a track across a barren plain, forded two rivers, lunched at noon on biscuits and bread and cheese, and after a short rest, pursued our way up a steep and wild ravine, until we emerged on an utterly desolate plain, the vast expanse of rough lava being only broken by big pieces set up at intervals to mark the track. Suddenly the high plateau ended in a long precipice; to the right appeared the beautiful lake of GREAT GEYSIR AND STROKR.

Thingfallir, whilst to the left spread out an extensive plain, bounded in the far distance by snow mountains.

Through a narrow chasm called Almanna Gja—i.e., All Men's Road—a rough, rocky staircase, cut by Nature's hand through the precipitous wall, gave access to the valley beneath. Down the cleft our ponies made their way, slipping and sliding on the lava boulders that formed the stairs until we reached the bottom. Then, leaving the black wall that rose a hundred feet above our heads, we forded the river Oxeraa, and in a few minutes passed a little church, and arrived at the Pastor's house. This was a long low cottage, built partly of stone and partly of turf. Grass grew luxuriantly on the thatched roof, upon which a goat was regaling himself.

We had scarcely finished unsaddling the ponies when the Pastor made his appearance—a tall ungainly old man, with broad honest features, grey hair, and clothed in a suit of rusty black. He shook hands with us both, and conducted us to the little church which, strange as it sounds to English ears, was to be our hotel for the night, asking numerous questions in Danish all the time. Opening the door with a large latch-key, he led the way up the aisle. On the wall at the end hung a rudely painted picture of the Last Supper, and near it stood two enormous candles, one of which he lighted—a necessary process, as the few windows on either side had hanging shutters, which were fast closed and barred. The exterior and interior, like that of all Lutheran churches, were extremely plain. The service is very similar to that of our Evangelical churches in this country, the minister in black gown with white ruff conducting, with perhaps a precentor to pitch the tunes. The worshippers must have come from far, as the Pastor's house was the only one we had seen for miles. Some poor coffee was all that we could obtain from the cottage, and this, with the remainder of the bread and cheese, composed our "tea," which we ate in one of the pews. We had brought a piece of soap with us, and borrowing a towel, walked to the river's edge, and refreshed ourselves with a wash. This river, by the bye, was one of the marvels of the place, as sometimes it disappears from view altogether, and then as suddenly reappears.

It seemed that the Pastor's only grandchild was very ill, and hardly expected to live, and the old man was in great anxiety about it. This accounted for our poor tea; for though far from wealthy, they were by no means inhospitable, and promised us fish for breakfast next morning.

On returning to the church the Pastor lent us a couple of blankets, and these with our travelling rugs formed our bed and bedding, and we slept in the pews. Our horses were tethered outside.

Early next morning we crossed a natural bridge to the Althing—a grassy tongue of land surrounded on all sides by precipices from forty to a hundred feet in depth, and, at the bottom, a deep black foss of varying width, on the opposite sides of which rose the dark lava precipices again, the unbroken plain lying all around. In this natural fortification the Parliament used to be held in the days of the free Republic; armed guards defended the entrance, whilst within the members of the Thing deliberated. At the further extremity of the grassy slope was a slight elevation called "The Hill of Laws," and three banks whereon the great leaders of the people sat when the Parliament met.

Having rambled over this curious place, where now only grave-faced sheep assembled, we returned to the church, and found hot coffee and salmon steaks awaiting us. The fresh morning air had given us an appetite, and, having despatched our repast, we mounted our ponies, crossed the plain of Thingfallir, and clambered up a rocky staircase, the counterpart of the one we had descended the previous evening. We traversed a country strewn in every direction with various-sized blocks of lava, whilst we skirted the base of mountains of the most singular colours—red, yellow, black, blue and grey—many of them having the appearance of huge cinder-heaps. Again descending, we threaded a marshy plain, and beheld in the distance the snowy summits of Mount Hecla. Then followed some miles of very disagreeable ruts, until, by-and-bye, we reached the river Bruara, which we began to ford, when lo! in the middle appeared a cleft in its bed, creating a waterfall in the shape of a horse-shoe. The chasm was spanned by a bridge, partly under water, the only bridge in Iceland. Crossing it, we waded through the remaining portion of the divided river, and continuing our journey arrived late in the afternoon at the plain wherein the Great Geysir is situated. Leaving me to put up the tent, my guide set out for a farm not far off in search of food.

We had sugar candy as a substitute for sugar, it being commonly used by Icelanders, but bread and cheese and biscuits were all that we could get besides. By the time we had finished night had closed in, and being warmed and comforted, we took a short quick stroll, which was necessarily curtailed, as we feared walking into one of some thirty hot springs which strewed the plain, and which it might prove an awkward and embarrassing circumstance to step into inadvertently.

THE ONLY BRIDGE IN ICELAND.

The night was fine, though dark, and there lay quivering on the northern horizon a zone of light, now paler, now stronger, which sent far upwards towards the zenith long points of fire; whilst overhead, ever and anon, passed wreathing clouds of delicate pink or azure; or suddenly the whole heavens were illuminated, and then all would be dark again.

It being too cold to linger longer, we went back to the tent, and with the saddles for pillows, and our rugs for blankets, made ourselves as cosy as the circumstances would allow. Fierce gales of wind threatened to blow away our only shelter, whilst the sulphur vapour which constituted our atmosphere rendered breathing difficult. Somewhat stiff and unrefreshed, we rose at an early hour, drank the cold remains of our chocolate, and then, to induce circulation, ran a race to the Great Geysir. This spring has a basin four feet in depth and about sixty feet wide. The water therein is beautifully clear, and just on the boil. The sides of the pool and all around it are coated with silica, and in one direction—where the contents overflow—is a long, broad depression, the silica forming itself into a channel exactly like a series of oyster-shells. In the centre of the basin is a tube, like a funnel, through which the water spouts, now a rare occurrence. Its normal condition I have described as always simmering, full to the brim, and giving forth from its wide surface volumes of sulphur steam.

We next visited Strokr—the Hand Churn—a hot spring, in appearance the reverse of its larger relative, being an inverted funnel, small at the surface and larger below. Peering cautiously into its mouth, we could see the water boiling up almost to the top, and sinking again as if in spasms. My guide said that if we fed the Churn with a sufficient quantity of turf it would most likely spout; so digging with the spade some great clods of earth, we carried them to the mouth of the hole, where we piled them up, and toppling them in cannily all at once, discreetly withdrew. Everything remained quiet, and, as we had no more time to spare if we would reach Thingfallir that night, the guide prepared to saddle our steeds, whilst I dug up more sods in the hope that an overdose might prove effectual. However, we must start, so reluctantly I turned my back on disobliging Strokr and rode away. Scarcely had we gone a dozen yards when we heard a loud noise, and looking round, there were all the clods with which we had fed the Churn turning somersaults in the air, borne up by a column of water some five feet in diameter, and varying from sixty to seventy feet in height, whilst a dense volume of steam rolled far over the plain. For many minutes this singular spectacle continued, and when we trotted off exulting at our success, we left Strokr still muttering and sputtering, and protesting at our infamous behaviour in provoking his unquiet spirit.

Calling at the farm, we restored the spade, paid for our extensive banquet, and set off for Thingfallir, where we arrived late in the day. One of the first objects that met our gaze was a tiny coffin of dark wood, which told in language more eloquent than words its own sad story.

The grief of the poor old Pastor at the loss of his only grandchild was most touching to witness, as he showed me the narrow house to which the frail remains of mortality would so soon be consigned. He pointed upward to the infinite blue, where, beyond the range of mortal vision, his dead little one yet lived. The tears rolled down his furrowed cheeks, as he said amidst broken sobs that the time was close at hand when he too would leave this sorrowful earth, where life was made up so largely of meeting and parting, and join the many dear ones, who had gone before him, in that better world—where death cannot enter, neither any more pain, and sorrow and sighing are done away.

I pressed his hand in silence, and as I turned away a sadness seemed to have fallen on all around. A shadow as of the tomb rested on the fast deepening purple of the hills, but the glory that yet lingered on the highest summit seemed an earnest of the immortality beyond.

We made our preparations for the night as before, and rode off in the early morning without saying farewell. Having crossed the mysterious river, and climbed the rocky staircase, we paused for a last look at the wonderful valley and sleeping lake. There was the little cottage with its sorrowful inmates; there too the church, with its barred windows, and the quiet graves around; beyond, the ancient Parliament-place, the lava plain, and the giant hills bounding the horizon. Even as we gazed, the sun peered over the ridge behind us, touched with glory the loftiest snow peak, and thence descending filled valley and lake with a flood of light. With this as a last souvenir of Thingfallir, we slowly turned away, and rode through the rosy dawn towards Reykjavik.

SPIRITUAL BUILDING.

PREACHED THE SUNDAY PREVIOUS TO THE LAYING OF THE FOUNDATION STONE OF A UNIVERSITY BY THE PRINCE OF WALES.

BY THE REV. J. R. MACDUFF, D.D.

"According to the grace of God which is given unto me, as a wise masterbuilder, I have laid the foundation, and another buildeth thereon. But let every man take heed how he buildeth thereupon.

"For other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ.

"Now if any man build upon this foundation gold, silver, precious stones, wood, hay, stubble;

"Every man's work shall be made manifest: for the day shall declare it, because it shall be revealed by fire; and the fire shall try every man's work of what sort it is.

"If any man's work abide which he hath built thereupon, he shall receive a reward.

"If any man's work shall be burned, he shall suffer loss: but he himself shall be saved; yet so as by fire."—1 Cor. iii. 10–15.

THESE verses have suggested themselves in connection with the interesting event which, under Royal auspices, is before us this week. You will observe the words, spoken with reference to believers and the Church at Corinth, contain architectural symbols and similes: the master-builder; the foundation-stone; the materials of structure; and so on. With us the interest gathers round an institution for human learning. In the Apostle's case it was the rearing of a spiritual temple. Adapting, then, the subject of the chapter to not inappropriate meditation, we have these successive points brought before us—

I. The locality of the building.

II. The laying of the foundation.

III. The superstructure itself.

IV. The testing day.

I. The place of building. It was ancient Corinth, the capital of Achaia. Not the Corinth with which we are familiar in the earlier history of the country. That older city had been burnt down; and a reference to the burning is not improbably made in these very verses. The fatal conflagration was planned and consummated by a Roman Consul, one hundred and fifty years before the Apostle's time. But a new and more flourishing capital had risen from the ruins during the Imperial sway, and by the Imperial orders of Julius Cæsar. And just as the happy accident or conjunction of river, and iron, and coal, and such-like, will always secure the increase and prosperity of more than one of our vast marts, so the natural site and physical advantages of Corinth could not fail to maintain for it a permanent place among the great commercial cities of the old world. It was the key of the Peloponnesus. Situated in the narrow isthmus between the Gulf of Ægina and Gulf of Lepanto, it commanded the traffic between Morea and the continent—northern and southern Greece. Into its harbours came most of the trading vessels from Rome and Italy on the west, and from Ephesus, Antioch, and the islands of the Archipelago, on the east; hence called by one of their own poets, "the bridge of the sea."* Athens, though not now in its full tide of glory, the age of Pericles being long past, still continued the repository of the arts and sciences, and polite literature. But in wealth and manufacture, commerce and population, she had been outstripped by her neighbour. Though Corinth had her gymnasia, her schools and colleges, like ourselves (for these are specially noted by Greek writers), yet it was rather in the midst of a bustling, enterprising port, filled, not with old aristocracy, but rich merchants and traders and shipbuilders; it was not amid groups of philosophers on Mars Hill, but amid the lumbering waggons with their bales of merchandise, and crowds of business, money-making men, that Paul had succeeded in uprearing a spiritual building. The parallel between ancient and modern communities, civic and commercial, might be carried farther still; and that too with regard to profound issues. In the immediately preceding context, the Apostle mourns over divisions, miserable cabals and schisms, which had already sprung up in the infant Church. Parties ranged under favourite names and banners, each bent on disparaging the teachings of the other, and impugning the authority of their accredited leaders. The very runners in the Isthmian games, who at the base of the historic rock (Acro-Corinthus) engaged in friendly contention for a corruptible crown, put to shame the professing athletes for unfading garlands. None of us in this age, assuredly, can be the first to throw the stone at those who had thus early entered, as sectaries, the arena of religious warfare.

A well-known writer has attempted, and not unsuccessfully, to show that wherever there is the restless activity of commercial life, there is a greater likelihood, both politically and ecclesiastically, of this splitting up into parties, saying, "I am of Paul, and I of Apollos, and I of Cephas."† Yes! even in the little Church of Corinth it was so; and the burden of these first chapters of the Epistle is Paul's censure of this pitiable faction work.

* See Conybeare and Howson's St. Paul. in loco.

† See the Rev. F. Robertson's Lectures on Corinthians.

Brethren, am I not warranted in saying, that of our many sins as Christians, and specially in these days of boasted enlightenment and liberty, this is unquestionably the greatest? In the surging crowd that will be gathered next Thursday all will be in loyal unity, and devotion to the Throne. How different with the Altar? The jarring of religious parties—who dare gainsay it?—is a source of weakness amongst us. Unity is the strong point and the boasted point in the Church of Rome. Although, after all, her lauded unity is the mere unity of coercion and despotism, yet many are thankful to get apparent unity, even at such an unworthy and so base a cost: submitting to slavish subjection of mind and conscience and intelligence, in exchange for the alleged guidance of one supreme, immutable, paramount authority—the infallible Interpreter of Truth, the assumed Vicar of God. If Paul felt a burning indignation at these incipient party feelings in the church of Corinth, what would he not have felt had he been in the midst of ecclesiastical jealousies, and separations, which are the bane, not only of all our churches, but of all spiritual life, in these days and in these British realms?

There was so far apology, in the case of the Corinthians, for this clash of opinion and championing of parties, that they were owing to the mixed population. Corinth, from its site, was the meeting-place of many nations: a strange fusion and medley of Jew, Greek, and Roman—representatives from the Nile, the Orontes, and the Tiber, met in its market-place and harbours, with their provincial creeds, and rival schools, and inveterate prejudices. There is no such cause or palliation for these antagonisms with us. Let that future noble building crowning the adjoining eminence, where all the varied branches of human learning are to have their fostering home under the same roof, read the needed homily and rebuke. It is a type and prophecy—a silent sermon in stone, of what the Christian Church will yet be, and what her loving Lord designed her to be: when "He gave some apostles, and some prophets, and some evangelists and some pastors and teachers, for the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ. Till we all come in the unity of the faith and of the knowledge of the Son of God unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ."

II. But let us pass to the laying of the foundation-stone (v. 11): "For other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ." On this we need not dwell. It is the Lord Jesus Christ in the dignity of His nature, the divinity of His Person, the completeness of His atoning work and sacrifice, who forms the one only foundation of every true and living Church and living believer. And Paul felt as his apostolic successors in the true sense of the word feel by experience, that it is this fundamental truth of the Gospel, in its divine simplicity—Christ, the tried corner-stone, the sure foundation—which is the secret of all success in preaching. "Christ crucified," now, as it was then, is the power of God unto salvation. Nor is this foundation-stone and foundation truth to be shaped and modified so as to accommodate it to the pride and reason and prepossessions of men.

Paul had received a scant measure of success immediately before going to Corinth, among the curious, novelty-seeking philosophic listeners at Athens. In vain had he attempted to organise a church. Perhaps in consulting the passage you will see that one reason for this was, that he might not offend the scruples of these fastidious hearers. While he preaches Christ, it is not Christ the crucified, but rather Christ "the risen One," and "the Judge." To use a modern phrase, it is perhaps more negative than positive truth he dwells on. The full exposition of the atoning work of his Lord, so conspicuously unfolded in his later Epistles, is totally wanting. The result is failure.

His resolution in Corinth was altered; and it led to the gathering and formation of the largest of his churches. The means employed, the resolve recorded and acted upon, was this—"I determined not to know anything among you, save Jesus Christ, and Him crucified." Not seeking to grapple with the subtleties of Sophists, and enter an intellectual arena with Epicureans and Stoics, or to win rhetoricians with the flash and glitter of brilliant thought. His powers of preaching were, indeed, depreciated by a large section, compared to those of Apollos. They said, just as we hear it said nowadays, "This Paul is devoid of polish and oratory—all the higher qualities and refinements of a persuasive speaker." They desiderated and applauded gifts that excited and astonished—brilliant declamation—and put small estimate on any others. The unsophisticated man was aware of this himself. "My speech and my preaching," he says, "was not with enticing words of man's wisdom." And "again, I came not among you with excellency of speech or of man's wisdom." "His bodily presence," they said, "is weak, and his speech contemptible." But what mattered to him such unworthy and ungenerous criticisms? He knew that it was not by rhetorical art that living souls were won to his Great Master. He knew the danger of making preaching a mere intellectual display—pandering to the Greeks who "seek after wisdom." He had found the secret of success, and to this he would adhere. Such, then, was the foundation-stone, which one, who indeed could boast of no royal pedigree, but who was a veritable Prince, too, among men, came to lay in this commercial city of Corinth.

III. We have the superstructure. There are here presented to us, in the passage we are considering, two superstructures reared by two builders (v. 12): "Now if any man build upon this foundation, gold, silver, precious stones;" that is one. If any man build, "wood, hay, stubble," that is another. Observe, both builders erect on the same foundation, and the right foundation. It is the after-work alone which differs. In the one case, the structure remains unharmed, uninjured by the fire. In the other case, it is consumed, burnt to ashes. Let us look at both.

In that 17th chapter of Acts, when Paul stood on Mars Hill, with the glorious Parthenon close by him, which, though toned and mellowed by the lapse of 500 years, had still "its gilded and painted columns" and noble friezes, he spoke of the Godhead unlike "gold, or silver, or stone," graven by art or man's device." It has been ingeniously noted, that these are the very same words, in the same order as here. And, therefore, it may possibly have been his recent visit to Athens which suggested the language and simile of our text—these graceful Doric shafts of Pentelican marble gleaming in an Attic sun. Equally possible, it may have been some of the noble structures of old Corinth itself, which had survived the conflagration of Mummius: the magnificent porphyry columns, decorated with the precious metals of the temple of Venus or of Capitoline Jove. While the poorer and meaner buildings of "wood, hay, and stubble"—the wood-work of the walls; the hay, the dried grass that filled the interstices; the stubble, or thatch, covering the roof—while all these were consumed to ashes, what was "gold and silver and marble" escaped unscathed, and survived the fury of the destroyer.*

IV. The spiritual application will best be brought out by passing, in the fourth place, to the testing day (v. 13): "Every man's work (or building) shall be made manifest; for the day shall declare it, because it shall be revealed by fire, and the fire shall try every man's work of what sort it is."

That day, it need hardly be said, is the Day of Judgment. Malachi gives the best comment and paraphrase upon it: The Lord shall suddenly come to his Temple (or building). "But who may abide the day of His coming? For He is like a refiner's fire. Behold, the day cometh that shall burn as an oven: and all that do wickedly shall be as STUBBLE" (like the dried grass or inflammable thatch of St. Paul). "The Lord shall be revealed with His mighty angels in FLAMING FIRE." The wicked are to be consumed with the brightness (the fire) of His coming. †

We need urge no literal interpretation of these various utterances. Whatever be the material fires which may at last wrap our earth in conflagration, let us look to the figurative meaning, as denoting God's omniscient sifting, discriminating righteousness—retributive justice; "Who will render to every man according to his deeds."

For, observe, while elsewhere, in many passages, He speaks of the doom of the wicked, in this He is speaking of believers, His people, the Church.

The two builders are both safe at last. They have both built on the same secure foundation. But their superstructures have been very different, and their recompense is different too (v. 14): "If any man's work abide which he hath built thereon, he shall receive a reward. If any man's work shall be burnt, he shall suffer loss; but he himself shall be saved, yet so as by fire." Now this brings before us a great truth which again and again is presented and enjoined in the New Testament. We have already seen that the giant work of the Saviour's doing and dying stands now, and will stand then, alone in its matchless, pre-eminent glory as the procuring cause of salvation. Without this as a foundation, everything else would be worse than worthless.

> "On Christ, the solid Rock, I stand;
> All other grounds are sinking sand."

Nevertheless, this passage endorses and enforces similar New Testament averments—that the believer who builds on Christ, resting his everlasting interests on the Divine suretyship, will receive a proportionate corresponding recompense for all deeds done out of love to the Redeemer and from a desire to glorify His holy name. He who builds on that foundation "gold, silver, precious stones"—these virtues, excellencies, good deeds, noble exertions, a holy life, and holy character, these things will live; he will get his reward, and listen to the "Well done;" while the other builder, the man who believed on Christ, but who has shown no such devotion in His cause and made no such sacrifice for His glory, he will have no part in the splendid recompense. His best motives and good deeds may have been so mingled with self and sin, as to be entitled to no other appellation but dried hay and stubble. They will not be taken account of. He will himself be saved, having built on the right foundation; but it will be "yet so as by fire;" saved, and no more. Like a man rushing from a burning house, or let down by a fire-escape, rescued as if by miracle, the fire making wild havoc of all he had clung to. "He suffered loss, yet he himself was saved; yet so as by fire." This doctrine is in harmony not only with the statements of Holy Scripture, but with the principles of natural equity and justice. "Every man shall receive his own reward, according to his own labour." "He that soweth sparingly shall reap also sparingly; and he that soweth bountifully shall reap also bountifully." All will be stars deriving their lustre in the heavenly firmament from Christ the central Sun; "but one star will differ from another star in glory." Many were the runners on these plains of Isthmia, so identified with the Corinth of St. Paul; but it was not those who lagged in the race, or were hampered with weights, but the swift of foot and the strong in heart and purpose, who were wreathed with the proudest crowns of olive and pine on reaching the goal. We listened, but a short time ago, to a harrowing tale of captivity, with all its privations and horrors, from men who have already suffered for their Divine Master, and are ready and willing to suffer again, even to bonds.

* See Dean Stanley, on St. Paul's Epistles to the Corinthians, passim.

† Ib., vol. i., p. 77.

Are we unwarranted in saying, and saying strongly, how different will be their eternal recompense from those who, though building on the same foundation, have not made any such self-surrender and self-sacrifice? Those who drink of the cup of suffering are to sit on the Master's right and left hand in the Kingdom. Other faithful men, those who are spoken of as "the wise," are to shine "as the brightness of the firmament," but such-like hero hearts, who have braved all and endured all to "turn many to righteousness," are to shine "as the stars for ever and ever."

The urgent practical exhortation and lesson is contained in the last clause of v. 10:—"But let every man take heed how he buildeth thereupon." The great truth these verses bring home to us is that Christianity is not a mere system of creeds and of dogmas, but a life. What are we doing? What are we building? It is not needful that we aspire after great things in our present sphere. It is not necessary that we should, like St. Paul, be wise "master-builders." But whatever be our assigned place and niche in the building, are we occupying it? We are only the hand-labourers, God is the Architect. All is planned for us. We work to His plan, no more. Let us do our assigned part, whatever it be. "To every man his work." That magnificent building which is to be much in our thoughts this week, has had, and has still, its divisions of labour. Some quarrying the stones, some working the engines, some rearing the walls, some levelling and shaping the terraces. But each has his allotted part, and the lowliest hewers of wood and drawers of water are indispensable for the rearing and completion of the whole. He that planteth and he that watereth are one—i.e., they do not interfere, but rather co-operate. Both are needed. And so it is in the Christian Church. No one is so lowly that he or she can do nothing. Only do it heartily as to the Lord, and not unto men, and He will regard your lowliest work. He will accept the farthings, as well as the gold and silver and precious stones. Oh, on that great day when "the Books are opened," let these divine registers contain the record of faith, and love, and charity; submission under trial; a meek bearing of the cross; a close walk with God; a sympathetic interest in the good and welfare of our brother. The cup of cold water, where there was nothing else to give, will weigh more with the Judge than the brilliant action of the parade-day. The patient forgiveness of an injury will win the laurel denied to many a deed that drew down the plaudits of thousands.

Let us leave this House of Prayer to-day, with the devout impression that to each of us is committed a building—a soul building for eternity; a superstructure to rear silently, without pageantry or blare of trumpet; but withal, a great and divine reality. What is to be its characteristic? Are we to build the hut or the palace? Is the material used that which is worthless and perishing, to be finally consumed as tow, or is it that which is to defy the last fires?—a building of God; its walls salvation, its gates praise; more enduring than Parthenon marble, or Corinthian brass, or Ophir gold.

Spirit of all grace, come down and make every one of us a consecrated sanctuary! As spiritual and immortal builders, inspire each lip with the resolve, "I will not give sleep to mine eyes, nor slumber to mine eyelids, until, in this deathless soul of mine, I have found a place for the Lord, an habitation for the mighty God of Jacob!"

THE SNAPDRAGON AND HER FRIENDS.

BY THE REV. ALFRED J. BAMFORD, B.A., AUTHOR OF "TURBANS AND TAILS; OR, SKETCHES IN THE UNROMANTIC EAST," ETC.

IT was quite clear that the Snapdragon was in a bad temper, though the reason of it was not at all clear. The morning was bright and sunny, one of those glorious mornings so common in the latter part of summer, and all the plants in the garden, except the Snapdragon, seemed perfectly happy. Some were joyously throwing open their full-blown flowers to the sunlight, some were thinking with glad anticipation of their buds soon to break out into blossom; while others, which had done flowering, were comfortably nursing their ripening seeds, and although they did not themselves look as gay as when glowing with bright colour, were heartily enjoying the gay show all around them.

Close by the Snapdragon grew a little Pansy, as merry a flower as ever rooted. It took a good deal to make her miserable. She was always cheerful, but for all that, she felt happier when her neighbours were happy too. Without becoming actually miserable, she was conscious of a kind of chilliness in the air when any of them were out of spirits. She felt, for instance, just now a sort of breeze of unhappiness, almost like an east wind, blowing upon her from the Snapdragon. What was the matter—whether she was sick, or cross, or both—she did not know, but she did know that she would rather have her glad than grumpy, and, moreover, that it would be better for her, and she determined, therefore, to try and find out what was wrong, and, if possible, to put it right again.

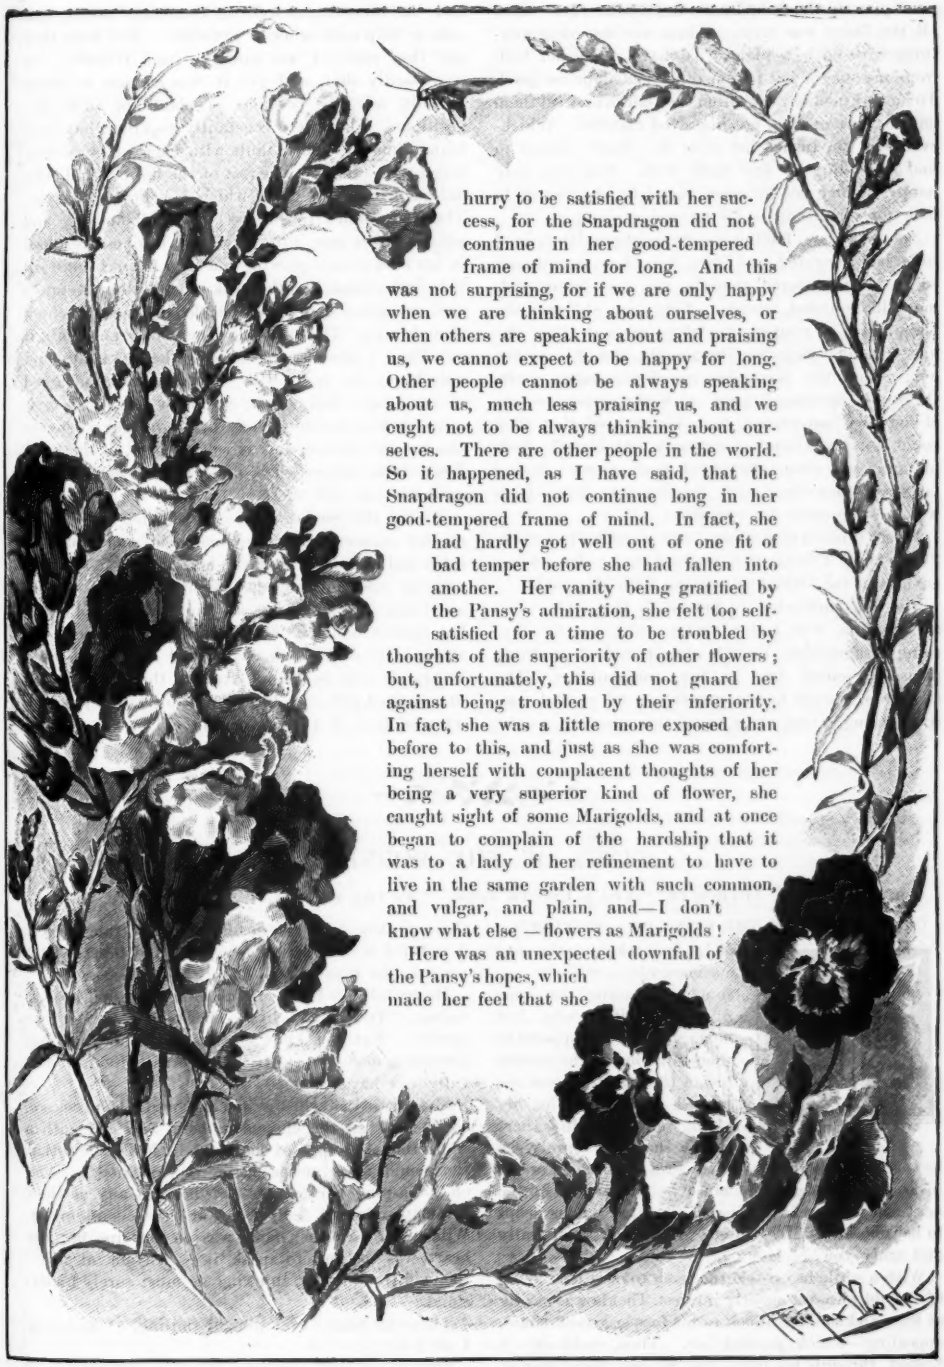
"What a lovely morning, madam, is it not?" said she, by way of a beginning. If she had been addressing almost any other flower of her acquaintance she would have left out the "madam," but she had long ago discovered that her neighbour grew up pretty straight, and was accustomed to stand somewhat on her dignity. Even among the blossoms on her flower-stalks she insisted on what she considered the due observance of rank and precedence; much more did she insist on regard being paid to conventional courtesy and etiquette between different plants. So the Pansy said "madam."

But the Snapdragon took no notice. She either did not hear or pretended that she did not.

"Not very promising," thought the Pansy; "but I 'll try again." At that moment she noticed a very comical expression upon the face of the Daisy, who, as soon as she caught the Pansy's eye, gave her a wink with a good deal of meaning in it. It meant that the Daisy understood exactly how the Pansy felt, and knew exactly what she was trying to do, but considered it a hopeless task to attempt to put the Snapdragon into a good temper when her ladyship thought fit to be in a bad one. There was a touch of sympathy in the wink—which was pleasant; but there was also a touch of superior wisdom in it—which was not. It was as though the Daisy had said, "I have a great deal more sense than to set myself to any such foolish endeavour as that which you have undertaken; but go on, if you like; everyone must learn for herself." So the Pansy felt a little put on her mettle. She was more fully resolved than before to get the Snapdragon into a good humour, if it were at all possible, for it would not only be good for the Snapdragon and herself, as the Snapdragon's neighbour, but it would show Daisy that her airs of superiority were a little out of place. She would try again.

"How are you feeling this morning, madam? There is the promise of a beautiful day. This sunshine is really enough to make anyone cheerful and well, is it not?"

The Snapdragon spoke this time; but it was less a reply to the Pansy's words than a remark to herself, which, however, she evidently intended the Pansy and others to overhear. "Just think," muttered she, "of that Dahlia. I wonder she is not ashamed of flaunting such staring colours in the face of the whole garden. I declare my eyes are so dazzled, it is as much as I can do to see anything else."



Now, the blossoms of the particular Dahlia referred to were of the same colour as were the blossoms of the Snapdragon herself, but they were brighter and larger. It was no secret that the Snapdragon had been anxious to increase both the brightness and size of her blossoms. She was finding fault, therefore, with the Dahlia for being what she had unsuccessfully tried to be herself. The Pansy knew this quite well, but was far too discreet, not to say too polite, to say so. It would probably have done very little good to read her a lesson on the sinfulness of envy, so the Pansy tried another method, which was all the easier for her, because, being a flower of a rather irregular blossom herself, she did not altogether admire the formal style of the Dahlia, and considered the Snapdragon really beautiful, or, at least, considered that she would be if it were not for the dulling of her colours and cramping of her growth by her envious and unhappy disposition. It was with a clear conscience that she was able to express for her a measure of admiration.

"I suppose I 'm too small to see either you or the Dahlia properly," said she. "You both of you seem to me right up against the sky; but, as far as I can judge, you are very nearly as big and as bright as she." You see, the Pansy knew what was the matter with the Snapdragon—that she was envious of the Dahlia—and so replied to her thought rather than her words. "Of course your style is different from hers," she went on, "and for my part, I think it is better. But then, every plant must blossom out according to its own nature, and must make the best it can of its own type of beauty. We must not blame the poor Dahlia because she cannot blossom after your form."

The Snapdragon was evidently gratified, and answered the Pansy quite pleasantly. The appreciation of the one flower had helped her to forget the superiority of the other, and to turn her thoughts from the Dahlia to herself. She grew quite friendly and free in conversation with the little Pansy, condescending to tell her what glorious and magnificent blossoms she had the last time she bloomed, and what still more glorious and magnificent blossoms she was going to have next time—she was not in bloom just then—and the Pansy listened with humble attention, highly pleased to see the Snapdragon so happy, though not blind to the fact that her happiness seemed to grow out of thinking and speaking about herself. So gracious, indeed, did she become, that she even praised the bright cheerful look the Pansy had when in full bloom. But even in this, I fear there was more desire to say what would be considered the proper thing for her to say than to express any real admiration. She was thinking of the necessity she thought herself under of saying something pleasant because she was so much grander than the little flower she was talking with. She spoke of the Pansy's bright looks: she was thinking of her own superior position and grace.

The Pansy understood this, but did not feel hurt about it. She was too glad to have succeeded in her aim, and was rather inclined to triumph over the Daisy, at whom she sent a quiet sly glance that as good as asked that perky little flower if she had not been a trifle over-wise just now, when she gave her that knowing wink.

But the Pansy was perhaps in a trifle too great a hurry to be satisfied with her success, for the Snapdragon did not continue in her good-tempered frame of mind for long. And this was not surprising, for if we are only happy when we are thinking about ourselves, or when others are speaking about and praising us, we cannot expect to be happy for long. Other people cannot be always speaking about us, much less praising us, and we ought not to be always thinking about ourselves. There are other people in the world. So it happened, as I have said, that the Snapdragon did not continue long in her good-tempered frame of mind. In fact, she had hardly got well out of one fit of bad temper before she had fallen into another. Her vanity being gratified by the Pansy's admiration, she felt too self-satisfied for a time to be troubled by thoughts of the superiority of other flowers; but, unfortunately, this did not guard her against being troubled by their inferiority. In fact, she was a little more exposed than before to this, and just as she was comforting herself with complacent thoughts of her being a very superior kind of flower, she caught sight of some Marigolds, and at once began to complain of the hardship that it was to a lady of her refinement to have to live in the same garden with such common, and vulgar, and plain, and—I don't know what else—flowers as Marigolds!

Here was an unexpected downfall of the Pansy's hopes, which made her feel that she must give up the Snapdragon in despair. Yes—after all, the Daisy was right. There was no doing anything with such a plant. To have made her look from one side of her to the other had done no good. To have turned her eyes from the Dahlia and set them on the Marigold had not improved matters. Whichever way she turned her eyes, she clearly meant to find something to find fault with. She was only happy so long as, by some oversight, she forgot to look for something to be miserable about.

So the Pansy, finding the Snapdragon determined to be bad-tempered, and being herself as determined to be good-tempered, thought she had better seek more like-minded friends. Very soon she and the Daisy and a couple of Asters were having the merriest time together imaginable, and it was not long before the Marigolds joined the happy circle. Of course the Snapdragon, with the sense she had of her own importance, took for granted that they could not be talking of anybody but herself—took for granted, when she heard their merry, ringing laughter, that they were laughing at her. Here was fresh ground for complaint.

"Just think of that Pansy," she grumbled to herself. "Only fancy a flower that professes to be above being envious of the Dahlia associating with Marigolds!"

She was muttering to herself in this style when a Geranium, who had a pretty quick ear for anything disagreeable, though almost deaf to anything pleasant, joined her in her complainings. The Geranium mostly had a grumbling fit on, but was, if anything, worse than usual this morning, so she and the Snapdragon were in congenial moods, and able to help each other to grumble. And from that day they grew—I was going to say, friendly. It was hardly that, and yet it was as near to being friendly as was possible to plants of such dispositions. They were constantly together, but they found almost as much fault with each other as they found with others. The rest of the flowers said they did each other no good, which I believe was true. The Geranium's fretfulness and fault-finding, and poking of her nose into everybody's business, resulted in her seed-vessel growing out into a long spike till it looked almost like the beak of a stork or a crane; and wherever she went people whispered behind their hands, "There, look! There's a crane's bill, if you like!" She never got rid of the nickname, and very likely she never will. But she is so ashamed of her long "bill" that, although her blossom is quite pretty, she hides away in the hedges whenever she has the chance, and is seldom seen in the open flower-beds, except when, much against her will, the gardener sets her there.

As for the Snapdragon, she suffered in a very similar manner. She grew more and more quarrelsome and irritable; in fact, she got into a habit of opening and shutting her mouth without saying anything, as though her utterance were choked by her morose temper. Moreover, when her seed-pods ripened, the effect of her continual grumbling could be plainly seen in them. And to this day a Snapdragon seed-pod is as like as possible to the pinched, wizened face of a cross-looking old crone.

WINGS OF THE MORNING.

BY C. DESPARD, AUTHOR OF "INTO A LARGER ROOM," "BY THE WATERS OF BABYLON," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER XVI.—AT THE BRINK OF A PRECIPICE.

THEKLA had taken up the card mechanically, without so much as reading the name of the visitor who had come at such an opportune moment. But on the threshold of the drawing-room she paused. Who was the big young fellow standing there in the shadow? Surely she had seen those kind brown eyes before. For an instant she thought she must be mistaken; in the next she was reassured, and the glad colour leapt to her cheeks. "Mr. Hinton!" she cried, "is it really and truly you?"

With a smile he crossed the room to meet her. Full of the old pleasant sisterly interest, Thekla was gazing at him, and she saw a look in his face—earnest, timid, appealing—which puzzled her. Then, suddenly, it flashed through his mind that he had heard Marion was disengaged still. Ah! and everyone said that there must be some reason for it. How strange—how delightful it would be if her dear, kind brother Hinton was the reason.

Meanwhile his hand was clasping hers, and he was saying, "Yes, it is I, little Thekla—oh! I beg your pardon. But you know on board the Amazon you always seemed like a little girl to us. How wonderfully you have changed!"

She was not offended, as she had been when Isaacson commented on the change in her. She said, with a smile, that she supposed she was a little older, but that she would never, never change to her friends. And oh!—clasping her hands—had he seen any of their shipmates, dearest Lady Lucy, or the General, or Mr. Wilkinson? Another name was on her lips, but her heart was too full to speak it. "Anyone at all!" she said tremulously, thinking he must surely understand.

"Give me time," said Ronald, smiling. "And may I sit down?"

"Sit down? of course. What a scatterbrain I am! Wheel the couch before the window, good Gopal, and bring me my work-table and chair. Are you in a hurry, or can you stay a little while?"

"I have nothing whatever to do until dinner," said Ronald.

"Because, I mean," said Thekla, taking out her embroidery, "it will be such a delightful surprise to Marion and father to find you here when they come back. Now I am going to work, and you must talk, and I shall feel as if we were on board the dear old Amazon again."

"I am to talk about Amazon folk, I suppose?"

"Oh yes, yes! Have you seen any of them lately?"

"I saw Lady Lucy only two days ago."

The busy little fingers that had been flashing to and fro stopped, and the large grey eyes were fixed upon Ronald's face. "You saw her? Oh! I wish I could!" she cried.

"I have a suspicion that you may see her before the winter is over," said Ronald. "She has an idea that you want looking after,"

"Oh! I do: I do—I mean," stammering and blushing, "I want her advice. I have just begun to go out, you know, and I am afraid I make dreadful mistakes sometimes."

There came a stern expression into the kind brown eyes. What had they been doing to his frank little darling to make her so timorous? "Surely," he said gravely, "you have friends here!"

"Oh, yes. I have my father and my sister. Only—well, I thought I should like a talk to Lady Lucy. Everybody confides in her," said Thekla. She was making a desperate effort to get back to her old light-heartedness, and to forget the skeleton that was stealing her life away. It was an imaginary skeleton, she said to herself. She had only to tell her father how rudely Isaacson had behaved, and he would be forbidden the house. And ah! there he was. "I hear the carriage!" she said, springing up. "Sit where you are, Mr. Hinton. I will tell them a visitor is here. They will be so much surprised!"

In a moment, before Hinton could stop her, she was out on the verandah. The barouche had just drawn up. Sir Richard, who had stepped out first, when he caught sight of his younger daughter's face, all aglow with pleasure and mystery, forgot to give his hand to Marion. "Why, Thekla," he cried, "Thekla!"

She ran into his arms. "Darling, I am so glad to see you!" she whispered.

He stroked her hair. "Then my child is happy?"

"Oh, yes, dear—perfectly happy now you have come back.—Marion," to her sister, who was standing close by, smiling, but not expansively, "there is a visitor in the drawing-room."

"Oh, indeed! Is there?" said Sir Richard. "This is very nice. So you have been playing the hostess in our absence, little madam! Blushing, too!"

"But, father——" stammered Thekla.

"You needn't apologise. You are caught. But girls are girls, and if you will tell me all about it, you shall be forgiven this time. Marion, will you very kindly go in and entertain this visitor for a few minutes? When I have had a few words with Thekla. I may possibly have a lecture for him. This way, my little girl."

He drew her to the curtain that shut off his library from the verandah, lifted it, and motioned that she should pass under. "Come," he said, with an encouraging smile—for her blushes and smiles had gone—"tell me all about it. Let your father be the first to hear of your good fortune."

They stood face to face in the cool dark room, luxurious with Eastern bijouterie and heavy with the scent of roses and magnolias. Only a few days before Sir Richard had feared he might have to leave it, and with it the things which were dearer than life to him, and at this moment, when, as he believed—and how else was he to interpret her look of smiling mystery?—his child, by yielding to his wishes, had prevented the crisis which was so nearly impending, he felt very tender and benignant towards her.

"You are trembling, my love," he said gently; his hand was on her shoulder, so that he could feel the tremor that passed through her; but the room was too dark for him to see the white anguish of her face. "Then it was true—all true!"—this is what she was saying to herself. She stood at the brink of a precipice, and hands—trusted hands—were pushing her over. She could not speak. She felt, at that moment, as if words would have choked her. Her father sat down on one of the settees, and drew her to his knees. "Sit here," he said. "Ah! child, if you knew how strange it is to me that you, my little Thekla, should be even thinking of such things as love and marriage! Why, it seems only the other day that I took you from the arms of your dying mother. 'Be a good father to my baby,' she said. And I have tried, Thekla."

"Yes—yes—yes! You are the best and dearest father in all the world."

"Hush! hush! my little one. You are exciting yourself. I know you love me; there is no need for protestations. And we must think of this poor visitor we have left with Marion." He was stroking her hair all the time, and his touch was so soft and kind that Thekla began to take heart again. "What is that you say?" he went on, as she stammered something about the visitor's feelings. "He will be pleased? Of course he will. But I think he may be just a little anxious to see us too. Are you surprised that I know so much about it? I think I must tell you a secret. I knew he was coming to-day—I let him come. I confess I was afraid of what the result might be, for it is more to you, and indeed to us all—much, much more than you can imagine, that you should accept this fine offer. But poor Isaacson was impatient. Do you know he is quite ridiculously in love with you, child? If it hadn't been for that—— Why, what is it?" She had drawn herself away from him and sprung to her feet.

"Father," she panted, "you are making a mistake. I haven't accepted anybody. Oh, dearest, don't turn away from me! Take me into your arms again! I love you—you—more than anyone else in the world, and why should I wish to leave you?"

"This is all nonsense, child," he said feebly; but his face turned pale, and he set his teeth together.

"Yes—yes—nonsense!" she cried. "I am your little Thekla, and——" With a stifled sob she threw her arms round his neck.

He thrust her away. "Do you mean to tell me," he said darkly, "that you have refused Isaacson?"

"I couldn't accept him, father."

"Not accept him? You have as good as accepted him already." And then he was silent for a few moments, and stood looking at her. It was a terrible change. All in a moment, like the sweeping down of a tornado upon the stillness of Southern seas, came the swift and awful revulsion of feeling. He was conscious of it himself. He was aware of departing miserably from his own standard of gentlemanly action and feeling, and this consciousness made him all the more angry with the slight girlish creature who had raised his hopes so highly only to dash them to the ground. And what was she—this little girl—his own daughter—that she should venture to resist his will? She must know, by this time, what he desired, and she should do it.

Forcing himself to speak quietly, he said—

"Is Mr. Isaacson here?"

"No, father."

"I gather from what you have said that he has been this afternoon?"

"Yes."

"How long did he stay?"

"I don't know."

"You sent him away?"

"I didn't ask him to stay."

"Answer me without prevarication. It was what you said that caused him to go away?"

"I think so."

"And what is this nonsense, then, about a visitor?"

"Mr. Hinton came, father."

"Hinton?"

"Yes; don't you remember him? He came out with us. I thought Marion would be glad to see him, and I wanted to give her a surprise."

"Oh! a surprise," said Sir Richard, with a smile of bitter satire. "So it is not enough to disobey me yourself—you must entrap your sister into disobedience. I am thankful to know that I need not be afraid. I have one dutiful daughter."

He stopped. Thekla did not answer, for she could not. Her face was covered with her hands, and she was weeping bitterly.

"Have you anything to say?" said Sir Richard. "Isaacson will come back at a word from me."

"No, no, no!" she said, shuddering.

"Then," he said sternly, "I must beg you to stay where you are until I can see you again. That Isaacson will come back I believe. I intend," with strong emphasis on the word, "that he shall find you more reasonable."

And so she was left alone with her wildly beating heart. She might easily have left the room, for one curtained opening led to the verandah, another to her sister's dressing-room, and a third to Sir Richard's sleeping apartment, which communicated with the dining-room. And this dark, heavily scented room oppressed her like a dungeon, made her feel as if she could neither think, nor breathe, nor understand, nor reason. But she would not stir. Reverence for her father governed her still. She did not think of him as cruel, only as mistaken. It was because he had set his heart upon seeing her rich that he would force this dreadful thing upon her. He could not know how impossible it was.

But if she obliged him in everything besides, then he might come to see that it was not perverseness which kept her steadfast, that in this she could not—she could not be obedient. Had the kind, soft-footed angel from whom, as our Father, for wise purposes, has ordained, men and women in the full rapture of life shall turn away with horror—had the angel of death stood on one side of her, and Isaacson, with all the bright possibilities of his boundless wealth, on the other, her choice would not have wavered for a moment. Nor did she ask herself why. Reasoning itself was out of the question, for there was no room for it. Everything—religion, intellect, taste, the innocence which, like a fair white garment, the Father of spirits sets about His children for their glory and defence—made this dreadful thing impossible, even to her imagination.

And so, while the darkness fell, she sat on alone in her prison.

Presently she heard voices in the verandah—Marion's light tones. "We hope you will come again, Mr. Hinton?"—His answer, curiously grave: "I shall certainly accept your kind invitation, Miss Ellerslie." Sir Richard ordering Gopal to call up Mr. Hinton's syce, the rattle of wheels and horses' hoofs in the compound, and then silence.

Another brief spell of time passed away, after which she was aware of steps in her father's dressing-room. He was moving about, and giving brief sharp orders to his bearer. After a few moments the voices dropped. He was ready, then; surely he would come in and speak to her—he must know how miserable she was. But the curtain upon which her eyes were fixed remained unlifted. The sounds of movement ceased; the glimmer of light died away; she was once more alone, and, gentle and patient as she was, she found her position almost intolerable. Was she to be left all night alone in this dismal place? Would not they send even Luchmee to her? What had she done—what had she done—that she should be so treated? She tried to cry out, but her father's face as she had seen it last came back to her, and her voice died away in her throat in indistinguishable sounds. Deadlier and more awful grew the silence; she was becoming frightened; she could hear her own pulses throbbing; dark fancies bred in hours of study took bodily shape and thronged about her. At last she felt that she could bear it no longer. She was on the point of rushing out, when she heard sounds again; wheels, a prodigious trampling of horses' hoofs; voices; and now her colour rose, and she uncovered her face and sat erect in her chair, looking out before her with dry, blazing eyes. Isaacson had come back, and if her imprisonment was to last all night she was glad of it. To save her life she would not have come out of the room.

"Poor little Thekla!" Surely the voice was purposely lifted. "So she is not able to see me this evening? That is bad news. We must try to do the best we can without her. To-morrow, I make no doubt she will be all right again."

And then the hateful voice, with its assumed good nature and its veiled brutality, died away in the distance; but it had done its work, for the girl's timidity and terror had gone. Abashed before her father, whom she loved, before this man, who, knowing she did not love him, would buy her with his gold, she could be brave and strong and steadfast.

"Thekla did not answer, for she could not."—p. 361.

CHAPTER XVII.—AN ALLIANCE OFFENSIVE AND DEFENSIVE.

Late that evening Lady Lucy Leveridge arrived in Bombay, drove to an hotel, and at once sent out a messenger for Ronald Hinton, who was with her in as short a time as possible.

"Why, Lady Lucy," he said, as soon as he was admitted to her presence, "I didn't expect you for a week at least. You look pale and agitated. I hope nothing is wrong. The General——"

"He is perfectly well, thank you, and will follow me shortly. Sit down, Ronald. No, there is nothing wrong with me," said Lady Lucy, trying to smile. "I have come for that poor child's sake. I can't get her out of my head; so my good husband, who is always distressed when I am, said 'You had better go on at once.' I ought to tell you that since I saw you last I have heard more about her. I wrote to friends in England who have known the Ellerslies for years. One of them was a great friend of the second Lady Ellerslie, and is co-guardian with Sir Richard of our poor little Thekla. My letter alarmed him; and he has not only given me a few very surprising particulars about the child and her father, but he has also asked me to act as his representative with her. But more of that presently. You have seen her?"

"Yes. I saw her to-day."

"You look grave. For pity's sake don't tell me she is engaged."

"I don't think it has come to that. But something strange is going on. In fact, I was in the middle of a letter to you when I received your message." He then gave a brief account of his visit to the Ellerslies, saying in conclusion: "My own belief is that the man has proposed to her, and that she has refused him, and that her father means to try and make her reverse her decision."

"To persecute her into marrying a man whom she abhors?" said Lady Lucy indignantly. "And what wonder? The man is a barbarian! He hasn't even manners. But I mustn't rave, for that won't help in the least. Ronald Hinton" (abruptly), "do you take a real interest in this little girl?"

"How do you define a real interest, Lady Lucy?"

"Nay; I think I must leave that to you."

And there they paused for a few seconds, and the brave honest eyes of the young man and the brave honest eyes of the woman, who, knowing the world well, had preserved unsullied her freshness of heart, looked one into the other.

"Does it mean," said Ronald at last, very sadly, "that one image fills all your heart and mind, that you see it by day, that you dream of it by night? Does it mean that you spend hours thinking and thinking for one; that for the comfort and happiness of that one—aye, even if you never share in it yourself—you would willingly give your life? Does this mean interest?—because——" His voice broke and his eyes fell. "I don't think I need say any more," he whispered.

And there was no need, for Lady Lucy was weeping. But from that time forth they were firmer allies than ever.

The next forenoon, taking the privilege of an old friend, Lady Lucy called on the Ellerslies. She was pleasantly received by Marion and effusively by Sir Richard, but she did not see Thekla. "My poor dear little sister was not well last night," said Marion. "I am afraid the climate tries her. I gave orders that she was not to be awoke this morning. But she may be getting up. I will call Luchmee."

The pretty little ayah came in, and Lady Lucy scanned her face. She had lived so long in India, and she had watched the people so closely, that she understood them after a fashion that is rare with the Anglo-Indian, to whom, in many cases, the native servant is merely a machine. To Marion, Luchmee was much the same as usual; Lady Lucy saw that in her face which made her tremble. There was anguish in the dark liquid eyes that for one instant, as if in search for help, had sought hers. Was the trouble Thekla's or her own?

"How is the chota Miss Sahib now?" said Marion.

"Miss Sahib sleeps," said Luchmee.

Marion turned to Lady Lucy. "Then we had better not awake her. But she will be so sorry to miss you."

"I will send her a message by Luchmee," said Lady Lucy. "Come here, my child."

Swiftly, at the sound of the kind voice, the dark eyes were lifted. They were full of intelligence now. This kind and clever English lady, who could read the heart of the Indian woman as if it were a book, would surely help them.

"Luchmee," said Lady Lucy gently, "you can take your Miss Sahib a message—can you not?"

"Exalted presence," said the ayah, bowing low, "the words that are told to Luchmee she will faithfully tell again."

"They will not be difficult to remember," said Lady Lucy. "Here is my card. Give it to Thekla Sahib when she awakes, and tell her that her old friend Lady Lucy hopes to see her soon. Do you understand?"

"Luchmee understands; Luchmee will remember," said the Indian woman, gathering the card into her bosom and gliding noiselessly from the room.

Later in the day Lady Lucy paid several more visits, and what she heard from her friends in Bombay made her tremble for Thekla's resolution. For the pretty little legend that had made Isaacson a success and Sir Richard a hero had gathered force and volume in its journey from mouth to mouth, and it was repeated to her everywhere. She denied it, of course; but her friends, although ready to admit that there might have been exaggeration, could not and would not give it up altogether. Others had met people, who had met other people, who had been on board the Amazon with the interesting young couple; and hadn't he given her presents? and was there not an unfortunate young fellow on the ship who broke his heart, or committed suicide, or something of the like dreadful sort, when he saw what was going on?

"Oh!" cried Lady Lucy, "this is too bad. You have got hold of the wrong end of the story altogether."

But her protests were of no use whatsoever; for, in spite of all she could say, the Isaacson-and-Ellerslie legend held the field.

"The child must be stronger than we think," she said to Ronald Hinton, whom she found that afternoon looking out for her eagerly in the ladies' side of the club, "or she would have been married already. The whole station is against us. What are we to do?"

"I can do nothing," said Ronald, very sadly. "I called this afternoon, and my card was taken in, and the message was, 'Doors shut!'"

"They were at home?"

"Yes, I am certain of it. I saw Isaacson's mail-phaeton and black horses in the compound."

"The plot thickens," said Lady Lucy. "I must get to speak to her. Let me see."

She thought for a few moments, and then said, "There is something going on here to-night?"

"Yes: a musical and elocutionary entertainment. The Ellerslies and Isaacson are sure to attend."

"And it is more than likely that Thekla will be left alone," said Lady Lucy, striking her hands together. "That would be my opportunity. But I should like to be sure before I make the venture."

XUM

"I have it," said Ronald. "You wait here, and I will watch the arrivals; and as soon as I see Sir Richard's party drive in, I will let you know who have come."

The evening came. Lady Lucy, cloaked and hooded, in a beautiful evening dress, and with a card of admission in her hand, was waiting in a corner of the library at the Yacht Club. Ronald Hinton was watching the carriage-loads of gaily dressed people come and go.

The Ellerslies' barouche drove up. It was open, for the night was clear and lovely, and he saw at once that it had three occupants—two gentlemen and a lady. Marion was the lady; Sir Richard and Isaacson were the gentlemen. Armed with this news, he went to Lady Lucy, and she was soon on her way to Malabar Hill.

CHAPTER XVIII.—A TERRIBLE NIGHT.

"Luchmee dear, what is that? I am sure—I am sure I heard a noise."

"Noise there is none," said Luchmee, lifting the curtain of her mistress's door and peeping out. "Still is the house, and night has fallen. Will not Miss Sahib sleep again?"

"No, Luchmee; I have slept long enough."

"But see; I will fan Miss Sahib, and Sonya shall sing to her."

Sonya was at Thekla's feet. When her mother spoke, she lifted her voice and sang a little Persian song, which ran something like this:—

"Gather roses, gather roses, in the garden of the sun.
The thousand-eyed beholding, whose race is nearly run.
While champa-buds are bursting, and the air breathes soft and sweet,
Gather roses, dearest maiden: they are springing at thy feet."

The sweet thrilling voice filled the room, so that when there were sounds none of the three heard them, and Lady Lucy, whom Gopal had admitted, was actually within the door before the song was over.

Sonya, whose face was towards the door, saw her first, and gave a little cry, which Thekla echoed. But in the next instant the cry was a cry of rapture, for Lady Lucy's kind arms had received her.

"Too bad of me to give you such a surprise!" she said smilingly; "but the fact is that your little maid's sweet voice attracted me; and when I had come in, you know, I couldn't stir. You can't think what a pretty picture you made! But tell me, how is it that I find you here, and not in the midst of the gaiety at the Club?"

The dark flush mounted to Thekla's face. "I am not very well," she said, in a low voice; "and—and someone is there whom I had rather not meet. But"—springing up—"here I am talking about myself and forgetting you. Take off your cloak, dearest Lady Lucy. Oh, no; I am not so ill that I cannot wait upon you. Luchmee, tell Gopal to get some tea ready, and to bring it in as quickly as ever he can. Now I shall be quite comfortable; and oh, how delightful this is!" said the poor child, nestling close to her friend.

"You have been alone long, you poor little thing!"

"All day, except for Luchmee; and yesterday there was no one."

"But why?"

"I am afraid it would be too long a story," said Thekla, sighing.

"I have come to hear it, Thekla."

"Then you know?" said Thekla, hiding her face in her hands.

"I know something. You must tell me the rest."

There was a pause, and then Lady Lucy went on. "Listen while I tell you a little story of my own. A few weeks ago, when my husband and I were camping out in a wild part of the Punjaub, I saw amongst the dark hosts thronging about us a face which I thought I knew. It was under a jewelled turban, which crowned a rich Oriental dress, so at first I was perplexed. But presently I saw the stranger address my husband. The General looked pleased, brought him up to me at the door of my tent where I was sitting, and asked me if I had room at the dinner-table for an old friend. Then I saw that my first impression had been right. Through the disguise of the Oriental dress I had recognised—can you guess whom?"

"Was it Mr. Grierson?" said Thekla, whose cheeks were rosy again.

"Yes, our friend Michael, and not changed in the least, though I must tell you that he has become rather a personage. One of his Eastern relatives, who died lately, left him a large fortune, and now, if you please, his head is full of schemes. He is going to educate, and elevate, and no one knows what. That, however, doesn't belong to my story."

"It is just what I should like to hear," said Thekla, who felt as if she were being lifted into the larger life of which she had dreamed, and leaving the bitterness of the present behind her. "Couldn't you tell me?" she entreated.

"Not to-night, my dear child. It would take hours. Besides, we shall hear of all that presently. If I don't very much mistake, Michael is one of those of whom the world will talk; and when the world talks, you know, everybody listens. And now come down, if you please, out of your dreamland. My little story is not meant to send you on a voyage of discovery through the universe, but to explain how I know what I have come here this evening to tell. I wonder if it will astonish you very much to hear that our eccentric friend Michael had more to say about you that night than about his grand schemes for the regeneration of Eastern society?"

"About me? Oh, Lady Lucy!"

"I am telling you the simple truth. In fact, I may say that my presence here to-night is due to him. Do you remember poor Murchison?"

"Indeed, indeed, I do!"

"He said some strange things to you."

Thekla covered her face with her hands, and trembled. "Why do you speak of him?" she said.

"Because I must, dear." As she spoke Lady Lucy laid her hand softly on the girl's flushed cheek.

"Listen to me," she said, "and believe that it is for your sake, and to prevent a great wrong from being done, I speak as I do. Michael was poor Murchison's friend, and he confided to him this amongst other things—that he had overheard a conversation between your father and Isaacson."

"She heard a noise, and instinctively her hand closed over them."—p. 373.

"But ought I to hear? Ought anyone?" cried Thekla. "What was said was not meant for us."

"Dear," said Lady Lucy gently, "you are right, and I respect you for your honourable feeling. But in certain kinds of warfare we must use the defences that are provided for us. This was the case with Murchison, who had reasons—good reasons, I believe—for disliking and despising Isaacson. As it pains you, I will not repeat what was overheard; but I will tell you a fact you may not know—you are the inheritress of all your mother's property."

"And my father—Marion!" gasped Thekla.

"Marion has nothing. Your father has a life-interest in part of your mother's property."

"Has father no money of his own, then?"

"I believe not. When he and your mother met, he was on the verge of ruin. This Michael told me. Part of it he had gathered from Murchison's story, and part from inquiries which he made afterwards. But so long as you were living quietly, and Isaacson was away, he made no sign. It was only when he heard that you had begun to go out, and that Isaacson was coming to Bombay, he came to me."

"How did he know?" said Thekla, the colour on her cheek deepening. It was strange and sweet to be so cared for, but she would have prefered that anyone else—anyone else in all the world rather than Michael—should have heard this miserable story.

"How does Michael know everything? I can't tell you," said Lady Lucy; "no one can. But I never knew him to fail in any search he attempted. This, however, was not so extraordinary, for I myself heard through quite another channel that Isaacson gave himself out everywhere as virtually engaged to you."

"I can believe that," said Thekla. "But my father—he had not consented. He was as much surprised as I was when Mr. Isaacson came the other day."

"My dearest child, I am very, very sorry, but I must open your eyes. Your father has made up his mind that you shall marry Isaacson. Can't you understand? Must I speak more plainly? When you come of age, if you wish it, or whenever you marry, should you marry in the ordinary way, nearly all your father's income will leave him."

"But it cannot; it shall not. My father's income! It would be fearfully unjust. If I say I will not take it! If I say I will die first!"

"Your father would prefer to make it certain. Your marriage with Isaacson will do this. He promises either not to touch your money at all, or to give back your father the equivalent of your fortune. I confess I could not at first believe this."

"And I do not; I do not! It is not true. Whoever said so, it is false. My father! No, no; it can't be. He wishes me to be rich. That is natural. Fathers often wish their daughters to be rich," said poor little Thekla, looking at her friend piteously. "But it is not because of that. He knows I would not take his money—I—his little Thekla; and leave him without anything! He knows he has only to speak, and I will, so gladly, give up everything." She tried to smile, but her lips were trembling, and the smile only flitted over her face for an instant "I rich!" she cried, "and my father and Marion poor? It can't be. Lady Lucy, for pity's sake, tell me you were dreaming when you said it."

"No, my poor child; I was not dreaming. Michael said there was time, and I wrote to England. Do you remember Mr. Harrington?"

"Yes, very well! He was my mother's cousin, and when I was a child I often met him. But he and my father had a dispute about some property, and it is a long time since I have seen him."

"Mr. Harrington is your guardian, Thekla, and he has delegated his responsibilities to me. I am to watch over you in his place—to protect you against your own father, if that is necessary."

After these terrible words there was silence. Thekla did not protest any more. She covered her burning face with her hands, and Lady Lucy, who thought she was weeping, kept silent, feeling it wise to allow this natural sorrow to have its vent before she proposed the plan which had, in the meantime, occurred to herself, and which was that Thekla, if this marriage were further pressed upon her, should leave her father and sister for a time, and accept her guardianship.

That plan was never proposed, for when, after those few moments, Thekla looked up, Lady Lucy saw with surprise that her eyes were dry, and that her face, though white as that of the sheeted dead, was very firm and still. "Thank you for coming, Lady Lucy," she said quietly. "It has been very good of you. But I think, perhaps, you had better leave me now. My father thinks I am disobedient. That, I suppose, is natural, for I have never before refused to do what he asked me. And so I have made up my mind to be very careful in everything else. Then he will see, in a short time, that I don't really mean to be rebellious, and he will forgive me. But if he found you here, he might think I was fighting against him. I am very sorry. I ought to have thought of this at first, and not let you talk to me. Of course, it can't make any difference. My money is my father's: he knows that perfectly well. It is Marion's too. How can there be these differences in families? And if dearest father wishes me to marry richly, it is only because he knows so well that I would never take anything away from him, and that he wishes to see me comfortable. It is all so plain to me. I wonder you could not have seen it," said Thekla, with her little air of dignity. "I shall, of course, make my father understand that I don't care in the least for being rich: in fact, that I had much rather be poor, and then it will be all right. Good-bye;" and she held out her hand.

"But, my dear child," said Lady Lucy, who had never felt so baffled in her life, "supposing your father insists, what will you do then?"

"He will not insist. I am his daughter. I know him better than you can. And, oh! I am afraid I can't talk any more," she said brokenly, being in momentary fear of breaking away from her new dignity, and throwing her arms round Lady Lucy's neck, and crying like a child. "Please—please—leave me."

"If you really wish it, Thekla,"

"I do! I do! And——"

"Well, dear, what?"

The white face had flushed crimson. "If—if," she stammered, "you should chance to meet Mr. Grierson again, will you thank him for taking so much interest in me, and tell him I could never——" The voice died away.

"Go on," said Lady Lucy. "You could never——"

"I shall never marry anyone," cried the poor child; and then she hid her face in her pillows, and Luchmee, whom she had called feebly, came to her, and Lady Lucy went away with a pang at her heart.

Luchmee helped Thekla to undress, and then she and Sonya went away to their hut in the compound, and the young girl was left alone. She was tired, and she hoped to sleep. A curious physical weakness seemed to oppress her. She was glad she had sent Lady Lucy away, and yet she would have called her back, for she felt as if she had not a single friend in the wide world.

She had been lying awake for what seemed to her a long time, when the carriage drove into the compound, and, a few moments later, Marion, who slept in a room communicating with hers by an arched and curtained doorway, came in and began to move about. Thekla, being seized with a strong desire to see her sister, called out, but Marion did not answer, and, supposing she had not been heard, she remained where she was quietly for another few minutes. At last the wish to repeat her strange story, and to hear Marion's indignant denial of it, became too strong to be resisted, and she got up, smoothed her hair, and threw on her tea-gown.

Now Marion, as it happened, was not in an amiable mood that night. Things generally had been showing a perverse inclination to go against her of late. Thekla had been made of importance: she had been overlooked: she feared, since Thekla was rich and she poor, that this sort of thing would go on. Then uninteresting people had paid her attentions, keeping the interesting and important people away; and now, to complete her humiliation, Ronald Hinton, the handsome and devoted young civilian, to whose coming she had looked forward, as giving her the assurance of, at least, some fun, had come to Bombay indeed; but come in a very different character from that which she had expected him to bear. He looked at her calmly: he, who had gone into a small fever of rapture, if, in those happy Amazon days, she had so much as smiled at him. And he spoke to her coldly, and showed no particular interest in her concerns. But—which was worse—she had at once suspected that it was Thekla who had supplanted her, and her suspicion had been confirmed that evening. Ronald had, by Sir Richard's orders, been denied the house in the afternoon; but he would not allow himself to be avoided at the Yacht Club entertainment, and, in spite of Marion's studied coldness of manner, he asked questions about Thekla, the gravity and earnestness of which had a curiously irritating effect upon Marion's nerves.

We may say that, so far as this went, Thekla was not to blame. She had not set herself to conquer Ronald Hinton, and she was now what she had always been—Marion's ready helper and warm admirer. But when we wish to be angry we do not need to seek far for a cause; in fact, as a rule, we are more angry with the guiltless ones than with those who have actually wronged us: their innocence, when we wish to have a legitimate cause for offence, adding bitterness to our displeasure.

Marion persuaded herself that evening that admiration was spoiling her sister. Thekla had become conceited and objectionable; she was obstinate; she was making them all miserable by her perverse opposition to her father's commands; and she was becoming grossly selfish, and taking the best of everything for herself. This last accusation was a little difficult to maintain, till it occurred to her that of their two ayahs Luchmee was much the cleverer, which, of course, was unfair, as she, being the elder, should have had her choice.

Thoughts of this bitter kind were drifting uncomfortably through Marion's mind, when, as she lay upon her bed, with a book in her hand and a lamp by her side, the curtain between the rooms was lifted, and she saw Thekla's white face, lit by those large, pitifully imploring eyes, emerging from the shadows. The sight naturally did not soothe her; rather it added to her irritation; and, being really afraid of saying something she might repent afterwards, she called out petulantly that Thekla should go away, as she was much too tired to talk.

For a moment Thekla paused; but the longing for human companionship and one kind, reassuring word, was too great to be resisted. In the piteous unreasonableness of love she stole in, and took a seat by Marion's bed.

"Dearest," she said pleadingly, "I won't keep you long; but I must speak to you for one moment. I have heard a strange story to-night. I don't believe it in the least; but I want to tell it to you, and to hear you say it is not true."

"You have heard a strange story to-night?" said Marion, ready to seize upon the first occasion for reproach. "Pray, whom have you seen?"

"Don't look so angry, dearest. I couldn't help it, indeed. I saw Lady Lucy."

"Do you mean to say, Thekla, that Lady Lucy Leveridge has been here to-night?"

"Yes, Marion. Why not? She came to see me."

"Stole in, you mean, when she knew that father and I were out of the house. I see it all now," cried Marion bitterly. "And you entertained her, of course, with the story of father's severity and my unkindness—a story which she will be delighted to repeat. I see it! I see it!"

"You see what? Oh, Marion!" cried Thekla, "you frighten me! Why do you look at me so?"

"I frighten her!" laughed out Marion. "I am appearing in a new character. This is really very interesting. Go on, you poor little thing! That is the look that makes people pity you, I suppose."

"Marion, how can you be so cruel? I want no one to pity me—no one but father and you. I begged Lady Lucy to go away."

"Perhaps you will be good enough to tell me what she told you," said Marion, with dignity; "for it appears you listened to what she had to say before you sent her away. To my limited intellect that seems a little inconsistent."

"It was wrong," said Thekla, very sadly. "And that is why I am so anxious to tell you. Lady Lucy says I have money—much more than either father or you."

"That is true, or it will be true shortly. You are an heiress. In two years' time—for I believe there are no conditions—you will be independent of us altogether. Did you tell me this that I might congratulate you?" said Marion sarcastically.

"You know I did not," said Thekla, stung almost past endurance.

"Then why, in the name of all that is wonderful, do you come in at this hour of the night to tell it to me?"

"Because," said Thekla, hungry still for that indignant word of denial which would give her peace—"because, Marion, Lady Lucy said something more. She thinks, and some other people think, that it is on account of this father wishes me to marry Mr. Isaacson."

"Well?" said Marion coldly.

"But it can't be; it can't be."

"My dear, to be frank with you, I fail to see why it should not be. If you were a French girl, your marriage would be arranged for you. If you were a princess, you would be married for reasons of State. Why, being as you are, a little person who does not know her own mind—for I am convinced you were pleased enough with Mr. Isaacson a few days ago—we should be so very choice and delicate over you, I cannot really understand. You have everything that we have not: for money means everything in these days. If my father wishes to secure money to himself and to me for the remainder of our days by giving you to a rich and particularly agreeable young man, who has nothing in the world against him, I see no hardship in it—quite the opposite. You, I suppose, have other views. Mr. Hinton, who is certainly handsomer, would be more to your mind."

"Marion, Marion! How can you be so cruel and wicked?"

"Then why," said Marion fiercely, "do you come in at this hour of night, when I am tired and cross, and goad me into saying things which I shall be sorry for presently?"

"Yes, yes; you will be sorry," said Thekla, catching, like one in deep waters, at this little straw of hope. "You are sorry already, my poor darling. It is my fault for bothering you. You know very well that if I were given more money than you I would not keep it. And you know—oh! Marion, say you know, and I shall go to bed so happily—you know that father couldn't do as you say."

"I know this," said Marion, whom the pitiful address, emphasised by the soft shining of eyes that she knew now to be more beautiful and fascinating than her own, had only hardened: "father will have you obey him, or he will give you up altogether. He will put you to school, or something of the sort, till you are of age, which would be an excellent arrangement for us all; and then he will let you take your money and go where you please. As for not taking it, don't talk such ridiculous, babyish nonsense. Heroics of that sort don't outlast the bread-and-butter age. And now, have you anything else to say?"

"Nothing else. No, I don't think so," said Thekla, pressing her hand to her head. She got up, and went towards her own room, moving uncertainly, like one who is dazed; but before lifting the curtain she stopped and looked round. "Is it true, quite true?" she cried out. "Marion, for pity's sake tell me."

"Is what true?"

"That I must choose—that is what you said, I think; but my head is so strange, I can't remember—that I must choose between obeying my father and losing him?"

"Yes, it is true. There is no other alternative. Ask him, if you won't believe me. He will tell you."

"Oh no! Your word is enough. Thank you, dear, for telling me frankly; now I shall know what to do. Good-night."

The voice died away, the white face disappeared; and Marion, who was trembling from head to foot with terror of herself, lay back against her pillows and tried to sleep. Tried to sleep, but could not. This new agitation, this awful triumph and awful misery, held her spell-bound in their fatal grasp, and kept all her nerves quivering. Once she was moved to go in to Thekla, and gain rest for herself by unsaying her cruel words. But the spirit of pride was too strong to be mastered even by her misery, and, unfortunately for herself, she resorted to another anodyne. It had been given to her during the illness from which she was recovering when she left home, and the relief had been so great and immediate that she had resolved to carry some about with her always, in case the nervous trouble should return. But this was worse than any nervous trouble from which she had ever suffered. In the darkness she groped for the phial, and poured herself out a dose. In a few moments after she had taken it she was sleeping heavily.

CHAPTER XIX.—THE CRISIS.

When Thekla awoke the following morning, she found Luchmee standing by her bedside with her tea-tray, and Sonya peeping in at her smilingly through the mosquito-curtains. Lady Lucy's visit of the previous evening had made them both happier, and Thekla tried to be cheerful too; but she could not. As she took her breakfast and dressed, all sorts of wild plans were drifting through her mind. She would go away: she would be lost: some of these kind Indian people would give her a hut in their village, and she would dress and live as they did, and her father and Marion would think she was dead. It would be better to die really. This she said to herself when she was kneeling by her bedside, and trying, through the terrible confusion of her spirit, to say her morning prayer. But Death, the peace-bringer, will not come to our call. This Thekla knew. So, after a few moments' struggle, she said over the dear old familiar words which she had been accustomed, from her infancy, to repeat, rose from her knees, and went out into the verandah.

Her father was there; but as soon as he saw her he retreated into his library. Did this mean, Thekla wondered, that she was expected to remain in her own room? She made a few steps towards her father's library, and then returned, for a new fear and a new shame had taken possession of her.

Presently, through the brilliant sunlight, she saw Gopal approaching her. He made a low salaam, and put a letter in her hand, which she saw at once was from her father. She opened it, and read as follows:—"If you feel disposed to obey my wishes, come to my room and tell me so; and, in consideration of your penitence, I will try to forget the uneasiness you have caused me. If you are still in the same mind, I must beg you to remain in your own room for the present. Your inability to tolerate the guests whom I choose to invite to the house will prevent you from taking your place at my table or in the drawing-room."

With a burning spot on her cheek, Thekla read the cold and cruel words, each one of which confirmed fearfully what she had heard the night before; then not thinking for a moment of disobedience, she went back into her room.

Slowly, very slowly, the hours of the forenoon wore away. At tiffin-time she heard Isaacson's step and voice in the verandah; but she heard nothing of Marion. Luchmee, meanwhile, went to and fro, waiting upon her, and Sonya sat in a corner, watching her with sad plaintive eyes, that soon—although happily none of them knew it then—would be filled full with a bitter anguish of their own. And still those plans which she could not think out came and went through Thekla's brain. They tormented her by their vagueness, and hoping to steady her brain, she threw down her sewing-work and took up a book. Her late friends and favourites were lying about her. She tried them one after another, but with the same effect. She could not for one moment forget her perplexities.

At last, when she was almost in despair, her eye lighted upon a new book, which had been unwisely lent to her, but which she had not yet had courage to attempt. It was, in fact, a curious book which was written at the time when the terrible league known in India as Thuggee was being hunted down. The awful story, that is nothing more nor less than a plain record of cold-blooded massacres, undertaken and carried out, under the supposed sanction of religion, by men not only to all appearance in their sane senses, but animated in their domestic life by tender and elevated feelings, has a certain weird power, and is not to be recommended as comfortable reading for the timid; especially for those amongst them whose fate it is to be constantly in presence of the dark-hued Indian, who, as a general rule, is a gentle and inoffensive being.

But such as it was, it answered Thekla's need that day, for the horror and pity of it held her spell-bound.

She was deep in one of its tragic episodes when, looking up suddenly, she saw Luchmee, with convulsed face and streaming eyes, standing before her, and the horror of the story being fresh upon her, she started up with a cry of fear. Remembering then that it did not take much to make Luchmee weep, and that probably the tears were for her, she composed herself, and tried to smile.

"Luchmee," she said, "do you know that crying will not help either of us?"

"Miss Sahib," wailed the poor little creature, "it is the happiness of Luchmee's life to serve you. If she is taken away from you she will die."

"But who thinks of taking you away?"

"The big Miss Sahib. She told Luchmee. Here is her letter."

"A letter—a letter from Marion? How strange!" murmured Thekla. While Luchmee, wrapping her head in her white veil, and sobbing like a child, crouched at her feet, she opened and read her sister's letter.

"MY DEAR THEKLA,—I scarcely remember what passed last night, for I was tired and out of sorts; but I believe I made use of one or two expressions for which I ought to apologise to you. I am sorry I was so hasty; but it was too bad of you to come in as you did, and to insist upon speaking to me when I was tired and irritable. You really don't know what mischief you may do when you act in that inconsiderate way. Everything is so upsetting just now, that I have, with father's consent, made up my mind to take the change which I have been thinking of at once. I have telegraphed to our friends at Poonah, and I will start on my visit to them this afternoon. By-the-bye, if I leave Duniah with you, I am sure you will not mind my taking Luchmee. Having been trained under Janet, she is far more capable, and as I shall be going out continually, it will be necessary for me to have an ayah upon whom I can depend. I have spoken to Luchmee, and instead of taking it as she should—for it is really a compliment to her—she chooses to cry and go on like a baby. Please speak to her, and try to make her understand reason.

"As for you, I hope you will be sensible, and do as father wishes, for I am certain it will be best for us all. I hope you will not think me unkind for saying that I had rather not see you before I start. Forget the worst things I said. It is so unlike me to speak in that way, that I can't get over my feeling of annoyance with you for having goaded me into saying them. Good-bye. When I come back I hope we shall be again, as we have been—sisters and friends."

So Marion's letter ran. With a sinking heart Thekla read it. Here also there was neither help nor hope for her, but she read through the lines that Marion was unhappy, and, after her own fashion, penitent; and the love and pity, which, try as they would, her father and sister could not kill, welled up in her heart, and filled her eyes with tears. "Poor Marion!" she murmured; "it hurts her to be unkind. Luchmee," she went on softly, "get up. It is foolish to go on so; and do you know what they will say? They will say that I have spoiled you. There! That's right; you look more like yourself. Now listen to what I say. You will go with my poor sister without complaining any more—you and my dear little Sonya. Yes, Sonya must go too, for I might not know what to do with her. And you will serve the big Miss Sahib as you serve me, dearest Luchmee, and if she is tired and sad, Sonya will sing to her. Yes; it is my wish. How could I keep you when my sister wants you? Wherever I am, I shall love to think that you are serving her. Besides, it is her order, and we must all do what we are told. You will go, will you not?"

Poor little Luchmee could not speak, for the sobs in her throat were choking her; but she bent low in sign of assent, and then slowly, with a lingering backward look at her young mistress, she hurried away.

It was not until Luchmee had gone that Thekla realised what she had done. Then, for a few minutes, the bitterness of desertion filled her heart. She was alone. In all the world there was no one to whom she could turn for help or counsel. In an agony of weeping, she flung herself down upon her bed. What were riches to come in comparison with this great misery of the present? "Dearest mother," she murmured, dimly understanding now why these strange provisions had been made, "you meant to shield me; but it would have been better not. I might have never known that they do not love me." For this was the bitterness: they did not love her; they did not believe in her love. Had they cared for her as she cared for them, they must have known how impossible it was that she could ever consent to be rich, seeing them poor. As it was, how should she ever convince them?

Marion had laughed at her notion of giving up everything. Would her father do the same? And even if he would not, how could she find out? To tell him what she had told Marion would have been impossible. Filial respect and a sense of shame, which she could neither understand nor conquer, forbade. And how could she offer to give up to him what he felt, no doubt, was his by right? Never once, through all this bitter labyrinth of contending thought and feeling, did it occur to Thekla that the easiest way of solving the problems that faced her would be to obey her father and consent to marry Isaacson. From first to last she felt that out of the question. Some other way there must be, if only she could find it.

For hours she thought and thought, coming no nearer to a solution of her problem, which was to get herself out of the way of her father and Marion, so that the property which would have come to her might be theirs. The afternoon closed in, and she heard Gopal's voice calling severely to her ayah, Duniah, that she should take in tea to her at once. Duniah was a lazy, sleepy woman, who did no more work than was absolutely necessary. She stole in with the tea-tray put it down, and looked helplessly at Thekla, who told her that she would not want anything more that evening. Thereupon Duniah went out to her hut, and, glad of the rest and inaction—for Marion gave her plenty to do—cooked her evening meal, curled herself up in her blanket, and went to sleep.

Thekla, meanwhile took up her weird book again, and lost herself for a brief spell in its horrors. Darkness fell; she lighted her lamp; and then, thinking that the house was curiously still, she called out to Gopal, and asked him if her father had come in. He answered that the Sahib was dining out, and wished to know when she would have her dinner, and she told him what she would take, requesting that it should be brought to her room. It did just strike her that after he had heard what she had to say he lingered, and there was a curious furtiveness in his expression which for a moment startled her. But this impression was fugitive. Gopal went out, and she returned to her book. On this occasion however, it did not hold her attention long, for a scene out of the past which might possibly have some bearing upon the present had darted in upon her brain.

All in a moment she has left the burning plains of India behind her, and is wandering through her childhood's home. She comes to the large room on an upper storey that is still called the nursery, and sees Anna, her dear old nurse, sitting by the fire. Anna calls to her solemnly, "Miss Thekla, come here. I have something to say to you." "Is it anything more than good-bye, Anna?" "Yes, my bairn, it is more. As I cannot go with you on your journey, I wish you to take this;" and she gets up—Thekla can see her now—and lays her trembling fingers on a parcel sealed with many seals. "This, bairnie, was given to me by one who is gone, to be held in trust for you till you came of age or married, and, but that you 're going so far, I would not give it to you now. But it has come to me that you may want a friend in these distant lands. If you do so, open the packet. But, bairnie, you must promise me two things. You must tell no one you have this parcel and you must only open it if you want for help." This was the scene that memory floated back upon Thekla. She had taken this packet, as she remembered now, and, smiling at the conditions imposed upon her, she had hidden it away and forgotten it. With a curious shock of feeling it came to her that to-day the condition was fulfilled; trembling from head to foot, she ran to her box of treasures, and drew out old Anna's packet.

In the next instant a cry, half of rapture, half of fear, broke from her lips. It was a casket of jewels. The glitter of diamonds, and the deep-glowing rose of the ruby, and the flash of emeralds met her bewildered gaze. Looking closer, she saw writing, and her eyes filled with tears when she read the following words, written in a faint and trembling hand: "These are for my little daughter. I shall give them to my good Anna. She is faithful."

Poor mother! poor mother! Had she found out that no one was faithful but her nurse? Thekla covered her face with her hands, and for a few moments gave herself up to unrestrained weeping.

The torrent of her tears was checked by a curious, uncomfortable, and unaccountable feeling. It came to her like a chill—a hand of ice upon her heart. Through her mingled sorrow and excitement there penetrated a sense of terror, which she could not combat. She knew that the gems she held in her hand were valuable, and she was alone, perfectly alone, with none but dark servants in the house. Even her faithful Luchmee had gone.

The weird stories she had read that day were fresh in her mind as she thought how easy it would be for anyone to put her out of the way and carry off her precious casket. Then another thought came, and she smiled sadly to think of Anna's reason for giving her the packet. If only Luchmee had not gone! If any single being whom she could trust were near, she might put one of her wild plans into execution. In Bombay the gems could be exchanged for money, and with it she could go away, lose herself, be to her father and sister as if she were dead.

All this time her face was covered with her hands, and the jewels were spread out upon her knee.

She heard a noise, and instinctively her hand closed over them. In the next instant she had sprung to her feet, and her cheeks were burning, and her eyes were dry and shining, for she knew that the crisis of her fate had come. In a shadowy corner, half hidden by the curtains that led through her dressing-room to the verandah, a dark, lithe form, with an unknown face, was standing.

(To be concluded.)

THE CHILDREN'S HYMN.

THY word, O Jesus, in the past,
Once calmed the roaring sea,
And stilled the raging of the blast,
On storm-tossed Galilee.

The sudden tempests of the heart,
That cause distress and pain,
Thy voice can bid them all depart,
And bring us peace again!

Speak, in the accents of Thy grace,
When tears invade the eyes,
When anger flashes from the face,
And words of passion rise—

Say to us softly, "Peace, be still!"
Thou hast the right alone
To rule the thought, to curb the will,
To claim us for Thine own!

INTERNATIONAL SERIES.

MARCH 16TH. THE DRAUGHT OF FISHES.

To read—St. Luke v. 1—11. Golden Text—ver. 10.

PEOPLE TAUGHT (1—3). Last lesson told of Christ healing many sick who crowded around Him. To-day read of people crowding together to hear Him: Why were they so eager to listen? Because—

He brought good tidings—salvation and peace.

He taught Word of God—not traditions of men.

Picture the scene to the children:—

The day calm and fine—summer weather.

The lake glistening in the sunshine.

Two empty boats lying sideways on the beach.

The fishermen—sitting on the sand—washing their nets.

Christ enters Simon Peter's boat—is pushed out a little from the shore—sits in the stern and teaches.

The people sit on the sand on the shore.

Would we not have listened to such a teacher?

II. FISH CAUGHT (4—7). Christ bids Simon—

Push the fishing-boat out into the deep water.

Let down the nets for a haul.

Notice two things about Christ:

(b) His testing of Simon's obedience.

What objections did the Apostle make?

(a) Night is the time for fishing, not the day.

(b) We have toiled all night without success.

Yet he does what he is told. Why?

Because of his faith in Christ. Had already seen many of His miracles, heard many of His words. Is sure can trust Him now. How was his faith rewarded?

A multitude of fish caught, so that the net "began to break" (not "brake" as A.V). Their partners James, John, Andrew (St. Matt. iv. 18—21) beckoned to help—both boats filled with shiny, glittering fishes.

III. A DISCIPLE ENCOURAGED (8—11). What effect had this miracle on Simon?

Fear, because of the mighty power of Christ.

Humility, because of his own unworthiness.

Realised for first time Who and what Christ was—the Son of God, therefore felt his own sin.

How could a sinner stand before God?

How did Christ encourage him?

By word—fear not. By command—to leave all and follow Him. By promise—he should now catch men.

LESSONS. 1. Faith in Christ as friend, Saviour.

Blessed are all they that trust in Him.

2. Obedience. Work done at God's command must ensure success.

3. Humility. Christ's presence and power is for blessing, not for hurt. He giveth grace to the lowly.

MARCH 23. CHRIST FORGIVING SIN.

To read—St. Luke v. 17—26. Golden Text—ver. 31.

I. THE DISEASE (17—19). Notice first those present.

Christ the great Teacher instructing even the learned men.

Pharisees and doctors from all parts around.

A crowd of people thronging the house.

Now a procession comes up—four men (St. Mark ii. 4) carrying a sick friend on a litter. What was the matter with him? Palsied or paralysed. Notice about this disease. It was—

(a) Painless. Person afflicted lost all sense of feeling in his limbs. They were useless and dead.

(c) Hopeless. Gradually became worse. Nothing but death could end it.

All this a picture of sin. It is—

(c) Hopeless. The wages of sin death (Rom. vi. 23).

II. THE CURE (19—26.) The man, so helpless himself, got friends to help.

They brought him to the house where Christ was.

They overcame difficulties—taking him up outside staircase, uncovering matting over courtyard—letting him down by ropes, to the presence of Christ.

What made the man so eager to be brought?

Because was a sinner as well as a sufferer.

Had learnt something of Christ's double cures.

So Christ healed first his soul and then his body.

(b) Wanted to show His power as Son of man.

What objections did some make? That He was speaking blasphemy—claiming a power belonging to God only.

How did Christ prove His divine power?

(b) He healed the man's disease.

What a contrast between the faith of the man and his friends and the unbelief of the scribes!

The same cure ready for sin-stricken souls now. What can they do?

(a) Believe on Christ who forgiveth sin. (Ps. ciii. 3.)

(b) Come to Christ who calls sinners. (St. Matt. xii. 28).

See how the cure affected different people.

The scribes were amazed. The people glorified God.

The paralytic departed thankful and happy.

LESSONS. Christ gives to all who come to Him—

1. Pardon for the soul—beginning of spiritual life.

2. Health and blessings for this life.

3. Work to do for Him at home and in the world.

INTERNATIONAL SERIES. SECOND QUARTER.

APRIL 6TH. CHRIST'S LAW OF LOVE.

To read—St. Luke vi. 27—38. Golden Text—ver. 31.

INTRODUCTION. Christ been healing great multitude of people—now preaches to them and His disciples (ver. 17), telling them some of the laws of His Kingdom. Remind of difference between the old religion of the Jews and Christ's new religion. In the old had laws given to guide their conduct as a nation—these laws were mostly—

Christ gives rules for their conduct as individuals.

I. THE LAW OF LOVE. (27—34.) Notice the different points:—

(a) Love enemies, as Joseph did his brothers after their shameful treatment of him.

(b) Do good to them which hate, as Elisha gave food to the Syrians who sought his life at Dothan. (2 Kings vi. 23.)

(c) Bless those who curse—as David did to Shimei. (2 Sam. xix. 22.)

(d) Pray for those who do you wrong—as Christ did for His murderers. (Chap. xxiii. 34.)

(e) Bear injuries patiently—as Paul and Silas did their imprisonment at Philippi. (Acts xvi. 25.)

(f) Give to those who ask—as Dorcas made garments for the poor. (Acts ix. 39.)

(g) Do as would be done by—as Naaman's little maid did for her master the leper, telling him of Elisha. (2 Kings v. 3.)

All these rules show how much more is required by Christ than other teachers. All men love and help those who love them. Christ's followers must do so to enemies also.

II. THE LAW OF FORGIVENESS. (35—38.) Various details—

Give without stint as God does, Who gives good things so liberally to all.

Lend without looking to receive back.

Be kind to all, as God, loving Father, who sends rain and sunshine to all alike.

Be merciful and not always insisting on rights.

Be lenient in judging others.

Forgive wrongs as would be forgiven.

Result will be a return even in this life.

Enemies will become friends, as the dying thief.

Blessings will return to ourselves in greater measure (chap. xviii. 29): e.g., widow who fed Elijah received food all through the famine, and her son raised to life.

III. LESSONS. Can see principles of Christian life.

1. God has forgiven us, so we must forgive.

2. God loving to all, evil and good—so must we be.

3. Love, kindness, forgiveness, etc., benefit others—melt cold hearts, etc.

4. They also bring back blessings to ourselves.

What a happy religion is ours! its ways pleasantness—its paths peace!

APRIL 13. THE WIDOW OF NAIN.

To read—St. Luke vii. 11—18. Golden Text—ver. 16.

I. THE SAVIOUR'S COMPASSION. (11—13.) Christ had been spending a busy Sabbath at Capernaum—healed many sick who were brought to Him—healed Centurion's servant at a distance by speaking a word. To-day does a more wonderful miracle still. A good many people from Capernaum have come with Him and His disciples 25 miles to Nain. What do they see as they approach the city?

(c) A weeping widowed mother.

(d) Many friends following out of respect and love.

Remember how Christ was perfect Man. Not merely had sorrows of His own, but felt much for other people's troubles. Therefore at once, when saw sad sight, was full of compassion.

What made the case so sad?

The dead man was an only son of a widow.

He died in the prime of early manhood.

His mother would be left poor, sad, solitary.

No wonder much sympathy aroused among her neighbours. No wonder Christ had compassion, Who is touched with feeling of our infirmities.

II. THE SAVIOUR'S HELP. (14—18.) Sympathy very precious, but help better. What did Christ do?

(a) He spoke to the mother—"Weep not."

(c) He addressed the dead—"Young man, arise."

What a thrilling moment! Grave clothes flung off—prostrate body sits up—closed eyes open—cheeks regain colour and tongue speech.

The young man speaks—embraces his mother. Can be no possible doubt—he is risen from the dead.

What effect did this have on all?

(a) Fear and awe of Jesus Christ—a prophet indeed—God manifest in the flesh.

(b) Glory to God, who had done such wonders.

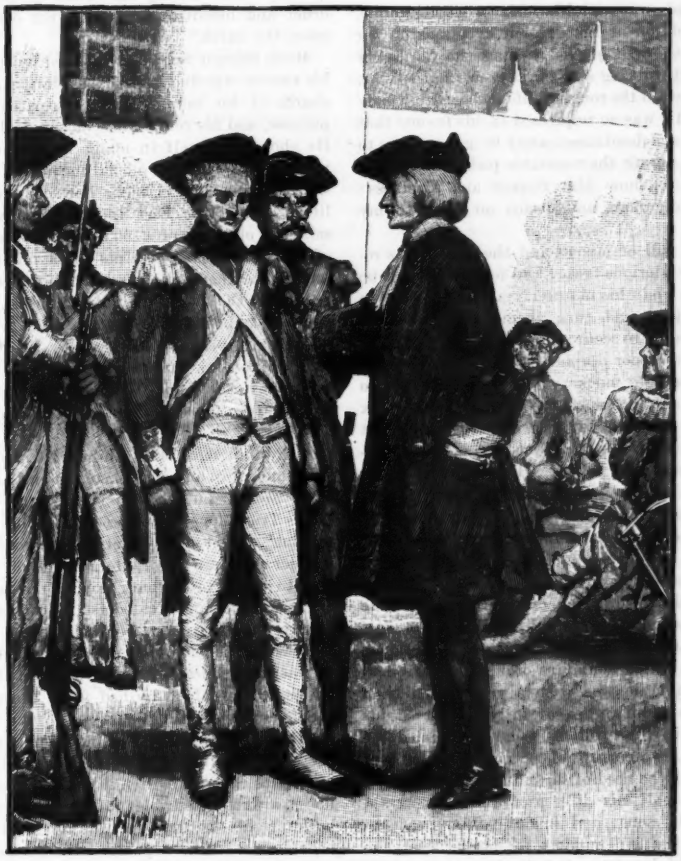
III. LESSONS. 1. Does Christ do such things now? Yes, His sympathy ever the same. He feels for all our sorrows. His help too is given in distress. What does His religion teach us to do? Visit the fatherless and widows (James i. 27) and relieve their wants. Christ only raised one widow's son, but how many widows and orphans have been cared for by His people!

2. Another kind of death. Those who fear not God said to be "dead in sin." But Christ's voice by His Spirit can wake them. They too may live. (1 Cor. xv. 22.) And they will hear His voice hereafter calling dead to rise, and will live with Him for ever.

HALF-HOURS WITH THE WORTHIES OF YESTERDAY AND TO-DAY.

BY THE REV. PROFESSOR W. G. BLAIKIE, D.D., F.R.S.E.



I.—CHRISTIAN FREDERICK SCHWARTZ.

"CERTAINLY it is heaven upon earth," is a saying of Lord Bacon's, "to have a man's mind move in charity, rest in Providence, and turn upon the poles of truth." This earth of ours is not too thickly peopled with these emanations of heaven. There seems little fear that this population will soon outgrow the limits of our world. Few and far between they undoubtedly are, these men of love, of trust, and of truth; and when we do find remarkable samples of them, their memory is well worth preserving, especially when they occur in the mission-field. For there is so much said against missionaries that it is well to recall to mind some of those whose lives, as spent before the heathen, have preached more powerfully than all their spoken discourses. Pre-eminently such a man and such a missionary was Christian Frederick Schwartz. A German by birth, and sent out to the South of India by a Danish missionary society, he was so much among Englishmen that he became like one of themselves. Never was there a more devoted, unselfish missionary: never one who showed himself more above the things of earth: never one who had more tact in dealing with the natives, and interesting them in the truth: never one who combined more wisely an interest in their temporal welfare with regard for their souls: and never one who had more influence with the powers that be—Indian rajahs on the one hand, British residents and governors on the other—or more skill in conducting negotiations, or who enjoyed more of the respect and confidence of both.

XUM

Born in the Duchy of Brandenburg in 1726, he was dedicated to God's service by a pious mother, who died while he was an infant. A young lady having put into his hands, while a boy at school, Francke's "Footsteps of a Divine Being in the World," he was deeply impressed by it. His earnest desire to visit Halle for the younger Francke's sake was gratified by his becoming a student at the University; and when Francke proposed that he should become a missionary to India, he was quite willing to go, if he could obtain his father's consent. It seemed out of the question that the father should agree to part with his oldest son, who was the prop of the family; but he was so impressed by his son's earnestness that after two or three days he gave him his blessing and bade him depart in God's name, charging him to forget his country and his father's house, and to go and win many souls to Christ. Ordained at Copenhagen in 1749, and appointed to the mission at Travancore, in the south of India, he reached that place in October, 1750, and continued working there and at adjacent places without furlough and with little rest, without wife or child to brighten his home, almost to the day of his death, 13th February, 1798. And seldom has any man died amid louder or more unanimous expressions of affection, honour, and regret.

From the very beginning of his spiritual life

"Conversing with British soldiers."—p. 378.

Schwartz was possessed, heart and soul, by a sense of what he owed to Christ, "the Son of God, who loved me, and who gave Himself for me;" and in his discourses, and lessons, and letters, and conversations, the power of this thought was ever showing itself. If a Mahometan asked him—"What is the difference between your religion and mine?" he replied, "We both have a heavy burden of guilt to carry; you have none to remove it, but we have Jesus Christ—a powerful deliverer." When he pressed Mahometans and others to come to Christ, it was because "God hath made Him to be sin for us who knew no sin; accepting out of infinite compassion His atonement, which He has sufficiently demonstrated by His resurrection. He is now the foundation of all grace, so that unless you seek through Him the forgiveness of your sins, the guilt will rest upon yourselves, and you must bear the punishment." "None should dare to appear before a righteous God without trusting in the atonement of Christ. You will find by experience that the doctrine of the Atonement will incline you to be thankful, grateful, and obedient to the commandment."

So it certainly was with himself. Always humble, with a poor opinion of himself, but ever seeking for conformity to the will of God, setting the Lord ever before him, and walking and working as in His sight, he appeared even to the roughest of the heathen a holy man. Hyder Ali was so impressed in his favour that amid his cruel and desolating career he gave orders to his officers "to permit the venerable padre to pass unmolested, and to show him respect and kindness; for he is a holy man, and means no harm to my government."

His life was full of labour, and the labour was rewarded by very glorious fruit; and however much he might be taken up in his maturer years with efforts to pacify fiery rajahs, and turn them from desolating war; or endeavours to secure a righteous administration of law for the poor people to whom the law-courts were but a miserable mockery; or with struggles to protect the country people from the exactions of tax collectors, who would fleece them up to the very point of starvation: he was always intent even on the smallest details of spiritual labour. Teaching in school, preaching by the wayside, instructing catechumens, baptising converts, conversing with British soldiers or civilians, writing letters of guidance to the young or of consolation and encouragement to the bereaved, were his constant occupations.

Even when detained, as on one occasion when he undertook a mission to Hyder Ali, and obliged to wait patiently at Caroor till it should please his highness to meet him, he found abundant occupation. He had prayers and Bible lessons with a young man from Ceylon and his family; he carefully instructed his servants: and in the open street he proclaimed the majesty of God, the corruption of man, the grace of the Saviour, and the need of faith and repentance.

Schwartz was all his life profoundly impressed with the angels' song, and made it his great endeavour to realise it; putting foremost "glory to God in the highest," and believing that when the message of peace and goodwill was received, a spirit of goodwill both to God and to man would spring up and flourish. He felt himself called on on every available opportunity to make the crooked straight and the rough plain; delighted to lighten up gloomy homes and dreary hearts; had a great love for children, and a great pleasure in ministering to their happiness; never turned away from any human being, however repulsive or apparently hopeless, believing that God's grace could soften the hardest and cleanse the foulest, and that as God's love did not depend on the worthiness of its objects, so God's children and servants ought to have compassionate and loving hearts even for the worst of their kind.

It pleased God to reward Schwartz with great success. Even before his day the mission at Travancore and the neighbourhood had been greatly blessed. The converts were counted in scores and hundreds, and under Schwartz's personal labours this success continued. At Tanjore, where many of his years were spent, he continued to reap the fruits of his labours even when the armies of Hyder Ali were spreading carnage and terror around. He moved about in tranquillity even "among the ranks of one of the most cruel and bloodthirsty armies that ever spread ruin upon the earth."

Much though Schwartz effected by his instruction, his success was due in perhaps a larger measure to the charm of his manner, his transparent honesty of purpose, and his remarkable tact in dealing with men. He showed himself in many ways above the love of money. Enjoying an official income of £48 a year, he showed on many occasions how content he was with little. When the East India Company gave him a salary as chaplain of £100 a year, he spent the whole of the first year's receipts on a mission-house and school, and thereafter devoted half to his congregation, retaining the other half for himself, mainly, it is believed, to be spent in charity. Once when for translations and other extra services the Company had resolved to make him a present, he entreated that it might be in the shape of stone and lime, of which they had a store, for enabling him to build a church at Tanjore.

A Brahmin once said of him, "No man lives so holy. Offer money to any other man, and all his good resolutions vanish; but on him it makes no impression."

At Trichinopoly he besought that in place of making a present to him, they would allow to a brother chaplain the same amount of salary as was paid to him, in order that (like him) he might maintain a schoolmaster and a catechist. Notwithstanding his generosity in giving, Schwartz was found to be possessed of considerable property at his death; but it was all bequeathed to purposes of the mission, on whose account alone he had made the accumulation.

Schwartz was sadly distressed by the ill-conduct of the British in India. It was not merely that generally they were cold to his work, so that while the people of Madras contributed ten thousand pagodas for a playhouse, a wretched driblet was all they gave to help in building his church in Tanjore; but that their behaviour was like a public advertisement that they scorned all Christ's precepts. It was gall and wormwood to him, at a public conference at Tripatore, to hear natives say though they thought Christian doctrine, religion, and instruction very pleasing, "we do not see you Christian people live conformably to what you teach. The Christians appear to be doing quite the contrary; they curse, they swear, they get drunk, they steal, cheat, deal fraudulently with one another; nay, they blaspheme, and rail upon matters of religion, and often make a mock of those who profess to be serious." In short, they said, "You Christians demean yourselves as badly, if not worse, than we heathens. Should you not first endeavour to convert your Christians ere you attempt to proselytise pagans?"

"I am convinced," said the Rajah of Tanjore, "that the Christian religion is a hundred thousand times better than idolatry." Why, then, did he not embrace it? On account of the unfavourable impression which the conduct of the Europeans made on his mind.

In contrast to all this inconsistency of Europeans, the character of Schwartz himself shone out with a pure and beautiful lustre. But first, what was he like? A great friend of his, Mr. Chambers, drew the portrait of his outer man in middle life. "Figure to yourself a stout, well-made man, somewhat above the middle size, erect in his carriage and address, with a complexion rather dark, though healthy, black curled hair, and a manly engaging countenance, expressive of unaffected candour, ingenuousness, and benevolence, and you will have an idea of what Mr. Schwartz appeared to me at first sight."

The testimonies to the beauty and consistency of his inner nature were alike numerous and intensely cordial: "That worthy brother of the mission and labourer in Jesus Christ," said an influential clergyman in England at the ordination of a young missionary, about to join him, "has established such a reputation for candour, integrity, and disinterestedness among both natives and Europeans as cannot fail of recommending the cause of Christianity to men of every description who have heard his name; and this we assert from the concurrent testimony of every person who has returned from India."

Another young missionary who spent three months with him at Travancore writes of him in the most gushing terms: "The account he gave of the many dangers to which his life had been exposed, and the wonderful manner in which it was often preserved, his tender and grateful affection toward God, his fervent prayers and thanksgivings, his gentle exhortations constantly to live as in the presence of God, zealously to preach the Gospel, and entirely to resign ourselves to God's kind providence—all this brought many a tear into my eyes, and I could not but wish that I might one day resemble Schwartz." Another says: "The purity of his mind, his disinterestedness and strict integrity, his active zeal for the mission and his constant attention to the temporal as well as spiritual prosperity of the native Christians, his indefatigable exertions to procure them the means of subsistence, his pastoral wisdom and charity, his fervour in prayer, his eminent talent of engaging the attention of mixed companies by the manner and tone of his conversation, his peculiar skill in noting defects and reproving faults with so friendly and cheerful an air that even the highest and proudest are not offended—these and many other excellent qualities, but rarely found together, render him universally loved and respected.

There was one remarkable feature of Schwartz's life in which missionaries have seldom shared—the part he took in certain political negotiations and arrangements both at the instance of the East India Company (then the governing body in India) and of some of the native chiefs. But these were not ordinary political transactions; it was only when great moral interests were involved in them that he was persuaded to interfere. When the progress of that fierce warrior Hyder Ali was spreading terror in Madras, and the haughty potentate refused to receive an English embassy, Schwartz was the only man that could approach him. "Send me the Christian—he will not deceive me." Schwartz went to him, and was well received, although he was not successful in the object of his mission.

We have not space to go into detail respecting Schwartz's earnest and persevering labour to rescue the people among whom he laboured from the effects of the rapacity of the collectors of taxes, and of the bribery and injustice of those who professed to administer justice among them. We will rather say something of his efforts on behalf of a young prince whom he found suffering atrocious treatment on the part of the ruling Rajah of Tanjore, and the remarkable success with which they were attended.

The child, whose name was Serfojee, had been adopted by the Rajah Tulajèe on his death-bed, and appointed his heir. The reins of government, however, fell into the hands of Ameer Sing, and Schwartz, whom Tulajèe had named as guardian to Serfojee, discovered that Ameer was confining him in a dark and dismal room, which he was never allowed to leave, that he was getting no education of any kind, and was not permitted to visit or have intercourse with the other branches of the family.

It was no easy matter to rescue him from the hands of Ameer, but through firmness and perseverance the thing was done. After some time Serfojee fell most innocently under the displeasure of the rajah, who took the extraordinary method of burning pepper under his window to punish him; the poor boy was nearly suffocated, and doubtless Ameer designed that he should be so wholly. The consequence was that through Mr. Schwartz's efforts he was removed to Madras. Both Schwartz and Gericke, another missionary, made every effort to instruct him; and when he was at a distance Schwartz wrote to him most fatherly letters. Afterwards the validity of Serfojee's claim to the sovereignty of Tanjore came to be disputed, but the decision was given in his favour, Mr. Schwartz watching the case with much anxiety on his behalf.

About the end of 1798 Ameer was deposed, and Serfojee raised to the throne. By this time Schwartz was dead. Serfojee did not become a Christian, but he was a good friend of the mission, and in testimony of his gratitude to Schwartz he erected a monument to his memory extolling his many virtues and apostolic character, and testifying how these won for him the esteem and reverence of Christian, Mahometan, and Hindu alike.

After a short period of decaying strength, Schwartz was gathered to his fathers on the 13th of February, 1798, dying as he had lived. Among the numberless tributes to his character, that of the Honourable East India Company, inscribed on a monument by Flaxman, merits special notice. We can quote but a sentence from a long inscription:—

"HE DURING A PERIOD OF FIFTY YEARS WENT ABOUT DOING GOOD, MANIFESTING IN RESPECT TO HIMSELF THE MOST ENTIRE ABSTRACTION FROM TEMPORAL VIEWS,
BUT EMBRACING EVERY OPPORTUNITY OF PROMOTING BOTH THE TEMPORAL AND ETERNAL WELFARE OF OTHERS.

ONLY A BRAVE GIRL.

A STORY IN TWO CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER I.

"DO you ever tire of this kind of thing?" asked Amy Drummond.

"Tire of what?" returned her friend, with reasonable surprise; for they had been shopping all the afternoon, and were now in a confectioner's, drinking tea—Amy had not tired of that.

"Of life generally," she explained; "our life—all tennis, and shopping, and parties."

"I never think of such things," replied Miss Wedmore rather coldly, and raised her faintly marked eyebrows.

She was a typical society girl of the upper middle class. Tall, slim, and colourless, with an indescribable air called "style."

Amy, on the contrary, had a distinct individuality. Her wayward bronze hair had a trick of curling itself in little tendrils round her bright face; her limpid brown eyes looked out rather wistfully at the smoothly prosperous world in which she found herself.

"I often think," she went on, stirring her tea rather dreamily, "that I should like to be a working girl. You see, they must enjoy their occasional holidays so much."

Miss Wedmore stifled a yawn, and suggested they should start for home. She was going to a dinner-party, and wanted to make a careful toilette.

"Are you coming to the Browns' to-night?" she asked, as the girls parted.

"No; mamma has made a party to hear Patti at the Albert Hall—the Haystocks, with Caroline Druce and her brother."

"Oh!" returned Miss Wedmore carelessly.

But her cold grey eye noted the warm colour which rushed over Amy's sweet face, and she turned away with a rather abrupt farewell. Self-possessed Emily Wedmore was not wholly indifferent to that handsome young barrister, Edgar Druce.

Very pretty and radiant Amy Drummond looked as she came down the wide staircase that evening, her white gown trailing and rustling behind her, a rich rosy flush on her fair round cheek.

"Come, Amy," cried her mother, "we must start at once; there is always such a crush when Patti sings."

"Is not papa coming?"

"No; he is detained in that tiresome City."

Mrs. Drummond spoke rather pettishly. Her husband was a wealthy merchant, and she, as a prosperous matron with some pretension to fashion, rather looked down on that "tiresome City."

Yet a little pang shot through her heart as she thought of her husband's careworn face. "He has had business worries lately," she said; and, lightly dismissing the matter fell to making a mental list for her next dinner party.

Yet it was no light matter, as many of her husband's business acquaintances could have told her. To use their expression, "Drummond was shaky." That was the reason why, night after night, he pored over accounts in his deserted office, and came home jaded and weary, hours too late for dinner. Poor over-worked, over-anxious City man!

Patti's glorious voice fell on two pairs of unappreciative ears that night—Amy's and her lover's. For though he had not said a word of love, his eyes had told, and her throbbing heart had guessed, his secret. And as, the concert over, Edgar Druce helped our heroine on with her cloak, he whispered, "I am going to Egypt. Think of me sometimes, Amy. Not for long—six months or so. I travel with Sir William Hampstead as secretary and companion."

"But your——"

"My profession, you mean," he said, with a gleam of mischief in his brown eyes. "Between ourselves, I am and have ever been—briefless. So a six months' absence will not injure that."

Then the Drummonds' carriage drove up, and our heroine stepped out into the clear night air.

"Good-bye," whispered the barrister, and held her gloved hand a little longer than absolute courtesy demanded. "I shall be back in six months. Meanwhile, think of me sometimes, Amy."

Then the girl gave a last look at his handsome face: for six long months, and then—and then! She flushed at the thought of the happiness which the future would bring.

"Papa is in," she said, when she and her mother were at home, and she saw the familiar tall hat on the hall table. Then she ran swiftly up-stairs to the drawing-room, where the lamp was burning softly and the fire was red and low. She stood for a moment on the threshold; a radiant young figure in clinging white, with pearls at her throat, and white roses across her breast. Then she went to the sofa, on which her father lay asleep. She gently lifted the handkerchief he had thrown over his face. The tender words of greeting froze unspoken on her lips. For his face was set and calm, and the brow she kissed was nearly cold.

Then came a rustle of silk, and after that a piercing shriek. The wife had stolen behind her daughter, and gazed with wild dilated eyes on the face of her husband—the face of the dead.

* * * * * *

"Mamma, I must get something to do." The speaker was Amy Drummond; the time was six months after her father's death; the place, a tiny second-floor sitting-room in the neighbourhood of Regent's Park.

Mr. Drummond's affairs were found to be hopelessly involved, and, with the exception of the money realised by their furniture, mother and daughter had but fifty pounds a year.

In the sad days which followed her father's death, it was Amy who arranged all business details, who superintended the sale, and who finally, when the dear old home was invaded by auctioneer and noisy bidders, carried her mother off to the cheap rooms she had taken near Regent's Park. For sorrow and misfortune had utterly crushed the spirit of the merchant's placid, handsome wife. Six months had changed her from a happy-hearted, even-tempered mother to a desponding and querulous one.

"Now, mamma," said Amy coaxingly, "I want your advice, you know. So do put on your considering-cap, darling. It is no use to suggest type-writing or teaching, because I have tried both and failed."

Mrs. Drummond made a suggestion at last, and she made it almost hopefully.

"You can write."

"Write what, mamma?"

"Why, tales and things," responded the widow rather vaguely. "I was reading in a newspaper the other day that the author of 'Under a Cloud' made a thousand a year by her pen. And I am sure," she concluded, with a mother's fond confidence, "that you could write something much better than 'Under a Cloud;' for I got it from the library, and it was terribly dull."

"Do you think I could?" asked Amy dubiously.

"I am sure of it."

"Well, dear, I will try to-morrow."

"Her heart stood still as she saw her quondam friend's companion."—p. 382.

Writing stories, however, was not quite so easy as it appeared at first blush.

All the next afternoon Amy worked hard, and the only sounds in the room were the scratch, scratch of her pen, the loud tick of the clock, and the complacent purr of the tabby cat. At last, just as it began to get dusk, and the lodging-house servant brought up the tea, the budding author threw down her pen, gave a big sigh, and stretched her arms high above her head.

"How are you getting on?" asked mamma, anxiously.

"Pretty well," was the reply. "It is not nearly so easy as I thought it would be. Still, with hard work I shall finish it in a couple of days."

That was an exciting moment for Amy when the story, neatly sealed up and directed to the editor of a weekly paper, was dropped into a pillar-box. She had enclosed a pretty little letter to soften the great man's heart, and now she sat down and awaited the result. She had not long to wait. In a couple of days the ominously bulky envelope came back with the poor story and the editor's compliments and regrets (lithographed) inside. Nothing daunted, she sent it off to another paper, and waited hopefully for six long weeks.

"They must have accepted it," she said feverishly to her mother.

"I hope so, dear," soothingly. "But why not write another?"

"Oh, mamma, I could not while the fate of this one trembles in the balance."

But it came back, and faint-hearted Amy gave up literature in despair.

"I was never intended to be an authoress," she said, with a queer little smile, half sad, half comical, as she stood before the fire and saw her literary first-born turn to black tinder and go skirling up the chimney. "There remains nothing now but a business life. In my heart of hearts I have always believed myself to be capable of that."

"Never!" cried Mrs. Drummond with unusual animation. "My daughter shall never be a shop-girl."

Amy took up the newspaper, and turned to the advertisement column. "Here," she said—"here is Madame Emilie advertising for an assistant. She, so you told me on Thursday, is Lady Sedley. There can be no objection to my working for her."

And without waiting for a further protest she ran up to her room, dressed herself in her best black gown, and sallied forth in search of fortune.

Madame Emilie informed her coldly that she would not suit. So she trudged along the busy streets for a long morning in the weary search for work.

She passed the confectioner's where such a few months before she and Emily Wedmore had sat at tea, and she had idly wished herself a working girl. Well, some malevolent fairy had granted the hasty wish, and the wisher was tasting the full bitterness of its fulfilment. Then came another memory, the memory of that evening—sweet, yet so tragic—when Edgar had told his love, and her father had died. Tears stood thick in her eyes, poor little footsore, would-be shop-girl, as she thought of her lover. He must be back in England now. Would he seek her out, and love her still, despite her poverty? Or would he, like the other friends of prosperous days, conveniently forget her? And while she asked herself sorrowfully which of these two things her hero would do, the answer, or what she took for it, came. A rather shrill and affected woman's voice was in her ear; a dainty gown, brushed against her. The wearer passed on. Amy recognised the smooth, carefully dressed head, with its jaunty hat, the perfectly fitting tailor-made gown, as Emily Wedmore's; and her heart stood still as she saw her quondam friend's companion—the tall figure, the handsome face, tanned by a foreign sun, of Edgar Druce. A wild longing seized the poor child to hide herself, to prevent any possibility of those two seeing her.

She turned into a confectioner's, and mechanically ordered a cup of coffee and a roll. And there, at the little marble-topped table in the busy shop, she buried her love, turned her back on the careless happy past, and strove to show a brave front to the terribly real and sordid present.

All the big shop-keepers looked askance at the little figure, and said shortly that they required someone with experience. They kept her waiting, even for that unsatisfactory morsel of information; and while she waited, a whole battery of scornful eyes was turned on her sweet quivering face, and supercilious voices audibly voted her "dowdy."

At last, however, a kind providence led her down a side street, a quiet street, just out of the whirl of its big sister, yet a very exclusive and aristocratic one, as befitted the neighbourhood. And the same pitiful spirit who had guided her there stayed her weary feet outside a little low-browed shop, in one of the small panes of whose old-fashioned window was displayed the familiar notice—"Wanted, an Assistant." Amy opened the door, and a very ugly old Frenchwoman raised her beady black eyes from the cap she was trimming. Our heroine's timid heart fluttered, the milliner was so very ugly; but if her face had matched her heart, it would have been lovely and pitiful as an angel's. And that morning she saved one sad little soul from despair. She engaged Amy for a month on trial.

CHAPTER II.

So Amy Drummond blossomed into a shop-girl. Every morning she carefully disposed the hats and bonnets in the window, and strewed flowers and lace fichus and elegant trifles in lavish profusion round the shop; and that done, she sat at the little table in the corner, and hemmed lappets and linings. She was not advanced to important work yet.

So six months passed, till one day, just before the New Year, a carriage stopped before madame's door. The customer was a new one, and at sight of her the demure assistant's heart began to thump in a most unbusinesslike way. She stepped forward with the usual deference to serve—Emily Wedmore. That self-possessed young lady was rather startled when she recognised Amy Drummond in the respectful shop-woman. But she soon rallied; and having hastily decided that it would be wiser to recognise her former friend, she held out her slim perfectly gloved hand and gave a smile, chill as the rush of wintry air she had brought in with her. Then she murmured a few stereotyped words of surprise and condolence, put off the acquaintance, and assumed the fashionable lady with great ease and nonchalance. When at last she had selected a hat, a Brussels lace shawl, and some French flowers, she turned to Amy with something of her old manner. "I am obliged to be particular, you know, because," with a slight smile curving her thin lips, "these things will be part of my trousseau; I shall be married on the thirtieth, and you will never guess to whom. In three short weeks I shall be Emily Druce." She gathered her costly furs around her, and stepped out to her carriage. The patient girl began with numbed fingers to clear away the finery which lay scattered on counter, chairs, and table. Her brain, her very heart, seemed numb. He was going to marry Emily Wedmore. The words, so lightly spoken, burnt themselves into her memory—"In three short weeks I shall be Emily Druce;" and bitter tears fell from her brown eyes, and took the curl from a costly ostrich feather. She huddled it into its box. Madame would have been wroth indeed, kindly soul though she was. Private sorrows are all very well—in their place. But the trade axiom is this—Heart-break or no, be careful of the stock.

Two months more went by. She trudged daily to the little low-browed shop. Sometimes, in wet and murky weather, she took an omnibus, but not often, because the money which the dear household treasures had fetched was nearly gone. Soon she and her mother must depend solely on their yearly fifty pounds and Amy's slender earnings. No wonder, then, that she grudged her scanty pence for omnibus fares, and patched her gowns and darned her gloves with true heroism. Poor brave Amy!

It was March—a bleak gusty afternoon. Amy had been to Grosvenor Square with some bonnets. As she came down the steps of the stately town-house—a wind-blown little figure, with an errand-boy at her heels—a gentleman passed. She shrank back into the gloomy portico; it was Edgar Druce. But he had seen her. He came forward with hands outstretched, and with such joy shining in his handsome face that the girl was startled.

"Miss Drummond—Amy!"

"How do you do, Mr. Druce?" she said, in the primmest of matter-of-fact voices. He was Emily's husband now—she must never forget that. To make sure of not doing so, she added politely, "How is Mrs. Druce?"

He looked surprised; then seemed to recollect, and answered coolly, "She is very well, I believe. But," he went on impetuously, "we do not want to talk about her. It is enough for me that I have found you. Oh, my love, my poor little love! After all these months—and thus?"

He touched her black gown tenderly, and gazed meaningly in the direction of the milliner's retreating errand-boy.

"I asked Emily; I asked everyone," he went on hurriedly. "They knew nothing about you or your mother, except that Mr. Drummond was dead, and that you were much poorer."

"But Emily is Mrs. Druce," she faltered.

"Of course she is," he answered promptly. "Mrs. James Druce, she married my second cousin, Jim."

So, crooked paths were made straight, and it was a very happy shop girl who parted from her lover at madame's door.

"I shall come and meet you to-night," he said. Then, with a comical wry face, "I shall walk up and down till they put the shutters up."

She gave a merry little laugh—such a girlish happy ripple—and looked at her sweetheart archly. "You will do nothing of the kind. I shall be free in ten minutes. This is Saturday, and the usual half-holiday."

The Parisian hats and bonnets were treated very irreverently that afternoon. What cared their custodian for the inanimate heaps of gauze and silk and feathers when her lover—her very, very own—was waiting?

So, in the growing dusk of the gusty March day, these two walked slowly and by devious ways towards the modest Regent's Park lodging.

Edgar had told his love, and had been shyly accepted. "Only," she said, "I am so far beneath you now; I am only a shop-girl."

And he made this remarkable speech: "I wish I were a shopkeeper." This he explained a minute later by saying, "I forgot to tell you that I also am in trade. You see, law did not pay, and I was looking round for something that would, when an old college chum, Richard Sugden, who has a regular genius for house decoration, asked me to join him in business; and between us we are making rather a good thing out of it. At present we rent a house and have merely an office; but by-and-bye we shall take a higher flight, and own a Bond Street shop."

"Oh!" said Amy, with deep thankfulness, "I am so glad, because now you will not be ashamed of me and my shop."

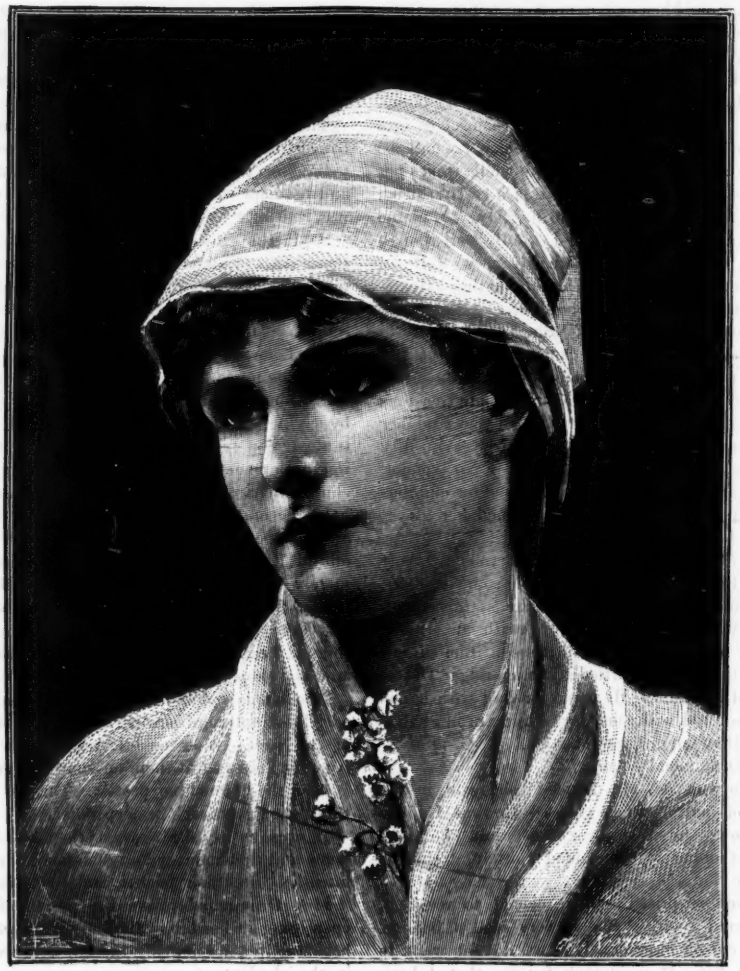
"So far as yours is concerned," he said, with an early assumption of marital authority, "it is a shop of the past. You meddle no more with French bonnets, unless to fit them on your own pretty head."

And she entered no protest. On the contrary, I think she gave a sigh of deep relief.

It was nearly dark when they reached Amy's home and that independent young woman drew her latch-key from her pocket, and took her lover in.

Mrs. Drummond was sitting in the firelight, an open letter in her lap. She hurried forward to meet her daughter, not noticing the tall figure which stood in the shadow.

"Oh, my darling!" she cried hysterically, "my Uncle Jonas is dead, and has left me three hundred pounds a year. Think of that! and I have not seen or heard of him since my marriage. And now, Amy, you will be free of that dreadful shop."



A little choking rose in the daughter's throat—a little sound which was half a sob.

"Dear mamma," she said, and gently pushed her lover forward, "I shall never be free of a shop—never, so long as I live, for I am going to marry a man who will keep one; and here he is!"

DISTRESSED: AT REST.

A CONTRAST.

A MIND distressed! O weary hours
Of each long day, each sleepless night
A mind distressed! O baneful powers
Of keen remorse and care—the night
Of haunting memory that preys
Continuously on heart and brain!
A mind distressed! O restless days
Of bitter, never-ending pain!

A mind at rest! O swift-sped hours
Of each glad day, each peaceful night!
A mind at rest! O golden powers
Of an approving conscience, white
From stains that foul in Error's ways!
O joyous calm of heart and brain!
A mind at rest! O happy days
Of sweet Content's unending reign!

WHAT THE JEWS BELIEVE ABOUT THE FUTURE LIFE.

BY THE REV. WILLIAM BURNET, M.A.

THE Jewish faith, like the Jewish race, occupies a unique and an isolated position. Whilst orthodox Jews accept the Divine authority of the Old Testament, they reject the fuller revelation of God in the New, and fail to recognise in our Blessed Redeemer the long-expected Messiah. This being so, the inquiry naturally arises, what are their views respecting the life beyond the grave? A system of mere morality may be very valuable in the regulation of the present life; but the worth of a religion is chiefly proved in the last solemn hours, when flesh and heart are failing, and the curtain is rising which hides the eternal world from our sight. This is the fiery ordeal to which every form or system of belief is exposed, and in its searching flames all the wood, hay, and stubble of human invention must perish, whilst the gold, silver, and precious stones of God's own truth will remain. How is it with modern Judaism? Controversy would be here quite out of place. Our aim is simply to ascertain what our Jewish brethren believe on this subject, in the hope that we may gather some thoughts of value for ourselves, or may view the substantial verities of our own faith more brightly exhibited by contrast. There are, then, two questions which we will endeavour to answer, first, what is the popular belief about the condition of the departed; and secondly, what grounds of confidence does Judaism offer in the prospect of death?

If modern Jews had sought light on these great questions solely and directly from their ancient scriptures the answers would not be difficult. There the doctrine of man's future life, though less prominent or clear than in the New Testament, is revealed with ever-growing clearness and fulness. Even the resurrection of the body is implied, where it is not distinctly taught. Our Lord rebuked the Sadducees who denied it as "not knowing the Scriptures or the power of God," and pointed them to the words addressed to Moses at the bush as sufficient proof: "I am the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob." The Pharisees, on the other hand, who accepted the whole of the Old Testament as inspired, held this precious truth, as the writings of the Prophets (particularly Isaiah xxvi. 19; and Daniel xii. 1—3) justified them in doing. They allowed, as St. Paul said before Felix, that there shall be a resurrection both of the just and unjust. These are the two classes, into which throughout the Bible men are broadly divided, and two corresponding states after death are more or less plainly spoken of, whereas a third or intermediate state is not even hinted at.

Unhappily modern orthodox Jews have not drawn their beliefs immediately from the pure fountain of Revealed Truth, but in great measure out of the turbid streams of tradition handed down in the Talmud and other writings of the ancient Rabbins. These, as Jesus told the Pharisees, have often made the Word of God of none effect through their traditions, and so have mystified and perplexed the minds of their disciples. Thus the Talmud asserts that "at the day of future judgment there will be found three classes of persons. The first will consist of the perfectly righteous, the second of the perfectly wicked, the third of the intermediate, whose iniquities and righteousness will be equal. The perfectly righteous will be immediately sealed to eternal life, the perfectly wicked will be sealed to hell, the intermediate will go down into hell and come up again."

Other authorities have discovered two Paradises, one above, in heaven, the other below, on earth. Access to the upper is not granted to the spirits of the righteous at once, but they must first pass a kind of novitiate in the lower. In both, it is said, there are seven dwellings for the reward of the righteous according to their deserts. Hell, too, is represented as divided, much like Dante's "Inferno," into different zones suited to different degrees of punishment. But as regards the Jews themselves such punishment is rather purgatorial than final; for in the Talmud it is taught that "all Israel shall have part in the future life," as it is said, "Thy people shall be all righteous and inhabit the land for ever."

This consolatory notion is connected with very singular theories about the origin of human souls, which in some degree anticipated the teaching of the New Testament. According to some of the Rabbins, the bodies of men are inhabited by a triple soul: the nephesh, or animal soul; the ruach, or spirit; the neshama, or the highest form of life. These correspond to the three worlds, which a man is, or may be, qualified to inhabit. The nephesh enters him at his birth; at the age of thirteen years and one day, if his deeds be right, he becomes possessed of the ruach; and if his deeds continue to be right, in his twentieth year the neshama becomes his. But if his deeds be not right, the nephesh and the ruach remain without the neshama. This distinction, although here enshrouded in so much gross and vain imagination, would seem to contain a grain of precious truth, which the inspired Apostle has revealed when he prays for the Thessalonians that their "whole spirit, and soul, and body may be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ." Man's nature is there spoken of as tripartite, the highest department being the spirit, which in the unrenewed is dead, and remains in abeyance until it be quickened by the Spirit of God.

Such, then, are some of the ancient Jewish beliefs about the future life. We need not attempt to explain or harmonise them, but will rather hasten to inquire into the practical effect of this teaching on the popular mind in the present day. What, we ask, are the grounds of confidence offered by modern Judaism in the prospect of death?

On this point we need not examine the writings of eminent doctors, or excavate the mines of theologic lore laid up in the Talmud. We simply turn to authorised forms of prayer and manua's of devotion. Such is the "Arbre de la Vie," a book of prayers for the sick, the dying, and the departed, which has been sanctioned by the Grand Rabbins of France. These prayers are composed in great measure in the words of Holy Scripture, especially of the Psalms; and, so far as they are such, they are, of course, very beautiful and expressive of the purest devotion. When the Angel of Death is hovering round a sick man's bed, he is directed to follow the example of good King Hezekiah, and in a spirit of submission to entreat the Lord to raise him up. He is also exhorted to make a full confession of his sins to God, and if he is conscious of any wrong in word or deed done to his neighbour, he is bidden not only to ask his forgiveness, but also to make any reparation in his power. Great importance, we may observe, is attached by pious Jews to this last duty, and we have heard of their taking long and expensive journeys in order to be reconciled to a dying acquaintance. All this is indeed highly commendable, and worthy of imitation by us Christians. Still the question arises, how the dying sinner hopes to obtain mercy from the just and holy God, Whom he has so often offended. In one place he is instructed to say: "If mine hour to leave the world is now come, let my death be an expiation for all the sins which I have committed since my birth even to this day." At the same time, the trembling soul is advised to cling to a misquoted text of Scripture, as if it were said in Proverbs xxviii. 13 that "He that confesseth his sin and repents sincerely is forgiven." Then a passage from the Talmud is added to the effect that "Four things can awaken the Divine compassion, viz., almsgiving, prayer, resolutions of amendment, and a change of name."

This last very singular ceremony takes place in the Synagogue before the ark. After certain prayers, the Minister opens one of the sacred rolls, and the first letter which presents itself on the right side of the page will indicate the name to be given. If it be Aleph, the name shall be Abraham; if Mem, Moses; and so on. What, we ask with surprise, can be the virtue of a new name, when a man is passing into a state where earthly titles shall all be forgotten? Buxtorf, a great authority on these subjects, informs us that this is done in order that all hard and evil decrees may be repealed. If death be decreed for the bearer of the first name, it is not decreed for the bearer of the second, who is now regarded as "another man, a new creature, a child recently born to a good life and length of days."

Other prescriptions follow, which we need not mention; but when the end has come, those around the dying person are exhorted to redouble their efforts for his salvation by repeating these sacred, time-honoured sentences in Hebrew—

"The King Jehovah shall reign for ever and ever."

"Blessed be the Name of the glory of His Kingdom for ever and ever." (To be said three times.)

"Jehovah alone is God." (Seven times.)

"Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord."

Amidst these solemn recitations of the Jewish creed the disembodied spirit wings its flight into the presence of the All-Holy and Merciful One. Thither we cannot follow it. We rather ask, in conclusion, what consolation does Judaism offer to the survivors in the darkest hour of nature's loneliness and desolation? The forms of interment are simple and impressive, not unlike those observed amongst ourselves; but can the mourners consign the remains of their dear ones to their last resting-place in "a sure and certain hope of a resurrection to eternal life"? Alas! no. A painful uncertainty still clouds the prospect. An immediate entrance into Paradise is assured only to the perfectly righteous, and as none are such, in most cases, if not in all, it is assumed that the departed are in Purgatory, and dependent on the intercession of their friends for their release. Accordingly a form of prayer in Chaldee, the Kaddish, is to be used after the funeral, on the eve of every Sabbath, and on other occasions during eleven months. It is specially intended to be said by the eldest son for a deceased parent. It may be rendered as follows:—

"May the Name of the Eternal be glorified and sanctified in this world, which He will renew one day, when He shall raise the dead and call them to eternal life, when He shall build the Divine City, the Heavenly Jerusalem, and establish there His Throne in all its glory. At that period idolatry and superstition shall be banished, the worship of the true God, the one God, shall be established over all the earth, and the very Holy One (blessed be He!) shall reign in all His glory, in all His majesty. Oh! may this be soon in our days and in the lifetime of all the House of Israel, and say 'Amen.'"

The legend of the Kaddish in the Talmud is strange and quaint. When the Rabbi Akiba had one day met in the fields an old man bending under a heavy bundle of wood, the doctor asked him whether he were a man or a ghost. He replied that he was a man already dead, and that each day he had to carry such a load into Purgatory that he might be burned most miserably on account of his sins. Then the Rabbi inquired whether he had not a surviving son, and where the son lived. He thereupon proceeded to the place and taught the youth to say the Kaddish for his father. Some time after the latter appeared to Akiba and informed him that he was now in the Garden of Eden. Upon that the Rabbi wrote to all the Jewish schools commanding the use of this prayer.

This story has, of course, very few believers in the present day; but the use of the Kaddish is almost universal. The views of modern Jews about its efficacy differ very widely. Practically, however, it is thought to benefit the departed in some way. Not only is there the natural longing for communion with dear ones gone before, but there is the lingering fear that all is not well with them. Indeed, how can it be otherwise, apart from belief in Him Who is the Resurrection and the Life? One by one Jews, as well as Christians, have to enter the valley of the shadow of death, and how dark must it be without the bright lamp of God's fulfilled promises! Still, their responsibility is not equal to ours in this matter. Very earnestly would we plead with them in the words of the Prophet—"O House of Israel, come ye and let us walk in the light of the Lord."

"UNDERNEATH."

A CHAPTER FOR THE SICK AND INFIRM.

I HAVE a message to-day for you who cannot help thinking of your trials, your infirmities, the cross that is laid upon you, the burden you have to bear. You cannot forget your trouble—it is no use trying to make light of it, for it is a real and heavy affliction, and your sad heart feels its pressure. Well, just for a while to-day, friend, look your trouble—your cross that God has chosen—full in the face; realise its weight if you will, including every foreboding you experience, every worry that oppresses you, each vexation you have to bear. Then rejoice to know that the burden need not in any wise overwhelm you, since this is the assurance of God's holy Word—"Underneath are the Everlasting Arms."

You are conscious of exceeding weakness, but underneath your feebleness is the strength of God: He bears up worlds; He controls all power that exists—none can describe or limit His Almightiness, and His strength is underneath your infirmity. A good, great man said once it rejoiced his heart when a little child, wondering how to cross the road, came up to him trustfully and said, "Please lift me over." How readily he took up the child in his arms, and with what confidence the little thing nestled against him, forgetful of fear! Does your Father in Heaven care less for His child than that good man did for a little unknown wanderer? No, feeble and suffering one; take comfort in the certainty that underneath your weakness, to uphold, sustain, and strengthen you, there abides the power of God.

The pain does not seem too hard to bear when you realise that underneath you, amid all your sufferings, is the Master's remembrance. The robust, healthy, fortunate child is not the one the parent thinks about most in the family, but the child that lies worn with pain in the sick-room, and looks to the mother for help and cheer. Never for one moment does the Lord forget His suffering ones; every pain laid upon them He understands as mortal vision never can. Underneath all your pain, child of God, is the eternal, unsleeping remembrance of your Lord and your Redeemer. Underneath your every need, felt and unfelt, is the care that provides for the sparrows, the grass, and the flowers—the care that is pledged never to forsake you, and that numbers the very hairs of your head. Beneath your weight of perplexities, beneath your doubts, your frettings, and your helplessness, is that sure and strong foundation on which now and henceforth your soul may rely—the wondrous, ever-living Love from which nothing can separate you.

"There is nothing but love between God and my soul," a believer once said earnestly; the cares and difficulties cannot part you from Him, since however your fear may magnify them, underneath is the Everlasting Love. God's love is beneath, and above you the stars of promise are shining through the darkness of trouble. Look no longer at your trials, but see how bright the promises! Though they shine with heavenly radiance, their glory seems to come right down and meet your own special case, your peculiar need to-day: you can lay claim to them as your own; they belong to you, for they are the promises of Him who is nearest and dearest to you—Jehovah-Jireh—the Lord who provides when otherwise all is shadow. Think of these promise-stars: "I will go before thee and make the crooked places straight." "Lo, I am with you alway." "Come unto Me, and I will give thee rest." "As the mountains are round about Jerusalem, so the Lord is round about His people from henceforth even for ever."

A Christian visitor tells of a much-tried saint who could not sit up without the support of bands and braces. He had been helpless and suffering for many years, and the visitor asked, in great compassion: "My friend, are you left quite alone in your infirmity?"—"No," was his triumphant answer; "I am not alone, for my God is with me." In pain and poverty he still possessed his treasured Bible, and the assurance of the near presence of his Lord. So the message I would bear to you just now is this: God is very near to you—so near that if you will only bid farewell to doubt and disquiet, and lean simply and entirely on the Master, you will know and prove how the touch of His power, His love, can sweeten sorrow, and lift away heart-heaviness. Where, oh, my soul! is the burden that bowed thee down? Where is the sting that embittered thy portion? Since for ever and ever underneath this life of mine, with its weight of sorrow, its manifold needs, its infirmities of soul and body, abides the covenant of my living Lord—"Underneath are the Everlasting Arms."

"GIVE HIM ANOTHER CHANCE."

A STORY IN TWO PARTS.—PART I.

AS to its being a "hard case"—this of Harold Stuyvesant's—the real object of my history is to invite an impartial judgment, as, of course, everybody concerned was biassed one way or the other. The women naturally took his side; their sympathies will always be stirred by anything that looks like a case of persecution; the men, as naturally, held that he deserved considerably more than he got. I incline to think that the last was Stuyvesant's own opinion.

I.

It seems only yesterday—although, in fact, it is four years ago—that the dovecots of Bishopshaven were fluttered by the advent of this surprising stranger—this delightful American, with his money, his philanthropy, his fine eyes and Vandyke air of majestic melancholy. This last quality excited less odium than usual in clubs and committee-rooms, from the fact that it was obviously a gift of nature. His worst enemy never accused him of being affected.

He carried the highest credentials from his previous home in Philadelphia, U.S.A. But, as everybody said, "What could Stuyvesant and Co. want with credentials to anybody?" The Stuyvesant millions were a sufficient guarantee. The present representative of the firm was only a sleeping partner; his life was devoted to philanthropic objects; and when it was rumoured that he meant to settle at Bishopshaven, all the charitable societies rejoiced as those that find great spoil. He stated, with the most charming frankness, that he was not born to his greatness.

"I had no claim whatever on old Mr. Stuyvesant," he said. "I had lost my parents, and he was childless. He took a fancy to me and adopted me, gave me his name, and took me into his business. It is a thing more frequently done in America than in England. When he died, he left me everything. There was no injustice in it, as he had no near relatives."

And inquiries made by some cautious spirits of their correspondents in Philadelphia, confirmed these statements. Of course, this brief résumé by no means satisfied the active curiosity of the provincial mind. But Mr. Stuyvesant, unpretentious as he really was, in spite of the Vandyke air, which he could not help, was emphatically not a subject for intrusive questioning.

It was not to be supposed that the good folks of Bishopshaven would omit to ask themselves what could be the attraction which fixed Mr. Stuyvesant to the town which he had at first visited as a casual stranger, or that they should fail to congratulate themselves on their own acuteness, when an engagement was announced between him and the niece and heiress of Edwin Prothero, of the great Quaker banking firm of Forwood and Prothero.

Matters stood thus, when one morning in April last Miss Prothero's low carriage, with its pretty pair of grey ponies, happened to be waiting outside the miserable shanty which Bishopshaven public spirit still suffers to exist and call itself a station. She herself, a small and dainty figure in the neatest possible costume of silver-grey, trimmed with grey fur at the throat and wrists, and with a cap of the same material over her shining hair, had descended to the nether regions of the platform to meet a friend by the incoming train. A rather large lady, much befurred, was emerging from a first-class carriage as Nancy came up.

"How is thou?" she said, with that disregard for one of the principal rules of concord common among the Northern "Friends," "and where are thy boxes, and has thou had a good journey? Come along; John will look after the luggage. I have something to show thee."

"I see thou hasn't learnt to talk any slower," laughed Miss Hardinge, consenting to be towed in the wake of her impetuous friend.

"What a pretty little turn-out," was her comment on being established in the pony-carriage. "Is this what thou wanted to show me?"

"Yes. I thought I would like to drive thee home in it. I only had it the other day—my birthday. Uncle Edwin gave it me. He is so kind."

"I wonder he didn't keep it for another occasion."

"Yes," Nancy answered, blushing and dimpling a little, "he said he had thought of that, and then again he fancied I might like to have it now, and very likely something else would have occurred to him by that time."

"Is it to be soon, Nannie?"

"Before long, I think. The time isn't definitely fixed yet."

As they turned into the principal street of the town Miss Hardinge's eyes were caught by an immense poster, which announced that Mrs. Olinthus P. Fiske, of Bleeksville, Ohio, U.S.A., would lecture the following evening, chair to be taken by Edwin Prothero, Esq., J.P.

"So they've come," she said.

"O! very much so," Nancy replied, with a tragicomic grimace, "and so I can't put thee into the best bedroom, my dear, thou knows."

"That 's very hard lines," said the other, laughing. "But tell me about them ; are they nice ?"

"Thou 'll see," Nancy answered, with an arch look. "But perhaps I ought to prepare thee a little. Mrs. Fiske is a dear old lady. She is rather absurd, but I like her. As to Florida Challis, I really can't describe her. She is beyond me."

"She is Mrs. Fiske's daughter, isn't she ?"

"Yes, Mrs. Fiske married, very young, a person called Challis, of New Orleans. Mr. Stuyvesant knew her in America, and he told me. This person was a sort of French Creole—very handsome, I suppose, and a great scamp. He treated her so badly that at last she had to get a separation, and she came and lived in Philadelphia, with her little girl. At last, this man Challis died, and by-and-bye she married again. But I think it was before that she took to public speaking. She thinks she has a mission. I wish it had begun at home. Miss Challis has evidently done just as she liked ever since she could stand alone. She keeps Uncle Edwin in a state of perpetual astonishment, though he is far too polite to say a word."

"It can't be very comfortable for thee."

"Well, it isn't. But it is amusing to watch her, sometimes, all the same. Spencer Forwood—by the bye, thou remembers him, the son of uncle's partner—happened to travel with them from New York, and he is quite wild about her, poor boy !"

"Is she pretty ?"

"That's not the word at all. She is just magnificently handsome."

"I am getting quite anxious to see this pair."

"Thou wilt have the pleasure very soon. Did I tell thee that they had put Mr. Stuyvesant up as alderman for this ward ? He didn't care about standing, but uncle and the rest of them persuaded him. There was no one else on our side who would have done so well. I don't think Josiah Forwood likes it, and yet he won't stand himself. I think he is jealous of Harold's influence in the town. He has been anything but amiable lately."

"People tell me Mr. Stuyvesant is very much liked. We had Mr. Meyer of St. Thomas's over the other day. He said, 'He is a thoroughly nice fellow.'"

"It isn't that only," Nancy replied. "He is so genuinely good." She spoke with the quietude of a fixed belief, but her cheeks were flushed, and her grey eyes shining. And Miss Hardinge, who had had her misgivings as to how far her young friend's heart was engaged in this marriage with a man sixteen years her senior, looked at the proud, glad face, and felt reassured.

Just at this moment, as if to confirm an old proverb, a gentleman came down the steps of the Town Club, which they were then passing, and lifted his hat. Miss Prothero reined up her ponies, and he went across to the carriage.

"Louisa, let me introduce Mr. Stuyvesant."

Miss Hardinge experienced a momentary shock of surprise. She knew that Mr. Stuyvesant must be nearly forty ; but, at the first glance, he looked ten years short of that age. A more careful look showed her lines of thought and trouble round the keen dark eyes, gleams of silver here and there in the thick curling hair. His manner had a certain grace that is rather at a premium in towns like Bishopshaven. Miss Hardinge began to feel that her friend was very fortunate.

"I think the thing that made me take to him first," said Nancy, when they had passed on, "was the way in which he used to talk to me, just as if I knew as much as he did. Of course I didn't ; but it was nice to be treated like an intelligent creature, and not be told—as Josiah Forwood is always saying—'My dear Anne, thou knows ladies don't understand these matters.'"

"He is very handsome," said Miss Hardinge, "and thou always said thou never would marry a handsome man."

"Oh, I meant a barber's block," she answered ; "or a pretty man with no character in his face, like Spencer Forwood."

The individual who was so unfortunate in his outer man as to incur such criticism, happened to be at this moment emerging from a back entrance to the large premises of Forwood and Prothero. It opened into a narrow lane. At the corner of this was the inevitable public-house, and a door or two up, round the corner, a small tobacco-and-news-shop, at the door of which two or three men were lounging, who might be leniently described as sporting characters. Young Forwood gave a rather furtive glance behind him as he moved in the direction of the group.

"Any news of the Donisfield match ?" he said.

"Sloggers beat," said the man addressed, taking his pipe out of his mouth to make the remark, and then putting it back.

"Are the papers out ?"

"Telegram !" said the other, and then swore. He had betted rather heavily on the other side, and lost. Nature demanded some expression of feeling.

Spencer's countenance, on the other hand, expressed the most lively satisfaction. The "event" had made him a gainer by about fifty pounds. But it was almost ludicrous to observe the change in his expression when Mr. Stuyvesant suddenly turned the corner and came upon him. The men grinned and nudged each other. Mr. Stuyvesant appeared not to notice them.

"Are you going on ?" he said to Spencer. "Shall we walk together ?"

"Bother the fellow !" said the youth to himself. "I thought he was safe in his committee-room."

"Mr. Spencer," began Mr. Stuyvesant, in his slightly formal way, "I was sorry to meet you there just now."

Spencer Forwood was a tall, slim young fellow, with fair hair that stood on end, and a complexion like a girl's. He had an unfortunate habit of blushing when embarrassed or angry, and now his very ears were crimson.

"I don't see," he answered, with his nose well in the air, "that you need trouble yourself, Mr. Stuyvesant."

"Oh, I agree, it is not a serious thing of itself," replied Mr. Stuyvesant suavely; "but when I am told that you have been betting heavily at recent matches——"

"Who has had the cheek to carry tales about me?" young Forwood interrupted.

"I have heard it in several quarters. It is matter of common talk. And—you will excuse me, Mr. Spencer—I was very sorry."

"I think all this is very uncalled for," Spencer answered, speaking fast, and with a sense of injury. "I suppose you mean it all right, Mr. Stuyvesant, but a fellow likes to be let alone. And to come poking after me like this, I say—confound it, you know!—it isn't gentlemanly."

"Ah!" said Mr. Stuyvesant, unmoved by this last insinuation, "you've been winning, I see. I'm sorry—I wish you'd lost."

"Thank you for nothing," growled his companion.

"You make me do what is very unpleasant," Stuyvesant continued. "You make me remind you of a circumstance some time ago, when I understood I had your promise to give up gambling."

There was no need to recall the incident more distinctly. Spencer perfectly recollected an "event" a year ago, that had not turned out so prosperously as this one. He owed one hundred pounds, and as his spending allowance was scanty for a young man of his expectations, he had no possible means of meeting it. Hanging over his head was the awful threat of an appeal to his father, a Friend of the oldest and severest type, and a Spartan disciplinarian. At his wits' end, he applied to Mr. Stuyvesant, who at once supplied the needful sum, together with some very good advice, which the prodigal took as a child takes powder in jam.

He now felt embarrassed as well as angry. He could not deny that he had made a promise.

"That was for races," he muttered. "You said nothing about football."

"My dear fellow," said Stuyvesant, kindly and gravely, "that evasion isn't worthy of you. I daresay you think this is very unwarrantable interference, but I can't help caring. You don't see where all this leads. You are only thinking of the fun.

"I tell you, Forwood," he went on, speaking with a deeper earnestness, as he saw the look of impatience and vexation on his young companion's face, "I am speaking from a dearly bought experience. There is a cloud on my life that will never lift till my dying day. I can't think even now with calmness of what I might have been spared if there had been a single soul in my hour of temptation to say to me what I have said to you."

Young Forwood was touched as well as surprised by an outburst of emotion so unusual in the calm and courteous gentleman. There was no mistaking the genuineness of the feeling that could so shake his self-control.

Spencer felt it difficult to say anything further, and they walked some distance side by side without exchanging a word.

At the corner of the High Street Stuyvesant stopped, and held out his hand.

"You will think of what I have said?" he asked, smiling; "and—I have entrusted you with a little confidence, Spencer. You will respect it?"

II.

BY the evening of the same day the impression that Spencer Forwood had received from Mr. Stuyvesant's remonstrances had had time to evaporate, and he had begun to work himself into a pretty state of indignation over the fact that any person should be "such a cad" as to presume on having once obliged a gentleman with a loan, to the extent of keeping a watch upon the aforesaid gentleman and treating him like a baby. Apart from this, he was not disposed to amiable relations with Harold Stuyvesant. He felt painfully raw and young in comparison with a person who, in point of travel, experience, and adventure, might be counted a fair modern representative of much-enduring Ulysses. Then Stuyvesant had captivated Nancy Prothero, with whom, until the last year, he had fully imagined himself to be in love. And although he had now rectified the mistake about the object of his affections, that did not make the intrusion of the American any the less offensively patent.

Miss Prothero's engagement had been a more serious disappointment to Spencer's father than it was to himself. Ambition, as everyone knows, may be as serious a factor in a town council as in the Concert of Europe, and Josiah Forwood devoted his mind to the promotion of his family influence in Bishopshaven with just as much zest as if he had been a reigning Sovereign with a potent voice in the Eastern Question. His son as he grew up was more and more a disappointment to him; but if he could be married to a woman with brains and an heiress—and Anne Prothero met both these conditions—the glory would not depart utterly from his house. Before he had time to see how small were Spencer's chances of interesting Nancy, this interloper from America came, saw, and conquered. Mr. Forwood did not quarrel, of course, with one who was so soon to be admitted into his partner's family; but he nursed his grudge until it grew visibly.

And these were not the only grudges that were nursed against the too-fortunate Stuyvesant, who, if he ever had had any painful episodes in his career, seemed to have quite forgotten them when he appeared at Mr. Prothero's house that evening. Beech Hill, the banker's house, was a big, brown, square structure, with that look of solid comfort about it which is the true-born Briton's chief desideratum. What the building itself lacked from an æsthetic point of view, was fully made up for by the situation; for it stood on the top of a green bank, shaded by fine old beech-trees. On one side the hill descended by terraces from the lawn in front of the drawing-room windows, on two others it fell away in broken slopes strewn already with wild hyacinths and clumps of yellow daffodils.

The drawing-room which he entered had a physiognomy of its own. The colouring of the room was harmonious but sober, the furniture rather heavily handsome. The only pictures on the walls were the portraits of bygone Protheros in drab surtouts or mob-caps. But, then, every article of furniture was made for comfort; one could move without trembling for the safety of Japanese jars or occasional tables, and there were flowers everywhere.

Nancy, in a black lace dress, with the slightest possible relief of pale blue ribbon, was sitting near the fire, talking to Mrs. Fiske and Miss Hardinge. She looked up and smiled at him as he came in, and went on with what she was saying; while Mr. Prothero came forward with a budget of questions about his election prospects. The old gentleman found him a little distrait—he was noticing how Nancy's face lit up as she talked; how her cheeks grew rosy, and her grey eyes shone and sparkled, and once or twice, when her glance met his for a moment, the sudden beautiful softening of the bright, keen, resolute face.

But, certainly, no one but a lover could have placed Anne Prothero's good looks in comparison for a moment with those of the girl who came in from the conservatory a little while after Mr. Stuyvesant's entrance. Her cream-coloured dress with a square cut bodice seemed much too elaborate a toilet for the occasion and the habits of the household; but she was the sort of person on whom the simplest dress looks more effective than it should. She had fastened a crimson camellia in her black hair, and carried another, swinging it carelessly by the stalk. She walked in slowly, with a wearied, sulky look on her handsome face, and moved towards a chair at the further end of the room, nodding slightly to Stuyvesant as she passed him.

"I've been stealing, you see," she said in an offhand way to Nancy, fastening the camellia into her sash.

"Oh, Florida! my sweet!" remarked her mother.

Nancy smiled, and said something pleasant about the becomingness of the flower; but contrived to telegraph to Miss Hardinge her feeling that her two-days' guest had taken a liberty.

Mrs. Fiske then reverted to the arrangements for her lecture.

"I do trust," she said, "it is being well advertised."

"I think it is," Nancy replied; "I gave out innumerable leaflets, and I see bills everywhere."

"It's very lovely of you to take the trouble," said the lecturer effusively; "but we don't mind trouble when we have the good cause at heart, do we, dear? When I think of the teeming millions in this town alone——"

"Go ahead, mamma!" put in Florida. "There can't be more than fifty thousand people in this town, I'm positive."

"You are always so accurate, my pet," replied Mrs. Fiske, with unruffled temper. "I do so delight in accuracy. They say that is the value of a mathematical training—it makes you accurate. But, even putting it at fifty thousand, and I dare say——"

"I wish you wouldn't talk shop, ma. I presume we shall have to hear what you've got to say tomorrow night. You might let us off now."

It was evident from Miss Challis's tone, quite as much as from her words, that she was a prey to the ailment known as bad temper. Even Mrs. Fiske's mild face flushed a little at this last interruption, and she remarked aside to Nancy that the darling was very highly strung, and that the journey had been too much for her.

At this rather electric moment Mr. Spencer Forwood entered, and Florida's face expressed her satisfaction at the prospect of something amusing.

"Are they always as dull as this?" she asked him. "Everything is so awfully proper, I can't exist."

And now, as Mr. Prothero was busy talking social statistics to the two elder ladies, the engaged pair had an excuse for escaping to the conservatory together for a few minutes.

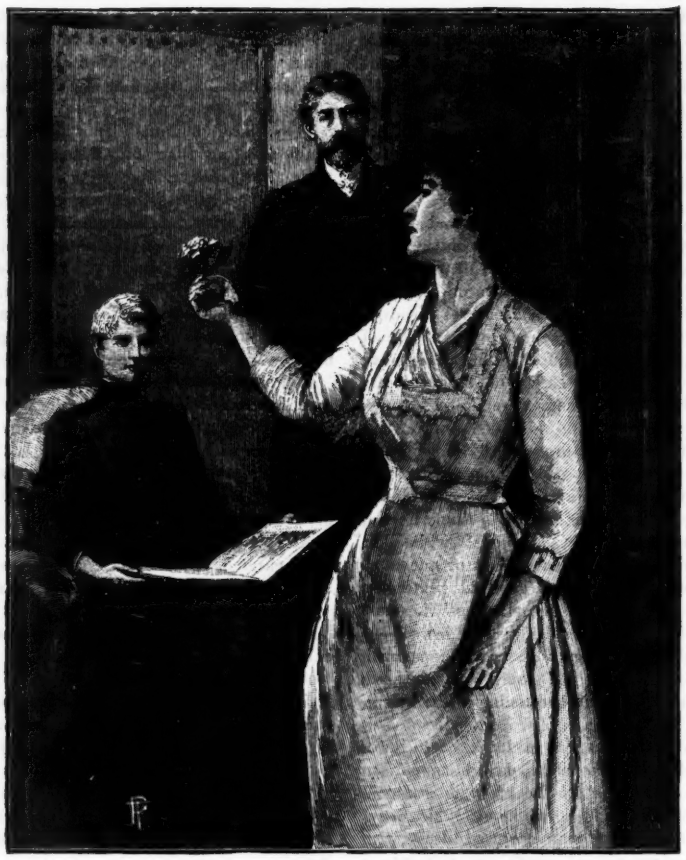
"You are worried, Harold. What's the matter?"

"Nothing," he said. "Nothing—now."

He was standing with his arm round her; she threw back her fair head so as to look up into his face.

"There is something, Harold. What is it? Has Josiah Forwood been disagreeable?"

"You know I don't care for Josiah Forwood. No; I was wishing I had been a better man for your sake, Nannie."



"You are good enough for me," was all she said; but the look she gave him was so full of tender pride that it seemed strange he should wince under it. Yet he did.

"I sometimes think," he said, "how it would be if you found out that I was not—that I had not always been——"

She laughed up at him.

"If you had not been the best man I ever knew I shouldn't have thought of you," she said. "But come; I don't want those people to fancy I neglect them. I think you are getting run down. You must go away for a day or two when this tiresome election is over."

When they came back into the drawing-room, they found that "a change had come o'er the spirit" of the scene. Nancy raised her eyebrows at her companion. "This is a new development," she whispered.

"'I've been stealing, you see.'"—p. 391.

On the voyage from New York, where Spencer Forwood had made Florida's acquaintance, she had gained some celebrity for her banjo-playing and singing. As Spencer happened to remind her of this—"I've got my banjo here," she said. "I'll fetch it."

Spencer looked a little dubious. He knew that Anne Prothero had never been allowed to learn music, even of the most decorous and classical type, and he feared that Miss Challis's répertoire would not commend itself to her host.

"I don't care if they like it or not," she said. "If I don't do something I shall suffocate."

So when Nancy returned with her lover, she found her warbling—

"Will you open de door, Maggie Judah;"

while Mrs. Fiske continued to pour out a stream of reminiscences into Miss Hardinge's politely attentive ear, and Mr. Prothero ambled up and down the room decidedly uncomfortable at the character of the music that was going on in his drawing-room (for, as we have said, he belonged to the old school), but unwilling to interfere with the amusements of his guests. Finally he could bear it no longer, and quietly departed.

Just as Florida was finishing her third ditty, Mr. Forwood, senior, appeared upon the scene. He cast a reproving glance upon the banjo-player, which she sustained with great coolness. When Miss Prothero introduced him to Miss Challis, he said—

"It is fashionable in America, I suppose, for young ladies to play on that instrument?"

"It is becoming fashionable everywhere, I think," said Nancy, who felt bound to take the part of her guest against what she felt to be an impertinence.

"Ah," he replied, "I hope it may be long before thou becomes a fashionable person, Anne."

His object in coming seemed to be to carry off his son, to whom he addressed a rather sudden question as they were going down the drive.

"What took thee up there to-night? Not business, I think."

"I just went up to call," the son replied.

"I wish I could have found thee spending thy time more profitably. And don't go making a fool of thyself with that young woman. I shall seek an opportunity with Edwin Prothero to tell him what I think of the ways of his household."

And so the pair went discontentedly home.

Edwin Prothero, meanwhile, quite unconscious of the offence that the ways of his household caused, was quietly conducting family prayer. As for Anne, if she had had a Quaker cap over the soft shining coils of her hair, she might have sat for the portrait of that ancestor of hers who died of gaol-fever in the county prison to which she had followed her husband, one of the earliest confessors among the Friends. She knew the story well; that and others like it had been the romances of her childhood. Her romance, her enthusiasm, her personal and family pride, of which the banker's daughter had a share that would have sufficed a Montmorency or a Howard—although, like a prudent person, she suppressed those tendencies to such a point that few suspected them—all ran in the same channel. The sense of belonging to a line of honest men, who had suffered for conscience' sake, but never as evil-doers, was as much to her as an hereditary coronet. For the same reason she never fretted against the limits imposed by the stricter members of her sect. Other young Friends of her acquaintance went to balls and theatres, and attired themselves in all the colours of the rainbow. Nancy Prothero's dress was always severely, though daintily, simple, and her wildest dissipations were a lecture or a Philharmonic concert; and this less out of reasoned conviction than because to do otherwise would not be in accordance with traditions which were precious to her.

But if she had been a finished coquette she could not have done anything more calculated to enhance the attractions she had. The cachet conferred by intercourse with "the best society" is one thing—and a charming thing—but there is a grace of breeding that may be acquired outside Court circles. It consists in reticence, calmness, sincere benevolence, heart-refinement. And of this good breeding no better school could be found than Edwin Prothero's household. It was this that gave a crowning grace of simple and delicate dignity to the gay, frank, high-spirited girl, a touch of sweet reserve and calm to the eager, sensitive face.

It is to be feared that Miss Challis was not in a frame of mind to profit by the closing exercises of the day. She was intensely and naturally annoyed at Josiah Forwood's behaviour to her; and yet the kindness of Mr. Prothero and his niece was scarcely more agreeable. She felt that they disapproved of her, and she was as quick to feel the disapproval of those about her as she was incapable of the self-command that would have avoided it—a temper as unfavourable to happiness in this world as can well be imagined. There was something in the sober calm of the Puritan household that, even while she chafed against it, touched an answering fibre somewhere in her strangely mixed nature. It was stupid, and slow, and monotonous, she said, but it filled her with a vague, vexing sense of her own deficiency.

Florida had another reason for feeling out of humour with her surroundings and herself. The presence of Harold Stuyvesant would of itself have been a trial to her; to meet him as the accepted lover of her hostess was worse, if possible. Four years back, while Stuyvesant was still their fellow-townsman, Miss Challis—then a just emancipated school-girl, impatient to begin what she, like many another novel-nourished young woman, considered the main business of life—had selected him as the appropriate object of a grande passion; and not only so, but on one occasion, piqued by the grandfatherly way in which he treated her, she surprised him by sobbing out a revelation of the place her fancy had given him. It was a distressing moment for him. He had been a most kind and helpful friend to the child herself and her mother, without a thought of any such sentimental complication. Looking back upon the circumstance, as she could not help sometimes doing, though the thought of it seemed to scorch her, Florida could not but admit that he had behaved like a gentleman. Nevertheless, she knew so little of what honourable feeling enjoins, that she saw nothing improbable in the idea that he had made Anne Prothero acquainted with the whole story. Nancy could not at all understand the suspicious looks that her guest sometimes bent upon her. The fact was, Florida was incessantly seeking for some indication of how much her rival knew, or if she knew anything.

When the party separated for the night, Nancy accompanied Miss Hardinge to her own room, which opened on the same corridor as Florida's. It was connected with a small dressing-room, which also opened on the corridor, and the door of which was open as Florida passed. She went to her own apartment, changed her shoes for a pair of soundless velvet slippers, and crept back to the dressing-room.

As soon as the two friends reached the shelter of their room Nancy carefully shut behind her the door that opened on the passage (it did not occur to her to think of the dressing-room door), and then, dropping into an easy-chair, on one side of the fire—Miss Hardinge was already ensconced in the other—she uttered the weighty monosyllable—

"Well?"

"Oh, I think he's delightful, Nannie!"

"That's right. I thought thou'd like him. I'm afraid it has been rather a dull evening for thee. I thought uncle would have relieved us of Mrs. Fiske. He gets on very well with her, but Miss Challis frightened him away with her banjo. I am sorry for that girl; she is bored to death here, I can see."

"She has one resource in that young Forwood."

"Oh! he is hopeless—a gone case. And I am afraid there will be no end of trouble, for Josiah Forwood will never allow it."

(Here a pair of velvet-shod feet shuffled noiselessly into the adjoining dressing-room, and Miss Challis's ear approached as nearly as possible to the door of communication, which was slightly ajar.)

"I suppose Miss Challis likes him?"

"Oh! as to her," answered Nancy, with a ripple of laughter in her voice, that made the listener want to choke her, "she is immensely in love, one can see—with herself."

Her voice dropped with the last words, so that Florida had the annoyance of missing the concluding part of the sentence.

"I don't think she will ever care much for anyone else," she went on. "Harold told me all the—— What was that noise?" For at this point there was a sound as if some garment had fallen from a hook in the next room.

"Nothing, I think. You were saying——"

"Oh! that Harold told me all about her family, and I know he was very good to Mrs. Fiske when she first came to Philadelphia. She has said so to me herself."

Florida was no longer benefiting by the conversation. There is a rather hackneyed quotation to the effect that

> "Trifles, light as air,
> Are to the jealous confirmations strong
> As proofs of Holy Writ."

To Florida, with her mind full of a preconceived idea, the words, "Harold told me," were enough to confirm her suspicions. A sudden choking sensation seized her; she rushed from the room, throwing down a dress that hung beside her as she did so, and flung herself on her own bed in a hysterical passion of rage and shame.

"I'll pay them out!" she gasped, as soon as she could get back her voice. "Oh, I hate him—I hate him—I hate them both!"

And she lay there sobbing, and revolving schemes of impossible vengeance, long after both the objects of her anger were fast asleep.

NOTES OF CHRISTIAN LIFE AND WORK IN ALL FIELDS.

THE LOHARDUGGA LEPER ASYLUM, CHOTA NAGPORE, BENGAL.
(From a Photograph.)

"NONE OF THEM DIED FOR ME."

A CHILD LEPER.
(From a Photograph taken at Lohardugga.)

INTEREST in the lepers, those special objects of the Saviour's help, has been greatly revived of late, and attention is justly drawn to the noble deeds wrought by Protestant missionaries in India. We read of a Leper Asylum at Lohardugga, Chota Nagpore, Bengal, with fruit-trees around, planted by the patients from time to time. Here John Newton, the lepers' friend, tended his charges devotedly, risking his life by coming into close contact with them, yet mercifully preserved from contagion. He was a medical man, and shone out as an earnest physician of the soul; his work amongst the inmates of the asylum was greatly blessed by God. Of another grand yet humble worker we hear that on one occasion, when a patient died, he performed the last offices, carried all that was mortal to the grave, and buried it himself, as no helper volunteered. A native Christian doctor who had been a Mahometan, and was clad in spotless muslin, did not shrink from placing his arms round a sufferer, raising him gently, and placing him in a comfortable position. The leper was coarsely dressed, and to the spectator the action recalled those tender words, "the love of Christ constraineth us." Mr. Budden, of the London Missionary Society, and Mr. Vaughan, of the C.M.S., put forth noble efforts on behalf of the sufferers. The Rev. Dr. Bauman, also of the C.M.S., was enabled to erect a place of worship in connection with the Calcutta Leper Asylum, and an aged woman, over eighty-two years old, was there led by the preacher to the Divine Healer. A sceptic asked her if the many gods and goddesses of her own religion would not suffice, but she had an answer ready for him—"None of them died for me." It is in His name and for His sake Who died for us, that help and sympathy are sought for these far-off needy ones, and those seeking to relieve them. The secretary of this grand work, the "Mission to Lepers in India," is Wellesley Bailey, Esq., 17, Glengyle Terrace, Edinburgh.

THE MUSICAL CLOCK.

A friend of ours received a legacy of an ancient clock, so constructed that it charmed the household with beautiful music, "and," said he, "when away from home, I was conscious of missing something sweet and pleasant, which on remembrance turned out to be the melodies of my clock." It came to pass one day that the music did not sound to him so sweet, and day by day there was a perceptible falling-off in the dulcet tones that had given such delight. At last the clock seemed to murmur rather than give music, and threatened to cease its tuneful notes entirely. "Dust and dirt," pronounced an expert, who was consulted as to the cause of the change. Under his skilful hands, the clock was thoroughly cleansed, and again the sweet music rang forth, clear and beautiful. As our friend mentioned the incident, we were reminded how necessary is the spiritual renewing which only can attune our hearts day by day to holy and helpful strains. The mire and dust of earth too often still the melodies of the soul, and these must be removed by fresh communion with the Lord, daily touching, by faith, of that Life which is altogether lovely.

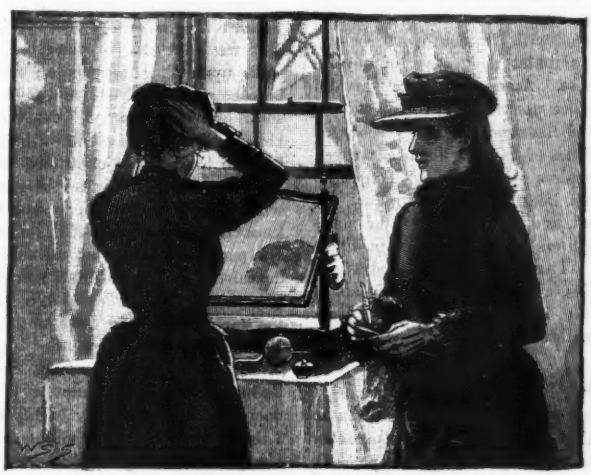
USEFUL LIVES AND USEFUL BOOKS.

The author of the popular biographies of the men who have risen from humble surroundings to the Presidentship of the United States, Mr. W. M. Thayer, has recently written a biography of Benjamin Franklin under the title "From Printing Office to the Court of St. James's," which is published by Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton. Of course Franklin's widely read autobiography did not leave very much that is new to be said about his life, but Mr. Thayer has succeeded in re-telling the story in an interesting way, and in putting many points in the great printer's public life in a new light. The work is one which, like its predecessors in the "Log Cabin" Series, cannot fail to be productive of good in the minds of young readers, and we heartily commend it. A series of earnest sermons by the Rev. Hugh Price Hughes, describing and illustrating "The Philanthropy of God," has just been issued by the same publishers. The title Mr. Hughes gets by a rather happy translation of the Greek word rendered "kindness" in the fourth verse of the third chapter of the Epistle to Titus. Many current topics will be found incidentally dealt with in the course of these addresses, but always in a thoughtful and sympathetic manner, and keeping in view the aim and purpose of the series, the illustration of the wonderful sympathy of God with man. The volume is a timely one, and likely to prove very helpful to preachers and teachers. There are some very pretty verses in a tasteful little volume entitled "Through Fields of Light" (Hodder and Stoughton), which have been collected from among the writings of the late Edwin Hatch, D.D., by his widow. Some have never seen the light before, others were only printed privately. All alike are now given just as they were written, most of them for the author's friends. How strange it is, in this age of change, to hear of an English city which has already had a settled form of civic government for a thousand years! This is the case in Winchester, and this fact alone would entitle the city to a place in the "Historic Towns" that are dealt with in Messrs. Longmans' series. The Dean of Winchester is the author of the volume on this old cathedral city, and he has told his story with all the affectionate enthusiasm of a resident who loves the city of his adoption. No one can spend even an hour in Winchester without seeing numerous evidences of its venerable age, and a very brief acquaintance with Dean Kitchin's book will show how many of the best sides of our English life are associated, in one way or another, with the ancient capital of Wessex and England.

LEFT IN THE QUARRY.

"Opportunity," it has been said, "is the flower of time," and to some people the flower may seem lost, and the stalk alone remaining. Let us not be too sure that our opportunities are past; they need seeking and inquiring for with full purpose of heart, and to the prayerful life that truly desires them they will yet become visible. It is a grand thing to know our opportunities, however, when they are granted to us—to say to ourselves, "Now's the time," and to make use of the present, all else being so unknown and so vague. How many a life-wreck, how many a wasted career has been brought about by procrastination! The time for the good work, the kindly greeting, the helpful letter, went by; and we had no part or share in what we knew to be blessed and Christlike. Why should we put our hands to the plough concerning that scheme which is just now upon our hearts? Because in a brief space the changes of residence, fortune, circumstances—life's uncertainty—may have put the ministry beyond our reach. Dr. Maclaren tells of lonely quarries wherein have been found blocks, squared and dressed, evidently meant for palace, shrine, or some important building. But no use has been made of them—the building for which they were designed is reared without their help. "Beware," says he, "lest God's grand temple be built up without you."

"THE VETERAN MISSIONARIES' HIVE."



A lady, who sympathises with the efforts put forth by the London City Mission to brighten the declining days of disabled workers, and to care for their widows and orphans, writes to the Society that she has added to her six bee-hives a seventh, on behalf of the veteran missionaries. "The bees have been so very industrious," she reports, "that I have sold the honey for £1 4s., which I now send, with best wishes for the dear old people." He who has promised that the righteous shall not be forsaken, must be well pleased with the solicitude of the London City Mission to make the closing scene of life's pilgrimage a land of peace to those who have borne the burden and heat of the day in the Master's warfare, and likewise to those they leave behind when called to the rest beyond. As far as their strength permits, several of the aged pensioners still engage in Christian work, such as visiting the sick, and conducting Bible-classes. Some of those most infirm make their sick-room a Bethel, by receiving visitors for religious counsel and prayer. Of one thus resting and waiting, a neighbour writes : "He is adviser-general for the village, and to many beyond ; with him it is a smile and a good word for everybody. When he is removed, the best influence we have ever had about here will be taken from us." The City Mission veterans have, in many cases, passed through perils and adventures which have tested the noblest qualities of Christian manhood. We read of a worker appointed to a neglected district near the Tottenham Court Road, which was crowded with the violent and dissolute. A drunken tailor insulted and attacked him for venturing to bring the message of the Gospel to his room. "A third time," said the missionary, "I tapped at his door, when he exclaimed, 'What ! come again !' and raising his 'goose,' he continued, 'If you come an inch further I will give you a bit of this.'" His visitor proved intrepid in his longing to see the drunkard a good and happy man. By-and-bye, the tailor shook hands, remarking, "You are a queer fellow to be religious, afraid of nothing. Yes, we will be friends." A few months later the reading of God's Word, and prayer, had brought the poor drunkard to the feet of Jesus, and his formerly ill-used wife was also found at the services held by the missionary, who, after twenty-six years of such arduous labour in the harvest-field, received his home-call with joy.

"THE CHRYSALIS OF ETERNITY."

Thus has Time been defined by Richter, and few of us remember from day to day what issues hide within the passing hours, what a solemn trust is the present, which so soon will be the past. It was once said of an individual, "He loses half an hour every morning, and runs after it all day long, without being able to overtake it." These words might be quoted now and then, perhaps, concerning ourselves, for the moments, the half-hours, are lost and wasted almost unconsciously, when they might be definitely used for good. We all require time for rest and recreation as well as labour, but many a moment is perfectly aimless and thrown away, tiring us more by its want of purpose than if we had filled it with work. We would remind our readers of that very useful society, the "Spare Minute Club," which relieves many cases of distress, and weaves leisure moments into chains of brightness and blessing. "Be merciful after thy power" is the watchword inspiring the association, concerning which particulars may be learnt from Miss Sargent, 20, Castellain Road, Maida Vale. Members undertake to work one quarter of an hour daily, or one hour and a half weekly, fining themselves threepence each week the work is left undone. The foundress was a hospital visitor, and became acquainted with so much domestic trouble in connection with the patients, that she longed to devise some regular means of comfort and assistance. The "Spare Minute Club" helps the sick, the widowed and the fatherless, the struggling poor, and those earnestly seeking work. "That 's impossible for me," said a poor zinc-worker, when the doctor ordered him a sea-change. The society sent him to a home at Folkestone, and he completely recovered his health. A poor invalid was asked if he was worried by the sound of the mangle provided for his wife. "Worrited by the mangle !" he cried. "I likes to lie and hear the blessed sound ! Won't it keep the missus and the kids from the workhouse ?" The hon. sec. of this club would be grateful for hospital or convalescent home letters, old sheets, linen, and new or mended clothes, but begs to be allowed to request that no clothes be sent from houses where there has been infectious illness.

USING THE SPARE MOMENTS.

"IN HIS NAME."

It has been said in the past, and not without truth, perhaps, that the girls of the working classes were better looked after spiritually than their sisters in homes of comfort. Now, however, societies exist to help all classes to fulfil the Master's bidding, and to follow in His steps. There are good works calling forth the time and talent of those whose days once hung heavily on their hands, and of late another association (originated in America) leagues "the King's Daughters" in a guild of active work for the Lord. Miss Tatham, 22, Welbeck Road, Birkdale, a lady who is connected with the Southport society, sends us a little pamphlet suggestive of several branches of helpfulness. Among these are "invalid cookery and ambulance work among the poor," infirmary visitation, and the supervision of discharged patients, making articles of clothing for needy cases, looking after the helpless and lonely. "To gentlewomen of the British Isles, younger and older," the pamphlet is addressed, and it is hoped that branches of the "King's Daughters" may be formed in different neighbourhoods. There are special ministrations adapted to older ladies, and one "group" consists of "little children of the King," from six to ten years old, who try to be truthful and polite.

"Looking after the helpless and lonely."

SERMONS, SKETCHES, AND STORIES.

Preachers have few more difficult tasks than to address a congregation of boys, and the preacher must be endowed with a peculiarly sympathetic mind who can successfully reach such a body of hearers. This thought is called up by the perusal of "Christian Conduct," a volume of sermons preached in the chapel of Mill Hill School by Mr. Vince, the headmaster, who has made admirable choice of subjects applicable to the wants of his boys, and dealt with them in a very happy manner. The volume is one that should be in the hands of all teachers of boys' classes. This volume is published by Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton, who also send us a volume of memorials of Andrew Kennedy Bremner, who is well described in the title as "A Child of Faith, in an Age of Doubt." Mr. Bremner's life was a short one, but it was an interesting and an earnest one, and its story, as told by his brother in this volume, will well repay reading. Another very interesting biography that is before us is Dr. Donald Fraser's "Life of Mary Jane, Lady Kinnaird" (Nisbet and Co.). Lady Kinnaird's name was so long known in connection with many good works that we feel sure her friends and fellow-workers will welcome this sympathetic memorial of her good life. "Old Crusty's Niece," from the same publishers, is a very pretty story told by the Rev. J. Jackson Wray and T. Jackson Wray, very closely written, but very well worth reading. Those who have to give addresses to children will find some very useful illustrations from nature's book in "Simple Lessons from Nature" (same publishers), by M. Cordelia E. Leigh. The volume consists of five-and-twenty well-classified lessons, from which useful hints might well be taken by those who have not at command the necessary resources for original research in this direction. Indeed, young teachers might do very much worse than take the outline of each of these lessons as a skeleton for their whole address.

OUT OF THE DARKNESS.

Some people are inclined to argue against religion because they have met poor specimens of Christians. But we have not to place our hopes and lean our souls upon Christian people; the Lord God Himself is to be our confidence, and none that trust in Him shall ever be ashamed. At the same time, could believers only realise what a help or hindrance they form to their fellow-creatures, they would pray yet more fervently that they might grow likeminded with the Master, and represent to those who do not know Him some image of His mercy, His forgiveness, His patience. "It is no use talking to me!" cried a despairing soul to a Christian friend, who was urging him to seek the pardon of the Lord, "I have gone too far—God would have nothing to do with me." Presently his friend reminded him rather coldly how often he had given him help, and how ungratefully he had requited his kindness. "What!" cried the poor fellow in surprise, "are you talking like that? I thought whoever else might cast me out, I could always trust in your kindness. And so I can—nothing has changed you—nothing will."—"I only wanted to prove to you," said the other, "how it would surprise you if ever I cast your past in your face. Now, if you can wholly trust in the love and pardon of an erring fellow-creature like myself, can you not more trustfully throw yourself on the mercy and pardon of God?" Light broke upon that despairing soul, and the prodigal was drawn, through confidence in a Christian man, to trust in the forgiving Lord, concerning whose grace to the contrite the poet cries—

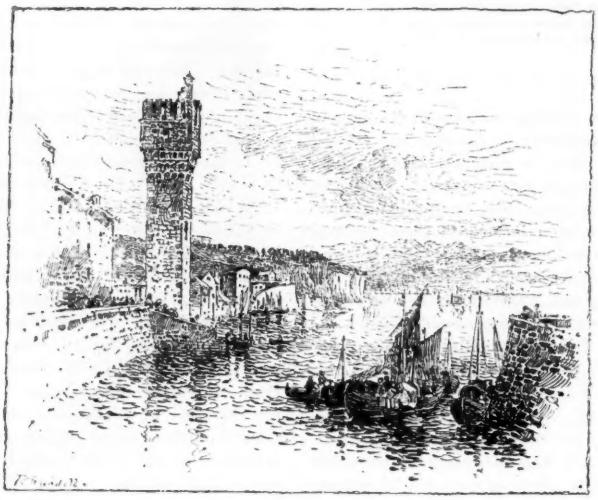
"Shall we attempt with puny force
To lash back ocean with a rod?
Arrest the planets in their course,
Or weigh the mercies of a God?"

THE Y.M.C.A. IN JAPAN.

One of the most striking features of the present rapid spread of Christianity in Japan is the success attending recent efforts to organise Young Men's Christian Associations in that country. At Tokio, the capital, such unions, each consisting of some forty students, have been formed in three Government and three missionary schools and colleges, while there is also a city branch. Buildings for the use of these young men unitedly are now in course of erection. While Christianity numbers about one in twelve hundred of the population of Japan, it has gained one-fifteenth of the students in seven prominent Government colleges. A leading scholar in one of these, when asked, "Why do many among you hesitate to accept the religion of Jesus Christ?" answered, "Nearly all who investigate it carefully do accept it." The Secretary of the American Y.M.C.A. Central Committee, lately visiting Japan, was struck with the missionary spirit of the native Christian youths at the Doshisha College, Kioto. At their instance he held evangelistic meetings among their still heathen companions, many of whom were led by this means to join the college church. From June 29th to July 10th, at the earnest request of the teachers and scholars in this institution, meetings for Bible study were held at the same time as the Northfield Summer School. Native pastors and young men from all parts of the country were invited, five hundred of whom were present. Addresses were given on "The Bible," "The Holy Spirit," "Prayer," "Methods of Work," by ten Japanese speakers and seven foreigners. A report of this gathering, entitled, "Guku Sei no Dai Kwai," "The Students' Great Gathering," is now published and widely read. It is hoped that a similar meeting next summer may be held in the new Y.M.C.A. buildings already mentioned.



FOR TEACHERS AND SCHOLARS.

Many Sunday-school workers and scholars know that in the British Museum are many objects of interest to them, from the light which they throw upon the Bible records. But their difficulty has hitherto been that these were so scattered through the various collections as to make it difficult for a student to visit all that he should see. The Rev. J. G. Kitchin, M.A., has now prepared a descriptive guide to the principal antiquities which illustrate and confirm sacred history, under the title of "The Bible Student in the British Museum." This little work is issued by Messrs. Cassell, and, armed with this, any scholar visiting the British Museum could not fail to derive much pleasure and instruction from a survey of its treasures. We are glad to welcome a new and cheaper edition of "The Marriage Ring" (Cassell and Co.), by the Rev. W. Landels, D.D., which is admirably adapted for a present to those recently married or those who are hoping shortly to be married. It is full of good and kindly counsels. A capital story for girls is "Polly: a New Fashioned Girl," issued by the same publishers, and from the pen of our old friend L. T. Meade, whose work needs no further recommendation to the readers of THE QUIVER. There is much that is very interesting in the little volume entitled "India: Sketches and Stories of Native Life," by the Rev. J. Ewen, just published by Mr. Elliot Stock. The work is the outcome of a long residence in India, and a careful study of the Mahometans and Hindus of the Northern Provinces. The work cannot fail to be useful to all who have the interests of mission-work at heart. The Rev. C. H. Butcher, D.D., formerly Dean of Shanghai, and now chaplain at Cairo, has collected in a tasteful volume, issued by the same publisher, some of the sermons that he has preached to his congregations in the East. Of course the volume will be chiefly interesting to those who heard the sermons at the time of their delivery, but they have a value for all as an illustration of earnest work in distant lands. Temperance workers will find "The National Temperance League's Annual for 1890" a veritable armoury for the year's work. It not only gives statistics of the past year's campaign, but supplies not a little information that should serve to make the new year's work more easy and more successful.

A DISTRICT-VISITOR'S EXPERIENCE.

"The first visit I made," said a devoted East End worker, "was to a woman who had invited me to call upon her, but who met me on the landing with uplifted fist, daring me to approach any farther." Such a reception made the visitor's heart quail within her, but she is one of those who in any perplexity call upon the Divine assistance promised to the needy and trustful. A few gentle words calmed the tumult of passion that had greeted her approach, and a request that she might be allowed to come in and sit down led at last to permission for her to read to the poor woman from the Gospel of comfort and peace. Since that day many a similar scene has defied the truth and endeavoured to daunt Christian courage. In one room a poor trembling wife could scarcely control the vagaries of a wildly drunken man, and in other cases coldness, haughtiness, opposition, have discouraged the visitor. Perhaps one of her most trying moments was when a man in a lodging-house expressed his approval of her efforts by giving her half of his saucer of tea, but she knew better than to refuse it, and finished it heroically, though it was flavoured with onion. A lady working hard among the poor said recently, "I do not know how I should have kept up heart of late but for two cases of conversion among those I visit." She was surrounded by discouragement, but those two cases shone out as God's witnesses that His Word will bear fruit even in unlikely soil. And so we could not help feeling that the toil of the East End labourer had been nowise in vain, when we heard the letter written to her by a poor labouring girl in that locality, blessing her that she had cared for her soul, welcoming her as a friend whom God had sent, and telling her she too would try what she could do to shine for the Master in that neighbourhood.

AT SAVONA.

AN ITALIAN MISSION TO SEAMEN.

The Church Mission for Seamen, Savona, Italy, was commenced about four years ago, and is now carried on in what was once a small theatre. The institute comprises a reading and recreation-room, and there is a library, to which additions would be welcomed. There are regular religious services, and a concert is held weekly. "We are now endeavouring," say the workers, "to arrange for short daily services on board the ships in port, so as to help and comfort many who are striving to walk in the narrow way." The sailors themselves are ready enough to aid the concerts, when once the ice is broken; and when there is an extra amount of talent forthcoming, the friends get up additional "sing-songs" amongst the men in port. Sympathising visitors passing through Genoa and along the Western Riviera would be gladly welcomed if they could look over the institute and lend their aid at some of the gatherings. When Jack comes ashore a cozy place with English papers has great attractions for him, and it is most important that he should find a shelter elsewhere than in a drinking saloon. Body and mind are well cared for at the various seamen's institutes now provided by Christian thoughtfulness, but the higher side of the work is going on at the same time, and good seed is being sown.

THE PROCESSION.

A GREAT SUNDAY-SCHOOL.

DR. JAMES MACGREGOR once said that Sunday scholars were the staple product of Stockport, and declared that the world might be searched in vain for anything in any way approaching the statistics in connection with the great school of that town. Though these are doubtless valuable and significant, the truly enormous influence which the school has exercised cannot adequately be gauged by them. An institution which has had six thousand teachers, and through which one hundred thousand scholars have passed, must necessarily have done much good that no system of official statistics, however complete, can possibly show, or that never will be known on earth. "The incidents that constitute the true history of our school year," says the Hon. Secretary (Mr. James Leigh) in one of his admirable reports, "cannot be written in these pages. They belong rather to such records as the Angel of the Apocalypse was commanded to write, and they can only be read when the seals are opened in the presence of that great assembly which no man can number." Much, then, must be left to the imagination.

The present building was commenced in 1805—rather more than twenty years after Sunday-schools were first brought prominently before the public—and cost upwards of £4,000, exclusive of the ground rent. In a circular issued at the time, the committee stated that the institution was founded upon the broad basis of universal philanthropy, and that it was intended to concentrate, as far as possible, the piety, charity, and talents of all parties. "The children," added the committee, "will be taken in turn to all the places of worship in town where accommodation is provided for them;" and it was further stated that scholars would be taught to read and write, and (in special cases) to keep accounts. As regards the management of the institution, it was provided that the committee, elected annually, should regulate all pecuniary matters; that visitors or superintendents, to each of whom would be allotted a particular department of the school, should be chosen from the most experienced of the teachers; and that, to connect together as much as possible the various branches of the school, there should be appointed a general inspector, whose office should extend to each department. This arrangement has, with few modifications, continued with complete success up to the present time.

It was at first feared that the building was much too large; but in 1835—thirty years after its opening—experience proved that the contrary was the case, and an appeal for funds being made, the response was so liberal that the committee were soon enabled to considerably enlarge it. Meanwhile, four branch schools had been erected by members of the committee at the different outskirts of the town, and were being carried on under the same management as the parent institution, and supported out of the common funds. Since then, the only addition of note was that made in 1884, when a new infant-school was built. The total cost of erection, with the branch schools, was £22,000.

To architectural beauty the principal building has little pretence. It is built of brick, and stands in such a position that it can be seen from many parts of the town. Yet, notwithstanding its lack of interest to the lover of the picturesque, few institutions in the neighbourhood are more worthy of a visit. During school hours it is a veritable hive of industry. From the corridors running through the building there open a number of doors leading into the various rooms, of which there are more than one hundred in the school. Most of these are class-rooms. About sixty classes are held every Sunday, some—which are divided into sections, each furnished with a teacher—containing between three and four hundred scholars. In addition, there is what is known as the "Large Room," which is capable of seating between two and three thousand people, and in which are held the monthly and annual services. There is also a periodical room (where about 22,000 publications are sold annually), several rooms for night classes and for the management of the institution, and three libraries—one each for the ordinary scholars, the first and second classes, and the teachers.

On the books of the large school there are generally about four thousand scholars, with about three hundred teachers and forty visitors or superintendents. These statistics are exclusive of the branch schools; with them the totals are much larger—namely, between five and six thousand scholars and five hundred teachers. Altogether, about one hundred thousand scholars have passed through the school, and there have been about six thousand teachers—a grand result which must be extremely gratifying to all concerned in the management of the institution.

Secular education, as we have seen, was one of the objects of the founders, and indeed writing lessons have always been given during Sunday afternoons. Now, however, week-night classes are held during the winter months. The average attendance is about one hundred and fifty scholars nightly, and the curriculum is pretty much the same as that of a well-managed mechanics' institute. This department is kept well in touch with the requirements of the time, the latest improvement being the erection of a laboratory that is probably surpassed by none within twenty miles of Manchester. Some years ago the science classes won for themselves a high position, and this they have succeeded in fully maintaining.

There are also in operation other organisations for the mental or social improvement of scholars, such as a Band of Hope, a flourishing sick and burial society, male and female improvement classes, etc. At one time the "Big School" (as it is familiarly called) had a band, consisting of some of the finest amateur musicians in England, and at the present time it is famous—in something more than the circumscribed sense in which the word is usually employed—for the excellence of its services in this respect. The school has a choir of two hundred voices and an orchestra of thirty performers.

In connection with the school there is no church, nor is any particular sect or denomination recognised; but the churches and chapels in the town are visited occasionally, while on one Sunday evening in each month a local clergyman preaches in the large room. Here, too, the annual sermon is delivered by some prominent divine. As a proof that the committee strictly carry out the design of the founders of the school, it is worthy of note that among those who have officiated at the yearly gatherings have been men representing many schools of thought. J. Brewer, Rowland Hill, Thomas Raffles, Thomas Chalmers, John Styles, Robert Vaughan, John Stoughton, Hugh Stowell Brown, Norman Macleod, W. B. Robertson, Dean Stanley, Donald Fraser, Newman Hall, James Macgregor—these are a few of the names that arrest attention on glancing down the list of preachers of anniversary sermons from 1806 to date. The whole of the expenses of the institution—about £800 per annum—are defrayed by voluntary subscriptions. Towards this sum as much as £500 has been collected after the annual sermon.

If a stranger wishes to see the largest Sunday-school in the world at its best, he cannot do better than visit it during one of these anniversary gatherings. Or, if he wants to bring home to his mind how great a force Sunday-schools are in the training of youth, let him see the annual procession, which takes place in June, and in which between four and five thousand scholars, past and present, take part. To see both is almost an education, so far as judging of the great influence at work on the rising generation is concerned. And yet this is only one school.

When we remember that, as John Bright once said. "There is no field of Christian benevolence which has yielded a greater harvest to our national interest and national character than the great wide-spread institution of the Sunday-school," we should think with profound gratitude of the founder of that institution, and of the many zealous and pious workers in the same field who have succeeded him—men who, without thought of earthly reward, have carried on the Master's work at the cost of much self-denial. In this respect the Stockport Sunday-school has happily been very fortunate. Willing workers it has never lacked, and to this fact must doubtless be attributed much of its great success.

THE WORLD'S TRINITY.

BY THE REV. J. R. MACDUFF, D.D.

(PREACHED AT A COMMERCIAL CRISIS.)

"Thus saith the Lord, Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom, neither let the mighty man glory in his might, let not the rich man glory in his riches:

But let him that glorieth glory in this, that he understandeth and knoweth me, that I am the Lord which exercise loving-kindness, judgment, and righteousness, in the earth: for in these things I delight, saith the Lord."—JEREMIAH ix. 23, 24.

THESE words bring before us a Trinity which men deify: wisdom, might, riches. None of the three are in themselves unworthy. As subordinate objects of aspiration they are not only lawful, but commendable, and may be consecrated to high purpose. If made the terminating objects of life, the ruling, absorbing passion of the soul, they are fraught with peril. If rightly guided and rightly used, they may exalt, elevate, ennoble. If misused or abused, they may and will only accelerate and insure deterioration or ruin. They are like the steam engine, which if skilfully directed will speed along its lightning path in calm and stately majesty, and hundreds will quietly resign themselves to its tractable guidance. But leave it in unskilful hands, and it will rush away in uncontrollable madness, breaking, like another Samson, its iron withs as if they were tow.

Let us briefly consider, in succession, each of these three objects of human pursuit and ambition.

1. "LET NOT THE WISE MAN GLORY IN HIS WISDOM." Wisdom! This is a noble subject of glory. No wonder it is put first in the triple theme. The inspired prophet looks to the greatest of earthly triumphs, the triumphs of mind, the achievements of intellect. The conquests of wisdom are greater than those of heroes or armies. No brute force, no outward calamities, no war or pestilence or famine can arrest or destroy them: no earthquake can engulph them. The warrior's victory of to-day may be reversed to-morrow; fire and sword may leave the fairest domain a blackened waste. Mind outlives all catastrophes. The ashes of the philosopher may be scattered on the river, and borne down in insult to become the sport of the ocean; but his mighty words and doctrines are remembered and treasured when the tongue which spake them is silent. No monarch that ever swayed sceptre is to be compared to the sovereign Thought! We see the deification of Wisdom in ancient Greece. Minerva (the Goddess of Wisdom) was the presiding deity in her Parthenon. It was her poets and sages, her sculptors, orators, and statesmen, who mainly constituted her pride and boast. Her Lyceums and Porticoes were more to her than navies and martial camps. It is the country in all the world (past or present) which has exercised the greatest influence on Mind. Wisdom and greatness were with that people synonymous. Yet what did Greece, the soil of Pericles and Demosthenes, Socrates and Plato, do to work out the mighty unsolved problem of aching humanity? Nothing. "The world by wisdom" (by all the boasted wisdom of its sages, its laws, its sensuous refinements, its poetry, its art)—"the world by wisdom knew not God."

A nation that gloried in its wisdom may well read a lesson to individuals. All honour to men of science, and doubly so in these decades of her greatest triumphs. All honour to the distinguished names of those who in our own country have enlarged and are daily enlarging every department in the domain of natural truth. But higher honour to those who with a Newton spirit have made the noblest discoveries of the finite only the ladder-steps to the grander discoveries of the Infinite. As it is the principle of the modern Baconian philosophy to approach Nature, the volume of the outer world, with a child-like reverence, saying, "What sayest thou?" so is it the attribute of Christian wisdom to approach the other volume (the volume of Revelation) saying, "How readest thou?"* Seeking to be wise up to what is written, but not wise above what is written; feeling that "the wisdom of God is wiser than men." Oh! whatever be the boast of intellect and the triumphs of her reputed monarchs—however wondrous the powers by which Science now controls the elements; her steam, her telegraphs, her arsenals, her dockyards, her navies; her astronomers mapping out the pathway of the stars, calculating to a minute the time of the eclipse, and registering with fidelity the return of the comet; her geologists reaching down to the foundation-pillars of the earth; her navigators exploring their way amid the icebergs of eternal winter; her travellers through untrodden continents casting new and invaluable trophies at the feet of discovery—yet nevertheless the telescope of the astronomer, and the shaft of the geologist, and the compass of the navigator, and the keen eye of the geographical explorer, can throw, of themselves, no gleam of light on the vastest and most momentous subject of all. Here philosophy must own itself a little child, and opening this Book of God read of a new "Wisdom" higher than all ethical systems, transcending all the guesses of humanity at its noblest and best, a "new thing on the earth"—"Christ crucified, the power of God and the Wisdom of God."

2. "LET NOT THE MIGHTY MAN GLORY IN HIS MIGHT." We have spoken of Greece as the impersonation of Wisdom. We may well take its sister-kingdom Rome as the type and embodiment of Power. "Might" or "strength" was the name of the Eternal City; and when a Jewish Prophet speaks of this Roman Empire, he takes as its meet symbol "a beast whose teeth were of iron and his nails of brass, which is to devour the whole earth, tread it down, and break it in pieces." As we think of Greece in connection with the Grove and the Academy, the Pnyx and the Agora, so we are in the habit of associating Rome with the Campus Martius—with conquering armies, the spoil of vanquished nations, the insolence of power. She was the mighty Nimrod in the ancient chase for sovereignty; and her bow, like Jonathan's, never turned back.

But behold the emptied quiver now! Where is her boast of chivalry and power now? Where her legions which made the world tremble? The saying of Jeremiah is chiselled on every ruin of her capital, on every moss-grown fragment in her naked Campagna. "Let not the mighty glory in their might." "Ichabod: the glory is departed!"

Our text, however, here again speaks, not of empires, but of individuals. It addresses, not the mighty kingdom, but "the mighty man." It would tell each of us how poor and paltry the highest objects of human ambition are—statesmanship, titles, rank, military glory—if they are made the supreme and ultimate objects of life. Such are only the accidents of existence; they are, in themselves (many of them), praiseworthy. They may be lawfully aspired after; and when the proud pinnacle is attained, noble is the influence which the child of genius or fortune may wield over his fellows. But they are a poor portion if the aspirant on realising his dreams of earthly ambition comes to fold his arms and say, "This is my rest, this is my glory." "As for man, his days are as grass." And if man will not rise to a true estimate of himself, how often does God pour contempt on his false glory! scathe with one lightning glance his tower of pride and ambition, and leave it a humiliating heap of ashes! Nebuchadnezzar was a mighty man who gloried in his might. God sent him forth to herd with the beasts! Sennacherib was a mighty man who gloried in his might; his words were, "By the strength of my hands have I done it, and by my wisdom, for I am prudent." God converted his tented field into a necropolis; the morning sun rose on a camp of the dead! Herod the Great was a mighty man, with the blood of Rome in his veins. He made it his object to overawe by dazzling proofs of regal splendour the spirit of the Jewish people. When the shout arose from an obsequious crowd in the theatre of Cæsarea, "It is the voice of a God," the King of Kings sent a loathsome disease to give the lie to his divinity! What a picture is that we have in one of the grandest but most fearful passages in Isaiah! It is the vision of these same "mighty men" who had been glorying in their might entering the abodes of Death and Hades. The millions they had dragged at their chariot-wheels, the captive thousands over whom they had wielded their sceptres, are represented as crowding from their varied places to hail with sarcasm the approach of the old tyrants. "Where is your power now? Where your jewelled coronets, your victor garlands, your processions to the Capitol? Thou didst say in thine heart, I will ascend into heaven, I will exalt my throne above the stars of God! Art thou also become weak as we? Art thou become like unto us? Is this the man that made the earth to tremble, and did shake kingdoms? How art thou fallen, O Lucifer, son of the Morning!"

* See Dr. Chalmers' "Evidences of Christianity."

And such, brethren, is a picture, an awful picture, of what the mere lust of power and might will lead to if unsanctified and unregulated by higher principles. Nothing is there nobler than to see one encompassed with the insignia of earthly power, another statesman like Daniel, strong in the maintenance of high-souled honour and integrity, seeking to feel that he has been invested with these for no mean, or paltry, or time-serving purpose, but as a minister of God to do His pleasure and promote His glory. On the other hand, "I saw the wicked great in power, spreading himself like a green bay-tree; yet he passed, and lo! he was not. Yea, I sought him, but he could not be found."

Let not, then, the mighty man glory in his might!

3. LET NOT THE RICH MAN GLORY IN HIS RICHES. As Wisdom in itself is not forbidden, but is rather the noblest object of human ambition; as Power in itself is not illegitimate, but may be wielded as a mighty instrument for good; so Riches are not in themselves proscribed. There is not one verse in Scripture which denounces the possession of riches as a sin. The love of money it speaks of and condemns as the root of all evil, but not money itself. In the parable of the rich fool who pulled down his barns and built greater, the man was not condemned because he was rich, but because he was a fool. If he had been poor, he never perhaps could have manifested his folly, for he would have had neither barns to dismantle nor enlarge. The possession of money only helped to develop his selfish passion, and publish to the world his folly. His riches might have been a blessing, inestimable to himself and others, had he used them well; had he been faithful to his stewardship, and like the giant oak thrown out a hundred sheltering arms to the poor, and fatherless, and friendless. But he was a traitor to this great trust, and "Fool" was the word which Incarnate Truth wrote on his gravestone. It is the sinful lust of money, the desire of more, hoarding for the sake of hoarding, the vulgar craving and boast of increasing wealth, ever eking out the web on the golden loom — in other words, it is covetousness which God condemns. The rich man glorying in his riches, as if they were the great end and goal of existence; as if the mere having of these riches (or acquiring more) constituted the summum bonum of life. And say, is there a spectacle on earth more miserable than the poor gold-digger (not of Ophir, or Australia, or California, but the gold-seeker and gold-digger among ourselves), piling up his heaps, not one coin of which he can carry with him beyond the grave? Like Icarus he soars upwards and ever upwards nearer the sun; but the golden beams he loves so much are the first to melt his waxen wings and bring him to the dust. The hands of Mammon will smooth no death-pillow. The golden oars will not ferry across Jordan. The golden keys will not fit one lock or gate of the only true Golden City. When Death comes, that great canceller of all bonds, he will make every coin look as base alloy. Remember the words, and who uttered them, "How hardly shall they that have riches enter into the Kingdom of Heaven!"

Such, then, are the three false subjects of glorying enumerated in the text.

The prophet now passes to the theme or subject of true glory. "But let him that glorieth, glory in this, that he understandeth and knoweth me, that I am the Lord, which exercise loving-kindness, judgment, and righteousness in the earth; for in these things I delight, saith the Lord."

On this, time forbids adequately to enter. I can only observe that the prophet here sets forth in an attractive delineation, and in loftier words than his own, the one all-sufficient satisfying portion. Wisdom, Might, Riches, are all good, only if they are ladder-steps conducting to the Divine throne. Before man can truly glory—or, what is equivalent, be truly happy and blest—you must restore him to what he was, and to what he had. Worldly philosophy, martial power, golden ingots, cannot do that. They are husks without the kernel. They may feed one part of his nature, but they are a mockery as food for the nobler cravings of the immortal counterpart. They may even so far avail through life; but what can they do for him at death's inevitable hour? Greek! what says thy philosophy then? Rome! what says thy boast of heraldry and pomp of power then? The whole writings of antiquity, the familiarly known "classics," shrink appalled at the contemplation of the dark fabled river. The present was their all. Paul's quotation of the tenet of one of their own philosophic schools was the prevailing accepted sentiment of the ages of Paganism: "Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die." But the same Apostle brings the Christian to that river's brink; and as he himself is preparing to plunge in, whispers in the ears of others the ground of his own triumph. "The cross in which I glory disarms death of its terrors. None of these things move me; neither count I my life dear unto myself, that I might finish my course with joy."

Men and brethren, be it yours to seek this true subject and theme of glory; this only panacea for all the evils of life; the disarmer of future dread and misgiving; the rod and staff conducting and supporting through all its valleys till you come to the last one of all. Know God, study His perfections, delight in His Word, adore His Sovereignty. "Acquaint thyself with Him, and be at peace." If His way appear to be dark, remember it is the right way. He inscribes over His every dealing, "I am the Lord, which exercise loving-kindness, judgment, and righteousness on the earth." Thus making Him your stronghold, alike in the day of adversity and prosperity, you will rise superior to all life's vicissitudes. Whether your stewardship be the treasures of wisdom, and knowledge, and influence, and worldly wealth; or whether yours be the lowly lot, the uncultured mind, the restricted means—ay, the rifled and desolated home, and the crash of earthly fortune—you will be able to glory in the noble avowal—

> "O Thou bounteous Giver of all good,
> Who art of all Thy gifts Thyself the crown,
> Give what Thou canst; without Thee we are poor,
> And with Thee rich, take what Thou wilt away."

WINGS OF THE MORNING.

BY C. DESPARD, AUTHOR OF "INTO A LARGER ROOM," "BY THE WATERS OF BABYLON," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER XX.—A FRUITLESS SEARCH.

IT was much more than a nine days' wonder. Indeed, we may safely say that never, since the days of the Mutiny, had English society in India been so deeply moved. For, while interesting in itself, as all cases of mysterious disappearance must be, it drew a painful importance from the circumstance that it shook that sense of personal security without which life would be almost unendurable. If, it was argued, a young girl, beautiful, rich, happy, and tenderly cared for—all of which Thekla Ellerslie was generally supposed to be—if such a girl could disappear suddenly from her own father's house in a great station like Bombay—disappear as absolutely as if she had been spirited, body and soul, to some distant planet, who was safe?

The circumstances, known, before many days had gone by, through the length and breadth of the country, were as follows:—

Thekla, who had been absent from the famous entertainment at the Yacht Club, was suffering from a slight feverish attack. Her father gave her a simple remedy, and kept her in her room. Late that evening—this was not meant to be known; but it leaked out through ayahs' talk—there had been a few words between the girl and her elder sister. Regarding the subject of the dispute no one was quite clear; but some—the sensational—thought it had to do with a gentleman lately come to Bombay, who had transferred his attentions from the elder to the younger sister. What appeared to be certain was that Miss Ellerslie had, on the following day, left home rather suddenly to visit some friends at Poonah.

Here a singular complication occurred. For reasons of their own, the sisters changed ayahs: the ayah who had hitherto served the younger, and who was a faithful and intelligent servant, going with the elder sister to Poonah; the second ayah, a woman who seemed to have been stupid and lazy, staying in Bombay.

On the evening of the day when the elder sister left home, Sir Richard dined out. He returned home later than usual, and found the house perfectly quiet. He awoke late the following morning, and, being tired and out of sorts, he spent the greater part of the day in bed.

On the afternoon of that day, Gopal, his khansama, sent in to ask him if he knew where his daughter was, reporting that she had not been in since the morning. He was a little annoyed, for he thought she might have sent in to inquire for him before going out; but he was not the least alarmed. He got up, however, and went into her room, which was just as she had left it in the morning; the bed open, and articles of her dress, with the trinkets which she generally wore in the evening, lying about. Thereupon he called up the ayah, and ordered her to put the room tidy. The afternoon wore away; but still he felt no anxiety, though his displeasure increased; for he thought that, in being away so many hours without letting him know where she was, his younger daughter was taking advantage of her sister's absence; and by this time he had made up his mind that she was spending the day with Lady Lucy Leveridge, who, as he heard, had paid a visit to his house on the evening before his eldest daughter left home.

When evening fell, he sent a messenger to Lady Lucy's hotel, with a note requesting that Thekla should be sent home at once. Here an unfortunate delay occurred; for, after his messenger had waited some time, the note was brought back to him with the information that Lady Lucy had left the hotel that afternoon. The messenger was Gopal, the khansama, a person of remarkable acuteness. Instead of returning to his master with this piece of news, he made inquiries on his own account, the result of which he communicated to Sir Richard on his return. It was in consequence of this communication, which, though mistaken, was proved to have been given in good faith, that another night was allowed to elapse without any serious steps being taken to recover the lost girl. Her father believed that she was under the protection of Lady Lucy and General Leveridge, and being deeply wounded by the way in which, as he thought, he was being treated by his daughter and her friends, he would make no sign.

The following day Lady Lucy and her husband drove up to his house. They were admitted, and he went in to meet them, being prepared, as he said afterwards, for a stormy interview, when, to his horror and dismay, they asked to see Thekla. It came out then that it was not his daughter, but another young lady, whom Gopal's informant had seen with Lady Lucy on the afternoon after Thekla's disappearance, and the question now was, Where could she be?

Up to this—we have taken up the story three months in advance — that question remained unanswered. Space would fail to tell of the efforts that were made to trace the unfortunate young girl. Legal machinery of every kind was set going. Magistrates, lawyers, the subtle and clever Indian police—all were busy, but all for the space of that three months worked in vain. Time was their enemy. In those fatal three days of delay to start the search every trace of her was obliterated.

This was what was generally known in Bombay, whence it found its way to other parts of India, producing the most extraordinary excitement. Many set their wits to work, and the wildest theories were started, while letters containing the most impossible suggestions were written to the papers.

There was one theory in the wind, of which no one ventured to speak publicly, but which had a distinct and disastrous effect on the feelings of the community towards Sir Richard Ellerslie and his remaining daughter. It was built up on the ruins of the pretty little legend that Lady Lucy Leveridge had once combated in vain. Some now were heard to whisper that it was impossible this secret could be so well kept without collusion from the family. And was there not a certain supineness in the conduct of the search at head-quarters? The servants, for instance —that astute person, Gopal, who had answered so glibly at the inquiry, and the young girl's ayah—was it possible that neither of them nor any of the others had seen her leave her room? For this is what everyone of them maintained. No one had seen her go. Was this natural? Nay, was it possible?

The legend, as I have said, had fallen into ruins. It was pretty well known now that Thekla Ellerslie did not wish to marry Isaacson, and some had it that the real reason of the indisposition which had resulted in her being left alone with native servants was her conflict with her father on this subject. It was known, further, that when she came of age—an event which was nearer, rumour said, than most of her acquaintances imagined—she was entitled to her mother's property, on the proceeds of which her father was living, and that this was the secret of his strong desire that she should marry a man of large wealth; for, in such case, his present income would in all probability be left with him.

She declined the rich marriage, and almost at the same instant she disappeared. Was there not, whispered the sensation-mongers, something strange in this? No one uttered the ugly word "murder." That would have been too horrible, too blood-curdling. But she might be hidden—kept out of the way until she would consent to the marriage her father had arranged for her, or until she should be of an age to dispose of her property by her own will, when, of course, the condition of her being received by her family would be that she should dispose of it to her father.

This particularly wild conjecture gained colour from the circumstance that, as soon as decency would permit, Sir Richard left Bombay, and that those who met Miss Ellerslie reported a curious change in her. It did not come all at once. At first, though to all appearance distracted with grief and anxiety, she was in her manner generally very much what she had been; but as the days went by, bringing no news of her poor little sister, her vivacity departed, and there came a strange dazed look into her eyes, just as if, people said, she was continually haunted by some painful dream. Lady Lucy Leveridge, who had thrown all her energies into the search, but as yet with no result, noticed this, and she spoke of it to Ronald Hinton in one of their many consultations; for he, as we shall imagine, was leaving no stone unturned to unravel the dreadful mystery. Lady Lucy's remark, which for a moment startled him considerably, sent him on another tack: but concerning this we shall have more to say presently. Here we may mention that they had, in the meantime, called in the assistance of Michael Grierson. "He took a strong interest in the poor child," said Lady Lucy. "Already he knows more about her affairs than we do. It is due to him, you know, that I came to Bombay when I did."

Michael was on the point of starting for England, with the view of gathering together men and materials for one of his great educational and society-regenerating schemes in Northern India. At Lady Lucy's request, he stopped at Bombay and met her and Ronald Hinton there. They told him the story of Thekla's disappearance. Strangely enough, he had up to this heard nothing of it, although it had gone the round of the English papers, and his horror and dismay were disconcerting even to Lady Lucy. The first shock over, he, to use her own expression, cross-examined her as if she had been in a witness-box. A curious spasm contracted his face, when, in the course of her story, she told him how Thekla had received the accusation against her father. Hinton had been glad when he heard it. He had wished that his poor little darling should know exactly how she was being treated. Michael shook his head sadly. "You should have remembered," he said, "that Sir Richard was her father, and that she loved him. You accused him, and the whole of her true sweet nature sprang in arms to his defence."

"She would find out that I was right," said Lady Lucy.

"Yes. And what might the effect not be on such a nature?"

"You don't think—you can't think——" began Lady Lucy; and Ronald Hinton sprang up.

"This is becoming too horrible!" he cried. "I cannot bear it. Tell us, for pity's sake, what we are to do!"

"Go on searching. There is nothing else," said Michael.

"And you?"

"I will search too; but in my own way."

He left them then, and, although Lady Lucy heard of him as spending another week in Bombay and seeing all sorts of people, she did not see him again at that time. He proceeded, as she found out later—a little, it must be confessed, to her disappointment—on his voyage to England.

There was one person who, if the former pretty legend that for a time had gained credence could have been supposed now to have had any basis in fact, should have been foremost in the search for Thekla, but who actually did little or nothing. That person was Isaacson. Shortly after the story of the disappearance became known, he paid Sir Richard a visit, wishing, to use his own expression, to talk the thing over. Sir Richard, who looked haggard and careworn, received him coldly, and he asked, in his blunt fashion, if he was to consider the engagement at an end. "Unless you can find my poor child and bring her back to me, it must be at an end," said Sir Richard. "Between us we have driven her to despair."

"Oh! is that your opinion?" said Isaacson. "Well, if so, I'd better say good-morning."

"Funny people there are in the world!" he muttered to himself as he turned away. "A girl, while she stays at home and behaves herself, is a bore. She gets lost and gives no end of trouble, and she's a heroine. I don't think a heroine would suit your book, Montague Isaacson, so perhaps you'd better make up your mind to give up this little business. It's a pity, for she's a handsome girl; but there are as good fish in the sea as ever came out of it. I'll have a shot at the Simla beauties, and when little Miss Thekla comes back, as I am sure she will do—and penitent too, very likely—she may just whistle for me."

CHAPTER XXI.—AMONG THE HILLS.

With its usual severity the month of May has set in, and the people in the plains of India—the white-skinned strangers from the dark and friendly north—are panting out the long days in rooms artificially darkened and cooled, and, in the mornings and evenings, going out in the lightest of raiment to breathe the heated air. Fortunate are those who, like Sir Richard Ellerslie and his daughter, can leave the burning arid plains behind them and find a summer refuge in the hills!

Sir Richard has taken a house at Darjiling for the season. It was a long journey from Bombay, but (so at least a few of his acquaintances are beginning to say) this was all the better for him. He wished to put distance between himself and his first Indian home. That home, it is rumoured, he has given up. Surely a very hasty decision; but he has taken his whole staff of servants, including the ayah who was so deeply devoted to his lost daughter, up to Darjiling.

Whether he has continued the search or given it up in despair no one knows. It is in this high valley, in any case, that we find them again, the time we have chosen to look in being the late afternoon of a day which, but for the fierce glare of the sun, undarkened by the floating clouds that make the beauty of our northern skies, would have been almost like a summer day at home.

The bungalow is beautifully situated on one of the little eminences that abound in Darjiling, and it is faced on two sides by an open verandah, between whose pillars, which are gay with climbing roses, peeps of the lovely green valley, dotted over with bungalows and gardens and woods, and the confused world of far-receding hills, with, in the distance, gleaming white and wonderful from the sky-line, the awful peaks of Kichinjunga, that monarch of the mountains, are to be seen.

The young girl, who, with eyes wide open and full of a nameless pain, is lying on one of the couches in the verandah, has become accustomed to this glorious spectacle. At first it did her good. For a short space she was lifted out of herself; she ate and slept naturally, and she thought she might some day be able to think naturally again. But the uneasiness from which she had been suffering came back, she resorted to the old dangerous remedy — the dose that makes her sleep and forget her misery—and now she is as weak and languid as when she left Bombay.

As she lies gazing out dreamily, her father comes in. "Marion, my love," he says softly, "General Chesney is here."

She turns her eyes upon him. "Well, father," she answers.

"He is in my library, dear; but he is not satisfied with my society. He wants to see you; shall he come in?"

There is a brief pause. Marion looks as if she were trying to rouse herself. "General Chesney," she repeats in a low voice.

"Yes, darling, the General," says her father, patiently. "You like him, you know."

"Oh, yes, I like him. He didn't forsake me like the others. He is a good man. But——"

"He is waiting, dear. May I not tell him you will see him?"

"Yes, in one moment. Father, do you think——"

"My dear girl, do let him speak for himself."

"Oh! but that is just it. Should he speak? Ought I not to tell him——?"

"Marion, you will send me mad!" says Sir Richard, in desperation; then, trying to control himself, "Didn't I say, dear, that this was to be a closed subject between us?"

"Between you and me, father——"

"And you will not surely drag others into our secrets!"

"I have thought once or twice," says Marion, turning her pain-haunted eyes upon her father, "that this ought not to be a secret—that if I had told everything exactly as it happened—how cruelly I spoke, and how she looked as she went back to her room, it might have been a clue. I should like to know, father, to be sure, even if" (shuddering) "it is the worst. Sometimes when I lie awake at night, I have dreadful ideas about her being alive, and in misery, and long, long years going by—all the years of her youth—and our never finding out."

Sir Richard's face has changed as his daughter speaks; but he sets his brows together and answers firmly: "You are morbid, Marion. I have told you over and over again that you are not so much to blame as you think. You spoke roughly—that I regret: but you spoke under the influence of strong aggravation. For many reasons I must beg you not to mention the subject to General Chesney. I am afraid to think what he or anyone else besides myself would imagine if you were heard speaking as you have spoken now. Ah!" as the sound of a step and a hearty voice calling him comes from the drawing-room, "here the General is! Couldn't be patient any longer."

A fine-looking middle aged man, tall and broad, with grizzled hair and beard, sunburnt complexion, and the face of a true warrior of civilisation, which should be as tender as it is strong, appears in the entrance to the verandah.

"Do please forgive me," he says, looking at Marion and speaking in a voice as gentle as if she were a little child, and he was afraid of alarming her. "I was impatient, and that is the truth of it. I haven't seen you for two whole days, Miss Ellerslie."

"What a long—long time," says Marion, giving him her hand and smiling.

"Now you are laughing at me," says the General, holding the little hand, which is one of the dearest things in all the world to him, a trifle longer than is altogether necessary. "But, to be frank"—he sees out of the corner of his eye that Sir Richard has gone away—"the days when I don't see you seem interminably long."

"The days long, when you have so much to do in them? It is you who are laughing, General, and"—with one of her old smiles—"at the expense of poor little me, who have nothing to do but to lie here and think of you."

"Do you, really?" The colour springs to the bronzed cheek, and the manly voice that once and again has risen above the roar of battle is hoarse with emotion. In another moment the strong hand that is tearing at the tassels of the chair-cover will grasp the little white hand that lies within its reach, and then——

"Ah! what is that?" cries Marion.

"Nothing! nothing!" answers the General, strongly irritated, of course, by the interruption. "A wrangle amongst the servants, I suppose! Sir Richard hasn't got them under proper discipline. I've told him so again and again. You don't mean to say that you are frightened, Miss Ellerslie?"

"Go away, please—go away!" gasps the girl, who is looking out before her with frightened eyes.

"Go away, and leave you in this state!" protests the General.—"Here, some of you lazy louts! Khansama! chuprassie! ayah! have that noise stopped. It is disturbing Miss Sahib."

"I am afraid she must be still further disturbed." The words are in English, and the voice is undoubtedly that of an Englishman.

"Insolence!" cries the General; but even as he speaks, the words are frozen on his lips.

Marion has risen from her couch and is standing beside him, with face as white as death, and trembling lips, and eyes full of horror. "Hush!" she says, in an intense whisper. "You mustn't speak. They are coming to tell me that she is dead."

"Don't listen to her. She is mad," says a voice from behind. "I warned him."

"I did not come so far to be put back by excuses now," says the intruder, a tall young fellow with a stern face, who stands at a little distance from Marion, looking at her fixedly. "Are you enough yourself to know me, Miss Ellerslie?"

"Yes," she says wearily, "I know you. I thought you would come. You are Ronald Hinton."

"And you know why I have come?"

"To ask me about Thekla."

"Will you answer me, before those who are standing here now? Will you tell me what you have done with her?"

For an instant the pale lips move; but no sound comes from them.

The General comes forward. "What is all this?" he says.

Ronald does not so much as notice him. "If you will not speak, I must.—Boy," to his servant, "tell Ahmed to bring in his prisoners."

"I protest," says Sir Richard, coming to the front. "She cannot stand this excitement. It will kill her."

But Ronald gives no more answer to him than he had done before to the General, and in the next instant two native policemen appear in the verandah leading Luchmee, whose face is hidden in her veil, Gopal, the khansama, and an Indian who does not belong to the household.

"Have they come to accuse me? Did they hear and understand?" says Marion, sinking down into a chair, and covering her face with her hands.

Ronald looks at her for a few moments silently, then he says quietly, but very sternly, "Miss Ellerslie, I must ask you to be good enough to look up for a moment."

She obeys. There is a dazed look in her eyes, which makes him fear that she really does not understand what is said to her; but now there is no other course but one to pursue. A little parcel is in his hand. He opens it, and shows a small necklet of diamonds. "I will not ask you if you have ever seen these before," he says. "I will tell you what I know about them, and then you shall judge whether it will be well for you to speak or keep silence. I found them at a jewel merchant's in Bombay. Judging from certain marks upon them that they had not been righteously come by, I took the trouble of finding out their history. I traced them back to that man" (pointing to the stranger), "and he asserts that he had them from the khansama Gopal, about the time when Sir Richard Ellerslie's younger daughter disappeared."

At this Gopal and Luchmee lift their eyes and look reproachfully at the stranger, who preserves a stony demeanour.

"I thought this suspicious," Hinton proceeds, "and I made further inquiries, in the course of which I discovered that the man Kaisoo, who disposed of the diamonds, is this woman's brother"—he pointed to Luchmee—"and has been acting under her instructions."

A thrill of surprise passes through the little company.

Luchmee, who had wept night and day for her young mistress—can she be implicated too?

"The jewels," goes on Ronald, very gravely, "with others, which, guided by this clue, I found in Bombay, are by Sir Richard recognised as having belonged to his second wife."

"Jewels that were lost years ago," says Sir Richard. "Ask any of my friends if I have not constantly complained of their mysterious disappearance."

"It may be," says Ronald, "that this mystery also is in a fair way to be solved.—Miss Ellerslie, I have a painful office, but I must perform it. These people state that they received these gems from you."

All eyes—the General's, Sir Richard's, Ronald Hinton's, the servants'—are turned upon Marion, for they are expecting her indignant denial of the charge.

The General whispers to her encouragingly. "This is barbarous," he says; "but who minds what these canaille say? Lean upon me, dearest Miss Ellerslie. Look them in the face and speak out."

"Yes, yes; speak out. It is absurd. It bears falsehood on the face of it," says Sir Richard.

"I shall be thankful for ever if you can deny it," says Ronald.

Marion looks before her still with that fixed and dreamy gaze. "What is it?" she says, when they all press her to speak.

"They accuse you of giving these jewels as bribes, I suppose, that they might spirit away your sister," says the General.

"My sister, my poor little sister! She has gone. It was my fault. I meant to tell you. Why are all these people about? I don't think I could tell it before them. Such a number! And how strangely they are looking at me! Father," says Marion, throwing herself into his arms with a piteous cry, "take me away. I've told you, you know, and you can tell Mr. Hinton."

CHAPTER XXII.—THE DAWNING OF HOPE.

THE excitement in Bombay and Calcutta, spreading thence to all parts of India where English people were settled, was overpowering, and the circumstance that everyone believed some horrible solution of the mystery had been discovered, and that no one outside the little inner circle of those immediately interested in it knew positively how the solution had been reached, or the actual form it had taken, added intensity to the general interest.

The few English people concerned in the scene at Darjiling were, each for reasons of his own, particularly reticent concerning it, and yet it leaked out that Marion and her father, who were actually more interested than anyone else in Thekla's disappearance, had been proved to have some hand in it. But, so it was rumoured, the only witnesses against them were people of the country, whose testimony is notoriously untrustworthy Some had it, however, that the native witnesses were supported by material evidence, which would be brought forward at the trial that was to take place at Bombay in the winter.

Two of Sir Richard Ellerslie's servants, a khansama who had hitherto borne an irreproachable character, and an ayah, with a man outside of the house, who was said to be related to the woman, were committed for trial, and Sir Richard and his elder daughter were subpœnaed under heavy penalties to appear as witnesses. It was whispered that if their evidence should turn out unsatisfactory they would run a serious risk of standing in the dock beside the prisoners; for those who were conducting the inquiry had made up their minds to leave no stone unturned to sift out the truth and lay the blame of the great crime which, as everyone began to fear, had been committed, on the right shoulders. This was the state of affairs when Lady Lucy Leveridge, who was at Darjiling, having gone thither at the urgent request of her old friend General Chesney—it was several weeks after Ronald had set the new proceedings on foot—received the following telegram, sent on to her from her home in the Punjaub:—

"Stop the Ellerslie case. I have important evidence. This is urgent. You will receive news by next mail. "MICHAEL GRIERSON."

She sent the telegram on to Ronald Hinton; he communicated the news to the lawyers and police, and it was soon known throughout the country, to the great disappointment of lovers of sensation, that possibly there might be no trial at all.

Lady Lucy, in the meantime, hurried to General Chesney's rooms. Ever since the painful scene at the Ellerslies', in which he had unwillingly borne a part, the General had been in a very strange condition. He professed himself bitterly indignant at the way in which the sweetest and truest girl in the world had been treated. He was angry with Ronald Hinton—angry with his old friend Lady Lucy—angry even with Marion's father, for not loudly asserting their conviction of her innocence; and yet there were moments when a cold and cruel doubt, which, warrior though he was, made him shrink and turn pale with sudden fear, would steal into his heart, and lie hidden there like a serpent. Those jewels, which Sir Richard had acknowledged as having belonged to his second wife—how did they come into the possession of the native servants? And why had Marion's manner been so strange? It had been enough, not to bewilder her only, but to kill her outright, poor little darling! Still—ah! how passionately he had longed for one strong indignant word of denial, one outcry of the pure heart, stung past endurance by the cruelty of its accusers!

He went to the bungalow the day after the servants were seized. Sir Richard saw him, but he was not permitted to see Marion. "She is in a high fever. I shall lose her too," said the unfortunate man.

The day after, he went again. Marion was a little better; but she was still in a critical state, and could see no one but her father. It was then that he had written to Lady Lucy Leveridge, and entreated her, by the friendship that for many years they had borne one another, to come to Darjiling.

Lady Lucy, who was allowed to see Marion, did not bring out a very comforting report. "She has something on her mind, my poor friend," she said.

But after her visit to the prison where Luchmee was confined, she brought back more reassuring news. Luchmee, she felt convinced, was not so guilty as she gave herself out to be. Even on her own testimony, which, Lady Lucy maintained, halted in many particulars, she would not believe that she had received and passed on bribes to compass the destruction of the young English girl, whom, up to this, she had professed to adore. There was, moreover, a grossness—a want of proportion about the story which made it incredible.

"But would she," said the General, "accuse herself falsely?"

"She might," said Lady Lucy—"I have known of such cases—if the motive were strong enough."

"But what could the motive be?"

"That is exactly what we must find out."

So it went on day after day—Marion ill, Sir Richard haggard and anxious, the General hoping only because he would not let himself despair, and Lady Lucy lingering on week after week in the hope of making Marion speak, or of coming to some truer understanding of Luchmee.

At last, when she was on the point of going away in despair, and letting things take their course, this telegram arrived.

It came in the afternoon of a stormy day. Having telegraphed it on to Bombay, she rushed, through torrents of rain, to the General's rooms. He was sitting beside a wood fire, gazing dismally into the glowing embers, and listening with a dull heart to the beating of the storm, when he heard her cheerful voice outside. "May I come in, General? I have news."

He leapt up. "Lady Lucy—out in this weather! Come in! come in! News or no news, you are always welcome. Take this arm-chair by the fire!"

"No, thank you. And I will keep my cloak, if you please. I must rush on to the Ellerslies at once. Perhaps you will come with me." And she showed him the telegram.

The red colour came rushing to the bronzed face of the soldier. "I wonder," he said, "if you interpret this as I do."

"How do you?"

"I think she has been found."

"And I am certain of it," said Lady Lucy.

Without any more words they started off, and another few moments found them in the verandah of Sir Richard Ellerslie's bungalow; then the General drew back, and Lady Lucy, having given her wet cloak to the ayah, went on into the drawing-room, where, looking white and worn, Marion Ellerslie was lying.

"Thank you for coming to me through the rain," she said softly; "and didn't I see someone with you?"

"Yes, dear; General Chesney is in the verandah."

"Tell him to come in, please; it is cold out there."

"You are sure you are strong enough to see him?"

"Oh, yes; and he has been so kind. Those are his flowers," pointing to a basket of magnolia blossoms. "They fill the room with their scent. When I look at them I think that there is someone who believes in me; and the ayah tells me he has been here every day to ask after me. I should like to thank him."

For a moment Lady Lucy paused, looking at Marion searchingly. Then, a new idea striking her, she went to the verandah, and taking the General by the arm, drew him to the furthest corner from the drawing-room. "Miss Ellerslie wishes to see you," she said.

"Have you told her?" he asked eagerly.

"No; I will tell her before you."

"Is that fair?"

"I think so—perfectly."

"You are a woman, and ought to know. I place myself in your hands," said the General, whose voice was trembling with emotion.

When, after those few moments' delay, they went in, they saw Sir Richard with his daughter. "I have just heard you were here, General," he said, "and I was coming out to ask you to my den. What weather! It is very good of you and Lady Lucy to come out."

"I have come because I have news for you and your daughter," said Lady Lucy.

"News!" cried Marion wildly.

"Compose yourself! I believe it is good."

"If it is good——?" began the poor girl—and then she broke down, and burst into bitter weeping. "Father, God has forgiven us!" she sobbed out. "Our poor little Thekla is found."

Later, when she was more composed, and had heard exactly what Lady Lucy's news was, Marion, with her father's consent, told her and the General of the painful interview between herself and Thekla on the night before the mysterious disappearance. She did not spare herself. All through those bitter days and weeks, when the memory of her sister's white face and sad eyes had haunted her, those fatal words, spoken by her own lips, had been ringing in her ears. That they had driven the helpless girl to despair; that finding herself unloved, and thrust upon a fate which would have been worse to her than death, she had chosen to die, and thus be rid of her perplexities, Marion had come to believe. As for all this tangle of servants and jewellery and confessions and mutual accusations, she was only just beginning to understand it. She was guilty. If her little sister had died in her despair, it was she who, by her cruel words and base desertion, had driven her to her death. This was the mental agony which all these weeks had been torturing her, so that she was driven for rest to the potion that had so nearly been her ruin. But for some weeks now she had been forced to live without it, and her brain, for the first time since the evening when she and Thekla parted, was working clearly.

When Lady Lucy told her of Gopal's and Luchmee's confession—she had heard of it before, but she had never understood its import—she smiled incredulously. They take bribes to do Thekla an injury! It was impossible, absurd! Luchmee would have died rather than hurt her. "The poor little thing almost died when I took her away to Poonah with me," said Marion. And then she sprang up, and there came a sudden light into her eyes. "Let me see her! Let me see her!" she cried. "I understand it all now."

"You are the cleverest of us all," said the General rapturously. "What a pity someone hadn't the sense to speak plainly to you weeks ago! I knew there was some very easy solution of the mystery, if we could only find it."

So that evening, on the representation of Lady Lucy, who, if there was a trial, bound herself to produce Luchmee, she was released from prison, and she and Marion were brought face to face in the presence of Lady Lucy, who, being fluent in Hindustani, interpreted for them.

It was a painful interview, for Luchmee, who, as Lady Lucy could see, distrusted and disliked Marion, refused to speak plainly. Up to a certain point, indeed, she was clear enough. She had brought Kaisoo to the Ellerslies' bungalow in Bombay. Kaisoo, acting under her directions, had received and disposed of the jewels. Gopal, without whose assistance nothing could have been done, had favoured his entrance and covered his retreat; but after that, she became hopelessly mixed. It was something, however, that, under Lady Lucy's kind and skilful questioning, the wild original tale completely broke down. Driven into a corner, Luchmee confessed, with streaming eyes, that she would not for all the world have had her chota Miss Sahib hurt. But after she had said it, she wept as bitterly as one who has been guilty of a treachery.

"Thekla has gone away of her own accord; and these unfortunate, misguided people are sacrificing themselves to prevent her from being found," was Lady Lucy's comment on the interview. "There is nothing to be done now but to wait for letters."

CHAPTER XXIII.—THE MYSTERY SOLVED.

LET us go back a few weeks and cross the sea, and look in at a well-known house in London. It is night, and the large reception-rooms which have been full all day of people who came and went, are silent and deserted. But up-stairs there is movement still. The mistress of the house, an elderly woman whose face and figure are familiar in London society—she is the foster-mother and friend of half the forlorn hopes in the kingdom—has dismissed her maid, and with a disturbed look in her face, is pacing her room to and fro, and talking to herself. "I can't have it go on. Everyone says so. She must either go or speak. But where is she to go to? I don't see that I ought to concern myself about that. I have given her the alternative. She has only to confide in me—and surely that is not asking much, after all my kindness to her—and I will continue to befriend her. If she doesn't——" and there Mrs. Ogilvie pulls up, and her face changes. "Poor little Mary! I can't help trusting her. And what a strange sad look there is in her eyes! Sometimes I fancy that someone she loves has done her a great injury. If I let her go I am certain those eyes will haunt me. But I have spoken before others. The question is, can I draw back now?"

Poor, vacillating, kind-natured Mrs. Ogilvie! The decision of that question is already being taken out of your hands. In an upper room someone else is stirring—a girl with a beautiful pale face, lit up by large grey eyes that have in them a look of pain pitiful to behold in one so young, who is sitting before her writing-table with a pen in her hand. There are a number of sheets of manuscript before her. She adds a few words, which run as follows:—"And now I must go out again into the wide world. Mary Somers can no more find a home than Thekla Ellerslie. God knows how thankful I am for this little pause, and how grateful to my dear Mrs. Ogilvie for all her kindness to me. If it were not that I see I am becoming an embarrassment to her, I would stay with her always. But she has given me the alternative. I must say who I am—and that, for their sakes, I will never do—or I must go. So, as it will pain her kind heart to send me away, I will go of my own accord, and go at once. If I steal out of the house very early, without bidding her good-bye, she will be angry, most likely, and leave me to my fate, and I shall keep my secret."

It is yet some hours before the morning. Having nothing else to do, she turns over the sheets of manuscript, which are written in her own hand, and reads them rapidly.

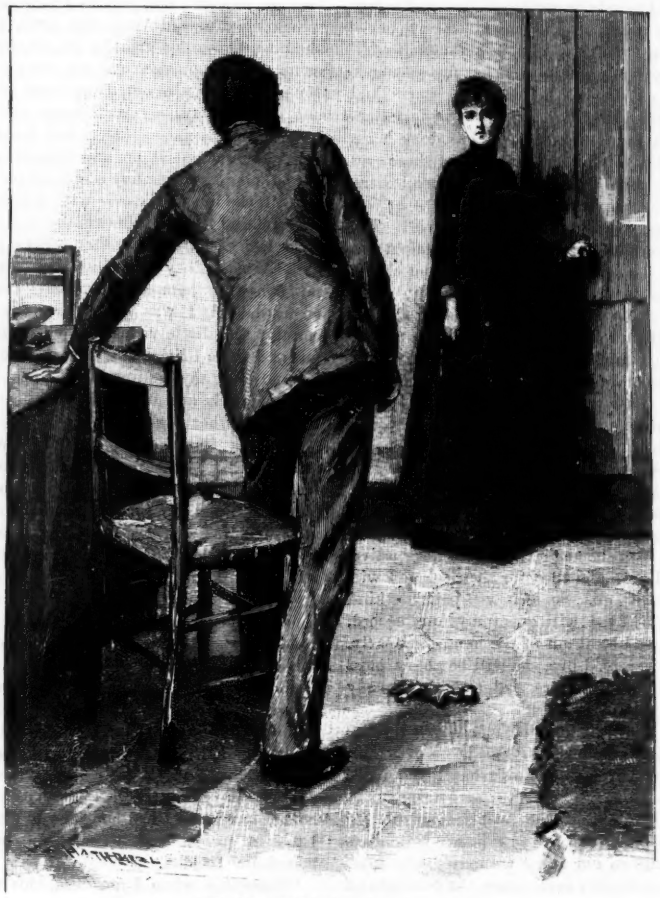
We cannot give all that she read that night, for space would fail us; but the few pages which are necessary to complete our story we may fairly take, more especially as the day came when the contents of that sad little journal were widely known.

The preface, in which she gives her reasons for telling the story in writing, and the searchings of heart—the doubt as to whether, after all, she had done rightly—into which she was led when she took up her pen, we must leave, beginning with the plain narrative of what actually took place after the discovery of the jewels:—

"When I saw a strange man in my room," she wrote, "I was on the point of screaming out with terror, for I believed he had come to rob and murder me; but in the next instant I saw behind him my good Gopal, with my dinner-tray, and then I was quite reassured.

"The stranger was Kaisoo, my dear little Luchmee's brother. He brought with him her pearl earrings, and all her silver bangles, which, he said, I was to take and keep, and he offered himself to me, body and soul, to use as I pleased. I may be wrong, of course; but when Kaisoo came to me in this sudden way, a messenger from Luchmee, who believed I wanted to run away as she had done, I could not help feeling as if he had come in answer to my prayer. It was such a strange moment, too, just as I had found the jewels which my dear old Anna had given to me in case I should ever want a friend! So, whether it was right or not, the temptation was too strong to be resisted. My poor father was out, Gopal had sent his servants out of the way, my own ayah was asleep. They brought me a native dress, and I stained my hands and face and put it on, and slipped out of the compound, no one taking any notice of me. That night I slept in the hut of Kaisoo's wife, a kind little woman, who reminded me of Luchmee.

"I had given my dearest mother's jewels to Gopal and Kaisoo. They came back the next day bringing me money for them, and then a litter and bearers were engaged, and I was carried a long way into the country to a little village, where a hut was given to me, and there I lived, the good Kaisoo watching over me and doing my bidding, until Gopal had disposed of all my jewels and ordered the things that I required for my further flight.



"By this time the first excitement was over. Gopal managed to see me from time to time, and I heard from him that my father and Marion had not fixed the blame of my disappearance upon any of the servants, and so I was at peace. They will search until they feel it is useless to search any longer, and then they will think I am dead, and forget me.

"In due time Gopal brought me the money. It seemed a large sum to me, I remember; but it has all gone now. He brought, too, at my request, two or three servants' dresses, and a dark travelling cloak and bonnet, and then one night late, when everyone in the village was asleep, I dressed myself as an English servant, and with the good Kaisoo still waiting upon me, I found my way to the nearest railway station, and took train to Calcutta. There I stayed for a few days as Mary Somers, an English servant on her way home; and when I had bought a few necessary things, I took a second-class passage on board a steamer bound for London.

"Some day, when I am dead, this account may be found, so I wish to leave it on record that Kaisoo, Luchmee's brother, was good and faithful to the very last. Not until I actually started would he leave me, and then it was only with great difficulty that I could persuade him to take the few rupees which he had so fully and nobly earned, and return to his own people. As for dear little Luchmee's ornaments, since Kaisoo would have thrown them into the sea rather than take them back, I have them still, and some day, if I can possibly manage it, she shall have them again."

So far we have given Thekla's story verbatim. An account of her voyage, her arrival, her first days in London, the slow but alarming waning of the sum of money she had considered so much more than sufficient to keep her until she could find some remunerative work, and the despair which seized her when she found that no one would take her without a reference, or at least some statement from herself of what her antecedents had been, follows. She went at last into a governesses' home, where she lived at the very lowest rate possible; and finally, when she was at the end of her resources, the great Mrs. Ogilvie, one of whose forlorn hopes was a governesses' society, happened to see her at the Home, and engaged her on the spot as her secretary.

"Thekla stood before him."—p. 418.

At Mrs. Ogilvie's house Thekla spent a few pleasant weeks. She was brought into contact with some strange people, and her diary, which became tolerably diffuse, is full at this period of amusing and characteristic observations.

To her employer she was both charming and useful, and if only Mrs. Ogilvie could have been content to allow the relations between them to go on as they began, all would have been well. Unfortunately for herself, she conceived the idea of adopting the charming child who had fallen into her hands so strangely, and then, immediately, difficulties began.

Mrs. Ogilvie had friends and relatives. What rich woman is without them? These did not oppose her new whim. On the contrary, they entered into it most warmly. But they suggested that their good cousin should find out something about the girl's antecedents before she made a daughter of her.

This commended itself to Mrs. Ogilvie's good sense. Of course she must hear Mary Somers' history. How was it possible she could adopt her without knowing who she was? for Thekla had confessed already that she was living under a feigned name. Mary Somers was appealed to. Very sorrowfully she declined to speak. She was grateful for her kind friend's interest; but she could not tell her story, and she did not wish to be adopted. Her persistency, which whetted Mrs. Ogilvie's curiosity, made her angry at last; and she said, in a hasty moment, before one of her cousins, that Mary must either consent to be frank with her, or seek another home.

Thekla could not be frank, and she made up her mind to go. Early, very early, on the morning that followed that sleepless night, she put a few necessaries and her diary in a small travelling bag, and stole out of the house.

CHAPTER XXIV.—AND SO THE TANGLE ENDS.

THERE was one person who had long since reached a solution of the mystery of Thekla's disappearance, so remarkably near to the actual facts of the case as we know them now, that one might almost have imagined him to be gifted with second sight. That person was Michael Grierson. So firmly convinced was he that she had escaped and left India for England, that he actually went himself to London, where he instituted a search for her. But while the Oriental mind was an open book to him, he failed to understand the intricacies of the search-agencies in London, and he lost time in following up many a false clue. What miseries he encountered, and what help he brought in that long and dreary search, is not for this history to record. There are one or two—honoured and useful members of society now—who will thank Heaven all their lives for the strange providence which brought them once under the light of those luminous eyes, and within sound of that spirit-stirring voice.

Michael had been in London for several weeks, when it occurred to him suddenly that Mrs. Ogilvie, the mother of forlorn hopes, might advise, if she could not help him, and, on one of these fair mornings in early summer, he went to call upon her.

It happened to be the morning of Mary Somers' flight, and she was so much disturbed that, instead of listening to his story, she began to pour out her own.

At first Michael listened with languid interest. Mrs. Ogilvie was always being disappointed in her pets, and always appealing to her friends for sympathy. All at once, however, his attention was aroused, and he asked, with extraordinary eagerness, what Mary Somers was like. The description still further exciting him, he asked if she had left anything behind her.

"Anything!" cried Mrs. Ogilvie indignantly. "She has left everything: all my presents—the dresses, and the jewellery, and the handsome plush mantle—she looked so well in it, poor little thing, that it was quite a pleasure to see her. And don't you call it ungrateful to throw back one's presents in one's face, just because one wanted to adopt her? I shall never want to adopt another girl—never!"

"Then you have looked over her room?" said Michael.

"Of course I have, and here is one of the things I found. I brought it down because I thought it might be a clue. You know I am certain that girl is not in her true position."

As she spoke, she took up from the table a silver bangle, such as Indian women wear. "If you take that to the light," she said, "you will see that there is writing on it—Oriental, I think. I meant to show it to one of my Indian friends, but you, I believe, are up in the Eastern languages."

Trying to keep calm, though his heart was beating wildly, Michael took the bangle to the window. There was one word on the silver, traced rudely in Hindi characters. The word was "Luchmee!"

"Well!" said Mrs. Ogilvie, who thought he was a long time making it out, "have you read it?"

"Yes," said Michael, turning round.

"Why! what a light there is in your face! Is it her name? Do you—can you know her? For pity's sake speak."

"I think I know her. I know something of her, at least," said Michael, trying to speak calmly.

"Where do you suppose she is?"

"Wherever she is, we must find her."

"Wait for one moment, and I will take you to the Governesses' Home, where I found her first," said Mrs. Ogilvie.

Left alone, Michael took up the paper, which, as it happened, he had not seen that morning, and one of the first pieces of intelligence that fell under his eyes was an extract from an Indian paper, concerning the cause célèbre which was agitating the whole of the English community in the East.

"I thought it would come. I am only just in time," he said to himself. As soon as Mrs. Ogilvie joined him, to say that she and her carriage were ready, he begged to be driven to the nearest telegraph office, whence he sent off the message which produced such a happy result in India.

"Go in alone, Michael," said Mrs. Ogilvie, when they reached the door of the Home. "I will wait here. Yes, do as I say. I believe I understand what it all means. So if she is your Mary, or Martha, or whatever her name may be, bring her out to me that I may scold her."

Before these words were well out of his kind friend's lips, Michael was standing in the doorway of the Home.

"Miss Somers here?" said the servant. "Yes, sir. Came in this morning. Step this way."

She showed him into a small, bare sitting-room on the ground floor. It was empty, and he waited with a beating heart. One minute, two minutes, three minutes. Did ever minutes pass so slowly before? He stood looking at the door, for his eyes were growing dim, and he feared he might not see her if she came in. He turned and watched the clock. That dreary little clock, how slowly, how mechanically it was moving—tick, tick, tick—the beats that wear the heart out! Would she never come? Perhaps he had been premature. That she had an Indian bangle in her possession, with the name of her ayah upon it, was no positive and certain reason that she was Thekla.

"Thekla!" He repeated the name to himself, and it throbbed through his heart like music. If she were here, and if—— The door was opening—slowly, very slowly, as if the hand that opened it were in doubt or dread; there was a startled cry, and then the door closed, and his little Thekla—the sweet and true-hearted girl who for these many days and weeks had been a living presence in his heart—stood before him! He thought he had prepared himself; but when he saw her—alone, helpless, forsaken!—all his calmness fled.

"Thekla!" he said, in a broken voice. She did not speak; she gazed at him with dazed eyes, into which the light of a new and wonderful joy was dawning. "Thekla!" he repeated, holding out his two hands pleadingly, "I have found you at last!"

"Have you been looking for me?" she said, coming forward slowly.

"Yes, darling—all the world over!"

"Looking for me? You?" The large grey eyes were blazing with light. "Oh I am so glad! so glad!"

She had not intended it; but she had betrayed herself. In that cry of rapture, drawn from her by the fulness of her joy, her secret had gone from her for ever. In the next instant strong and loving arms were about her, and the tears which she could not keep back were being kissed from her eyes by the lips of her lover.

That evening Mary Somers—named by her own name now, for Michael had proved to her that further concealment would do no good, but only injury to her father and sister—went back to Mrs. Ogilvie's house; not to be adopted, said the mother of forlorn hopes, but to be given away.

The post, so eagerly waited for in India, which carried the news of Thekla's safety and health, with a full account of her adventures since she left her father's home, carried also a letter from Michael Grierson to Sir Richard Ellerslie, containing a proposal in due form for his younger daughter's hand. He had become rich; the arrangement he proposed was even more generous than that Isaacson had been ready to agree to, and the only condition he laid down was that they should not be kept in suspense.

The answer came by telegraph: then Mrs. Ogilvie and Thekla, with Mr. Harrington, the girl's relative and guardian, and several other friends, went to the beautiful old house in Kent where Thekla's mother had reigned in her girlhood. Thither in due time Michael came, and thence they were married, in the presence of the friends of both families, with old Anna, alternately blessing them and weeping, in the background.

In the autumn they returned to Bombay, where Sir Richard and Marion, who was now engaged to General Chesney, and Gopal and Luchmee and Sonya received them.

And so everything was settled to the satisfaction of all in whom we are interested, with one exception. That one was Ronald Hinton. But even his dissatisfaction was brief. "I shall see her again," he said to Lady Lucy, his friend and ally; "and I know I shall always have her friendship. But——" and he paused.

"Well?" said Lady Lucy. "Go on."

"I was only thinking that if on board the Amazon I had been a little more clear-sighted, I might have won her."

"No, Ronald, I scarcely think so. She was in love with Michael then. Looking back, with the light of the present to guide me, I am certain of it. And though I confess I never thought of it beforehand, I can see now that this is the best solution. They will make a grand pair. If I don't very much mistake, the world will be glad of them."

"That is very likely," said Ronald, smiling a little sadly. "And so our tangle ends."

"But not our alliance," said Lady Lucy. "Come and see the General and me in the English home which our friends are preparing for us, and we will find you a wife."

THE END.

LIGHT AND LIBERTY.

WHAT THE REFORMATION DID, AND WHAT IT DOES.

BY THE REV. ARTHUR ROBERT PENNINGTON, M.A., CANON OF LINCOLN CATHEDRAL, AND RECTOR OF UTTERBY, LINCOLNSHIRE; AUTHOR OF "THE LIFE OF WICLIF," "THE LIFE OF ERASMUS," "PRELUDES TO THE REFORMATION," ETC.

ONE of the greatest blessings obtained by the Reformation was the circulation of the Sacred Scriptures in a tongue understood by the people. The Church of Rome has always been wise in her generation. She well knew that when the Bible was sent forth the fabric which she had erected with so much industry and care would be shaken to its foundation. She therefore issued various decrees prohibiting the reading of the Sacred Scriptures by the laity in the vulgar tongue. But her efforts in the end failed of the wished-for success. The bright light which shines in God's Word has penetrated to every part of the building, exposing the hidden things of darkness, exhibiting those multiform delusions with which she had practised on the credulity of her followers, and enabling us to discover that she had corrupted and mutilated "the faith which was once for all delivered unto the saints."

We say that the study of the sacred Scriptures contributed at the time of the Reformation, and that it still contributes, to the enlightenment of the human race. Some have attributed this change to the revival of ancient learning. "It is now admitted," writes Mr. Lecky, "that the causes of the Reformation are to be found in the deep changes effected in the intellectual habits of Europe by that revival of learning which began about the twelfth century in the renewed study of the Latin classics, and reached its climax after the fall of Constantinople in the diffusion of the knowledge of Greek, and of the philosophy of Plato, by the Greek exiles."*

But though the diffusion of ancient learning may lead to the discovery and removal of errors and abuses, it cannot, by itself, communicate the knowledge of that "wisdom which maketh wise unto salvation, through faith which is in Christ Jesus." The study of Homer and Virgil could never be the means of regenerating the world. The paganism of the poets taught men at the time of the Reformation that religion was a cunningly devised fable, and eternity a dream. To use the words of Lord Macaulay, the class just referred to consisted of men who "with the Latinity of the Augustan age had acquired its atheistical and scoffing spirit; who regarded those Christian mysteries of which they were stewards just as the augur Cicero and the High Pontiff Cæsar regarded the Sibylline Books and the pecking of the sacred chickens; and who, amongst themselves, spoke of the Incarnation, the Eucharist, and the Trinity in the same tone in which Cotta and Velleius talked of the oracle of Delphi, or the voice of Faunus among the mountains."†

Of what use is the knowledge of literature independently of religious truth in taming the passions, in quenching pride, in moderating ambition, in stifling envy and all the malignant feelings of the natural heart? This knowledge may shed a gleam of light over the dark and cloudy day of adversity, and possibly minister consolation during the weary moments of languor and disease, but it cannot cleanse men from moral pollution: it cannot deprive death of its sting and the grave of its victory, nor speak peace to a man who is troubled with a sense of his sinfulness; it cannot give us the assurance of pardon, nor ensure our approval hereafter; it cannot "minister unto us an entrance abundantly into the everlasting Kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ."

The moral and spiritual regeneration and enlightenment of Europe were effected at the time just referred to, and are still effected, because the Reformers brought forward truths which they have taught us to discover int he sacred volume; because they constantly exhibited Christ as the sole atonement for known and forsaken sin; because they declared the truth asserted in those words—"not by works of righteousness which we have done, but according to His mercy, God saved us"; because they taught men that the love of Christ should constrain them, in dependence on God's Holy Spirit, to walk in the path of holy obedience.

The Bible, too—the unmutilated Bible, the Bible uncorrupted by the false interpretations of that Church which arrogates to itself the attributes and prerogatives of Deity—this is the moral lever by which the world is to be raised from its present state of degradation. We always recur with great delight to the testimony of a Deist, who, after having publicly laboured to disprove Christianity, and to bring Scripture into contempt as a forgery, was found instructing his child from the pages of the New Testament. When taxed with his flagrant inconsistency, his only reply was that it was necessary to teach the child morality, and that there was nowhere to be found such morality as in the Bible. We thank the Deist for this confession. If this be a certainty on the confession of its enemies, how great an advantage is there in the possession of the Scriptures, even if death were the termination of human existence. Let the Bible no longer circulate among the people, and we should quickly find, as during the dark ages of Europe, that honesty and integrity were no longer held in estimation, but had given place to fraud and extortion; that there was a universal enthronement of the idol of selfishness; that little or no sacredness was attached to domestic relationships, and that our firesides would soon lose all which gave them their attractiveness. Take away the Bible from a nation, so that there should no longer be the exhibition and inculcation of its precepts, and we should find that there would be a rapid introduction of false principles which would prepare the way for a total degeneracy of manners. Men would again be the slaves of evil habits and of vicious practices from which they were emancipated when they were brought into "the liberty wherewith Christ hath made them free."

> "He is the freeman whom the truth makes free,
> And all are slaves besides."

We do not, therefore, feel that we are giving an incorrect description of the blessings which flow from the circulation of the Scriptures when we say that by means of it the worst forms of evil are banished from a land, and its households obtain pure and invaluable blessings.

If we look at the Bible as an instrument of civilisation, we shall certainly see that in this sense also its circulation has been greatly advantageous to the nations of Europe. Which, I ask, are the countries where vice, ignorance, superstition, misery, and immorality reign triumphant? I answer, Italy and Spain, where the Bible does not circulate among the inhabitants. Which, again, are the countries whose fleets are on every sea, and pour into their laps the riches of the world; where even-handed justice is administered, and men have obtained that freedom which is their inalienable birthright? I answer, England, Scotland, and the United States. These countries enjoy all the higher blessings expressed in the words "Light and Liberty." The Bible, received and read by the inhabitants of those countries, because it contains whatever is requisite to correct the disorders of States, and to promote the happiness of families, has produced a revolution, including equally the cottage of the poor and the palace of the king, so that every rank, as though the wand of a magician had been waved over it, has been elevated in the social scale, and has been furnished with new sources of light, dignity, and happiness. If we, as Englishmen, continue in the course which God has marked with His approval, we need not fear that England's glory has reached its zenith: that we shall be called on to breathe a lamentation over her departed majesty. The land of Protestantism, the land the inhabitants of which labour for the circulation of the Scriptures, not only in England, but through the length and breadth of the world, shall continue the land of plenty, the land of peace. The sunshine of Heaven's favour shall sleep on her fields, and the blithe music of contentment shall be heard in her valleys. "The Lord of Hosts shall be with us; the God of Jacob shall be our refuge."

But we must look beneath the surface of society if we would have a full view of the blessings—of the light, the peace, the comfort, and the happiness—secured to us by the circulation of the Scriptures. We must go into families, and see how burdens are lightened and afflictions mitigated by the promises of Holy Writ. We must be with men in their struggles with poverty, and observe how contentment is engendered by the prospect of the riches which can never pass away. We must be with them in their retirements, and observe how they gather strength from the study of the sacred volume for the discharge of the various duties of life. We should thus see, for example, that the promises of the Gospel had nerved the arm and animated the heart of the heroic soldier amid the tumult of the battle-field; that they had supported the sailor on the wide waste of waters, when the storm was raging furiously around him. We must be with men and women on their death-beds, and observe how, animated by "the hope full of immortality," their spirits rise joyfully out of the ruins of the body, and wing their flight to the world of glory. We must be with them, too—if, indeed, we could accompany the spirit in its flight to heaven—as they enter the Divine presence, and prove, by taking possession of the promised inheritance, that they "have not followed cunningly devised fables." The amount of happiness conferred by the circulation of the Scriptures never can be known till God has laid open all secrets on the Day of Judgment. We must have access to the history of every individual, from his childhood to the time when he enters into his everlasting rest, before we can compute what the Scriptures have done for those who have received their truths into the heart, and are striving so to fashion their lives by them that hereafter they may not be ashamed before our Lord Jesus Christ at His coming.

In speaking of the circulation of the Bible, I must not omit to show that when distributed merely for private reading it may aid greatly in the evangelisation of a land. I believe, indeed, that ordinarily, through the simple proclamation of the message of the Gospel, God is pleased, in the first instance, to bring mankind to the saving knowledge of the truth, and afterwards to train them up for glory: "It pleased God by the foolishness of preaching to save them that believe." But I wish to observe that the mere distribution is often the means of producing a blessed result. I may illustrate the truth of that assertion by a reference to the translation of Wiclif's Bible in the fourteenth century. Difficulties, apparently insurmountable, stood in the way of the execution of his design, which embraced not only the translation of the Bible, but also its circulation among all orders of his fellow-countrymen. Those difficulties were the slow process of transcription by which copies were produced, and the enormous cost of each copy—equal to about £40 of our present money. Wiclif knew also that the sword of the persecutor would be unsheathed against him. But he persevered in his allotted task. Trial did not daunt, difficulty did not discourage him. We may form some idea of the eagerness with which, after its completion, it was read, and of the large number of copies issued, when we hear that nearly 150 manuscripts, most of them written within forty years of its publication, were discovered at the time of the preparation of the Oxford edition in 1850; that the most powerful measures were taken to suppress the version; that copies were burnt or destroyed as productions of heretical depravity; that those who possessed them were exposed to severe persecution; and that in the course of four or five centuries many more manuscripts were destroyed through accident or negligence. We are told that so great was the eagerness to possess the Bible that those who could not procure the volume would give a few loads of hay for the possession of some favourite chapters. They would hide the forbidden treasure beneath the floors of their houses, and expose their lives to danger rather than surrender the book; they would sit up all night, their doors being shut for fear of surprise, reading or hearing others read the Word of God; they would bury themselves in the woods; they would converse with it in silence and solitude; they would, while tending their flocks in the fields, still steal an hour for meditating on the good tidings of grace and salvation.

This study of Wiclif's Bible, carried on in silence and solitude through the fifteenth century, contributed to the religious knowledge which prevailed at the beginning of the Reformation, and prepared his fellow-countrymen to cast off the yoke of the oppressor. We can trace only indistinctly this education of the English people by means of it for the Reformation, because, from fear of persecution, it was carried on in the secret chamber, or in the lonely valley among the hills, or around the pale watch-fire in the bosom of some large forest. Thus, like the fabled river of old, the stream rolled on, as it were, in a subterraneous course, until at length it burst forth into the full light of day, and poured its fertilising tide over a parched and barren soil so as to clothe it with rich vegetation. "Then was the sacred Bible sought out from dusty corners; the schools were opened; divine and human learning raked out of the embers of forgotten tongues; princes and cities trooped apace to the newly erected banner of salvation; martyrs, with the unresistible might of weakness, shook the powers of darkness, and scorned the fiery rage of the Old Red Dragon."*

We may give another and a modern illustration of the blessed results often produced by the mere distribution of the sacred volume. A servant at one of the mission stations in Africa, in a fit of anger, killed his wife. Immediately he fled, and took refuge in a desert solitude. His only companion in that solitude was a copy of the Gospel of St. Luke, which he had carried away with him. He was for a long time oppressed with a sense of his guilt. At length, through prayerful meditation on this Gospel, he seems to have received the assurance that God had been pleased for Christ's sake to blot out his iniquities. One day, as he was wandering in the forest where he had constructed a hut, he encountered an old friend from a neighbouring village. He instructed him and two others who subsequently joined them in the records of heavenly truth. The end was that he was induced to go to a neighbouring village, where he succeeded in converting the leading man of the village and thirty-five others to the Christian faith. That leading man became a zealous propagandist. We have since heard that the slave-dealers have exterminated the Church. But it has not been formed in vain. We may be encouraged to persevere in the prosecution of our work of faith and labour of love by the thought of that man who, having obtained his knowledge of Divine truth from the prayerful study of the sacred Scriptures, was afterwards enabled to induce others in an unknown village in a remote district, far removed from external influence, to cast in their lot with the followers of the Lord.

The British and Foreign Bible Society has been a very successful agent in the work which has come before us. The founders cast into the ground a seed which has sprung up, and flourished, and grown into a mighty tree, "the leaves of which have been for the healing of the nations," long after those who planted it were silent in the grave. We believe that the agents of that Society have shaken to its foundation the usurped dominion of Satan. We earnestly pray that this work may continue to be successful, and that they may hasten forward the coming of the time when a song of triumph shall ascend from every part of an emancipated world.

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

INTERNATIONAL SERIES — SECOND QUARTER.

April 20th.—Forgiveness and Love.

To read—St. Luke vii. 36—50. Golden Text—1 John iv. 19.

I.  HE PHARISEE. (36.) Christ came to call all men to Himself. All sorts and conditions welcomed by Him. To-day read of a Pharisee inviting Christ to his house. Who were the Pharisees?

A rich and influential party of the Jews. Attentive to outward religious observances.

Mostly proud and self-righteous.

Why did Simon invite Christ to his house?

Perhaps from curiosity, having heard of His miracles.

Perhaps to show respect to this wonderful Man.

What did he give to Jesus?

Admission to his house.

A feast of good things to eat and drink.

What did he not give Him?

Water to wash His feet. (Gen. xliii. 24.)

A kiss (verse 44). Admission to his heart.

Why did he not give these? Because had no real love for Christ, no sense of sin, no seeking for pardon. Christ the Saviour was near him, but he received no blessing.

II. The Woman. (37—39.) Who was she? and how came she there?

A sinner—probably well known to many present.

Came because heard Jesus was to be at feast.

(Explain Jewish custom of strangers being allowed admission at a feast as lookers-on.)

What did she do? Stood, listened, thought of her past life. Then wept, washed Christ's feet with tears, anointed Him with ointment, kissed His feet.

What did all this show on her part?

(c) Love and devotion to His service.

She gave Him her best. She did what she could to show her love to Him.

III. The Saviour. (40—50.) Knew all that was passing in Simon's heart.

Knew his pride—offended at Christ's notice of the woman.

Knew his want of love to Himself.

Knew also the woman's true repentance.

Tells Simon a parable—to be applied to himself.

What did Simon think of himself?

What did the woman think of herself?

Which was most forgiven? Which loved most?

What, then, was the blessing to the woman?

(b) Peace for the future, because of her love.

Lessons. I. What think ye of Christ? With respect and admiration? or with love because of sin forgiven, grace received?

2. What think ye of yourselves? Good, upright, moral, respectable? or as sinners needing and seeking a Saviour? He came to seek the lost.

April 27th.—The Parable of the Sower.

To read—St. Luke viii. 4—15. Golden Text—verse 18.

I. The Parable. (4—8.) Find from St. Matt. xiii. 2, that Christ taught this parable while sitting in a boat on Lake of Galilee. Probably a sower came in view on the hill-side opposite. Notice:—

(c) The success in three degrees.

What were the three failures?

On way-side, trodden down or picked up.

On rock, withered for lack of moisture.

On thorns, choked for want of good soil.

Notice also a certain apparent progress.

First sown did not spring up at all.

The second formed a small root but no fruit.

The third came to flowers but no fruit.

The last on good ground, carefully dug, cleared of weeds, well watered, produced good fruit.

II. The Meaning. (9—15.) Given by Christ.

The sower—Christ and all who teach of Him; e.g., parents, ministers, teachers.

The seed—God's Holy Word, however taught; e.g., classes, sermons, reading, etc.

The ground—Man's heart.

1. The way-side—the Word heard—makes no impression. Heart not prepared to receive it. No prayer, no attention, no wish to learn; in some cases Word caught away at once by devil.

2. The rock—the Word does make an impression—heard with joy. But no root, no steadfastness. Temptation comes, e.g., ridicule, laziness, etc. Prayer, Bible-reading, good habits dropped. No fruit.

3. The thorns—the Word produces result. Profession made—God served for a time. But still failure. Why? Because other things mixed up with religion. What are they?

Cares, as with Martha. (Ch. x. 41.)

Riches, as with "rich fool." (Ch. xii. 20.)

Pleasures, as with Demas, who loved this present world. (2 Tim. iv. 10.) All these draw away the heart from God.

4. The good ground, i.e., ground prepared. How?

By prayer for the hearing ear and tender heart.

By pains in checking all that may hinder, e.g., bad habits, etc.

In such God's Word produces the fruit of good works, such as—

A character like Christ's—meek, forgiving.

A life given to God and His service.

Lesson. Take heed how ye hear.

May 4th.—The Ruler's Daughter.

To read—St. Luke viii. 41, 42; 49—56. Golden Text—verse 50.

I. A Child Dying. (41, 42.) All know something about sickness:—

It causes pain and suffering—hard to bear.

It comes to all alike—rich, poor; old, young.

Most sad to see a sick child—can do so little.

For such a child of 12 years Jairus came to Christ.

Notice—(a) He was an important man—a ruler of the Synagogue—churchwarden, as we should say.

(c) She was very ill—dying.

No wonder her father implored Jesus to come. So Christ started at once for the ruler's house.

II. A Child Dead. (49—53.) A crowd of people accompany Christ. First they are stopped by a woman, who is healed of her disease. Then a servant from Jairus's house is seen hurrying to meet them. What is the news? Better or worse? Alas! the child is dead. No use now in troubling "the Master." Have never heard of a dead person being raised to life. Have forgotten the three risings in the Old Testament by—

Elijah—widow's son—after earnest prayer (1 Kings xvii. 22).

Elisha—Shunamite's son—ditto (2 Kings iv. 34).

Elisha's bones—after a year (2 Kings xiii. 21).

So all pass on to the ruler's house. What do they find?

Father and mother in great agitation.

Child dead in the house.

Hired mourners already raising their cries.

What did Christ say? "She is only asleep."

How is death like sleep?

The person is unconscious, but can be awoke.

What did Christ do?

Took three disciples and the child's parents.

Spoke to the child—took hold of her hand.

Her breath comes back—she sits up, speaks.

What did Christ do next?

Ordered food to be given the child.

Restored her to her parents and home.

Bade the story to be kept quiet for the present.

Lessons. 1. Christ's sympathy. With sorrowing parents then, and with all in sorrow still.

2. Christ's tenderness. Giving child food at once.

3. Christ's power even over death. Will at last raise all. (St. John v. 25.)

But how does this affect us now that Christ is in heaven? His religion teaches:—

1. Sympathy with all in sorrow. (James i. 27.)

2. Help to those in want or suffering (St. Matt. xxv. 40).

3. Hope to those dead in sin now (Eph. ii. 1), and of resurrection hereafter (1 Cor. xv. 22).

May 11th.—Feeding the Multitude.

To read—St. Luke ix. 10—17. Golden Text—St. John vi. 35.

Introduction. Last lesson told of three disciples witnessing a miracle.

After that, the twelve apostles sent out to prepare way for Christ.

Their work was to tell the people of Christ, His coming, His love, His salvation. Their helps were power of healing, etc.

Now they return after a few days' absence.

I. A Desert Talk. (10—12.) Christ took disciples into desert place.

They told Him all they had seen, said, and done.

He cheered, encouraged and exhorted them.

Probably prayed with them, and gave fresh directions.

Their intercourse interrupted by a crowd of people. Christ used every opportunity of doing good. What did He do to them?

Spake of the Kingdom of God, i.e., of Himself and His work.

Healed all the sick among them.

The evening draws on. Notice three things:—

(a) The people's wants—food and shelter—are far from home.

(b) The apostles' unbelief—"it is a desert place."

(c) The Saviour's care—"Give ye them to eat."

II. A Desert Miracle. (13—17.) The story, being well known, can be briefly questioned on as follows:—

The time—evening—sun setting over the hills.

The place—unenclosed moor-land.

The people—five thousand men besides women and children.

The food—five loaves and two fishes prepared for apostles' meal.

The arrangement—fifty in a row, to prevent confusion.

The blessing on the food—said by Christ.

The distributors—the disciples, fellow-workers with Christ and ministers (or servants) of the people.

The supply—enough and to spare for all.

The fragments—gathered up that none should be wasted.

III. Lessons. (a) Natural. 1. All things to be done in orderly way.

2. God's blessing to be asked on food.

3. Waste always to be avoided.

(b) Spiritual. 1. Our souls also require food.

2. Christ gives, and is Himself the Bread of Life.

3. His ministers work with and for Him in giving that spiritual food.

4. Thanks be to God for this unspeakable gift.

5. This bread of life lasts unto life eternal.

6. Shall God's gifts be wasted?

7. Lord, evermore give us this bread!

"GIVE HIM ANOTHER CHANCE."

III. A STORY IN TWO PARTS.—PART II.

AND now, for a few days, things went on without a "sensation" of any kind. Mrs. Fiske was gratified by the success of her mission, for Bishopshaven is the "happy hunting-ground" of the itinerant public speaker; and Florida consoled herself for the tameness of old-fashioned hospitality by attiring herself in the most surprising toilettes, and flirting vigorously on every opportunity with Spencer Forwood. That youth was beginning to indulge in daring visions of throwing off the stern paternal yoke, to which he had so far submitted, not from principle, not even from necessity (for he had recently succeeded to a small fortune of his own), but from habit and moral timidity.

Mr. Stuyvesant had almost forgotten the little episode which cost Florida so much annoyance in the recollection; neither was he annoyed at the haughty, sullen manner which she invariably displayed towards him, considering it as the freak of a spoilt child. He was much occupied with election business, very happy in his love, thoroughly interested in his life. Is it not often at some such period of careless happiness that a man's self-forged destiny rises to confront him— "Speechless, with cold inexorable eyes"?

It was on the Monday following the events detailed in the last chapter that a shabby-looking individual accosted Stuyvesant as he was coming out of his committee-room, and "begged the favour of a word or two on pressing business."

In spite of his disreputable look, the fellow spoke with the accent of a man of education. His tone, too, suggested associations that were vaguely familiar. Harold led the way back into the room he had just quitted. It was now empty. He sat down, and pointed to a chair. The man took it, a rather sinister smile crinkling his unprepossessing features.

"I see you don't remember me," he said. "This is a little rough on an old pal."

"I don't know you," said Harold angrily, and not without a touch of uneasiness. "You are under some mistake."

"I?—never less so! I've knocked about the world, and lost my good looks, I suppose, and of course poor beggars like me must expect to be cut by their swell friends. But you've not altered since the time when we used to call you 'Handsome Harold,' at the old shop in the City—you'll remember it if you think a little. I should have known you anywhere."

At once the whole chain of circumstances connected with the man who was speaking to him rushed on Harold's mind. He blenched, and shrank back like one who has received a heavy blow, and, for a moment or two, found it physically impossible to speak. He had that hideous nightmare sense, so often accompanying the painful moments of life, of having lived through precisely the same experience before. He fought hard, with those scornful eyes upon him, for calm and self-possession, and at last said quietly —

"I know you now. You are George Moore."

"Come, come, my good fellow! a little more consideration. How do you know that there may not be painful associations connected with the old familiar name, for me as well as anybody else? You call yourself Stuyvesant, I notice. Well, I've nothing to say against that—at present."

"It is of no consequence to me what you choose to call yourself," Harold replied. "Perhaps you will kindly say at once what you want with me, as I am very busy."

"Well, you used to be a sharp youth. Unless you lost your 'cuteness' when you made your pile, you might have the sense to see that I've not been a fortunate man, like some I could name. No old buffer took a fancy to me when I came out of—I don't want to stir up painful memories: call it furnished lodgings, at Government expense—and took me into his family, and left me all his tin. I shouldn't have been down on my luck to-day, you may depend, if I'd had your chances."

"There's something in what you say," said Mr. Stuyvesant, who had now recovered his habitual calm, and was gravely scanning the inscrutably impudent face of his old acquaintance. The two were so different—he with his grave and graceful dignity of mien and person, the other marked from head to foot with the stamp of the gaol-bird—that it was difficult to imagine any tie of common memory or interest between them. "There's so much in it that if you want employment, although you have given me no cause to befriend you, I will see what I can do to help you."

"'Pon my word," said the other, with a sneer, "this is very kind. You'd exert yourself, perhaps, to the point of a fifty-pound clerkship, that I should have to slave ten hours a day in an office for. Come, be a little reasonable. I don't want to be disagreeable, but it wouldn't be quite nice for you if we didn't agree. You'd better make it worth my while to be obliging. What do you say to one hundred pounds a year, or a lump sum down? You are as rich as a Jew; it would be nothing to you."

"I offered to help you to a decent living," said Harold, suppressing his rising anger with difficulty; "you have no claim on me for anything else."

"Oh! I've no claim, have I? Come, Mr.—whatever your alias is—you'd better be civil, and consider your own interests. I understand you're quite a shining light in this town—you go to church, don't you? and take the chair at temperance meetings; and you're standing as candidate for the ward, hey? Pretty well for a common felon! for that's what you are; and I'll take care that every soul in the town knows it, too, unless you mind what you're about."

"Then, I understand," Stuyvesant answered, still quietly, "that unless I pay you any sum that you may choose to demand, you will endeavour to damage my reputation in the town by bringing up what took place twenty years ago, before I left England?"

"Yes, Mr. Ticket-of-leave, that is exactly what I do mean; and, what is more, that is what I'll do. I should have no difficulty, I assure you. I've spoken within the last month with people who remember you, and the circumstances of your leaving England, and the old bloke who took you away."

"I don't for a moment doubt," returned Stuyvesant, "that you can make my position here a very painful one. I don't expect you to spare me. You didn't spare me as a boy, when you, a mature man, played on my ignorance and vanity and led me into crime, of which you took the profit and left me to bear the blame. I was your dupe then, but"—here he rose from his chair with flashing eyes and dilated nostrils—"I won't be your slave now. To pay for your silence, to live on your forbearance! Never! Go, and do your worst!"

He pointed to the door with a look and gesture of such supreme contempt as the accumulated impudence of a lifetime could hardly support. With one hand on the door-knob Moore made an effort to rally.

"You'll think better of this," he said. "I'll give you till six o'clock."

"Go!" repeated Stuyvesant, and made a step towards him, on which his unwelcome visitor fled precipitately.

Then, as if some inner spring of action had given way, he sank into a chair by the table and hid his face in his folded arms. "My little Annie!" he murmured. "It's hard! It's hard!"

That evening, at half-past seven, the Albert Hall was filled with what the Bishopshaven Evening Mail called "a highly representative gathering." It did not mention among the representatives present Mr. George Moore, who had posted himself near the platform entrance. When the chairman came in, he touched him on the arm to attract his attention. Stuyvesant turned round on him haughtily—

"You have had my last word to you," he said, and passed on.

After a few minutes appeared the white head and tall, stooping figure of Mr. Edwin Prothero, escorting the lecturer; then followed two ladies, the one a magnificent brunette, the other fair and dainty, with clear-cut features and bright grey eyes.

"Which of them is Miss Prothero?" asked Moore of a man who stood near him. The answer was either indistinctly given or imperfectly heard, in consequence of which Moore slipped the piece of crumpled paper which he intended for Miss Prothero into the hand of Florida Challis, and having, as he thought, accomplished his purpose, and being quite disinclined to sit out a temperance meeting, he withdrew.

Miss Challis's hand closed over the note with the ease of long habit. Her experience in such matters dated back to her early boarding-school days. But no previous episode in her life had prepared her for what she read, when during Mrs. Fiske's address she found an opportunity to glance over the writing. It ran thus:—

"MISS PROTHERO,—DEAR MADAM,—As a sincere well-wisher, I write to warn you that the man you are engaged to marry is a common felon, who was sentenced to two years' imprisonment for embezzling his master's goods. What I say I can prove to the satisfaction of yourself or any of your friends, if you call or send to-morrow, between 10 a.m. and 1, to Guy's Hotel, and ask for Mr. William Baker."

She crumpled up the note in her hand, and grasped it with a sense of triumph. What a talisman she held! What a means of humiliating those who, as she thought, had humiliated her, if this should turn out to be true! She looked at Mr. Stuyvesant, and noticed that he seemed distrait and fatigued, and certainly was going through the duties of the evening with much less zest and geniality than usual. Nancy too had noticed it, for she watched him with some anxiety.

The light of half-suppressed elation in Florida's eyes made her handsomer than ever, and Spencer Forwood, who, with his father, accompanied the Protheros and their guests home, devoted himself to her under the very nose of his astonished parent. In the drawing-room after supper the two slipped away into the conservatory, while Josiah was deep in a political argument with his partner.

"How did you like the lecture?" said Florida.

"I know nothing about it," Spencer replied, gazing at this siren with a look that was meant to convey unspeakable things; "I was absorbed in looking at you."

"Don't be silly," she said. "There is something better for you to look at. What do you think of that?" she said, placing the note in his hand and watching him while he read it.

"Where did you get this?" he asked. "It is for Nancy. Has she seen it?"

"No," she replied, answering the latter query; "I don't think she had better at present. It was given me in mistake for her—very fortunately, I think; for I presume she and her friends would want to hush it up, and it seems to me it ought to be looked into."

"You don't think there 's anything in it?" said Spencer—not, however, with very sincere conviction, for the references that Mr. Stuyvesant had made to his own history in their last private conversation seemed to connect strangely well with this new information.

"I should like to know, anyhow," Miss Challis replied, "and I want you to find out."

"Well, it seems a pity," he said. "If it should be true it 's an old story; it must have happened ages ago. What is the use of raking it up, and making everybody uncomfortable?"

"I didn't know you were such a devotee of Stuyvesant. I know most people here don't call their souls their own when he 's around, and they would rather black his boots than not; but I didn't know you were one of that sort."

"I don't care for Stuyvesant," he protested. "I think he 's a prig. But I don't see the use of raking up old stories, and making a row."

"You think it is fair to Miss Prothero to let her marry such a man?"

"You might give her the note," he replied, "and let her do as she liked about it."

"Very well, Mr. Forwood," Florida answered, turning from him with a haughty bend of her swan's neck; "since you won't oblige me in such a trifle, I shall have to go myself." The dispute ended, of course, in Spencer making a humble submission, and promising to oblige his goddess anywhere or in anything.

"If there turns out to be anything in it," she said, just before they separated, "you had better put it into your father's hands."

"My father hates Stuyvesant," said young Forwood.

"Exactly!" she answered, smiling; "so do I!" And she sailed back into the drawing-room, whither he followed her, sore perplexed in mind, and more than half disposed to tell her that he would have nothing to do with her commission. But the grace and witchery of her beauty—that sumptuous tropical beauty of which one sees so few examples in lands where life is sharp and strenuous—bewildered his judgment and overpowered his will. Miss Hardinge was quite distressed at his obvious subjugation by this modern Calypso. "A loud, over-dressed girl," she said to Nancy, "ill-tempered, ill-mannered, half-educated. What can he see in her?"

"It is what he sees in herself, I think," returned Nancy, laughing. "You must admit she is worth looking at."

The upshot of the matter was that on the following afternoon, as Mr. Forwood, senior, sat in his private room at the bank, meditating a serious "opportunity" with his son on the subject of his attentions to the undesirable young woman at Edwin Prothero's, the youth appeared with papers and information concerning the candidate for the —— Ward, which drove everything else out of his head for the time being.

After this—but it would, perhaps, be unkind to infer connection, as Mr. Forwood always declared that he had acted with the greatest reticence in this painful matter—there appeared paragraphs in the local papers, and placards on the hoardings, referring sometimes jocularly to skilly and ticket-of-leave men, sometimes in accents of virtuous indignation to stained characters and public scandals. Finally, Mr. Stuyvesant, who, rather to the surprise of his friends, had initiated no action, received an invitation to attend a meeting with the object of deciding what was to be done with regard to the scandalous insinuations made by the opposite party, which no one on his own side had received authority to contradict.

IV.

IT was growing dusk, on the evening of the meeting, as Stuyvesant walked up the beech-tree avenue to the banker's house, slowly, with bent head and stooping shoulders, and the air of a man who is forcing himself to a hateful task; for that task must be hateful, the fear of which could so nearly efface the memory of what he had just come through. He had met his friends and supporters of three years' standing, most of them sure of his honour, and eager for his reputation. He had found that the only doubtful question with them was (as Edwin Prothero put it) whether he should trouble himself to expose, as he doubtless could most easily, these futile slanders, or whether they should be left to perish of their own rottenness. In spite of the banker's opinion, the sense of the meeting seemed to be that something must be done to stop the circulation of the falsehoods, when right athwart their preconceptions came the sad avowal, "I cannot contradict the statements. I cannot disprove them. In point of fact, they are absolutely true;" and then, without waiting to see the effect of this communication on the committee, he had left the room.

There was something, as we have said, harder than this before him. He had to make his confession to the girl whose love he had won, and who believed him the worthy object of her maiden fancy and her innocent pride. What would Anne Prothero, with her high sense of family credit and honour, "that felt a stain like a wound," her enthusiasm for whatever was honest and true, "lovely, and of good report"—what could she think of a man with a record like his? Then, when he remembered that next morning his miserable story would be the town's talk, and imagined how the secret envy which had followed him in his prosperity would gloat over the stain on his name, a sudden sense of help and healing came with the thought of Nancy's tenderness, Nancy's generosity, to be as quickly repulsed.

"I've done her harm enough," he thought. "I won't spoil her life. She couldn't love a man who has been—what I've been; and I won't take her pity. I'm not come to that!"

So on he went, and into the drawing-room, where the gas was lit, but lowered, so that the room lay in dusk shadow broken by fitful gleams of light from the fire, which played about the coils of Nancy's fair hair as she bent over it—for April evenings are cold in Bishopshaven. She was considering how to account for the fact that Harold had not been to the house for three days, and devising all manner of pretty scoldings for him; occupied also with thoughts of the infamous calumnies (so she called them in her heart) of which some vague echo, in spite of her uncle's thoughtful precautions, had come to her ears.

He paused in the doorway. She turned, rose quickly, and hurried to him, with a cry of surprise and joy. He had meant never to take her in his arms again, but now he held her close and kissed her passionately, saying in his heart, over and over, "For the last time, my love! for the last time!"

Something in the silent passion of his manner surprised the girl; she drew away, and turned up one of the gas-brackets, looking at him with an anxious tenderness.

"You are worried," she said; "you look wretched. What is it? You can't possibly be troubling about that nonsense in the Evening Mail?"

She came to him again, and put her hand upon his arm. He was standing with his back to the light, but at her touch he shrank away and turned round, and the look on his face terrified her.

"She caught his reluctant hands, as he spoke."—p. 432.

"Don't come near me!" he cried. She stepped back a pace or two, astonished and pained. He turned away from the look in her eyes; resting his elbows on the mantelpiece, he hid his face in his hands. "My love! how shall I tell her?" he groaned.

The "calumnies" of the Evening Mail again occurred to Nancy as the only possible explanation of his conduct.

"Listen, Harold," she said, touching his arm again, but timidly. "I know what people have dared to say about you; I don't wonder it distresses you. But never mind, for no one believes it." She paused, and her voice rang with scorn as she went on. "I can't see how you can condescend to care for such a thing. No one who knew you could fancy that you could ever have been dishonourable or dishonest."

She threw back her fine little head; her face was lit up with the proud trust in him which it was his business to destroy. Stuyvesant felt as he listened that the whole world held nothing so terrible for him as the judgment he was to read in those clear eyes. He was ready to cry out, in the bitterness of his misery and humiliation, "My punishment is greater than I can bear." Yet, after all, he was too much of a man to cower or hesitate long before an inevitable trial. He lifted his head, and met her questioning look with one of sad, unflinching purpose.

"Annie," he said, "I have been a villain to you. I let you think of me, I let you become engaged to me in ignorance of facts about my life, which, if you had known them, would have kept us apart. The Evening Mail is right in its facts. I have been a convicted felon. I served a term of imprisonment."

Her eyes dilated, her lips parted, she grew red and then pale while he was speaking.

"I can't believe it, Harold!" she said; "I won't believe it!"

The words broke from her instinctively, the expression, not of reason, but of the revolt of her whole nature against a hateful idea.

"Ah, Annie," he said, very sadly, "you must believe it, for it is so."

She stood by the fire, nervously twisting and untwisting her fingers, her brows knit, her firm lips set, her eyes fixed on the ground. He waited for a moment or two, but the suspense was too unbearable; he spoke again.

"Have you nothing to say to me, Annie?"

"What can I say to you?" she answered passionately. "You came here on false pretences—you deceived me. Am I to tell you it doesn't matter? What am I to say?"

Had she attempted to pity or excuse him, he must have cowered like a culprit before her, but her angry, reproachful words awoke an impulse of self-assertion within him.

"I won't ask you to think less hardly of me," he said. "It is some consolation to me now to see that I have not injured you as deeply as I had feared. But this I will say—that if twenty years of honest effort can atone for a crime, I have atoned. And as for deceiving you, why, when I came among you was I bound to publish my own disgrace, and tell strangers the story that I had spent the best years of my life in living down? Ask anyone in this town, ask the folks who knew me in America, if they ever observed anything in me inconsistent with the character in which I came among you."

He paused, but Nancy did not answer. She had sunk into a chair, and covered her eyes with her hand. He went on—

"All this does not excuse me to you, I admit. Nothing excuses me. I owed you my full confidence, and I withheld it because I knew your horror of disgrace, and I was afraid to risk my happiness. It is right that you should hate me for it. Some day, perhaps, when you are happy with someone worthy of you, you will think of me, and try to forgive me."

Then, as she sat with head bent and covered eyes, she felt his breath stir the hair upon her forehead as he bent over her. "God bless and keep you, Annie!" he said, and was gone.

As he went down-stairs, smarting in every fibre at the scene through which he had passed, Florida Challis met him. He passed her with blank, unseeing eyes; there was room just then for nothing in his mind but the figure he had left, the resentful attitude, the averted face. Florida had looked at him at first with hard curiosity, but the stony misery of his face awed her, and she crept up-stairs to her own room in a very subdued frame of mind—for her.

In the hall a familiar voice broke in upon his abstraction: it was Mr. Prothero, just coming in.

"Ah, Harold," he said, "I want thee. Come into the library."

The familiar name, the gentle friendly tone, conquered Stuyvesant's first impulse to break away. He followed the banker into the library, but refused the seat that was offered him.

"You want to tell me about the committee," he said. "Don't spare me. Nothing matters much now."

The old man laid one hand on his shoulder with great gentleness, and looked into the bitter, miserable face.

"Thou must not take this matter so much to heart," he said. "I think no less of thee, for one. It will make a talk, but thou wilt live it down."

The set face quivered at these generous words. "I don't deserve this from you," he said. "If I've injured anybody in the town by coming here under false colours, it's you and Annie. I feel your great goodness, but my mind is made up. I leave here to-night by the last train, and I shall not come back."

"That would be very ill-advised. I meant to tell thee the committee have decided to accept thy withdrawal; but as to leaving the town, even for a time, I think such a step would be ill-judged. There are many of us who feel that a man should not be brought into judgment for the errors of his youth, when he has given proof of sincere repentance and amendment, and we would all stand by thee. It would be difficult for thee, at first; but I am convinced it would be best."

"Mr. Prothero," said Harold simply; "I don't know how to thank you. I had one friend like you before; he came to see me after my trial, when I was disgraced and broken-hearted, and when my time was up he took me away."

"Was that Mr. Stuyvesant?" Edwin Prothero asked.

"Yes. I remember he spoke to me pretty much as you are doing. He did all for me that a man could do. He took me with him into a new country.

He took me into his counting-house; he gave me his name, and left me his money. You see what it has ended in. My comfort to-day is the hope that he knows nothing of this."

"My poor lad," said the old man, "it's a hard case."

"Ah, no! I can't let you say that. What criminal in a hundred had such a chance? No, I deserve all I got. As I sowed, so am I reaping. But, Mr. Prothero, I can't stay here."

"Why not? Have you seen Annie?"

"Yes," he answered. "She thinks of me as—as I deserve. I am glad of it. She will suffer less."

He took the old man's hands, and grasped them hard. "Good-bye," he said. "Heaven reward you for your goodness to me."

Mr. Prothero went to the door, and watched him as he hurried down the drive. Then he went slowly up-stairs to the room where Nancy was still sitting.

"Annie," he said, "did Harold tell thee he was leaving us?"

She looked up with a startled face. "No," she said. "When?"

"To-night, by the last train to London. He is very much broken down."

She made no answer to this, and was going out of the room when he called her.

"Thou wouldn't like me to send him a word?" he asked her, tentatively.

She shook her head, and went away.

In effective contrast—had she but known it—to the turmoil of spirit that was agitating the heads of the household, Mrs. Olinthus Fiske was sitting before a good fire in her own room, refreshing her mind before her evening address by a perusal of her favourite paper. At the sound of an opening door she remarked, without changing her attitude—

"I'm reading such a lovely address by dear Dr. T——. He does show so conclusively——"

"I presume you think it's Miss Prothero," Florida's voice broke in. She never used any ceremony in interrupting her mother.

"Oh, is it you, sweetest? I thought it was dear Annie. She promised to let me know when it was time to get ready."

"I guess it's about time now. Is Miss Prothero going with you?"

"She told me so."

"Well, I can't go around to-night, anyway."

"I didn't expect it, my love," said the mother, resignedly.

The absolute mutual independence of these two relatives was apt to amuse outsiders. Mrs. Fiske had long abdicated any pretence at control. She turned, however, with renewed interest at certain sounds which made her suspect that Florida was making a raid on her repositories.

"What are you doing at my drawers, dearest?" she demanded.

"Looking for your sal volatile. I've such a splitting headache."

"Oh, take a dose, and go and lie down at once. Promise me you'll lie down at once, darling!" ejaculated Mrs. Fiske.

"All right—don't excite yourself! I'd get ready if I were you."

And then she turned to go away, but paused and hung about the door a little, in a manner unusual for her.

"What is it, sweet?" asked Mrs. Fiske, in a preoccupied manner, getting out her best bonnet. "Try some of my eau-de-Cologne."

"Oh, it isn't that. Never mind," she answered; and muttering to herself, "What would be the use?" she went back to her room, not to lie down, as her fond parent had suggested, but to tax her ingenuity in getting as many things as possible into a small travelling-bag.

Mrs Fiske received a message while she was dressing to the effect that Miss Prothero had a headache, and could not go out, but that Miss Hardinge would accompany her. Florida's packing took her a long time for such a simple operation. She left it every now and then to walk distractedly about the room, with her hands pressed against her throbbing forehead.

"At any rate, he is miserable enough," she said to herself. "If that is any satisfaction, I have it. She has given him up—I feel sure of it. Cold, proper, formal, hateful, she never appreciated him—she hadn't the heart. If I felt that she would suffer—— She won't, though; it will be he and I. And he thinks nothing of me—nothing. I saw it in his face. O me! what a fool, what a fool I have been! As if that mattered, as if anything mattered now!"

She walked about her room so for a long time, tormented by a mixture of feelings which she would have found impossible to analyse; and then, driven, as usual, by a strong sudden impulse, she went along the passage and knocked at the door of Nancy's room.

Miss Prothero raised her head from her sofa-pillow at the summons. "Come in!" she said, sitting up. She had put on a blue wrapper, and unfastened her beautiful hair. She looked pathetically small and young, with the traces of trouble on her face, and for a moment Florida felt disposed to be sorry for her.

"What is it, Miss Challis?" she asked, in the tone of one who feels, but can hardly resent, an intrusion.

"I came to see if you could give me anything for my head-ache," Florida replied. She had just manufactured this excuse for coming in, and thought it a neat one.

Nancy got up at once to look for the remedy. While her back was turned, as she stood at the cupboard, Miss Challis opened fire.

"I suppose Mr. Stuyvesant thinks of leaving the town after this?" she said, with studied carelessness.

Nancy turned round with her face aglow. She felt that such an allusion at the moment was impertinent and unfeeling; but her self-respect did not allow her to say so to her guest.

"I believe so," she answered. "Here is what you want!"

"And you are letting him go?" asked Florida, ignoring the latter part of Miss Prothero's answer.

"I had rather not speak of it," said Nancy decidedly, sitting down again.

"But I will speak of it!" cried the girl, who had now lost all control over the passion that swept her into fiery speech. She towered above her hearer, in her superb young beauty, as she went on rapidly—

"I've held myself in too long. I must speak now, if I were to die for it. You thought it was good fun, I suppose, to laugh over me with your friends, but I wouldn't change with you now. I'm not ashamed—however good a joke it may seem to you—I'm not ashamed of having cared for Harold Stuyvesant. If he isn't the man I took him for, if he told you about me, so much the worse for him. And I've paid him out. I've driven him out of the town. If he is ashamed to show his face here, that is my doing."

Annie Prothero had sat, while this avalanche of words descended upon her, with an air half of bewilderment and half of scorn for any girl who could be so wanting in measure and reticence. The look in her face irritated the excited girl still further. She went on—

"You think this isn't ladylike, I daresay. I don't suppose it is. All the same, I wouldn't be you, Annie Prothero, with your reserves and your proprieties. There's one comfort—he knows you now. I saw by his face, when he came away from you, that you had broken his heart. To care for a man when he is well thought of, and to cast him away when he is in trouble and disgrace, that may be your idea of love. It isn't mine."

She stopped, exhausted with her vehemence. Nancy's face was hidden in the sofa-cushions. She was not given to crying, but the first tears that she had shed since she had heard Harold's confession rushed uncontrollably from her eyes. Florida looked down at her rival's bowed head, with something like compunction, and then turned to go.

"Wait a moment!" cried Nancy, sitting up and tossing back her fair hair. "What did you say that Harold had told me about you?"

"You know," said the girl sullenly.

"I assure you," said Annie, rising and speaking, "whatever you may have felt for him, or said to him, I have never heard of it till now. You are under some great mistake. You should know that he has too much honour to tell a girl's secret."

It is superfluous to say that clearness of perception and a fine sense of probity were not Miss Challis's most striking qualities; but a person must have been very dull, or very dishonest, not to recognise the transparent sincerity of Annie Prothero. Florida felt suddenly convicted of an egregious blunder. Annie went on, facing her with the same clear gaze—

"And if, under a wrong impression, you have done anything to bring this trouble on Mr. Stuyvesant and me, I think, when you consider it, you will see that we have given you no cause."

Florida hung her head and turned away.

"Here is the medicine," Nancy said. "I hope it will do your head good. Good-night."

But as she closed the door against the baffled intruder, she did not tell herself that she had come off conqueror. She was thinking of Harold as he had gone away from her that evening, looking as though his heart was broken.

V.

MRS. FISKE'S meeting was over at nine, and by eleven the sober household at Beech Hill had composed itself to rest. The two young ladies had not appeared at all during the evening, and Mrs. Fiske was left to the somewhat absent-minded attentions of Mr. Prothero and Miss Hardinge. The latter lady had just retired to her room, and was wondering whether Nancy would care to see her, when Nancy herself, in her fur cap and mantle, suddenly appeared. Her eyes shone like stars, her face was tense with excited resolution.

"Louisa, I want thy help," she said. "I am going to the station to see Harold before he goes away."

"Art thou out of thy wits, Annie?" said the other. "The house is shut up. Thou can't go now."

"I must go, and I will," she answered. "I can get out of the house without disturbing anyone; but I don't want to go alone so late. I want thee to come with me, Louisa."

Miss Hardinge stared at the idea that anyone should wish to involve her mature prudence in such an adventure. "But if thou wants to say anything to him," she said, very naturally, "why not write?"

"I haven't his address," said Nancy; "and it would be ever so long before he got it, and I simply can't let him go away without seeing him. I treated him shamefully to-day, Louisa. I said the most cruel things to him. I've failed him when he needed me most. And if we part like this, and there should be an accident on the line, or anything should happen to him—oh! it would break my heart!" she said, bursting into tears. "I must see him. I must ask him to forgive me! Do, Louisa, be good to me, and come."

Miss Hardinge was very soft-hearted where her young friend was concerned. She had also, like many other maiden ladies, a fondness for the romantic. The matter ended in her putting on her walking things, and stealing down-stairs after Nancy through the silent house, with the most curious sense of walking in her sleep.

A low-silled drawing-room window, easily unfastened, let them out on the lawn. The night was brilliantly fine—hardly a breath of wind stirred in the beech-trees over their heads. As they passed the lodge and came out upon the road, a cab stopped a few yards off, and someone got out and waited in the shadow. Miss Hardinge observed it; Nancy noticed nothing, as she walked forward, swiftly and silently.

They were not long in reaching the station, where Miss Hardinge broke the silence they had hitherto maintained.

"Will they let us go down on the platform?" she said.

Nancy went at once to the ticket-office, and took two tickets for the next station. Miss Hardinge, as she waited for her, suffered torments of fear lest they should be seen by someone she knew. She need not have troubled. They were not in the least danger of recognition.

It appeared that not many people were going to town by the late train. Four or five passengers paced up and down the illuminated space where the train stops; one more was walking in the outer darkness close to the end of the platform.

"There he is!" Nancy whispered, and for the first time her companion felt her trembling.

They went towards him in the dark, and he was about to pass them without recognition.

"Speak to him," whispered Nancy.

"Mr. Stuyvesant," said Miss Hardinge.

He stopped short, with a startled exclamation.

"Hush! I have brought Nancy. She would speak to you."

"Ah! Why have you come, Annie?" he said. "Haven't I done you harm enough?"

She caught his reluctant hands as he spoke.

"Oh, try and forgive me, Harold! Why didn't you wait a little? It was so sudden; but I know better now. I am so sorry, Harold—Harold!"

The words came brokenly, in a childlike abandonment of penitence.

Miss Hardinge did not hear what followed. She discreetly withdrew to a bench and sat down.

With a sudden rush and a shrill scream the London train panted into the station. There was the usual skirmishing hither and thither of guards, porters, and passengers. In the hurry two familiar forms seemed to pass her—a tall girl in a veil and a youth with a head of light hair that suggested nobody but Spencer Forwood. It must, she decided, be her fancy or an accidental resemblance.

In a few minutes the bustle was over and the platform deserted, save for a porter or two and for the two figures that were still walking up and down in the shadows.

Miss Hardinge was not in love, she was no longer very young, and may therefore be excused for feeling her position, in spite of the romance of it, decidedly irksome. Relief came at last, however, as Stuyvesant approached her with Nancy.

"Miss Hardinge," he began, with the abruptness of deep feeling, "you're a good woman; you're her friend; I'll go by what you say. She says she'll take me with my disgrace. What am I to do?"

"I think," said Miss Hardinge, with great embarrassment, "that Nancy should judge what is best for her own happiness."

"I have judged," said Nancy. "I have told him. What does it matter about the past? I trust him, and I honour him for what he is; and if he sent me away it would kill me. But you won't," she added, looking up at him.

Stuyvesant sighed like a man who yields against his will to a bitter-sweet compulsion.

"To give you a name that has been dragged through the mud, my darling——"

"Hush, Harold!" she interrupted. "I can bear anything but losing you."

The world of Bishopshaven was not as much startled as might have been expected by the new light thrown on the past history of its adopted townsman. Another even fresher and more startling sensation was dividing public attention—namely, Miss Challis's elopement and clandestine marriage with Spencer Forwood, which was discovered the morning after Mr. Stuyvesant's intended departure.

Of course, a great many people were found to be wise after the event. "What else could you expect," said some, "of a youth so tied down by a straitlaced old father? He was bound to break loose one time or another." "And what else could you expect," cried others, "of a girl who was allowed to run absolutely wild, while her mother was starring it on public platforms?" In the midst of this confusion of opinion and talk, the affairs of Annie and Stuyvesant escaped with less comment than they would otherwise have received.

Mrs. Fiske's "mission" was brought to a slightly premature close by this occurrence. The shock affected the poor lady's health to a serious extent. She had a sharp illness, through which Nancy nursed her with great kindness, and as soon as she was convalescent she returned to the States.

Mr. and Mrs. Spencer Forwood settled near London, and tried to amuse themselves with fancy farming. Its rural pleasures began to pall upon them; they sold their farm, and went abroad. Josiah Forwood still declares his determination never to receive his son, but Mr. Prothero's idea is that that determination will yield to time. He himself has lost nothing in the public eye by his niece's marriage and his own close friendship with Stuyvesant. The position of the best-loved man in Bishopshaven, which is his without a doubt, carries with it certain privileges.

Stuyvesant himself has retired from all public duties. The feeling against him is still strong in certain quarters, but it is gradually yielding to the persuasive influence of a quiet, useful, and beneficent life. And Nancy loves him none the less that she has had something to sacrifice for him. Taking his lot all in all, chequered as it is by an abiding shadow, it can hardly be said that his is—what he himself has never called it—"a hard case."

BABY HÉLÈNE

[The child alluded to in the following lines—and who was subsequently received into the English and American Orphanage in Paris—"was found sleeping peacefully upon the cold body of her dead mother, herself a gentlewoman by birth, and a deserted wife."]

TWO lie wrapped in the stillness deep—
The hush of a quiet dreamless sleep,
One to waken and wail and weep,
Baby Hélène.
Calm and chill is thy place of rest,
The calm of a dear dead mother's breast,
By whose kind arms thou shalt be caressed
Never again!

Cling not close to the broken heart—
God has stilled it and healed its smart;
Man had forsaken: thou too must part,
Lonely Hélène!
Poor little hands must their clasp unfold,
Poor wailing voice—all its woes untold—
Cannot call back the life that is cold—
Back to its pain.

Helpless, "forsaken"—terrible word!
Who can hear it with soul unstirred?
O hearts so cold that cannot be spurred
Such lives to win!
What is the fate in a callous world
Of desolate waifs on its mercies hurled,
In a city where flaunt the banners unfurled
Of gorgeous sin?

* * * * * *

Art thou so lonely? Nay! Christ reigns
In stately streets and in sordid lanes;
Still by the hands of His messengers deigns
His love to show.
Friends are around thee, little Hélène,
To tend and bless; as the sad days wane—
To teach thee to smile and gladden again—
New joy to know.

O English hearts, if 'tis good to relieve
The bodies that perish, the spirits that grieve,
O English hands, if ye "freely receive,"
Then "freely give!"
For Christ's sake give of your best, and earn
The joy of giving; by sympathy learn
The grim truth taught by poverty stern—
How hard to live.

Aye, hard to live when the courage dies,
And harder still under "alien skies"—
Strangers and pilgrims, sick, starving eyes
Homeward to strain. . . .
Yea, we will open unstinting hands,
Unstinting hearts drawn by love's rich bands
To our flesh and blood in the stranger-lands,
Nor give in vain!

THE MANIFESTATION OF CHRIST AS A WORKER.

BY THE REV. GORDON CALTHROP, M.A., PREBENDARY OF ST. PAUL'S, AND VICAR OF ST. AUGUSTINE'S, CANONBURY.

"This beginning of miracles did Jesus in Cana of Galilee, and manifested forth His glory; and His disciples believed on Him." St. John ii. 11.

IT appears, from the narrative of St. Luke, that after the forty days of temptation had ended, Jesus returned, "in the power of the Spirit," into Galilee. Whilst there, He encountered John, who had previously baptised Him, and John seized the opportunity of bearing witness to Him as the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world. (St. John i. 29.)

The result was that certain of the Baptist's disciples, together with some of their friends (about five or six men in all), attached themselves to the ministry of Jesus, and thus practically laid the foundation of the Christian Church.

Everything, as you have probably noticed, was very quietly done—done without parade and ostentation, and in the most natural and simple manner possible. Two young men follow Jesus, in the hope of engaging Him in conversation, and the interview which He grants them decides their future career. They then go out and bring others in, and a little company is soon gathered together, and the Saviour becomes a recognised religious Teacher—a Rabbi with His following—although no one but Himself really understands the true significance of what has taken place.

It may be supposed, however, that, quiet as the proceeding was, these new converts would expect some manifestation of supernatural power on the part of their Master, for they believed Him to be Messiah, and the prophets had spoken of wonders that Messiah should work: how that the eyes of the blind should be opened, and the ears of the deaf unstopped, and the lame man leap as a hart, and the tongue of the dumb sing. It was almost inevitable, then, that some manifestation should be looked for. But what manifestation? Probably one on a grand scale, such as the raising of a four-days' buried corpse from the dead, or the casting out of an obstinate devil from some poor oppressed demoniac, or the feeding of five thousand men with a handful of food. Such miracles would have seemed quite in accordance with the dignity of Him who had come for the purpose of overthrowing the dominion of evil, and of establishing in its stead the Kingdom of truth and righteousness upon earth.

But it was by a very different manifestation—by one much more simple and homely than might have been anticipated—that Jesus saw fit to strike the keynote of the coming strain, and to indicate the nature and character of His future ministry. He began His Messianic work by changing a certain quantity of water into wine at a simple marriage feast of peasants in a little village in the province of Galilee.

I. Let me just remind you of the circumstance. We suppose that Jesus had come with His disciples to pay a visit to Nathanael, "the Israelite indeed," whose home, as we know, was in Cana of Galilee. He has just arrived at the house when He receives an invitation to the wedding festivities of which we have just spoken. His mother, Mary—either as a near relative or as a very intimate friend—is present among the guests, and obviously occupying a post of honour, and Jesus determines to accept the invitation and to join the company. After a while, from some unexplained cause (for it can hardly be supposed that the accession to the guests of half a dozen such men as Jesus and His disciples could have made any perceptible difference in the drinking), the supply of wine begins to fail. There has been some mismanagement, some miscalculation, and it seems only too likely that the young couple will be placed in the painful and embarrassing position of hosts who have invited their friends and neighbours to an important entertainment, and then have neglected to secure a suitable and sufficient provision for them. The state of things is mentioned to Mary, and she sympathising, womanlike, with the trouble of her relatives—or with what would be their trouble, did they come to know of the circumstances—conceives the idea of extricating them from the difficulty by the help of her Divine Son. Two feelings—probably more—actuated her at this moment. There was the sympathy with the young couple, of which I have just spoken. Then, it may be—for one must not venture to speak too positively—there was the natural motherly pride in her wonderful Son, and the wish to see Him recognised and valued as He ought to be by the world at large. And, certainly—because she partook in the belief of His Messiahship, and knew that He had just entered upon the work of His life, there was the strong desire that He should announce Himself to the nation, and mark the opening of His ministry by some display of the power which God by His Spirit had just conferred upon Him. "Thou art the Messiah," we may suppose her saying, "and Thou must show Thyself. And who so fit to give the signal for the decisive act which shall make Thee known, as she who alone is cognisant of the secret of Thy mysterious birth, the mother who bore Thee—the mother who has watched Thy career from the first moment of Thine earthly existence even until now?"

Under the impulse of these feelings Mary speaks to Jesus: not dictating to Him, it is true, but simply mentioning the fact—"They have no wine." But although she does not presume to dictate to her Divine Son, she hints at what she wishes Him to do; and Jesus, reading the thoughts of her heart, is not altogether satisfied with her. Why not? it may be asked. Because Mary, good and holy woman as she is, has for the moment forgotten the true relation between her and her Son. She is thinking of the thirty years of duteous submission, of tender compliance with her every wish; she is expecting that state of things to continue. But—it is ended now; Jesus is engaged in His mighty Messianic work; He is about His Father's business; He is acting under the direction of His Father in everything, and He cannot allow of the interference of anyone—not even of the mother He loves, and not even in the way of a simple suggestion, because it is virtually an interference between Himself and His Father, and an attempt to set aside, or (as in this case) to precipitate, the Divine arrangements. Accordingly, he speaks in a tone of gentle, but still decided rebuke. That rebuke is not, of course, conveyed in the address "Woman!" which is, in the original Greek, or in the language used by Him, a term of profound respect; but it is conveyed in His repudiation of the relation which the virgin-mother has ventured to assume as established between them. In matters like these, He tells her, she has no hold upon Him now: "Woman, what have I to do with thee?" And yet, as if He shrank—as, of course, He did—from at all wounding her feelings, He intimates that the time may arrive when He shall feel at liberty to comply with her request: "Mine hour is not yet come."

This is enough for Mary. She humbly accepts the rebuke—which it must have been more painful for Jesus to administer than it was for her to receive—and accepts with it the latent promise that in some way or other, at some time or other (He Himself being left to judge of what is best) Jesus will display the power with which He has been Divinely endowed.

What followed you will, of course, remember; and yet perhaps I may as well recall it and comment upon it for a moment or two. There stood, probably in the vestibule of the room in which the banquet was going on, or it may be against the wall of the room itself, six water-pots of stone partially filled with water. The purifying ceremonies of the Jews on such an occasion as this were very numerous and complicated, and a considerable amount of water was required for them; so that, in all probability, these stone jars were the largest that could be procured in the neighbourhood, and must have held—judging from the statement of the Evangelist—about eighteen gallons of liquid apiece. Jesus directs the attendants to fill the vessels with water, and they obey, filling them up to the brim. When the water is drawn out for the consumption of the guests, it is found to be wine, and wine of so excellent a quality as to attract the attention of the man who is called the "governor of the feast." Whether this man was one of the guests, selected for the purpose of directing the proceedings, or a hired official, does not appear. His coarseness, however, points to the latter supposition; for he calls the bridegroom up, and compliments him upon the unusual liberality which he has displayed towards the guests. Other hosts, he says, are in the habit of giving their best wine first; and when the guests, by undue indulgence, have muddled their senses and blunted their palates—for that is clearly the meaning of his language—then the entertainer craftily produces the inferior vintage, and sets it before them, knowing that they have now lost the power to distinguish the quality of the wine. "But thou hast acted otherwise; thou hast kept the best wine back until now." With this rather vulgar jest, uttered, we suppose, to the bridegroom alone, and out of the hearing of the company, the narrative terminates.

You will observe, before we turn to another part of our subject, that the language of the ruler of the feast implies the intoxicating quality of the wine consumed on these occasions; but, at the same time, that it does not imply that there had been, or was likely to be, any excessive indulgence or any unseemly behaviour on the part of the guests at this particular banquet. Had there been a tendency in such a direction, the presence of Jesus amongst them would assuredly have checked it at once. The man simply alludes, in his rough jocular way, to what he knew to be the general practice at similar entertainments. He has nothing to say against the guests at the table before him.

II. Let me now pass on to consider some thoughts suggested by the narrative. We may notice, then, that by the miracle of the turning of water into wine the Lord Jesus is said to have "manifested forth His glory;" and by means of that manifestation to have confirmed the faith of the little band of young men who had already attached themselves to His person and His ministry. It was a true instinct which led the disciples—independently, perhaps, of the prophetic utterances of Isaiah—to anticipate that the works of the Messiah would be signalised by acts of supernatural power. That at this time they understood His real character, and knew Him to be very God of very God, the only-begotten of the Father, is not, of course, to be supposed. They arrived at the conception of His Godhead by slow degrees, as the result of a long and laborious training. But they knew enough to know that there would be an uniqueness about the person of Messiah, and that He would lodge and settle Himself in the world as a sort of central and controlling influence, subduing all that was evil and developing all that was good; and, knowing this, they could not but expect to witness some gleams, some coruscations of a Divine authority befitting the peculiarity of the mission which He had come to fulfil—in other words, they looked for miracles; and a Messiah without miracles would have been to them a Messiah to be suspected as not being adequately supplied with the requisite credentials. When, therefore, their Master put forth His power, they were strengthened and encouraged. They felt that they had made no mistake. It is true that they had not been attracted to Him by miracles. No; the Lord Jesus, to them, was His own attraction. His person, His manner, His words, His teaching, were enough; and this was as it should be. Christ had no need to say to them, "If ye believe not me, believe the works"—for they did believe Him. But, at the same time, their confidence in Him was not a little deepened—their attachment to Him was not a little confirmed—when they witnessed this manifestation of His glory at the marriage-feast in Cana of Galilee.

But this turning of the water into wine was not only a miracle, but it was also, as we read, "the beginning of miracles:" the words implying, we suppose, that the disciples were directed to gather from it what the nature of the Saviour's work on earth would be. Now, if we are justified in adopting such an interpretation, let us consider what, in all probability, the narrative is intended to teach us. We may suppose it intended to show that the Lord Jesus Christ made it His business to elevate our human existence, and to fill it with joy. From the water to the wine was an upward step. And Christ came to replace the Law by the Gospel, and to lift men from the bondage of service into the freedom and privilege of sons of the living God. And then, as to the "joy." We do not, of course, refer to the carnal and worldly joy—the joy of success and prosperity—far less to the joy of pleasure and surfeiting, but we mean the "new wine of the Spirit"—the joy and peace in believing which Christ has purchased for all those who serve Him and love Him. There is a stern side to our holy religion: no doubt about it. We have to deny ourselves; we have to crucify the flesh, with its affections and lusts; we have to be vigilant and self-controlling; we have to be on our guard against formidable perils—formidable because unseen. More or less, in fact, we have to be upon the strain—to keep ourselves up to the mark, as the runner does who presses towards the goal at which he hopes to receive the prize; as the soldier does who stands fully armed upon the battle-field, and dares not quit his post until the conflict is over, and the captain has given permission to him to return to his tent. But for all that, the prevailing characteristic of the Christian life is joy—joy in the Lord. Even our sorrow is turned into joy, as the water was turned into wine. And the Lord Himself and His apostles aim, as they tell us, at the "fulfilling of the joy" of the disciples. These things writes he unto you "that your joy may be full." Yes, brightness and buoyancy—a brightness and a buoyancy, not of animal spirits, but of spiritual feeling—and with these things a delight in the service of Christ, and an evident enjoyment of religion—are what ought to be found in the true followers and disciples of the Lord; for Jesus came for the purpose of making the position of His people—even in this world, to say nothing of the world of the hereafter—a happy and a blessed one.

We may gather another lesson as to the mission of Christ in the world. He came, if I may so speak, to work up already-existing material into better and nobler forms. In the miracle before us, He can hardly be said to have created—at least, not if we mean by "creation" making out of nothing. The water was there already. He turned it into another liquid. He re-modelled, re-formed, re-constituted it. It was really a new thing made out of an old. And have we not here an illustration of His work amongst us in spiritual things? The change which takes place in a man when he becomes a living member of the mystical body of Christ is a tremendous one, and Scripture employs the most striking and picturesque language wherewith to describe it. The man who has been converted; has been born again; has been made a new creature in Jesus Christ; has passed from darkness to light—"from the kingdom of Satan to the Kingdom of God." Before, he was like a dead body—dead in trespasses and sins; now, he is a living man, alive unto God. What forcible expressions these are! The sacred writers labour, if I may say so, to set before us the greatness, and the extent, and the importance, and the far-reaching issues of the spiritual event that has occurred. And more than this, they trace up the bestowal of the blessing to the secret counsels of the Most High. The children of God are "born, not of blood nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God." And, yet again, they represent the work as the work of Omnipotence, and tell us that none can communicate spiritual life but the Lord, the Giver of Life, God the Holy Ghost Himself. But is it wrong to say that the man who is the subject of the change is the same man throughout? Paul, after his conversion, does not cease to be Paul. He is Paul—I would not say "reformed," for the word is inadequate, if not misleading—but I would say "re-cast." He is not put away, and another person substituted in his place, as would be the case if a work of new creation—in the literal sense of the word "creation"—had been accomplished. He is Paul still, but Paul with the whole current of his being turned round and flowing in a new channel; Paul, with every feeling and affection directed to God, instead of to self; Paul, with every faculty, and power, and capacity of his grand nature devoted, by one supreme and absorbing act of self-consecration, to his God and Father, in the Gospel of the Eternal Son. And what is true of Paul becomes equally true of everyone who by grace is led to quit the world, and to join himself in sincerity and in truth to the Church of the living God.

With one thought more I conclude. Fault has been found by unbelievers with the Saviour on account of the very considerable quantity of wine produced on this occasion. Now, we know nothing about the number of the guests who had to consume it; and this we may be perfectly sure of—that had the wine thus made been in any way a temptation to the assembled company, the miracle would never have been wrought. But this we may say, I think, with almost equal confidence — that the bounty of the Saviour is in perfect keeping with what we know of the Divine character and dealings. Not stintedness, but profusion—is what we behold in nature: flowers bloom in unseen and desert places; fruit drops in ripe abundance from the bough where there is none to gather it. And not stintedness, but profusion, is what we behold in Grace. We have not only what we need provided for us, but more than we need, and enough and more than enough for all. "God is able," says the Apostle, "to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think, according to the power that worketh in us."

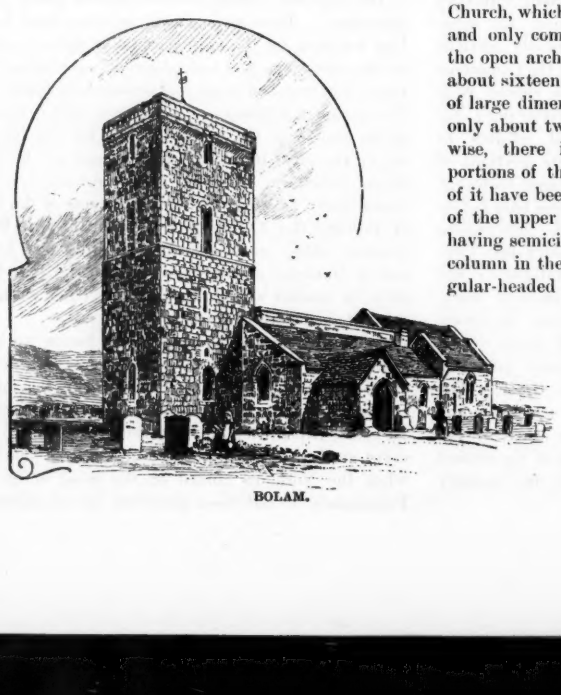
We have then here another of the manifestations of Christ—His manifestation as a Worker for the Kingdom—as we have had already His manifestation to the Gentiles, His manifestation to Himself, and His manifestation to John the Baptist.

CONCERNING SOME OF OUR MOST ANCIENT CHURCHES.

AMONG the ancient churches we still possess are some that were already ancient when William the Conqueror landed on our shores with his martial following; for we have still edifices in which there are portions of the simple, massy buildings that were reared by pious Saxon masons long before it came into his heart to win England. Alterations and extensions made since those old hoary days have given several later features to the buildings; but they yet possess some of the first massive work, standing as the Saxons placed it stone by stone. Saxon chroniclers, too, have handed down to us mention of several buildings that were esteemed wonders in those dim and distant times. The examples we possess corroborate their accounts; and looking first to one and then to the other, we are able to put together a fair presentment of the earliest stone churches that sparsely studded the country before the Norman Conquest.



The vigorous, earnest Saxons founded many of our cathedrals. Their strong work in these chief buildings has been for the most part taken down to admit of the extensions and splendours of succeeding centuries, but traces of it are still occasionally found. In Peterborough Cathedral, for instance, quite recently, in the course of the works needed for the rebuilding of the great tower, the foundations of the early Saxon cruciform building were uncovered. And about thirty years ago various fragments of the work of Edward the Confessor were identified in Westminster Abbey, such as columns three feet and a half in diameter, and walled-up windows. It is, however, in smaller structures that our chief examples of their skill may be seen.

Some very interesting instances of Saxon work are underground, in crypts. We may almost assume that these receptacles were usual features in the largest Saxon churches. We know they were formed at Hexham, Ripon, Repton, Canterbury, and York. The crypt at Hexham was nearly four hundred years old when the Normans landed on the coast of Sussex. Fortunately, it has been preserved for us exactly as the Saxon masons left it. We may see for ourselves they took such stones as were ready to their hands for its formation, for several of them are of Roman fashioning. A Roman tablet which is built into the roof of one of the entrance-ways has an inscription upon it that sets forth that it was dedicated by certain Roman soldiers to certain Roman emperors ; and another inscribed stone built into the vaulted cell records that a legate of Augustus erected it as an altar to his divinity, in performance of his vow. The Saxon masons took no account of these relics of their predecessors, except to gather them together and stolidly build them up as wall-stones, with other fragments of Roman work. The Ripon crypt, familiarly known as St. Wilfred's Needle, is very similar in size and construction, and is as plain and massy. Some steps in the nave of the cathedral lead downwards to a passage forty-five feet long, which leads to the chapel, or oratory, which measures rather more than eleven feet in length, and is seven feet nine inches wide. The Repton crypt, in Derbyshire, is somewhat lighter in character, and much larger. As in that at Hexham, and as is usual in these subterranean chapels, there are three entrances to it. It is about seventeen feet square ; and the vaulted roof is supported by four columns, the shafts of which are ornamented with wreaths, while the caps and bases are plain. As is the case at Canterbury, the York crypt has been disturbed, but in the herring-bone work there we may believe, without much fear of error, that we see some of the stones of the building in which Paulinus baptised King Edwin and two of his children, or of the structure erected on the spot immediately after that ceremonial.

We have several church towers that are of unmistakable Saxon workmanship. Saxon masons had peculiar modes of building that are easily recognised. They gave their corner-stones the first consideration, as a rule. These were about two feet in length, and they placed them alternately longways and shortways ; first a long stone placed as if in its natural bed, and then one above it placed on end, and on the top of that another longways, as in its natural bed again, and then another endways till the full height they desired was attained. In a tower this "long and short work," as it is designated, is generally seen at each angle, and the wide wall-spaces between them are filled up with rough rubble-work, or much smaller stones placed as they came to hand, without any particular lines or courses being aimed at. Occasionally we find a building that is authoritatively recognised as Saxon without this long and short work, but only very rarely. Instead of it, there may be courses of another disposition of stones, called "herring-bone work," in which a row of stones is placed aslant in one direction, with another inclining the contrary way above it.

Another peculiarity is shown in the tower of Earl Barton's church, in Northamptonshire, where long thin stones are so placed as to project slightly from the face of the rest of the masonry in long, straight, perpendicular lines. The tower of St. Peter's church, Barton-upon-Humber, is built in a somewhat similar manner, with the difference that the rubble-work is let in a framework of freestone arranged in compartments. There are Saxon towers at Bolam, Brigstock, Barnack, Brixworth, Bywell, Billingham, Corbridge, Ovingham, Wearmouth, Whittingham, and other places, with either one or another of these characteristics. The early writers mention porches of entrance, which it is supposed, from examinations of the remains handed down to us, were formed by four doorways in the lowermost stages of the towers. Wearmouth Tower has four such openings ; and the tower of Jarrow church had the same. Brixworth tower had also four openings in it on the ground-floor, before the Normans touched it. Some towers had no external entrance, as in the tower of Whittingham Church, which is built with the long and short work, and only communicates with the edifice by means of the open arch on the eastern side. This example is about sixteen feet square ; and but few of them are of large dimensions. The tower of Bolam church is only about twelve feet square. In this edifice, likewise, there is no external entrance. The lower portions of the window-openings of the lowest stage of it have been enlarged to give more light, but those of the upper stages are untouched, the belfry stage having semicircular headed couplets with a recessed column in the centre, and the uppermost stage triangular-headed single lights. There is no long and short work, but at the top of the tower is a course of herring-bone work. In Plantagenet times a projecting parapet has been added. Neither is there any external entrance to the tower of Woodhorn church, the Saxon piers and arch and turret stair of which are still remaining, though the three outer
